Conſtant. abſent by reaſon of his age. But his Presbyters were there, and ſupplied his place. The Emperor Conſtantine was the only perſon of all the Princes ſince the Foundation of the World, who (after he had platted ſuch a Crown as this by the Bond of Peace) dedicated it to Chriſt his Saviour, as a divine Preſent and Acknowledgment for the Victories he had obtained over his Enemies and Adverſaries, having conſtituted this Synod convened in our days to be a lively Repreſentation af that Apoſtolick Choir. For it is * written that in the Apoſtles Days there were gathered together devout men out of every nation under heaven, amongſt whom were Parthians, Medes, and Elamites, and the Inhabitants of Meſopotamia, Judæa and Cappadocia, of Pontus and of Aſia, of Phrygia and Pamphilia; of Ægypt, and of the Parts of Libya adjacent to Cyrene: Strangers alſo of Rome, Jews and Proſelytes, Cretians and Arabians. This was the only thing wanting, that meeting [in the Apoſtles times] did not conſiſt of the Miniſters of God only: But in this preſent Aſſembly the number of the Biſhops exceeded (a) three hundred. And the Presbyters that accompanied them, the Deacons, * Acoluthi, and the many other perſons were almoſt innumerable. Of theſe Miniſters of God, ſome were eminent for their Wiſdom and Eloquence; others for their ſober and diſcreet Lives, others for their patient ſufferance [of hardſhips,] and others were adorned with (b) Modeſty and a courteous Behaviour. Some of them were highly reſpected by reaſon of their great age, and others were eminent for their youthful Vigour both of Body and Mind. Some were newly initiated into the Order of the Miniſtry. To all theſe the Emperor commanded a plentiful proviſion of Food to be daily allowed. † Thus much ſays Euſebius concerning thoſe there aſſembled.

* See Acts 2. 5.

(a) The Ancients are not agreed concerning the number of Biſhops that were at the Nicene Council. Euſebius (in his third Book, Ch. 8. concerning the life of Conſtantine) ſays, they were two hundred and fifty. Euſtathius Biſhop of Antioch (in his Homily on thoſe words of Solomon, The Lord created me, &c.) affirms they were about 270; but ſays he had not caſt up their number exactly. The more conſtant account (which is confirm'd by the conſent of all modern Authors) is, that there ſat in that Synod 318 Biſhops, which is confirmed by theſe Ancients; viz. Athanaſius, in his Epiſtle to the African Biſhops, near the beginning; Hilarius, in his Book againſt Conſtantius; Jerome, in his Chronicon; and Rufinus. See Valeſius's Notes on Chap. 8. of Book 3. of Euſebius de Vitâ Conſtant.

* Ἀκολούθων, followers, or attendants

(b) Τῷ μέσῳ τρόπῳ κατεκοσμήντο. Many ſenſes may be given of theſe words. For firſt [μέσῳ τρόπῳ] may be taken for [Modeſty and a courteous Behaviour;] ſuppoſing [μέσῳ] to be put for [μετείῳ.] this ſenſe we have followed in our Verſion. Secondly, [μέσῳ τρόπῳ] may be meant concerning them, who were not the eminenteſt perſons amongſt the Biſhops for Learning or Piety of Life; but did not come much behind them. So the Ancients called thoſe Medios principes ac duces, middle Princes or Captains, who were neither the beſt, nor the worſt, but between both. Laſtly, this phraſe may be uſed concerning them, who deſerved to be praiſed on both accounts, to wit, for their Learning and Sanctity. And thus Sozomen interprets this place of Euſebius, as may be ſeen from his words in his Firſt Book, Chap. 16. See Valeſius's Notes on Chap. 9. of the Third Book of Euſebius, de Vitâ Conſtant.

† In the Allat. MS. there are ſome words added here; in which Copy the reading is περὶ ὧν ἐκεῖ συνελθόντων ὁ Παμφίλου διεξῆλθεν Εὐσέβιος, concerning thoſe there aſſembled, Euſebius Pamphilus has thus at large diſcourſed:] which reading has a greater Emphaſis. Valeſ.

When the Emperor had ended his triumphal Solemnities for his Victory over Licinius, he himſelf came alſo to Nice. The moſt eminent amongſt the Biſhops were theſe two, Paphnutius Biſhop of the upper Thebaïs, and Spyridion Biſhop of Cyprus: but for what reaſon we have made mention of theſe two particularly, ſhall in the ſequel be declared. There were alſo preſent a great many Laïcks, well skilled in Logick, ready to aſſiſt each their own party. Now the Patrons of Arius's Opinion were theſe. Euſebius Biſhop of Nicomedia, (whom we mention'd before,) Theognis and Maris: the firſt was Biſhop of Nice, and Maris was Biſhop of Chalcedon in Bithynia. Againſt theſe Athanaſius (who was then but a Deacon of the Church of Alexandria) contended vigorouſly. But Alexander the Biſhop had an high eſteem for him: upon which account he became the ſubject of envy, as we ſhall declare in the ſequel. A little before the Convention of the Biſhops in one place, the Logicians exerciſed themſelves by engaging in ſome skirmiſhing diſputes with ſeveral perſons: and when many had been enticed to take a delight in diſputing, a Laick, one that was a Confeſſor, an honeſt well meaning man, oppoſed theſe Diſputants, and told them thus: That neither Chriſt nor his Apoſtles taught us the art of diſputing, nor vain ſubtilneſs, or fallacies, but a plain (c) Opinion, which is to be guarded by faith and good works. All that ſtood by, hearing him ſpeak theſe words, admired him, and approved of what he ſaid: and the Logicians themſelves, having heard this plain and honeſt declaration of the the truth, did in future more patiently acquieſce: and thus was that tumult, which had been raiſed by diſputing, compoſed. The next day after this all the Biſhops were conven'd in one place; after whom came the Emperor: Who when he came in, ſtood in the midſt of them, and would not take his ſeat till ſuch time as the Biſhops had by bowing of their heads ſignified to him, that it was their deſire he ſhould ſit down; ſo great a reſpect and reverence had the Emperor for thoſe men. After ſuch a ſilence was made, as was agreeable to the occaſion, the Emperor from his Chair of State began to ſpeak to them in kind perſwaſive words, exhorting them to unanimity and concord. He alſo adviſed them to paſs by all private animoſities. For many of 'em had brought in accuſations againſt one another: and ſome of them the day before had preſented petitionary Libels to the Emperor. But he, adviſing them to proceed to the buſineſs before them for which they were convened, gave command that the Libels ſhould be burnt, adding only this [maxim,] Chriſt commands him, who deſires to obtain forgiveneſs, to forgive his Brother. Therefore, after he had at large diſcourſed upon Concord and Peace, he referred it to their power and arbitrement with a greater accuracy to make a further inſpection into the points of our Religion. It will be very opportune to hear Euſebius's relation of theſe affairs, in his third Book of Conſtantine's Life. His words there are theſe: * Many Queſtions being propoſed by both Parties, and a great Controverſie raiſed even at the firſt beginning [of their debate,] the Emperor heard them all very patiently, and with an intent mind deliberately received their Propoſitions; by turns he aſſiſted the Aſſertions of both Parties, and by degrees reduced them, who pertinaciouſly oppoſed each other, to a more ſedate temper of mind; by his gracious Speeches to every perſon, which he ſpoke in the Greek Tongue, (for he was not unskilled in that Language) he rendred himſelf moſt pleaſant, acceptable, and delightful; inducing ſome to be of his

(c) I prefer the reading in the Allat. MS. in which, inſtead of [γυμνὴν γνώμην, a plain Opinion,] it is [γυμνὴν γνῶσιν, &c. plain Knowledge, &c.) Epiph. Scholaſticus followed this latter reading, as appears from his Verſion of this place. Socrates ſeems to to have had this Narration out of Rufinus's tenth Book, where he treats concerning the Nicene Council. But Socrates on ſet purpoſe alter'd ſome things. Gelaſius treating on this ſubject, enlarges upon it, relating the Queſtions of each of the Philoſophers, and the Biſhops Anſwers thereto. All which paſſages of his, look more like Fables, than an Hiſtory of what was done. Valeſ.

Opinion

Constant. Opinion by the force of his Arguments : wooing others by Entreaties ; praising those who spoke well, and exciting all to an Accommodation ; at length he reduc'd them all to an Unanimity and Conformity in Opinion concerning all Points that were in debate. So that there was not only an universal Agreement about [the Articles] of Faith, but also a set time generally acknowledged for the Celebration of the Salutary Feast [of Easter.] Moreover, the Decrees ratified by a common consent were engross'd and confirm'd by the Subscription of every Person. These are Eusebius's own words concerning these things, which he has left us in his Writings : We thought it not unseasonable to make use of them ; and have inserted them into our History, relying upon the Testimony of what has been said by him : That in case any should condemn this Council of Nice as erroneous in the [matters of] Faith, we might take no notice of them, nor credit (d) Sabinus the Macedonian, who terms all those that were convened in this Council, Idiots and Simple Persons. For Sabinus (Bishop of those Macedonians which dwell at Heraclea a City of Thrace) who made a Collection of the Canons which several Synods of Bishops publish'd, reviles the Bishops of the Council of Nice as being Idiots and Ignorant Fellows, being insensible that he does also at the same time accuse Eusebius himself as an Idiot, who after a most exquisite search into it made a confession of that Faith. Some things he hath designedly omitted : Othersome he has depraved and changed ; but he has interpreted all Passages according to his own sense and design. He does indeed commend Eusebius Pamphilus as a Witness worthy to be credited. He does also praise the Emperor for his Judgment and Skill in the Principles of Christianity ; but he complains of the Creed published at the Council of Nice, as being set forth by Idiots und Men that understand nothing. And that same Man's words, whom he calls a wise and faithful Witness, he voluntarily contemns. For Eusebius testifieth, that of those Ministers of God that were present at the Council of Nice, some were eminent for their prudent eloquence ; others for their gravity and solidness of life ; and that the Emperor being present reduced them all to an agreement, and made them to be of the same mind and opinion. But of Sabinus (whersoever necessity requires) we shall hereafter make mention. Now the agreement in [the Articles of] our Faith (e) published with loud acclamations, by the great Council of Nice, was this.

(d) This Sabinus was Bishop of the Macedonians in Heraclea, a City of Thrace ; he made a Collection of the Synodical Acts ; a very useful Work : The Testimony whereof Socrates does frequently make use of in this his History. But Socrates reproves him in many places ; both because he was unfaithful in his Collection of those Acts, (studiously relating what conduc'd to the strengthning of his own Heresie, and omitting the contrary,) and also in regard he always shews himself incensed against the Orthodox Bishops. An instance whereof is this Relation of Socrates's here ; where he says, that Sabinus term'd the Fathers of the Nicene Council ignorant and simple Fellows. But 'tis usual for Hereticks to calumniate the Holy Fathers and Doctors of the Church. Vales.

(e) In the Allat. MS. the reading here is [Ἡ δὲ ἐν νικαίᾳ παρὰ τῆς μεγάλης συνόδου καὶ ἀπὸ Εὐσεβίου μεγαλοφώνως ἐπαινεθεῖσα συμφωνία, &c. Now the agreement in the Faith with loud Acclamations approved of by the Great Synod at Nice, and by Eusebius, &c.] Epiphan. Scholast. followed the same reading. Vales.

(f) This following Creed is wanting in all our MSS. viz. the King's, Sfortian, and Florent. But Christophorson did very well in placing it here : for 'tis plain both from Epiph. Scholast. as also by those following words, [ταύτην τὴν πίστιν τριακόσιοι, &c. this Creed three hundred, &c.] That it was placed here by the Historian himself. But all the MSS. did omit it in this place because 'tis repeated a little after in Eusebius Pamphilus's Epistle. Vales.

(f) We believe in one God, the Father Almighty, Maker of all things visible and invisible : and in one Lord Jesus Christ the Son of God, begotten of the Father, the Only begotten, that is, of the substance of the Father : God of God, and Light of Light ; very God of very God ; begotten not made ; of the same substance with the Father ; by whom all things were made, that are in Heaven and in Earth ; who for the sake of us men, and for our salvation, descended, and was incarnate, and was made Man, and he suffer'd and arose again the third day, ascended into the Heavens, he shall come to judge the Quick and the Dead. [We also believe] in the Holy Ghost. But the Holy Catholick and Apostolick Church doth Anathematize those that aver, that there was a time when the Son of God was not, and that he was not before he was begotten ; and that he was made of Nothing ; or that say he was made of another Substance or Essence ; or that he is either created, or convertible, or mutable. Constant.

This Creed three hundred and eighteen Bishops approved of and embraced : and (as Eusebius testifies) being unanimous in their Suffrages and Sentiments, they subscribed it. There were only (g) five that refused to allow of it, who misliked the word Homoöusios* : these were Eusebius Bishop of Nicomedia, Theognis Bishop of Nice, Maris of Chalcedon, Theonas of Marmarica, and Secundus of Ptolemais. For, in regard they asserted, that that is * Consubstantial which is from another either by Partition, or by Derivation, or by Eruption : by Eruption, as the Branch from the Root : by Derivation, as Children from their Parents : by Partition, as two or three pieces of Gold from the whole mass : but that the Son of God is [from the Father] by none of these three ways. Therefore they said, they could not give their assent to this [Draught of] of the Creed. Therefore after a tedious cavil about the term * Homoöusios, they deny'd to subscribe the degradation of Arius. Upon which account the Synod anathematized Arius and all those that were of his opinion, adding this besides, that he should be prohibited from entring into Alexandria. The Emperor also did by his Edict banish Arius, Eusebius, and Theognis. Eusebius and Theognis soon after their banishment exhibited their penitentiary Libels, and assented to the Belief of Homoöusios, as we shall declare in the procedure of our History. At the same time Eusebius sirnamed Pamphilus, Bishop of Cæsarea in Palestine (having made some small hesitancy in the Synod, and considered with himself whether he might securely admit of this form of Faith,) at length together with all the rest gave his assent, and subscrib'd : He also sent a Copy of the Form of Faith to the People within his Dioceſs, and explained to them the term Homoöusios, lest any one should have an ill opinion of him, because of his hesitancy : Thus therefore he wrote word for word. It is very probable (beloved) that you may have heard what hath been done concerning the Ecclesiastick Faith in the Great Council convened at Nice, in regard report doth usually out-run an accurate Narrative of the Matters transacted. But [fearing] lest by such a bare report the Matter might be represented to you otherwise than really it is, we thought it requisite to send to you ; first, that Form of Faith which we our selves proposed [to the Council,] and likewise that (g) There was only two Bishops, Secundus and Theonas which refus'd to subscribe to the Nicene Creed, as Theodoret does very well testifie in the first Book of his Ecclesiastick History, and (before him) Hieronymus in his Dialogue against the Luciferiani. The Synodical Epistle also of the Council of Nice, which is here related by Socrates, does plainly confirm this Vales.

Conſtant. that other publiſhed [by the Biſhops] who made ſome additions to ours. That Form of Faith drawn up by us, (which was read in the preſence of our moſt pious Emperor, and appeared to all to be ſound and orthodox,) runs thus. As we have received by Tradition from our Predeceſſors the Biſhops, then when we were inſtructed in the firſt Principles of the Faith, and received Baptiſm; as we have learnt from the Divine Scriptures, and as (during our continuance in the Presbyterſhip, and alſo ſince we have been intruſted with a Biſhoprick) we have believed and taught, ſo we alſo now believe, and do make a publick Declaration to you of our Faith; which is this.

We believe in One God, the Father Almighty, Maker of all things viſible and inviſible; and in One Lord Jeſus Chriſt, the Word of God, God of God, Light of Light, Life of Life, the Only begotten Son, the Firſt born of every Creature, begotten of God the Father before all Worlds; by whom alſo all things were made: Who for our Salvation was incarnate, and converſed amongſt Men: Who ſuffer'd, and roſe again the third day; he aſcended unto the Father, and ſhall come again in Glory to judge the Quick and the Dead. We alſo believe in one Holy Ghoſt: We believe that each of theſe [Perſons] is, and doth ſubſiſt: That the Father is truly the Father, the Son really the Son, and the Holy Ghoſt really the Holy Ghoſt: As our Lord alſo, when he ſent his Diſciples out to Preach, ſaid, * Go ye, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt. Concerning which [Articles] we do aver, that we thus maintain and hold them, that theſe are our Sentiments of them, that this was our Opinion formerly, that this Opinion we will till death retain, that we will perſevere in this Belief, and Anathematize every impious Hereſie. We call God Almighty, and Jeſus Chriſt our Lord to witneſs, that theſe were ſincerely and heartily our Sentiments, ever ſince we were capable of knowing our ſelves; and that we do now think and ſpeak what is moſt true: And we are ready to demonſtrate to you, by moſt infallible Proofs, and to perſwade you, that both in times paſt we thus believed, and likewiſe thus preached.

* Mat. 28. 19.

When this Creed was propoſed by us, there was no body that could oppoſe it. Moreover, our moſt Pious Emperor did himſelf firſt atteſt its Truth: He proteſted that he himſelf was of the ſame Opinion, and exhorted all to aſſent to, and ſubſcribe theſe very Articles, and unanimouſly to agree [in the Profeſſion] of them; (h) this one only word Homoöuſios being inſerted; which Term the Emperor himſelf thus explained, ſaying, he ſuppoſed that the word Homoouſios was not to be taken in ſuch a ſenſe as is agreeable to the Affections of the Body; and therefore that the Son had not his Subſiſtence from the Father, either by Diviſion, or Abſciſſion. For it is impoſſible [ſaid he] that an Immaterial, Intellectual and Incorporeal Nature, ſhould be ſubject to any Corporeal Affections: But our Sentiments of ſuch things muſt be expreſs'd in Divine and Myſterious Terms. Thus did our moſt Wiſe and Pious Emperor Philoſophize. But the Biſhops upon the Occaſion of adding this word Homoulios drew up this Form [of the Creed (i).]

(h) Euſebius ſeems to affirm that the Emperor Conſtantine was the occaſion of adding the word Homoöuſios to the Creed. But this is very improbable. For Conſtantine was not ſo learned, being as yet but a Catechumen. Euſebius's relation therefore muſt be thus underſtood, that the Biſhops (after the Creed propoſed by Euſebius Cæſarienſis,) judged that the word Homoöuſios ought to be added to it; and that Conſtantine confirmed their Opinion. But Euſebius, who made it his buſineſs to clear and excuſe himſelf to thoſe of his Dioceſs, becauſe he hath ſubſcribed that form of the Creed publiſhed by the Council, (as Athanaſius, in his Book De Decret. Synod. Nicen. and in his Book De Synod Arimini and Seleuciæ atteſts,) does deſignedly make the buſineſs intricate, and aſcribes that to the Emperor Conſtantine, which ſhould rather be aſcribed to the Biſhops. Valeſ.

(i) After theſe words, before the Nicene Creed, in the Florentine and Sforzian MSS. are added theſe words [τὸ μάθημα.] So the Greeks call the Creed, becauſe the Catechumens got it by heart. Socrates (in his third Book, Chap. 25.) has theſe words, πιστεύομεν εἰς ἕνα θεὸν πατέρα παντοκράτορα, καὶ τὰ λοιπὰ τῷ μαθήματι, We believe in one God the Father Almighty, and the reſt of the Articles of the Creed. See Leontius Bizantius, in his Book De Sectis, pag. 466. Valeſ.

Conſtant.

The Creed.

We Believe in One God, the Father Almighty, Maker of all things viſible and inviſible: and in one Lord Jeſus Chriſt, the Son of God, the Only begotten of the Father, (that is) of the Subſtance of the Father; God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God; begotten not made: Of the ſame Subſtance with the Father; by whom all things were made, that are in Heaven, and that are in Earth. Who for us Men, and for our Salvation deſcended, and was incarnate, was made Man, ſuffered, and roſe again the third day: He aſcended into Heaven. He ſhall come to Judge the Quick and the Dead. [We alſo believe] in the Holy Ghoſt. But thoſe who hold, that there was a time when he was not, or that he was not before he was begotten, or that he was made of nothing, and thoſe that affirm he is of any other Subſtance or Eſſence; or that the Son of God is created, or convertible, or obnoxious to change, [all ſuch] God's Holy Catholick and Apoſtolick Church doth Anathematize.

When this Form of Faith was appointed by the Biſhops, who did not inconſiderately omit making an enquiry, what their meaning was of thoſe Terms, Of the ſubſtance of the Father, and of the ſame ſubſtance with the Father. Hence therefore aroſe ſeveral Queſtions and Anſwers; and the true import of thoſe words was with great accuracy examined. And it was acknowledged by them, that theſe words, To be of the ſubſtance, did only ſignifie thus much, That the Son is of the Father, but not as a Part of the Father. It ſeem'd to us altogether reaſonable and ſafe to give our aſſent to this meaning of the Sacred Doctrine, which aſſerteth, that the Son is of the Father, but is not a Part of his Subſtance. Wherefore we our ſelves alſo gave our aſſent to this import [of thoſe words;] nor do we reject the term Homoöuſios, having peace before our Eyes as the Mark at which we aim; and [being cautious] leſt we ſhould fall from a right apprehenſion [of the Faith.] For the ſame Reaſons alſo we have admitted of theſe words, Begotten, not made. For made, ſaid they, is a common term attributed to all other Creatures which were made by the Son; of whom the Son hath no reſemblance. Wherefore he is no Creature, like to thoſe which were created by him: But he is of a far more excellent ſubſtance than any Creature: Which ſubſtance, as the Sacred Oracles do inſtruct us, is begotten of the Father, but by ſuch a manner of Generation as is ineffable and inexpreſſible by any created Being. Thus alſo this Propoſition, That the Son is of the ſame ſubſtance with the Father, was diſcuſs'd, to wit, that this is not [to be underſtood] according to the manner of Bodies, nor [in a ſenſe] agreeable to mortal Creatures. For this [Conſubſtantiality] cannot [be] either by Diviſion of the Subſtance, or by Abſciſſion, or Mutation of the Paternal Eſſence and Power. For all theſe things are inconſiſtent with the uncreated Nature of the Father. But this [Propoſition] To be of the ſame ſubſtance with the Father, doth expreſly Constant. expresly represent to us no more than this, viz. that the Son of God hath no community with, or resemblance to, created Beings; but that in every respect he is like to the Father only, who hath begotten him; and that he does exist of no other Substance or Essence, but of the Father. To this [Opinion] therefore thus explained, we thought good to give our assent: More especially, because we also knew that some of the Ancient Learned and Eminent Bishops and Writers, have made use of this term Homoöusios, in their Explications of the Divinity of the Father and of the Son. Thus much therefore we have said concerning the Creed published [at Nice,] to which we all agreed, not inconsiderately and without examination, but according to the senses given, (k) which were discuss'd in the presence of our most pious Emperor, and for the forementioned reasons, received with an unanimous consent. Moreover, as concerning the * Anathematism publish'd by the Fathers after the Creed, we judged it not in the least troublesome, in regard it does prohibit the use of terms that occur not in the Scriptures, from the use of which terms came almost all the Confusion and Disturbance that hath been raised in the Church. Since therefore, no part of the Scripture given by Divine Inspiration, hath made use of these terms, to wit, of things which exist not, and there was a time when he was not: It seemed disagreeable to Reason that these [Assertions] should be either mention'd, or taught. To this good and sound Opinion we also have assented, in as much as in former times we have never made use of such expressions. These things (Beloved) we thought requisite to send to you, that we might most apparently evidence to you the Considerateness as well of our Examination and Researches [into all Points,] as of our Assent: And [that you might also know] with what good reason we did at first make a resistance even to the last hour, as long as some things written in a manner different from what they should have been, offended us: But at length without further contention we embraced those Points which were not offensive, when after a candid enquiry into the Import of the Terms we found them to be agreeable with what we our selves had made confession of in that Form of the Creed we at first proposed.

(k) In the Greek Text of Socrates (as it is published by Valesius) there is at this place a great Error. For these Words [ἐπ' αὐτῷ τῷ θεοφιλεστάτῳ βασιλέως ἐξεταζομένοις, which were discussed in the presence of our most pious Emperor] are quite omitted; and instead thereof, these [καὶ τοῖς ἐμφανέσι λογισμοῖς συνομολογηθέντας, and for the forementioned reasons received with an unanimous consent] are twice printed. We supplied this defect from Robert Stephens's Greek Edit. with which our Translation agrees; as it likewise doth with Valesius's Latin Version, and with that of Musculus, Christophorson, and Grynæus.

* That is, the Curse.

Thus wrote Eusebius Pamphilus to Cæsarea in Palestine. Also, by the common consent and approbation of the Council, this following Synodical Epistle was written to the Church of Alexandria, and to the Inhabitants of Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis.

CHAP. IX.

The Epistle of the Synod concerning those Matters determined by it, and how Arius was degraded, together with them that embraced his Sentiments.

TO the Holy (by the Grace of God) and Great Church of the Alexandrians, and to our beloved Brethren the Inhabitants of Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis; The Bishops assembled at Nice, who fill up that great and holy Synod, send Greeting in the Lord.

For as much as by the Grace of God, and [the Summons] of the most pious Emperor Constantine (who hath called us together out of divers Cities and Provinces,) a great and holy Synod has been convened at Nice, it seemed altogether necessary, that a Letter should be written to you in the name of the sacred Synod; whence you might understand what things were there proposed, and what taken into examination, as also what were decreed and established. First of all therefore, the Impiety and Iniquity of Arius and his Complices was enquired into in the presence of the most pious Emperor Constantine: And the Council's Determination (which was confirmed by the Suffrages of all) was, that his impious Opinions, and execrable Terms and Names should be anathematized; which [Terms and Names] he blasphemously used, (a) affirming that the Son of God had his Being of nothing, and that there was a time when he was not; as also saying, that the Son of God had a freedom of Will, [whereby he was] capable either of Vertue or Vice: And calls him a Creature and a Work. All these [Tenets] the holy Synod hath anathematized, not enduring so much as patiently to hear this impious Opinion, or rather Madness, and those blasphemous Expressions. But what issue the Proceedings against him are arrived at, you have either heard already, or will hear; lest we should seem to insult over a Man who hath received a condign Recompence for his own Wickedness. But his Impiety was grown so prevalent, that he drew into the same Pit of Perdition with himself] Theonas Bishop of Marmarica, and Secundus Bishop of Ptolemaïs. For the same Sentence [that had been given against him] was pronounced against them. But after the Grace of God had delivered us from that mischievous Opinion, and from Impiety and Blasphemy, and from those persons who were so audacious as to make Divisions and [sow] discord amongst a People heretofore peaceable; there yet remained the perverse Stubborness of Melitius, and those that had been by him admitted into sacred Orders: And we now relate to you (beloved Brethren) the Judgment of the Synod concerning this particular. It pleased therefore the Synod (which dealt more kindly with Melitius; for in the (b) strictest sense and rigour of the Law he did not deserve the least favour) that he should contsnue in his City, but have no Jurisdiction, neither to Order, (the phrase that occurs here) imports the rigour or extremity of the Law: To which ἐπιείκεια, equity, is opposed. The Fathers therefore of the Nicene Council say, that the Synod dealt with Melitius, not according to the rigour and extremity of the Law, nor according to the exact rule and discipline, but (συγκαταβατικῶς) by way of dispensation. For in the strictest sense of the Law Melitius deserved no kindness or pardon, in regard he challenged Ordinations which in no wise belong to him, and had made a Schism in Egypt. For that is evidently declared by these words of this Epistle, viz. Τὰς δὲ χάριτι θεοῦ ἐν μεδενὶ σχίσματι εὑρεθέντας, Those that by God's Grace have not been found [engaged] in any Schism. By reason therefore of his rashness and insolency, Melitius deserved to be deposed and excommunicated. But yet the Holy Fathers had a mind to treat him kindly, depriving him of all power, and leaving him only the name of a Bishop. Now, why Melitius was thus kindly used, many reasons may be alledg'd. The first (which the Holy Fathers intimate in this Epistle) is, because they had before unsheath'd and made use of their sharpest severity and censure against Arius and his Followers. Now it was but equal, that after so sad and heavy a sentence pronounc'd against them, there should be a place afterwards left for clemency; especially, since Melitius had been convicted of no Heresie, but was only accused to have made a Schism. Secondly, there were many persons amongst the Melitians, that were good Men, and eminent for their pious Lives. Of which sort was Paphnutius the (a) This Epistle is extant in Theodoret, in Chap. 6. of the first Book of his Ecclesiastick History; but is in some places different from Socrates's Edition of it here. For Theodoret omits the Word [λέγον]τα, affirming,] together with the following Clause, and joins all this with the preceding period. In Leo Allatius's MS. the word [λέγον]τα is also wanting, and that which follows, to wit, [ὀνομάζον]τα, calls:] And instead of [ἅπαντα] the reading there is [ταῦτα πάντα.] Vales.

Anchoret, and John the Biſhop; whom Epiphanius mentions, in Hæreſ. Melitian. Laſtly, they did thus to promote Peace, whereby the members of the Church, which before had ben rent in ſunder, might cement and unite: Therefore the Nicene Fathers receiv'd the Melitians into communion. And this is a moſt illuſtrious Example of Eccleſiaſtick Diſpenſation. Valeſ.

* See note (f) in this chapter.

(c) I like not Chriſtophorſon's Verſion, who thought theſe words were meant of the Preſbyters Ordain'd by Melitius, For Melitius ordain'd not only Preſbyters and Deacons throughout Egypt, but Biſhops alſo, as Epiphanius atteſts. Yea, he had ordain'd far more Biſhops, than Pretbyters; as may be Collected from that Catalogue, which Alexander ('tis ſaid) requir'd of him, after the Nicene Synod. Wherein are reckon'd twenty eight Biſhops of Melitius's Party; but five Presbyters, and three Deacons. This Catalogue is extant in Athanaſius's Second Apology againſt the Arians. Since therefore Melitius had Ordained ſo many Biſhops, if the Nicene Fathers had made no Determination concerning the Biſhops by him Ordain'd, their ſentence had been imperfect; in regard they would have Decreed, what ſhould be done with the Presbyters made by Melitius, but would have made no mention of the Biſhops. Wherefore I think theſe Words muſt be taken in ſuch a Senſe, as to include both Biſhops, and alſo Presbyters. Valeſ.

*or to * propoſe the Names of thoſe that were to be Ordained, or to appear in any Village, or City upon this pretence: But that he ſhould barely enjoy his appellation and Title only. And as for* (c) thoſe that had been Ordained by him to any Function, being confirmed by a (d) more ſacred Ordination, they ſhould afterwards be admitted into Communion, and upon this condition they may continue poſſeſt of their Preferment and Function, but yet they are to acknowledge themſelves always inferiour to all thoſe that had been approved of in every Dioceſs and Church, who had been (e) Ordained before by our deareſt Collegue in the ſacred Function, Alexander. So that beſides, they ſhall have no Power (f) to propoſe, or nominate whom they pleaſe; or to act in any thing at all without the Knowledge and Conſent of ſome Catholick (g) Biſhop, who is one of Alexander's Suffragans. But thoſe that by the Grace of God and your Prayers have not been found [engaged] in any Schiſm, but have continued in the Catholick Church blameleſs; let ſuch have Power to nominate and elect thoſe that are worthy of the ſacred Function, and act in all things according to the eſtabliſhed Law and Sanctions of the Church. And if it ſhall happen, that ſome of thoſe who now hold Eccleſiaſtick preferments, die, then let thoſe that are newly admitted and receiv'd [into the Church] be preferred to the Dignities of the deceaſed, (b) provided that they ſhall appear worthy, and that the People ſhall freely elect them, provided alſo that the Biſhop of Alexandria doth by his ſuffrage ratifie and confirm [the Peoples Election.] This ſame Priviledge is alſo granted to all. But concerning Melitius in particular, We otherwiſe Decree, that (becauſe of his former irregularity, raſhneſs, and giddineſs of diſpoſition,) no Juriſdiction or Authority ſhall be allowed him, he being a Man able to revive the ſame diſturbances that were before. Theſe things are ſuch as moſt eſpecially and particularly relate to Ægypt, and [concern] the moſt holy Church of Alexandria. But if there ſhall be any other Canon or Decree made, being our Lord, and our moſt Reverend Fellow Miniſter and Brother Alexander is preſent, he at his arrival will give you a more particular Account, in regard he is the Author of, and conſcious to, what ever is done. We alſo ſend you the good News concerning the unanimous conſent of all, in reference to the celebration of the moſt ſolemn Feaſt of Eaſter; for this difference alſo hath been made up by the aſſiſtance of your Prayers; ſo that all the Brethren in the Eaſt, who formerly celebrated this Feſtival at the ſame time the Jews did, will in future conform to the Romans and to us, and to all who have of old obſerved our manner of celebrating Eaſter. Do you therefore (rejoycing at the good ſucceſs of Affairs, and at the unanimous Peace and Concord [amongſt all Men,] and alſo becauſe all Hereſie is wholly extirpated,) with a greater honour, and more ardent love receive our Fellow-Miniſter (but your Biſhop) Alexander, whoſe preſence here hath greatly rejoyc'd us, and who in this his infirm Age hath endured ſo great labours, that Peace might be reſtor'd amongſt you. Pray for us all, that thoſe good Determinations which are made, may remain firm and inviolable, through Almighty GOD, and our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, together with the Holy Ghoſt; to whom be Glory for ever, Amen.

Conſtant.

(b) Theſe words do plainly confirm what we ſaid before, to wit, that not only the Preſbyters and Deacons, but the Biſhopsalſo (who had been Ordained by Melitius) are here ſpoken of. For, if they here treated concerning the Presbyters only, that were to ſucceed in the places of other Presbyters, why ſhou'd the Nicene Fathers uſe ſo great caution, require ſo many and great things, for this reaſon, that one of the Melitian Presbyters ſhould be put into the place of a defunct Presbyter of the Catholick Church? For the holy Fathers expreſly prohibit, that any of the Melitians ſhall ſucceed in the place and dignity of the defunct, unleſs he ſeem worthy of that honour, unleſs the People Elect him, and unleſs his Election be confirm'd by the Biſhop of Alexandria. What need of ſo great caution and diligence in the promotion of a Presbyter? 'Tis therefore apparent, that theſe words do rather belong to the Biſhops. In the Elections of whom moſt eſpecially, the Peoples ſuffrages were neceſſary; and whoſe Election muſt beſides be confirmed by the Biſhop of Alexandria, in regard he was the Metropolitane of all Egypt. Valeſ.

In this Synodical Epiſtle 'tis apparent, that the Nicene Fathers did not only anathematize Arius and his followers, but the very Terms of his Opinion alſo: And that (in regard they had amongſt themſelves agreed concerning the celebration of Eaſter,) they receiv'd into Communion (i) the Arch-Heretick Melitius, allowing him indeed the liberty of retaining the Dignity of a Biſhop; but they deprived him of the Power of doing any thing as a Biſhop. And upon this Account I ſuppoſe it is, that the Melitians in Ægypt are to this Day ſeparated from the Church, becauſe the Synod took away all [Epiſcopal] Power from Melitius. Moreover, nor Athanaſius (in his 2 Apology) nor Epiphanius, accuſe Melitius of any Hereſie; they only affirm, he was the Author of a Schiſm. But when the Melitians had afterwards joyned themſelves to the Arians, (which, as I remarkt before, hapned after the Nicene Synod, and Melitius's death,) they turned their Schiſm into an Hereſie, as Auguſtine writes concerning the Donatiſts. In this ſenſe therefore Melitius may be termed an Arch-Heretick. Valeſ.

(i) Socrates does undeſervedly ſtile Melitius an Arch-Heretick. For neither do the Nicene Fathers, (f) In our Annotations on the third Book of Euſebius concerning the Life of Conſtantine, we remark'd, that προχειρίζεσθαι, ſignifies to propoſe the Names of ſuch Perſons as are to be ordained. So the Synod Decree'd above concerning Melitius, μήτε χειροθετεῖν, μήτε προχειρίζεσθαι, that he ſhould neither ordain, nor propoſe the Names of thoſe that were to be ordained. In the ſame ſenſe Nicetas us'd this term, in his Life of Ignatius Patriarch of Conſtantinople, where he mentions his Election: his Words are theſe, πολλῶν τοιαῦτα εἰς πρόσωπον τῆς ἐκκλησίας προχειριζομένων, &c. when therefore the names of many Perſons were propoſed to preſide over that Church, &c. Therefore the following Words [ἢ ὑποβάλλειν ὀνόματα, or to nominate] are only an explication of the foregoing term. In the ſame Senſe Sozomen took this word, in his fore-cited 24th chapt. Moreover, we muſt note, that Melitius was more ſeverely dealt with, (as being the Author of a Schiſm,) than the Melitiani. For the Nicene Fathers depriv'd Melitius of all Epiſcopal Juriſdiction, and left him only the name of a Biſhop. But they permitted the Melitians to exerciſe their Functions in the Church. That is, that the Deacons ſhould Miniſter in the Order of Deacons, and that the Presbyters ſhould Conſecrate and Baptize, as ſhould alſo the Biſhops. Tney only took from them their Power of Voting in Elections: Which was prudently done of the Nicene Fathers, leſt the Melitians ſhould clandeſtinely promote ſome Men of their own Party to the Eccleſiaſtick preferments. Valeſ.

(g) It ſhould rather be [τῶν Ἐπισκόπων, Biſhops,] as it is in Theodoret, and in the Allat. M. S. Valeſ.

(e) Inſtead of προχειροτονιῶν] it ſhould rather be [προχειροτονηθέντων, ordained before] as it is in Theodoret, book 1. chap. 6. Eccleſ. Hiſtor. For προχειρίζεσθαι ſignifies another thing, as we ſhall ſhew hereafter. (See the following Note.) Sozomen (in his firſt book chap. 24. where he epitomizes this Epiſtle) ſuppoſed theſe Words were meant of the Clergy, not of the Biſhops. Valeſ.

(d) In the firſt place the Synod Decreed, that the Biſhops and Clergy, which had been Ordain'd by Melitius, ſhould be confirm'd by a more Holy Conſecration, that is, ſhould receive impoſition of hands from the Biſhop of Alexandria. For, in regard they had been Ordain'd without his conſent, it was the pleaſure of the Synod, that they ſhould be Ordained by the Alexandrian Biſhop, according to the ancient uſage, by which it was cuſtomary, that all the Biſhops of the Dioceſs of Egypt ſhould be Subject to the Prelate of Alexandria. But the Synod required not the Re ordination of Melitius, becauſe he had been rightly Ordained before. Valeſ.

Constant. you must know, that Arius wrote a Book concerning his own Opinion, which he entitled Thalia. The Stile of the Book [and the Doctrine contain'd in it] was loose and dissolute, much resembling the Songs (k) or Verses of Sotades*. This Piece of his also the Synod did at the same time condemn. Nor was the Synod only sollicitous about writing Letters concerning the Peace restored [to the Church :] but the Emperor Constantine also [signified the same] by his own Letters, who wrote to the Church of Alexandria as followeth.

(k) The Sfortian, and Florentine MSS. add these Words [ἤτοι ἰάμβοις, or, Verses;] which Christophorson found in his Copy, as appears from his Version. Concerning Arius's Thalia see Athanasius, in his second Oration against the Arians. When Socrates says, that this Book of Arius's was condemned by the Synod, we must not so understand him, as if the Poem it self were particuly condemned, but the Doctrine only contained in that Poem. Vales.

The Emperor's Letter.

Constantinus Augustus, to the Catholick Church of Alexandria. God save You, beloved Brethren. We have received the greatest Blessing from the Divine Providence, that being released from all Error, We can now embrace and profess one and the same Faith. The Devil hath no longer a Dominion over us : For all the Machinations he design'd against Us are now totally destroy'd. The bright lustre of Truth has (according to the Commandment of God) defeated those Dissentions, those Schisms, those Tumults, and (if I may so term them) those fatal Poisons of Discord. We therefore do all adore one God in name, and We believe that He is. Moreover, that this might be effected, by the Admonition of God, We convened a great many Bishops at the City of Nice : *Together with whom We Our selves, one of Your number, who rejoyce exceedingly in that We are Your Fellow-servant, undertook the Disquisition of the Truth. We did therefore enquire into and accurately discuss all things, which seem'd to yield the least occasion of Ambiguity or Dissention. And (may the Divine Majesty pardon us!) how great and horrid Blasphemies have some indecently utter'd concerning Our * Great Saviour, concerning Our Hope and Life, speaking and openly professing that they believe things contrary to the divinely inspired Scriptures, and to the sacred Faith? Whenas therefore three hundred Bishops and upwards, admirable both for their Moderation and Acuteness of Understanding, had unanimously confirmed one and the same Faith, (which, according to the Verity and accurate Disquisition of the Divine Law, can only be the Faith)* Arius, vanquished by a Diabolical force, was found to be the only person, who with an impious Mind disseminated this Mischief, first amongst You, and afterwards amongst others. Let Us therefore embrace that Opinion, which Almighty God hath delivered. Let Us return to Our beloved Brethren, from whom this impudent Servant of the Devil hath separated Us. Let Us with all diligence imaginable hasten to the common Body, and to Our own natural Members. For this doth well become Your Prudence, Faith, and Sanctity, that since his Error (who has been evidently proved to be an Enemy of the Truth) is confuted, You should return to the Divine Grace. For that which was approved of by three hundred Bishops, can be [judged] nothing else but the Determination of God ; especially, since the Holy Ghost, residing in the Minds of such Great and Worthy Personages, hath disclosed to them the Will of God. Wherefore let none of You continue dubious, let none of You make delays : But do You all with great Alacrity return to the right way : That when We come to You, which shall be as soon as possible, We may together with You return due thanks to God, who inspects all things, because, having revealed the pure Faith, He hath restored You that mutual Love which was the subject of all Men's Prayers. God preserve You, beloved Brethren. Constant.

* In the Allat. MS. the reading is concerning our Saviour; which I like better than this, concerning our Great Saviour. Vales.

Thus wrote the Emperor to the People of Alexandria, demonstrating to them that the determination of the Faith was not imprudently, or unadvisedly made ; but that it was dictated with a great deal of disquisition and diligent examination : Nor [does he say] that some things were spoken [in that Council,] and others passed over in silence : But that all that was fitting to be said in confirmation of the Opinion, was produc'd and urg'd ; and that the Controversie was not inconsiderately determin'd, but was with great Accuracy first discuss'd. Insomuch that, all things whatever, which seem'd to produce Matter of Ambiguity or Dissention, were wholly remov'd and destroy'd. In short, he terms the Determination of all those there assembled, the Will of God, and does confidently aver that the unanimity of so many and such eminent Prelates was procured by the Holy Ghost. But Sabinus, the Ringleader of the Macedonian Heresie, does wittingly and on set purpose oppose their [Authorities] and stiles the Fathers there assembled, Idiots and Men of no knowledge ; and he does in all appearance asperse even Eusebius Cæsariensis with [the imputation of] ignorance : But he does not in the least consider with himself, that, although those convened in that Synod were Idiots, yet in regard they were illuminated by God, and the Grace of the Holy Ghost, they could in no wise err from the Truth. But let us hear, what the Emperor, by another Letter which he sent to all the Bishops every where, and to the People, decreed against Arius and those that embraced his Opinion.

Another Letter of Constantine's.

VICTOR CONSTANTINUS MAXIMUS, AUGUSTUS, to the Bishops and People.

(l) In as much as Arius has followed the Practices of wicked and prophane Persons, 'tis but just that he should undergo the same ignominy with them. Therefore, as Porphyrius, that Enemy of true Piety, found a just recompence for composing impious Volumes against Religion, and such a recompence as has rendred him ignominious to Posterity, covered him with infamy and many reproaches, and his impious Writings have been utterly destroy'd : So it also now seems reasonable to term Arius and those that embrace his Opinion Porphyrians, that they may derive their denomination from him, whose Morals they have so exactly imitated. Moreover, if any Book written by Arius shall be found extant, We do hereby order, that it be immediately burnt : That by this means not only his wicked Doctrine may be wholly destoyed, but also that there might not be left to Posterity the (l) This Epistle of Constantine the Emperor, is not rightly placed by our Author. It should rather be placed immediately after Constantine's Letter to the Churches, which is the next in this Chapter. For certainly those Letters which concern the Council of Nice should regularly be placed first. But this Letter does not concern that Council, nor does it in the least mention the Council. Athanasius in his Epistle ad Solitar. alludes to this Letter of Constantine's, where he speaks thus concerning the Emperor, Διὰ τί τὰς Ἀρειανὰς ὃς ἐκεῖνος πορφυριανὰς ὠνόμασε, τούτους δὴ καὶ εἰς ἐκκλησίαν εἰσαγαγεῖν σπουδάζει, (i. e.) Why does he (to wit, Constantine) endeavour to reduce the Arian into the Church, whom he himself calls Porphyrians? Vales.

Another Letter.

Coſtantinus Auguſtus, to the Churches.

Having ſufficiently experienced, by the flouriſhing poſture of the Publick Affairs, how great the benignity of the Divine Power has been towards us; We judged it our chiefeſt concern and aim [to labour] for the Preſervation of one Faith, a ſincere Charity, and one univerſally acknowledged Religion towards Almighty God amongſt the moſt bleſſed Congregations of the Catholick Church. But ſince this could not be otherwiſe firmly conſtituted and eſtabliſhed, unleſs all, or at leaſt the greateſt part of the Biſhops were convened in one place, and every particular that concerns the moſt ſacred Religion were by them firſt diſcuſſed: Upon this Account, when as many of the Clergy, as could poſſibly be got together, were aſſembled, and we alſo, as one of you, were preſent with them (for we will not deny, what we account our greateſt Glory, that we are your Fellow-ſervant) all things were ſufficiently diſcuſſed ſo long, until a determination acceptable to God the Inſpector of all things, was publiſh'd in order to an univerſal agreement and union: So that there is now no place left for Diſſention, or controverſie about [matters] of Faith. Where alſo, after a Diſquiſition made concerning the moſt Holy Day of Eaſter, it was by a general conſent concluded to be the beſt courſe, for all Men in all places to celebrate that Feſtival upon one and the ſame Day. For what can be more comely and commendable, or what more grave and decent, than that this Feſtival, from which we have received the hopes of Immortality, ſhould be unerringly kept by all Men in one and the ſame order, and in a manner apparently and expreſly agreeable? And in the firſt place, all Men lookt upon it as an unworthy thing, and misbecoming the dignity of that moſt ſacred Feſtival, to follow the Jewiſh uſage in the Celebration thereof. For the Jews, Perſons who have defiled themſelves with a moſt abominable Sin, are deſervedly impure and blind as to their underſtandings. Having therefore rejected their uſage, we may by a more certain and infallible order propagate that Day to future Ages for the completion of this Solemnity, which we have kept from the firſt Day of the Paſſion even to this preſent time. Let us then have nothing in common with that moſt hoſtile multitude of the Jews. We have received another way from Our Saviour. For there is propoſed to us a lawful and decent leading to our moſt Sacred Religion. Let us therefore (deareſt Brethren) with one accord conſtantly perſiſt in this courſe, and * withdraw our ſelves from that moſt adverſe Society and their conſciouſneſs. For it is really moſt abſurd for them to make their braggs, that we are not capable of our ſelves, without their inſtruction to obſerve theſe things. But of what are they able to paſs a right judgment, who after that parricide of theirs, the murther of our Lord, were ſtruck with madneſs, and are led, not by the conduct of reaſon, but by an ungovernable * impetus, whitherſoever their innate rage ſhall drive them? Hence therefore it is that even in this particular they diſcern not the Truth, (m) but always wandring at the greateſt diſtance from a decent and agreeable amendment, they celebrate Eaſter twice within the ſpace of one and the ſame Year. What reaſon have we therefore to follow theſe Men, who, it is acknowledged, are diſtempered with an abominable Error? We muſt never endure the keeping of two Eaſters in one Year. But although what we have ſaid were not ſufficient, yet nevertheleſs, it behoves your Prudence to make it your greateſt care, and the matter of your conſtant Prayers, that the purity of your Souls ſhould not in the likeneſs of any thing ſeem to be joyned or mix'd with the uſages of moſt wicked men. Beſides, this is to be conſidered, that it is a moſt impious thing, that there ſhould be any diſagreement in a matter of ſo great concern, and in ſuch a ſolemnity of Religion. For Our Saviour left us but one Day [to be celebrated in commemoration] of our Redemption, That is the Day of his moſt ſacred Paſſion: And he alſo deſired that his Catholick Church ſhould be one. The members of which Church (although they are much diſperſed in divers places, yet nevertheleſs) are cheriſhed by one Spirit, that is, by the Will of God. Let the Prudence of your Sanctity conſider, how grievous and undecent a thing it is, that on the ſelf ſame days ſome ſhould keep ſtrict Faſts, and others celebrate Feaſts: And that on the Days after Eaſter, ſome ſhould be converſant in Feaſtings and a vacantneſs from labours, and others devote themſelves to ſet Faſts. Wherefore it pleaſed Divine Providence that theſe things ſhould be ſeaſonably redreſſed, and reduced to one and the ſame Form, as we ſuppoſe you are all ſenſible. Since therefore it was expedient to make ſuch an emendation in this point, as that we might not ſeem to hold the leaſt Communion with thoſe Parricides, and Murderers of Our Lord, the Jews: And ſince this is the moſt decent and becoming Order, which all the Churches of the Weſtern, Southern and Northern parts of the World, and alſo ſome in the Eaſtern Parts do obſerve: For theſe Reaſons all Perſons have at preſent judged it good and expedient; (and we our ſelves alſo promiſed that it would not be ungrateful to your Wiſdom,) that that which with ſuch an univerſal unanimity is obſerved in the City of Rome, and all over Italy and Africa, throughout all Conſtant. Violence.

* In book 3. chap. 18. of Euſebius's Life of Conſtantine where (we have this Epiſtle of the Emperor,) the reading is [τῆς αἰσχρᾶς ἐκείνης συνοικήσεως] which Valeſius at that place, and here, renders thus [ab illâ turpiſſimâ ſocietate & conſcientiâ, from that moſt abominable ſociety and their conſciouſneſs.] Of this his Verſion, he gives this reaſon: They who celebrate Eaſter with the Jews, ſeem to be conſcious of that wickedneſs which they committed againſt our Lord. See his Annotat. at the book and chapter now cited.

(m) Inſtead of [ὡς ἀεὶ] in the Florent. and Sforzian M.SS. the reading is [ὡς ἀεί, always:] which reading Theodoret confirms. In book 3. chap. 18. of Euſebius's Life of Conſtantine, it is [ὡς δή] whereas the Jewiſh Paſchal Neomenia (or new Moon) began from the fifth Day of March, and was concluded at the third of April, hence it ſometimes hapned, that their Paſſover began before the Æquinox. So that they celebrated two Paſſovers in one Year, (ſuppoſing you mean the Solar and Julian Year) that is, accounting from the Vernal Æquinox of this year, to the Vernal Æquinox of the year following. Ambroſius aſſerts the ſame in his Epiſtle to the Biſhops of Æmilia, where he relates, that the Jews ſometimes celebrated their Paſſover in the twelfth month, that is according to the Latines, and Eaſtern men. For the Jews never kept their Paſſover on their own twelfth month, but on the fourteenth day of their firſt month. Moreover, this celebrating of their Paſſover twice in one year, which Conſtantine objects againſt the Jews, ſeems to me not at all momentous. For the Jews might have returned the objection upon the Chriſtians, to wit, that they celebrated Eaſter twice in the ſame year. For, ſuppoſe Eaſter is this year kept on the tenth of the Calends of May; (that is, on the 22d of April) next year it muſt neceſſarily be kept ſooner. And ſo there will occur two Eaſters amongſt the Chriſtians within the ſpace of one year current. But this will not happen, if you reckon the year from the Æquinoctial Cardo to the Vernal Æquinox of the Year following. See Epiphan. pag. 824. Edit. Petav. and Petav. Animadverſ. pag. 294, 295. See alſo Ægidius Bucherius de Paſchali Judæorum Cyclo, chap. 3.

Constant. all Egypt, Spain, France, Britain, Libya; over all Greece, and the Provinces of Asia and Pontus, and throughout Cilicia, would also be most willingly received and embraced by You. Let this also be seriously considered, that not only the number of the Churches in the forementiond places is far the greater; but also that it is most just and equal that all Men's Wills should universally concur in that which strict Reason seems to require, and which has no Communion with the Perjury of the Jews. But, that We may speak more summarily and briefly, it was by a general consent agreed that the most sacred Festival of Easter should be solemnized upon one and the same day. For it is undecent that there should be any diversity in so great and holy a Solemnity: And it is far better to adhere to that Opinion, in which there is no mixture of strange and absurd Error and Impiety. Since therefore these things are thus ordered, do You with joy receive this celestial and truly divine Commandment. For whatsoever is trausacted [and determined] in the sacred Assemblies of the Bishops, must be attributed to the Divine Will. Wherefore, when You have imparted to all Our beloved Brethren what has been prescribed, it is Your duty to embrace, and establish the forementiond Rule and Observation of the most Holy Day: That when We shall come into the presence of Your Love (which We were long since desirous of,) We may celebrate the sacred Festival with You, on one and the same day: And that We may rejoyce together with You for all things, beholding the cruelty of the Devil totally removed by the Divine Power and Our Endeavours; whilst Your Faith, Peace, and Concord does every where flourish. God preserve You, beloved Brethren.

(n) Another Letter to Eusebius.

(n) This Letter of the Emperor to Eusebius, and also the two next, are misplaced. For they have no Relation to the Council of Nice; neither do they make the least mention of Arius or the Arians. Yea, the first of Constantine's Letters to Eusebius was written before the Council of Nice. as Eusebius himself testifies, in his 2d Book of Constantine's Life, Chap. 45. Vales.

VICTOR CONSTANTINUS, MAXIMUS, AUGUSTUS, to Eusebius.

We really believe and are absolutely perswaded (Deareſt Brother) that, in regard an impious Desire and tyrannick Violence hath persecuted the Servants of God our Saviour even to this present time, the Edifices of all Churches, have either by neglect gone to ruin, or through fear of the imminent dangerousness [of the Times] have been adorn'd with less of statelineß. But now, since Liberty is restored, and that Serpent, (o) that Persecutor Licinius, is by Almighty God's Providence and Our instrumental Endeavours forced out of the Administration of publick Affairs, We suppose that the Divine Power hath been sufficiently manifested to all Men: And that all who either through fear or unbelief have fallen into any Sins, (p) having now acknowledged the only true God, will in future return to the true and right course of life. Do You therefore remind as well all [persons belonging to] the Churches over which You preside, as also all other Bishops presiding in other places, together with the Presbyters and Deacons, whom You know, that they use their utmost diligence about the Structures of the Churches; either about repairing those that are still standing, or about enlarging others, or in building new ones, whereseever it shall be found requisite. And You your self, and the rest by Your mediation may ask Necessaries [for that Work] both from Our Presidents of the Provinces, and also from the (p) Office of the Prætorian Præfecture. For they are already impowered by Our Rescripts to be diligently observant about all Your Holineß's Orders. God preserve You, Beloved Brother.

(o) We meet with this Letter of the Emperor's to Eusebius at Book 2. Chap. 46. of Eusebius's Life of Constantine; where these three words [that Persecutor Licinius] are wanting; being added here, in stead of a Scholion by Socrates, or some other Scholiast. He terms Licinius a Serpent, by reason of his craftiness, and age. Hence we may conjecture, that this Letter was written soon after Licinius's deposition. See Valesius's Notes on Book 2. Chap. 46. of Eusebius's Life of Constantine.

(p) Here we made choice of this reading [ἐπιγνόντας ἤδη, &c. having now acknowledged, &c.] By the term [fear] in the foregoing clause he means the Christians, who through fear of persecution had neglected the Churches, or renounced the Faith. The term [Unbelief] belongs to the Heathens, who had demolished the Churches, and divers ways vexed the Christians. See Valesius's notes, at the Book and Chapter before-cited.

Thus wrote the Emperor to the Bishops throughout every particular Province, concerning the Building of the Churches: But what he wrote to Eusebius of Palestine about providing [some Copies of] the sacred Scriptures, we may easily collect from these his Works.

(p) τάξις, the term here us'd, signifies an Office, or company of Apparitors attending on a Magistrate, i.e. a certain number of Soldiers waiting on the Judges. Ἔπαρχοι are the Præfects of the Prætorium; so termed, because they were ἐπὶ τῆς ἀρχῆσιν, over the Presidents and Rectors of Provinces. Therefore ἐπαρχικὴ τάξις (the Phrase here used) imports the Office of the Prætorian Præfecture, concerning which consult the Notitia Imperii Romani. Further, the Office (or Attendannce) of the Præfect of the Prætorium was more honourable than the Offices of all the other Magistrates. For as the Præfect of the Prætorium excelled all the other Judges, as well Military as Civil, in Dignity; so his Officials or Attendants, were look'd upon to be more honourable than the other Officials. Hence, in the Chalcedon Council, Action 3, the Office of the Præfects of the Prætorium is called μεγίστη τάξις. See Valesius's Notes, at the before-cited Book and Chapter.

VICTOR CONSTANTINUS MAXIMUS, AUGUSTUS, to Eusebius Bishop of Cæsarea.

By the assistance of God our Saviour's Providence, so great a multitude of Men have joyned themselves to the most holy Church in that City which bears our * Name; that [Christianity seems] to have made its greatest progress and increase there.

(r) It seems therefore very requisite that there should be more Churches erected in that City. Wherefore do You with the greatest alacrity admit of what We have decreed. We thought fit to signifie this to Your Prudence, that You should order fifty Copies of the sacred Scriptures (the Provision and Use whereof You know to be most necessary for the instruction of the Church,) to be written on well prepared Parchment by artificial Transcribers of Books, most skilful in the Art of accurate and fair Writing; which [Copies] must be very legible, and easily portable, in order to their being used. Moreover Letters are dispatch'd away from Our Clemency to the (s) Rationalist of the Diœcesis to take care for provision of all things necessary towards the preparing of the said Copies. Let it therefore be the employment of Your Care to see that the foresaid Copies be provided as soon as may be. You are also impower'd by this Our Letter to make use of two publick Carriages for their conveyance. For by this means those which are faireſt transcribed may be easiest convey'd even to Our sight, to wit, if one of the Deacons of your Church be employ'd in the Performances hereof: Who when he comes to Us, shall experience Our Liberality. God preserve You, Dear Brother.

* He means the City of Constantinople.

(r) In Eusebius's Life of Constantine, Book 4. Chap. 36. (where this Letter occurs) this place is far otherwise read and pointed, than it is here; so also it is in Theodoret, Book 1. Chap. 16. Vales.

(s) Concerning the Rationalist and his Office, we have spoken before, in our Notes on Eusebius. By [Diœcesis] is meant here the Dioceſs of the East. The old Romans called a certain number of Provinces (which, taken together, were under a Deputy of the Prætorian Præfecture) by this name [Diœceſis.] For the Præfect of the Prætorium had under his jurisdiction many Diœceſes; but the Deputies had each but one Diœceſis. This term began to be used in this sense about Constantine's time, as appears from his Letters, and from some Laws in the Cod. Theod. See Valesius's Annotations on Eusebius's Life of Constant. B. 4. Chap. 36.

Another Letter to Macarius.

VICTOR CONSTANTINUS, MAXIMUS, AUGUSTUS, to Macarius Biſhop of Jeruſalem.

*So great is our Saviour's Love and Favour, that no Rhetorick ſeems ſufficient to ſet forth a Declaration of the preſent Miracle. For, that the * Monument of his moſt holy Paſſion, long ſince hid underneath the Earth, ſhould lie conceal'd for ſo many Years ſpace, till ſuch time as, by the (t) Slaughter of the common Enemy, it ſhould glorioufly appear to his Servants now ſet at liberty, [is a matter which] does really ſurmount all Admiration. For if all thoſe Perſons that throughout the whole World are accounted wiſe ſhould be convened in one and the ſame place with a deſign to ſpeak ſomething according to the Worthineſs of this Matter, they would not be able, after their utmoſt Endeavours to attain to [an Explication of] the leaſt part thereof. For the * Authority and Greatneſs of this Miracle doth as far tranſcend every Nature capable of human Reaſon, as things that are celeſtial do exceed thoſe that are humane. Wherefore this is always our chief and only aim, that as the Authority of the truth doth daily demonſtrate it ſelf by new Miracles, ſo the Minds of us all ſhould with all Modeſty and unanimous Alacrity become more careful and diligent about an Obſervation of the Divine Law. Which in regard we judge to be manifeſtly apparent to all Men, our Deſire is you ſhould moſt eſpecially be perſwaded of this, that it is altogether our chiefeſt Care, that that ſacred Place (which by God's Command we have unburthened of that moſt deteſtable (u) acceſſion of the Idol, as it were of a ponderous and heavy weight; which [place] was by God's Determination made holy from the Beginning, but was afterwards demonſtrated to be more holy, out of which he hath brought to light the Certainty of our Saviour's Paſſion) ſhould be beautified and adorn'd with magnificent and ſtately ſtructures. Wherefore it does well become your Prudence ſo to order the matter, and to make ſuch a Proviſion of Materials neceſſary for this Work, that not only the Temple it ſelf may in ſtatelineſs excel all others in what place ſoever, but alſo that the other parts of it be made ſuch, as that all the beautifuleſt Structures in every City, may be acknowledged far inferiour to this Fabrick. And as concerning the Workmanſhip and exquiſite Beauty of the Walls, we would have you know that we have committed the Care thereof to our Friend † Dracilianus, Deputy to the moſt excellent the Prefects of the Prætorium, and to the Preſident of the Province. For our Piety has taken order, that Artificers and Workmen, and whatever elſe they may be inform'd from your Prudence to be neceſſary for the Structure, ſhall by their Care be forthwith ſent. But concerning the Pillars or Marbles, (and whatever you your ſelf on ſight of the (x) Model [of the building] ſhall judge to be more rich and uſeful,) make it your Buſineſs to inform us by writing: that when we ſhall underſtand from your Letter, how many, und what manner of Materials you ſtand in need of, they may be convey'd to you from all Parts. For it is but reaſonable that that moſt admirable place of the whole World ſhould be beautified according to its Dignity and Worth. We deſire to know of you, whether you think good to have the inner Roof of the Church, (y) arched, or made of any other ſort of Work. For if it be arched, it may alſo be gilded with Gold. It remains therefore, that your Holineſs inform as ſoon as may be the forementionʼd Judges, how many Workmen, and Artificers, and what Money for Expences you ſhall want. And be you careful to return Us a ſpeedy Account, not only concerning the Marbles, and Pillars, but alſo concerning the arched Roof (if you ſhall judge that to be the more beautiful Work.) Deareſt Brother, God preſerve you.* The Emperour wrote ſeveral other Epiſtles in a more florid Stile like Orations, againſt Arius, and thoſe that embraced his Opinion, and cauſed them to be (z) publiſh'd in every City; in

* He means our Bleſſed Saviour's Sepulchre.

(t) Conſtantine here terms Licinius the publick Enemy, after whoſe Deſtruction, he ſays, the ſacred Sepulchre of our Lord, which had been before concealed, was diſcover'd. Licinius was ſlain in the Year of Chriſt 326, as 'tis recorded in Faſt. Idat. And on that very Year, when Helena came to Jeruſalem, the Sepulchre of our Lord was found. By the name of the publick Enemy, the Devil might here be meant, were not this contradicted by the Expreſſions here us'd. For the Devil was not then vanquiſh'd and overcome, when the Sepulchre of our Lord was cleared from the Rubbiſh that cover'd it. Beſides, the Term [ἀναίρεσις, Slaughter] is more expreſſive, being meant of Licinius, than of the Devil. See Valeſius's Notes on Euſebius's Life of Conſtant. Book 3. Chap. 30.

* Ἡ τῆς θαύματος τούτου πίστις, the Faith, Authority, or Eſtimation of this Miracle, &c.

(u) He means the Temple built by Adrian the Emperor on Mount Calvary, in honor of Venus; which Receptacle of Paganiſm was demoliſh'd by Helena, Conſtantine's Mother, and in the room thereof was built a magnificent Temple, at this day called The Temple of the Sepulchre; The Deſcription whereof you may ſee in Sandy's Travels, Book 3. p. 125, &c. Edit. Lond. 1673.

† There are two Laws made by Conſtantine, extant in the Cod. Theod. (the one in Tit. de uſuris, the other in Tit. de Hæreticis,) written to this Dracilianus. The former of theſe Laws bears this Inſcription, Imp. Conſtantinus Aug. ad Dracilianum agentem vices Præfectorum præt. that is, Emperor Conſtantinus Auguſtus to Dracilianus Deputy to the Præfects of the Prætorium. This Law was publiſh'd at Cæſarea in Paleſtine on the 15th of the Calends of May, when Paulinus and Julianus were Conſuls. The other is ſaid to have been publiſh'd on the Calends of September, Conſtantinus Auguſtus being the ſeventh time, and Conſtantius Cæſar Coſſ. that is, in the Year of Chriſt 326. In which Year Conſtantine wrote this Epiſtle to Macarius, Biſhop of Jeruſalem. Further, we muſt remark, that the Præfects of the Prætorium are here ſtiled clariſſimi, moſt excellent. For as yet they had not received the Title of Moſt Illuſtrious. Moreover, in other of Conſtantine's Laws, the Præfects of the Prætorium are ſtiled Moſt Excellent. Now, as the Præfects of the Prætorium were in Conſtantine's times allow'd only the Title of the Moſt Excellent, ſo the Deputies of the Prætorian Præfecture had in the ſaid Conſtantine's times only the Title of Moſt Perfect given them, as the Epiſtle to Probianus Proconſul of Africa, ſhews, which we meet with in Athanaſius's Apology to Conſtantius, p. 794. See Valeſius's Notes on Book 3. Chap. 31. of Euſebius's Life of Conſtantine.

Conſtant.

(x) At this place the Term [συνόψις] ſignifies the Model or Delineation of the Fabrick that was to be erected. It is taken in the ſame Senſe, in the Epiſtle of Himerius Rationaliſt of Alexandria to the Præfect of Mareotis; which Athanaſius has recorded in his Apology, p. 803. For after he had ſaid, that Auguſtus and the Cæſars had permitted Iſchyras to build a Church in his Town, he orders the Governor of that Town, that he ſhould forthwith draw a Model of the future Building, and tranſmit it to his Office; φερέτω (ſays he) τοίνυν ἐν τάχει τὴν σύνοψιν ποιησάμενος, εἰς τὸ τάξιν ἀνενεγκεῖν. See Valeſius's Notes, at the Book and Chapter before cited.

(y) The inner Roofs of Churches were commonly fram'd two ways. For they were either beauſy'd with arched or embowed Roofs, or elſe painted with Moſaick Work. Coocerning the arched (or embowed) Roofs, this place of Conſtantine's Letter is an Evidence. Procopius evidences the Uſe of the Moſaick-work, in his firſt Book De Fabricis Juſtiniani, where he deſcribes the Temple of Sancta Sophia. Now the arched Roofs were uſually adorn'd two ways. For they were either gilded with Gold, or painted; which latter way was firſt invented by Pauſias, as Pliny atteſts, Book 35. Chap. 11. Hiſt. Natural. See Valeſius's Notes, at the Book and Chapter before cited.

(z) Inſtead of [προσέθηκε, He added] the Reading muſt neceſſarily be [προσέθηκε, He publiſhed.] For the Roman Emperors did uſually propoſe to publick view thoſe Reſcripts they wrote to the Cities. Therefore, at the Cloſe of the Reſcript they added this word [Proponatur, let it be publiſh'd:] as we have obſerv'd in our Notes on Euſebius. So Conſtantine, when he had wrote many Letters againſt Arius and his Followers, commanded they ſhould be propoſed to publick view in the Forum. Of this ſort was Conſtantine's Epiſtle to Arius and the Arians, which Gelaſius Cyzicenus has recorded in his third Book De Geſtis Synodi Nicænæ: which Epiſtle Epiphanius mentions in Hæreſ. Arian. It was written by Conſtantine after the Nicene Synod, and it contains the Puniſhment of thoſe that would not recede from Arius's wicked Tenets. For at the Cloſe of that Epiſtle, the Emperor commands, that, if they be Perſons of the ordinary Rank, they ſhall pay tribute for ten Heads, beſides their own Poll-Money. But if they be Deſcendants of the Curiales, (or Noble Men) they ſhall be deliver'd to the Court, and made liable to bear the publick Offices of the Decurions. This Letter therefore was like an Edict, and ſo ought to be publickly read and promulg'd. Valeſ.

Constant. which Epistles he represents [Arius] to be an infamous Person, and rebukes him sharply in an Ironical manner. Moreover, he wrote to the (a) Nicomedians, against Eusebius and Theognis: wherein he severely reprehends Eusebius's wickedness, not only for his Arianism, but also because, having formerly been a Favourer of the Tyrants, Party, he had been a Traitor against [him and] his Affairs. He therefore advises them to elect another Bishop in his stead. But I thought it superfluous to insert his Letters concerning these Matters here, because they are long. They that are desirous [to inspect them] may easily find them out, and read them over. Thus much concerning these things.

(a) The greatest part of this Epistle is extant in the first Book of Theodoret's Ecclesiastick History, chap. 20. it is entire in Latin, in Baronius, at the Year of Christ 329; as Justinian the Emperor sent it to Pope Vigilius. Vales.

CHAP. X.

That the Emperour summoned to the Synod Acesius also, a Bishop of the Novatian Heresie.

THis great Diligence and Industry of the Emperour moves me to make mention of another thing, wherein his Mind is declared, and how careful and solicitous he was to procure Peace. For, consulting the Concord and Agreement of the Churches, he (a) summoned Acesius, a Bishop of the Novatian Heresie, to appear at the Council. When the Synod had drawn up a Form of the Creed, and subscribed it, the Emperor enquir'd of Acesius, whether he wou'd also give his Assent to these Articles of the Creed, and also to the Determination about the Festival of Easter. He replied, O Emperor, the Synod has determin'd no new thing: for antiently, even from the [Churches] original, and the Apostolick Times, I have in this same manner received by Tradition both this Form of Faith, and also this time [for the Observation] of the Feast of Easter. When therefore the Emperor demanded of him again, what then should induce you to be a Separatist from the Communion [of the Church?] he related what was done under Decius in the time of the Persecution, and recited the Strictness of that severe Canon, [to wit,] that those who after Baptism had committed any such Sin, as the sacred Scriptures term a mortal Sin, ought not to be admitted to a Participation of the sacred Mysteries: They were indeed to be exhorted to Repentance, but ought not to entertain any Hopes of Remission from the Priests, but from God, who only is able, and has Power to forgive Sins. When Acesius had spoken thus, the Emperor reply'd, O Acesius, set a Ladder, and do you alone climb up to Heaven. This Story neither Eusebius Pamphilus, nor any other Author has mention'd. But I had it from a Person that was in no wise a Liar, one who was very aged, and related what he had seen transacted in the Council. Whence I conjecture, that the same Accident befell those who have omitted the Mention hereof, which happens to many other Writers of History. For they usually pass over many things, either because they are ill affected towards some, or have a Desire to gratifie others. Thus much concerning Acesius. Constant.

(a) Sozomen relates the same story in his first Book, chap. 22. but in such a manner, that 'tis sufficiently apparent, he had it out of Socrates's History. For Socrates tells the whole Story more fully and elegantly. And after he has told it, says he had it from a credible Person, who lived in the times of the Nicene Council. But Sozomen begins this Relation thus, Λέγεται δὲ ἡ Βασιλέα, &c. It's reported that the Emperor, &c. Nor does he confirm it by any Persons Authority. Besides, Sozomen has in a manner stole the very words of Socrates, making some small alterations and interpositions, as Plagiaries usually do. But this Story seems to me very improbable upon many accounts. First, because it is founded on the Authority of no antient Writer. Secondly, neither Socrates nor Sozomen, do say, of what City Acesius was Bishop, which was very necessary to confirm the Story. Thirdly, it is not atall likely, that an heretical Bishop should be summoned by Constantine to an Ecclesiastick Synod. For if Constantine had sent for Acesius in order to the restoring of Peace and Agreement to the Church, upon the same account he ought to have summon'd the Bishops of other Heresies also to the Nicene Council. Lastly, what Socrates says, to wit, that he had this story from a very old man who was at the Synod, seems to me altogether incredible. This person's name was Auxano, a Novatian Presbyter, who was at the Synod with Acesius, and lived until the Reign of Theodosius Junior, as Socrates says, Chap. 13. of this Book. Now from the Nicene Synod to the beginning of Theodosius's Reign, there are 83 Years. To which if you add 20 (for so old Auxano must needs be when he was present at the Council) Auxano must necessarily be above an hundred years old, when he told Socrates this Story. Let the Reader judge therefore, at what rate the Testimony of a decrepid old Heretick is to be valu'd. Vales.

CHP. XI.

Concerning Paphnutius the Bishop.

NOw because we have promised before, to make mention of Paphnutius and Spyridon, it will be seasonable to speak of them here. Paphnutius therefore was Bishop of one of the Cities in the upper Thebais; he was a Person so pious, that wonderful Miracles were wrought by him. In the time of the Persecution, one of his Eyes had been cut out: The Emperor had an high Esteem for the Man, and frequently sent for him to the Pallace, and kissed [the place of] that Eye which had been dug out. So great a Piety and Reverence was there in the Emperor Constantine. Let this therefore be one thing said by us concerning Paphnutius. This other (which was done by his Advice for the Utility and Advantage of the Church, and the Grace and Ornament of the Clergy,) I will now relate. The Bishops had a Design to introduce a new Law into the Church, to wit, That those who were in holy Orders, I mean the Bishops, Presbyters, and Deacons, (a) should abstain from lying with those Wives which they had married during the time they were Laicks. And when a Proposition was made to consult hereof, Phaphnutius (b) rose up in the midst of the Assembly of Bishops, and cried out with a great deal of Earnestness, that such an heavy Yoak ought not to be imposed upon those Persons that were in sacred Orders, saying, That Marriage was honourable, and the Bed undefil'd; [so that they ought to be careful] lest they should rather incommode the Church, by their overmuch Severity. For all Men [said he] cannot bear the Practice of so strict and severe a Continencie, nor is it likely that the Chastity of every one of their Wives should be preserved. (The Husband's keeping Company with his lawful Wife he termed Chastity.) It was sufficient [said he,] that they who had entred themselves into the Function of the Clergy before they were married, should afterwards (according to the antient Tradition of the Church) abstain from entring into a State of Matrimony: But that no Person ought to be separated from his Wife, whom

(a) The Florent. M. S. adds [καὶ διακόνους, and Sub-Deacons:] and so the Reading is in Sozomen, Book 1. Chap. 23. where he tells this Story concerning Paphnutius, where also what we said before is apparent, to wit, that Sozomen borrow'd from Socrates. For he that adds to anothers Relation, shews evidently that he wrote last. Vales.

(b) Rufinus (out of whom Socrates had the former Story which he tells in this Chapter concerning Paphnutius) says not a word of this Speech of Paphnutius; see his first Book Eccles. Hist. Chap. 4. But he relates, That Paphnutius was one of the Bishops in the Parts of Egypt, and that he was present at the Nicene Council.

Conſtant. whom he had heretofore married, [to wit,] whilſt he was a Laick. Thus he ſpake, though he was a Man, who had not experienced what marriage was, and (as I may truly aver) never knew a Woman, for from his childhood he had been educated in a * place where the ſtricteſt exerciſes of Virtue and Abſtinence were conſtantly practiſed, and was eminently famous above all Men for his ſingular continency. All the whole Aſſembly of the Clergy were perſwaded to yield their aſſent, to what Paphnutius ſaid; wherefore they ſilenc'd all further Debate concerning this Point, and left it to every Man's arbitrement whether he would [or would not] abſtain from keeping company with his Wife. And thus much concerning Paphnutius.

CHAP. XII.

Concerning Spyridon Biſhop of the Cyprians.

NOW [we come to ſpeak] of Spyridon: So great a ſanctity was in this Perſon whilſt yet a Shepherd, that he was thought worthy to be made a Paſtor of Men. He had obtained the Biſhoprick of a City in Cyprus call'd Trimithuntis: But by reaſon of his ſingular humility he fed ſheep during his being a Biſhop. There are many things related of this Man: But I will only record one or two, that I may not ſeem to wander from my Subject. One time about midnight, thieves entring his ſheepfold privately, and attempted to take away the ſheep. But God who protected the ſhepherd, preſerv'd his ſheep alſo: For the thieves, were by an inviſible Power faſt bound to the folds. The Morning being now come, he went to his ſheep, where finding the Men bound with their hands behind them, he perceiv'd what had hapned. And after he had prayed, he looſed the thieves, admoniſhing and exhorting them earneſtly, to endeavour the procuring of a livelyhood by honeſt Labours, and not by ſuch unjuſt Rapine: He alſo gave them a Ram, and diſmiſt them with this facetious ſaying, leaſt, ſays he, you might ſeem to have watched all all night in vain. This is one of Spyridon's Miracles. Another was of this ſort. He had a Daughter, a Virgin, indued with her Father's piety, her name Irene. A Perſon well known to her, entruſted her with the keeping of an Ornament, that was of great value. The Maid, that ſhe might with greater ſafety keep what was depoſited with her, hid it in the Earth: And within a ſhort time died. Soon after that, he who had committed this thing to her care, came [to demand it.] Not finding the Virgin, he involves her Father [in that concern,] ſometimes accuſing, another while entreating him. The old Man looking upon the Perſons loſs who had entruſted his Daughter, as his own misfortune, went to his Daughters grave, and did there beg of God, that he would ſhew him the promiſed Reſurrection before the Time. And his hope was not fruſtated. For the Virgin immediately revives, and appears to her Father, and having ſhewed him the place where ſhe had hid the Ornament, immediately departed. Such Perſons as theſe were during the Reign of Conſtantine the Emperor eminent in the Church. Theſe things I both heard from ſeveral Cyprians; and and alſo read them in a Book of Ruſinus a Presbyter, written in Latin, out of which I have not only collected what has here been ſaid, but alſo ſome other Things, which ſhall a little after this be declared. Conſtant.

CHAP. XIII.

Concerning Eutychianus the Monk.

I Have alſo heard of Eutychianus, a pious Man, who flouriſhed at the ſame Time: Who although he was one of the Novatian Church, yet was admired for Works of the ſame Nature with thoſe [we have mentioned.] I will ſincerely confeſs who it was that gave me this Account of him: Nor will I conceal it, though I am ſenſible ſome will be offended with me for it. One Auxanon a Presbyter of the Novatian Church, was a Perſon of a very great Age: This Man, when he was very young, went to the Council of Nice with Aceſius, from him I received what I have ſaid before concerning Aceſius. He lived from thoſe Times to the Reign of Theodoſius the younger, and rehearſed to me, though then very young, theſe [Memoirs] of Eutychianus: He diſcourſed much to me concerning the Divine Grace infus'd into him: But one thing he told me concerning him, more eſpecially worthy of remembrance, which happened in the Reign of Conſtantine. One of thoſe belonging to the Guard, whom the Emperor calls his (a) Domeſticks, being ſuſpected to have attempted ſome Tyrannick Deſigns, made his eſcape by flight: The Emperor, highly incenſed thereat, gave order, that he ſhould be put to death, wherever he could be found: Being apprehended about the mountain Olympus in Bithynia, he was ſhut up in priſon, and loaded with very heavy and painful chains; near theſe parts of Olympus Eutychianus then reſided, leading a ſolitary Life, where he wrought many cures both upon Men's Bodies and Souls. The long lived Auxanon was with him at that time, being then very young, and was by him inſtructed in the Precepts of a ſolitary Life. Many did reſort to this Eutychianus, beſeeching him to releaſe the Priſoner, by interceding for him with the Emperor. (For the fame of the Miracles wrought by Eutychianus was come to the Emperor's hearing.) He readily promiſed to make a Journey to the Emperor. But in regard the Priſoner ſuffered moſt acute tortures cauſed by his chains, thoſe that did ſollicit for him, reported, that his death, haſtned by [the tortures of] his fetters, would both prevent the Emperor's puniſhment, and Eutychianus's interceſſion for him. Eutychianus therefore ſent to the keepers of the Priſon, and intreated them to releaſe the Man. But when they anſwered that it would be a very dangerous thing for them to releaſe a Criminal, he, taking Auxanon only along with him, went to the Priſon: And upon the Keepers refuſal to open the Priſon. the Grace which was in Eutychianus, did there moſt illuſtrate it ſelf: For the Priſon, doors opened of their own accord, whilſt the Keepers of the Priſon had the keys in their cuſtody: And when Eutychianus, together with Auxanon, had entred the Priſon, and a great amazement had ſeized thoſe that were preſent, the

(a) By δίκτιοι he means the Protectores Domeſtici, or Guard of the Body, which waited on the Emperor's Perſon. They were Soldiers of a ſuperior Order; who alſo had greater pay than the others. See Valeſius's Notes on Amm. Marcellin. book 14. pag. 33.

Conſtant. the Chains fell from the Priſoners [Members] of their own accord. Afterwards [Eutychianus] together with his Companion Auxano travelled to the City heretofore named Byzantium, but afterwards called Conſtantinople, and being admitted into the Imperial Palace, he freed the Priſoner from [the danger of] Death. For the Emperor, having a great reſpect for Eutychianus, readily granted his requeſt. This was done after [thoſe times which we are now giving an account of.] But then, the Biſhops that were preſent at the Synod, after they had drawn up in writing ſome things, which they uſually term Canons, return'd to their reſpective Cities. Moreover, I look upon it as a thing advantagious to ſuch as are ſtudious of Hiſtory, to inſert here thoſe Biſhop's Names (as many of them as we were able to find,) that were convened at Nice, as alſo [the name of] the Province and City over which every one of them did preſide, and likewiſe the time wherein they were aſſembled. (b) Hoſius Biſhop of Corduba in Spain. I do believe as is before written. (c) Vito and Vincentius Presbyters of Rome. Alexander [Biſhop] of Egypt. Euſtathius [Biſhop] of Antioch the Great. Macarius [Biſhop] of Jeruſalem. (d) Harpocration [Biſhop] of Cynopolis: And the reſt who are particularly and fully ſet forth in the (e) Synodicon of Athanaſius Biſhop of Alexandria. And the time when this Synod was convened was (as we found it in the (f) Notation of the time prefix'd before the Synod) in the Conſulate of Paulinus and Julianus, Conſtant. on the (g) twentieth day of the Month of May; that was the (h) ſix hundredth thirty ſixth year from the Reign of Alexander the Macedonian. Thus the Synod was concluded. We muſt alſo take notice, that after [the diſſolution of] this Synod, the Emperor took his Progreſs into the Weſtern Parts [of his Empire.

(b) We perfected this place by the aſſiſtance of the Florentine and Sfortian MSS. For in the common Editions of Socrates, after theſe words [Ὅσιος ἐπίσκοπος Κορδύβης, Hoſius Biſhop of Corduba] followed theſe [Βίτων καὶ Βικεντῖνος, Vito and Vincentius.] But thoſe incomparable MSS. exhibited this place entire to us, after this manner: ὅσιος ἐπίσκοπος Κορδύβης Ἱσπανίας· οὕτως πιστεύω ὡς προγέγραπται· ῥώμης βίτων καὶ βικεντῖνος πρεσβύτεροι, &c. i.e. Hoſius Biſhop of Corduba in Spain. I do believe as it is before written. Vito and Vincentius, Presbyters of Rome, &c. This is the Series of the Biſhops who ſubſcribed the Nicene Council; which Socrates tranſcribed from Athanaſius's Synodicon, as he himſelf atteſts hereafter. In the Greek Collections of the Canons this Series is wanting, nor is it extant in Dionyſius Exiguus's Verſion. But in that ancient Collection lately publiſhed at Paris, (which the Weſtern Church heretofore made uſe of, before Dionyſius's Verſion) and in Iſidorus's Collection, this Series occurs almoſt in the ſame words. In that ancient Collection the words are theſe: Et ſubſcripſerunt. Oſius Epiſcopus civitatis Cordubenſis, Provinciæ Spaniæ dixit: Ita credo ſicut ſuperius ſcriptum eſt. Victor & Vincentius Presbyteri urbis Romæ. Alexander Alexandriæ magnæ. Alphocration, &c. i. e. And they ſubſcribed. Oſius Biſhop of the City Corduba, in the Province of Spain, ſaid: I believe ſo, as it is above written. Victor and Vincentius, Presbyters of the City of Rome. Alexander of Alexandria the Great, Alphocration, &c. The words in Iſidorus's Collection are almoſt the ſame. But in Athanaſius's Synodicon, Euſtathius Biſhop of Antioch, and Macarius Biſhop of Jeruſalem, are placed after Alexander Biſhop of Alexandria. Valeſ.

(c) Athanaſius makes mention of this Vito the Presbyter, in His Apologetick againſt the Arians, and atteſts, that a Roman Synod conſiſting of fifty Biſhops (by whom he was received into Communion) was convened in his Church. Valeſ.

(d) In the Latin Collections of the Canons, Harpocration is ſtiled Biſhop of Naucratis, and next to him is ſet Adamantius Cynopolites, or Cynenſis, as it is in that forementioned ancient Collection. Valeſ.

(e) This Book of Athanaſius's is not now (to my knowledge) extant. But 'tis probable that the names of the Biſhops who ſubſcribed the Nicene Council, were tranſlated out of that Book. Valeſ.

(f) Παραγραφὴ (the term that occurs here) imports the Notation (or expreſs Declaration) of the time uſually prefixt before publick Acts. In the Greek Collection of the Canons (which Joannes Tilius firſt publiſhed) the notation of the time is prefixed, thus: Κανόνες τῶν ἁγίων πατέρων, τῶν ἐν νικαίᾳ συνελθόντων, ἐν ὑπατείᾳ παυλίνου καὶ ἰουλιανοῦ τῶν λαμπροτάτων· ἔτους ἀπὸ ἀλεξάνδρου· ἐν μηνὶ δεσίῳ ἐνεσκαιδεκάτῃ, πρὸ δεκατεσσάρων καλανδῶν ἰουλίων· i.e. The Canons of the 318. Holy Fathers, convened at Nice, in the Conſulate of the moſt illuſtrious Paulinus Julianus, on the 636*th year from Alexander, on the nineteenth day of the month Deſius, before the thirteenth of the Calends of July.* Valeſ.

(g) It is otherwiſe in the Greek Collection, which Tilius publiſhed, (ſee the foregoing Note.) For 'tis ſaid that the Synod was convened on the nineteenth Day of the Month Deſius (which the Romans call June) on the thirteenth of the Calends of July. Which is confirmed by the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle, by the Chalcedon Council, and by that Latin Collection which Baronius calls Creſconiana, which account I think is the trueſt. For, ſhould we ſuppoſe that the Council of Nice was aſſembled on the twentieth day of May, there would be too narrow a ſpace of time left for the tranſacting of thoſe Affairs which Conſtantine did after his vanquiſhing of Licinius. Licinius was ſubdued in the laſt Engagement at Chalcedon, in the year of Chriſt 324, on the 15th of the Calends of October, as 'tis recorded in Faſtis Idatii, and in the Alexandrian Chronicle: On the day following Licinius (who made his eſcape to Nicomedia) yielded himſelf to Conſtantine the Conqueror. After this Conſtantine made his entry into Nicomedia: Whilſt he continued there, and haſtned to make his Progreſs into the Eaſtern parts, a Meſſenger arrived, declaring to him the Diſſention of the Alexandrian Church, and of all Egypt, upon account of Arius's Opinion, and the diſturbances of the Melitians, as himſelf atteſts in his Epiſtle to Alexander and Arius. And firſt he ſends Hoſius with his Letters to Alexandria, that he might compoſe thoſe Differences by his Authority. But Hoſius, after he had ſtaid a little while at Alexandria, returns to Conſtantine without effecting his buſineſs. All this could in no wiſe have been done in a ſhorter ſpace of time than three Months. Moreover, Conſtantine perceiving the miſchief to increaſe daily, reſolves upon calling a general Council of Biſhops, that he might thereby reſtore Peace to the Church. Upon this account he diſpatch'd away Couriers throughout all the Provinces, to convene the Biſhops at Nice in Bithynia. Suppoſe therefore, that the Couriers delivered the Emperor's Letters to every one of the Biſhops in the Month of March: It is ſcarce credible, that the Biſhops could come from the remoteſt Regions, as well of the Eaſt as of the Weſt, to Bythinia, before the Month July: Eſpecially ſince they came by Land, and not by Water, as Euſebius atteſts, Book 3. Chap. 6. De Vitâ Conſtant. See Valeſius's Notes on Euſeb. Life of Conſtant. Book 3. Chap. 14.

(h) After theſe words [the ſix hundredth thirty ſixth year from the reign of Alexander the Macedonian] Leo. Allat. MS. adds theſe [and it was the nineteenth year from the beginning of the reign of Conſtantine the Emperor,] which is very true. For when Paulinus and Julianus were Conſuls, (which was on the 325th year of Chriſt,) the Nicene Synod was (according to Socrates's Opinion) aſſembled in May, it being then the nineteenth year of Conſtantine's Reign. His 20th year began the ſame year, about the end of July following. Valeſ.

CHAP. XIV.

That Euſebius Biſhop of Nicomedia, Theognis Biſhop of Nice (who had been baniſh'd becauſe they were Abettors of Arius's Opinion,) having afterwards ſent a Libel of Repentance, and agreed to the Expoſition of the Faith, were readmitted to their Sees.

MOreover, (a) Euſebius and Theognis, (b) having ſent a Libel of Repentance to the moſt eminent Biſhops, were by an Imperial Order recall'd from Exile, and reſtored to their own Churches: For he ſays, that Euſebius and Theognis were recall'd from baniſhment almoſt before he had told us they were exiled. Sozomen therefore did better, who in this particular corrected Socrates's Relation. For, in the firſt Book of his Hiſtory, Chap. 21. he relates that Euſebius and Theognis were baniſh'd by the Emperor Conſtantine a little after the Synod, and that other Biſhops were put into their Sees. Then, in his ſecond Book Chap. 16. he declares how they were recalled from their baniſhment. From which paſſage (that I may make this Remark by the by) it may be concluded, that Sozomen wrote his Hiſtory after Socrates, in as much as he corrects and amends Socrates's Narration in many places. Further, Euſebius and Theognis were baniſh'd three Months after the Nicene Synod, as Philoſtorgius atteſts: and returned from their Exile (as the ſaid Philoſtorgius relates) in the third year after that Synod, that is, in the year of Chriſt 328. which account agrees exactly with the Hiſtory of Affairs tranſacted in that time. For all Hiſtorians agree that Euſebius, upon his return from baniſhment, entertained thoughts of confirming Arius's Opinion, and of thruſting out thoſe that aſſerted the Nicene Faith. And, that his firſt attack was made againſt Euſtathius

(a) Socrates has obſerved no order here.

Euſtathius Biſhop of Antioch, whom he cauſed to be expell'd [from his See] by feigned Calumnies, in the year of Chriſt 329, or 330. Baronius therefore did ill, to place Euſebius Nicomedienſis's return from exile on the year of Chriſt 330. Valeſ.

(b) Baronius (at the year of Chriſt 325.) reproves Socrates and Sozomen, for ſaying, that Euſebius and Theognis were baniſh'd a little after the Nicene Synod; and that ſome few years after (having ſent a Libel of ſatisfaction to the moſt eminent Biſhops) they were recalled from their Exile. Baronius endeavours to prove, that this Libel was preſented by Euſebius to the Biſhops in the Nicene Synod. For he aſſerts, that the Rule of Faith was firſt written; which Euſebius Nicomedienſis (with four other Biſhops) refuſed to ſubſcribe: But, that the ſaid Euſebius, having afterwards preſented a Libel of Satisfaction, did ſubſcribe what had been determined [in the Synod.] But, after this, when the Synod had Anathematized Arius, Euſebius and Theognis (ſays he) would not ſubſcribe this Anathematiſm; and for that reaſon they were condemned and depoſed, by the Synod, and Amphion and Chreſtus were put into their Sees. But the Emperor Conſtantine (continues he) interceded that the ſentence might not be put in execution, and perſwaded the Synod that they ſhould admit of Euſebius and Theognis upon their preſenting a Libel of Repentance. This is Baronius's Opinion. But he is out, firſt, in ſaying that there were two Libels preſented by Euſebius: For of the former Libel no Body has ever made mention. Secondly, he cites no Author for what he ſays concerning Euſebius's and Theoginis's Deprivation and Condemnation done in the Nicene Council. Conſtantine (in his Epiſtle to the Nicomedians, the latter part of which Epiſtle in Greek the Reader may meet in Theodoret. Eccleſ. Hiſt. Book 1. Chap. 20; it occurs entire at the cloſe of Gelaſius Cyzicenus's 3d Book, pag. 217.) ſays not that it was then done, but only ſays, that Euſebius was afraid it would be done. Laſtly, his ſaying that a Libel of Repentance was preſented by Euſebius in the Nicene Synod, is manifeſtly refuted from the Libel it ſelf. For this Libel was preſented by Euſebius, when he was in baniſhment, as is atteſted by theſe words of it, καὶ διὰ τάτε τὸ γεγραμμένῳ πληροφορῶμεν τῷ συγκαταθέσιν, ἣν τὴν ἔξοδον βασιλέως φέροντες, ἀλλὰ τῷ, &c. i. e. and by this Libel do fully declare and confirm our conſent; [which we are induced to do] not becauſe we look upon our Exile to be tedious, &c. Beſides, this Libel was ſent, when Arius was recalled from baniſhment; which is apparent from theſe words, Ἄτοπον δὲ τὸ δοκοῦντι μὲν κατάδικον, ἀνακεκλῆσθαι, καὶ ἀπολογησάμενον, &c. i. e. But it would be abſurd (ſince he that ſeemed to be guilty, is recalled, and has made his defence in reference to, &c. Moreover, Arius was recalled from baniſhment by Conſtantine long enough after the Nicene Synod, &c. Valeſ.

Conſtant. thoſe who had been Ordain'd in their places being removed by them; Euſebius [put out] Amphion, and Theognis [removed] Chreſtus. This is the Copy of their Libel.

We having been ſome time ſince (c) condemned by Your Piety, (d) without having Our Cauſe declared or defended, ought quietly to bear what has been determined by Your Holy Diſcretion.

(c) In as much as Euſebius and Theognis do ſay in the beginning of this Epiſtle, that they were condemned by the Biſhops: it is worth our making an enquiry, when and where they were condemned. Baronius ſays they were condemned, and depoſed in the Nicene Synod. But this is contradicted by St. Jerome's Authority; who, in his Dialogue againſt the Luciferiani, does in expreſs words atteſt, that Euſebius and Theognis (with other Biſhops of the Arian faction) were admitted of by the Nicene Synod. And this he proves both from the teſtimony of thoſe that were preſent at the Synod, and alſo from the very Acts of the Nicene Synod; in which, amongſt the names of thoſe Biſhops who ſubſcribed the Synod, Euſebius and the others I have mentioned are reckoned. The ſame is atteſted by Philoſtorgius, who ſays that Euſebius was baniſh'd about three months after the Nicene Synod. Since therefore Euſebius and Theognis do confeſs themſelves to have been condemned by the Biſhops, and ſince 'tis manifeſt that was not done in the Nicene Synod; it muſt neceſſarily have been done in ſome other meeting of the Biſhops. The reaſon of their being exiled, Conſtantine does declare in his Epiſtle to the Nicomedians, (the latter part whereof ſee in Theodoret. Eccleſ. Hiſt. Book 1. Chap. 20.) For he ſays, that he baniſhed them, becauſe they entertained certain Heretics, (whom he had commanded to be ſent to his Court from the City Alexandria,) and held communion with them. (Baronius, at the year of Chriſt 329, thinks theſe Hereticks were Melitians. But I do rather believe they were Arians: And this is expreſly affirmed by the Egyptian Biſhops, in their Synodick Epiſtle, which Athanaſius has recorded in his ſecond Apology againſt the Arians.) For this reaſon therefore Conſtantine ordered a Synod of ſome Biſhops to be convened, by whom Euſebius and Theognis were condemned and depoſed, after which the Emperor baniſhed them. This is expreſly affirmed by Athanaſius (in his Book De Synodis,) and by Theodoret (Book 1. Chap. 19. Eccleſ. Hiſt.) Valeſ.

(d) Chriſtophorſon and Muſculus omitted theſe words [πρὸ κρίσεως, without having our cauſe declared or defended] in their Verſion. They occur in Sozomen (Book 2. Chap. 16.) and Epiphan. Scholaſticus has rendred them thus: Dudum quidem ante judicium condemnati à Reverentiâ veſtrâ, patienter ferre quæ decreta ſunt à ſancto veſtro concilio debuimus; i. e. Having been ſometime ſince condemned by your Reverence before judgment, we ought patiently to bear what is decreed by your Holy Council. By theſe words Euſebius ſeems to intimate, that he was condemned without being heard, and by a raſh judgment, or prejudice: To wit, becauſe the Emperor had condemned him before, who was angry with Euſebius for ſeveral reaſons, which you may meet with in Conſtantine's Epiſtle to the Nicomedians; ſee Theodoret. Eccleſ. Hiſt. Book 1. Chap. 20. Valeſ.

Conſtant. But becauſe 'tis abſurd, by ſilence to give an occaſion of Calumny againſt our ſelves, for this reaſon we declare to You, that We have both unanimouſly agreed to the [Determination about the] Faith, and alſo (after We had made Reſearches into the Notion of Homoöuſios,) with Our utmoſt earneſtneß laboured for Peace, having never been Followers of any Hereſie. And when We had ſuggeſted whatever came into our Minds upon account of the Churches ſecurity, and had fully ſatisfied thoſe that ought to be perſwaded by us, We ſubſcribed the Faith, but have not ſubſcribed the Anathematiſm; not that we had any thing to object againſt the Faith, but becauſe We did not believe the Perſon accuſed to be ſuch a one [as he was repreſented to be;] having been fully ſatisfied that he was no ſuch Perſon, partly from the private Letters written to Us by Him, and partly from the Diſcourſes he made in Our Preſence. (e) But if Your Holy Council was [then] ſatisfied, We [now] make no reſiſtance, but agree to what You have determined, and by this Libel do fully declare and confirm Our Conſent; which We are induced to do] not becauſe We look upon Our Exile to be tedious and burthenſome, but that We might avoid the ſuſpicion of Hereſie. For if You ſhall now vouchſafe to let Us return to Your Preſence, You ſhall find Us to be of the ſame Opinion with You in all Points, and quietly to adhere to what You have determined: Since it hath ſeemed good to Your Piety gently to treat even * Him, who is accuſed for theſe things, and to (f) recall Him from Baniſhment. But it would be abſurd (ſince He that ſeemed to be guilty is recalled, and has made his Defence in reference to thoſe things laid to his charge,) that We ſhould be ſilent, and muſter up an Argument againſt Our ſelves, Do You therefore vouchſafe (as it befits Your Piety that loves Chriſt) to remind Our Emperor moſt dear to God, to offer up Our Supplications to Him, and ſpeedily to determine concerning Us as ſhall be moſt agreeable to Your [Prudence.]

* Arius.

(e) The meaning of theſe words is this. If we then ſatisfied your holy Council (to wit, the Nicene) and perſwaded it to think, that we had juſt cauſe for our being unwilling to ſubſcribe the Anathematiſm now we fully compleat our conſent, and are ready to ſubſcribe as well the Anathematiſm as the form of the Creed. You ſee how much the adding of theſe two words [then and now] would enlighten this place. Valeſ.

This is the Libel of Euſebius and Theognis's Recantation. From the words whereof I conjecture, that they ſubſcribed the Faith which had been publiſhed [in the Council;] but would not give their conſent to the depoſing of Arius: And it appears hence, that Arius was recalled from Baniſhment] before them: But although this ſeems to be ſo, yet he was forbid to enter Alexandria. Which is evident from this, [to wit,] that he afterwards invented a way for his own return into the Church and the City Alexandria, by having made uſe of a counterfeited Repentance, as we ſhall relate in its due place.

(f) That is attributed here to the Biſhops, which had been done by the Emperor. For the Emperor, not the Biſhops, had recalled Arius from his Exile. But Writers do uſually ſpeak thus; aſſigning that to the Biſhops, which was the Emperors Deed; and on the contrary, that to the Emperor which the Biſhops did. So Socrates ſaid above, that the Nicene Synod forbad Arius to enter Alexandria; whenas this was the Emperor's doing, as appears from his Epiſtle. Valeſ.

CHAP. XV.

That Alexander dying after the [Nicene] Synod, Athanasius was consecrated Bishop of the City Alexandria.

(a) SOON after, upon the death of Alexander Bishop of Alexandria, Athanasius was promoted to the presidency over that Church. Rufinus relates, that this Person, when he was very young, did, together with those that were his equals in Age, play at a kind of an holy sport: this Play was an imitation of the Sacerdotal Function, and of those Persons order that were Clergy-men. In this sport therefore Athanasius was elected Bishop, and every one of the rest of the Children acted either a Presbyter, or a Deacon. This sport the Children plaid at on that Day, whereon was celebrated the Memory of Peter the Martyr and Bishop. Alexander Bishop of Alexandria accidentally passing by at that time, saw all their Play. And, having afterwards sent for the Children, he enquired of them what place had been allotted to ever one of them in the Play, supposing that from what had been done, some thing might be portended [concerning each of them.] And he gave order, that the Children should be educated in the Church, and instructed in Learning; but most especially Athanasius. Afterwards when he was come a maturity of Age, he ordained him Deacon, and took him along with him to Nice, that he might assist him in the Disputations there, at such time as that Synod was convened. These things Rufinus has related concerning Athanasius, in his (b) Books [of Ecclesiastick History;] nor is it at all unlikely that these things hapned: For many such like Acts are frequently found to have been done. Thus much we have hitherto said concerning Athanasius.

(a) Socrates (as also Sozomen) Mistakes here in placing Alexander's death, and Athanasius's Ordination after Eusebius's and Theognis's return from exile. For Alexander Bishop of Alexandria dyed within five months after the Council of Nice, as Athanasius testifies in his second Apology against the Arians, where he speaks of Melitius. The same says Theodoret, in the first book of his History, in chap. 26. Alexander therefore died in the year of Christ 325. and Athanasius was Consecrated either at the latter end of the same Year, or in the beginning of the next. Vales.

(b) See Rufinus's Eccles. Hist. book 1. chap. 14. where Rufinus adds this circumstance to this story; that the Boys (upon Alexander's enquiry) confessed some Catechumens had been Baptiz'd by Athanasius, whom they had chosen Bishop in their sports. Then Alexander, having demanded of those said to be baptiz'd, what Questions they had been asked, and what Answers they made, and also having examined him who had asked them the Questions; found that all things had been done according to the Rites of our Religion: And, after a consult with his Clergy, 'tis said, he ordered, that those Boys (on whom water had been poured, after they were perfectly question'd, and had return'd compleat answers) should not be rebaptiz'd, &c. See Rufinus at the Book and Chapter now cited.

CHAP. XVI.

How the Emperor Constantine, having enlarged the City heretofore call'd Byzantium, named it Constantinople.

THE Emperor, after the [Dissolution of the] Council spent his time in delight and pleasure. As soon therefore as he had finish'd the Publick Festivals of his (a) Vicennalia, he forthwith employ'd himself very diligently about re-edifying and erecting of Churches. This he did as well in other Cities, as in that that bore his own Name. Which City being formerly called Byzantium, he very much enlarged; he encompassed it with magnificent Walls, and beautified with several Edifices; and having made it equal to the Imperial City Rome, (b) he named it Constantinople, and did by a Law establish that it should be call'd New Rome. Which Law was engraven on a Pillar of stone, and (c) exposed to the publick view, being erected in the (d) Strategium, near to the Emperor's Statue on horseback. He also founded two Churches in the same City, the one of which he named Irene, and the other he called the Apostles: Nor did he only improve and enlarge the Affairs of the Christians, as I have said, but did also subvert [the Superstition] of the Gentiles. For [he took their] Images [out of their Temples] and set them up in the most Publick Places, that they might serve to beautifie the City Constantinople: He also expos'd the Delphick Tripods openly in the Hippodrome. But it will perhaps seem superfluous to mention these things now. For they are sooner beheld with the Eyes, than the relation of them can be heard. But at that time the Christian Religion was mightily propagated and increased. For the Divine Providence did (amongst other things) reserve that more especially for the times of Constantine: And thus has Eusebius Pamphilus in a magnifick stile recorded the praises of this Emperor. But yet we judge it not unseasonable for us to speak briefly of them according to our ability.

(a) That is the Festivals for his having arrived to the twentieth year of his Empire.

(b) This place, which was corrupted and obscured by an ill distinction, we have illustrated and restor'd, by blotting out the Particle δέ; which Particle is not to be found, either in the Florent. or Sforti. M.S. our correction is also confirm'd by Epiphanius Scholasticus's Version, who thus translates the passage, Et denominatam Constantinopolim, appellari secundam Romam lege firmavit. Vales.

(c) Instead of [παρέθηκε, was set, or placed] it should be [παρέστηκε,] was exposed, or erected. This emendation is confirm'd by Epiphan. Scholasticus's Version. Vales.

(d) The Stategium was a publick edifice wherein the Strategi, (i. e. the Duumviri, the two principal Magistrates that hereto fore governed the City Byzantium) were wont to sit. It is mentioned in the old description of the City Constantinople, which is prefixt before the Notitia Imperii Romani. Vales.

CHAP. XVII.

How Helena, the Emperor's Mother, came to Jerusalem, and having there found Christ's Cross, which she had sought for a long time, built a Church.

HELENA the Emperor's Mother, (from whose name Drepanum, which was formerly only a Village, but made a City by the Emperor, was call'd Helenopolis) being admonished by God in her Dreams, travell'd to Jerusalem. And when she found that place which was formerly Jerusalem, desolate (as the Prophet predicted) * like a lodge [set up] to preserve Apples, she searched diligently for Christ's Sepulchre wherein he was buried, and whence he arose, and though with great difficulty, yet by God's assistance she found it out. What was the reason of this Difficulty, I will in few words explain. Those that embraced Christ's Doctrine, did after the time of his Passion pay an high respect to that Monument. But the Heathens, who abhorred the Christian Religion, having covered the Place with an heap of Earth, erected thereon a Temple to Venus, and set up her image there, designing wholly to suppress the memory of that place. And this plot of theirs had for a long time succeeded. But the Emperor's Mother had notice hereof. Wherefore, having thrown down the image, remov'd the Earth, and wholly cleared the place, she finds three Crosses in the monument: One of them was that blessed Cross on which our Saviour had

* See Esai. 1.8. where the Septuagint Version is, ὡς ὀπωροφυλάκιον ἐν σικυηρέᾳ; which, in our English translation is thus worded, as a lodge in a Garden of Cucumbers; which Rendition does exactly agree with the original Hebrew.

Conſtant. had hung: The other two were thoſe, on which the two Thieves, that were crucified with him, had died. There was alſo found with the Croſſes Pilate's Title, whereon he had written in divers Languages, and proclaim'd that that Chriſt who was crucified, was the King of the Jews. But in regard 'twas dubious which of theſe was the Croſs that was ſearch'd for, the Emperor's Mother was not a little troubled hereat. This trouble the Biſhop of Jeruſalem, by name Macarius, ſoon eaſed her of; and by [the power of] his Faith clear'd the doubt: For he requeſted a Sign of God and obtain'd it; the Sign was this: A certain Woman of that Vicinage, having been oppreſs'd with a tedious and laſting Diſtemper, was now juſt at the point of death. The Biſhop therefore commanded every one of the Croſſes to be applied to her now expiring, being perſwaded in himſelf that if the Woman were touch'd by the precious Croſs [of the Lord] ſhe ſhould recover: Nor was his Hope fruſtrated: For the two Croſſes which were not our Lord's being applied, the Woman nevertheleſs continued in her dying condition; but when the third, the true and genuine Croſs was applied, the dying Woman immediately recover'd and was made whole. After this manner was the Croſs found out: But the Emperor's Mother erected over the place where the Sepulchre was, a moſt magnificent Church, and call'd it (a) New Jeruſalem, building it oppoſite to that old deſerted Jeruſalem. She left there one half of the Croſs, incloſed in a Silver Caſe, as a Relique to be ſeen by thoſe that ſhou'd deſire it; the other half ſhe ſent to the Emperor, which when he had receiv'd, being fully perſwaded that that City would be perfectly ſecure wherein ſuch a [Relique] as this was preſerv'd, he hid it within his own Statue, (b) which is erected upon a vaſt Pillar of Porphyry in Conſtantinople, in the Forum, call'd from him Conſtantine's Forum. This Story I have recorded as it has been related to me; but almoſt all the Inhabitants of Conſtantinople do affirm it to be true. Conſtantine having alſo receiv'd the Nails with which Chriſt's Hands were faſtned to the Croſs; (for his Mother, having found them alſo in the Sepulchre, ſent them to him:) He order'd Bridles and a Helmet to be made of them, which he made uſe of in his Military Expeditions. Moreover, the Emperor gave large Supplies of all manner of Materials towards the building of the Churches, and wrote to Macarius the Biſhop to haſten the Work. The Emperor's Mother, having finiſh'd the New Jeruſalem, built another Church in no wiſe inferior in ſplendour to the former, in the Cave at Bethlehem, which was the place of Chriſt's Birth according to the Fleſh: Beſides, [ſhe erected another Church] upon the Mount, from whence he was taken up into Heaven. And ſhe was ſo religiouſly and piouſly affected towards theſe things, that ſhe would pray in the Women's company together with the others: She alſo invited thoſe Virgins that were enrolled in the Catalogue of the Churches to an Entertainment: Where ſhe herſelf waited, and brought the Meat to the Tables. Beſides, ſhe was very liberal both to the Churches, and alſo to the Indigent. [In fine,] having ſpent her life very piouſly, ſhe died about the eightieth year of her age: And her Body was convey'd to the Imperial City New Rome, and depoſited amongſt the Imperial Monuments. Conſtant.

(a) Socrates borrow'd this Story out of Euſebius's third Book of Conſtantine's Life, Chap. 33. But miſtakes in ſaying that the Church which was built over our Saviour's Sepulchre by Helena, or rather by Conſtantine, was call'd New Jeruſalem. For Euſebius ſays no ſuch thing: But he only alludes to the New Jeruſalem, which is mentioned in St. John's Revelations. See our notes on Euſeb. Life of Conſtant. Book 3. Chap. 33. Valeſ.

(b) Philoſtorgius does report that the People us'd to come to this Pillar with their Tapers, and worſhip it; which is very ſtrange and almoſt incredible: But Theodoret does by his authority confirm it, in the firſt Book of his Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory, and the laſt Chapter. Valeſ.

CHAP. XVIII.

How the Emperor Conſtantine aboliſh'd Gentiliſm, and erected many Churches in ſeveral places.

AFter this, the Emperor, becoming more ſolicitous about [the Propagation of] Chriſtianity, abhorr'd the Superſtitions of the Gentiles: And firſt he aboliſh'd the Combats of the Gladiators: Afterwards he placed his own Statues in the Temples. The Heathens affirming that it was Serapis that cauſed the Inundations of Nile, whereby the Fields of Egypt were water'd, becauſe there was a Cubit uſually carried into his Temple, the Emperor (a) ordered Alexander to remove the Cubit into the Church [of the Alexandrians,] hereupon 'twas generally reported, that, becauſe Serapis was diſguſted, the Nile would not overflow; nevertheleſs, there hapned an Inundation on the enſuing Year, and afterwards, which alſo does continue to this day: And thus it was really demonſtrated, that the Inundation of the Nile hapned not by the means of their Superſtition, but by the decree of Providence. About the ſame time, thoſe barbarous Nations, the Sarmatæ and the Goths made Inroads into the Roman Territories, and yet the Emperor's forwardneſs in building of Churches was not in the leaſt interrupted thereby, but he made a commodious proviſion for both thoſe Affairs. For, having put his confidence in the * Chriſtian Banner, he totally ſubdued thoſe his Enemies; in ſo much that he took off the Tribute of Gold which had been cuſtomarily paid to the Barbarians by thoſe Emperors who were his Predeceſſors; and that was the firſt time that they (being aſtoniſh'd at their prodigious Overthrow) were perſwaded to embrace the Chriſtian Religion, by which Conſtantine had been every where preſerv'd. Again, he erected other Churches: One he built at that place called the Oak of Mambre, under which the ſacred Scriptures tell us that the Angels were entertain'd by Abraham. For the Emperor being inform'd that Altars were erected under that Oak, and, that Pagan Sacrifices were there perform'd, by his Letter he ſeverely reprov'd Euſebius Biſhop of Cæſarea: And gave command that the Altar ſhould be demoliſh'd, and an Houſe of Prayer erected near that Oak. He alſo gave order for the building of another Church, in Heliopolis, a City of Phœnicia, for this

(a) Chriſtophorſon and Muſculus thought that theſe Words were tranſpoſed; they read them (as appears from their Verſion) thus, εἰς τὴν ἐκκλησίαν Ἀλεξανδρέων ἡ πῆχυς μεταπεθέναι ἐκέλευσε, [the Emperor] ordered that the Cubit ſhould be removed into the Church of the Alexandrians. But, becauſe the word [μεταπεθέναι] cannot be taken in a paſſive ſenſe, the place muſt be otherwiſe mended: Which from the Sfortian MS. we have thus reſtored: αὐτὸς εἰς τὴν ἐκκλησίαν ἡ πῆχυν ἀλέξανδρον μεταπεθέναι ἐκέλευσεν; [the Emperor] ordered Alexander to remove the Cubit into the Church [of the Alexandrians.] Which emendation needs no confirmation. See Rufin. Eccleſ. Hiſt. Book 2. Chap. 23. This order of Conſtantine's laſted not long. For Julian commanded that the ſame Cubit ſhould be carried back again into Serapis's Temple, where it ſeems to have continued till Theodoſius's Reign, and the demoliſhment of Serapis's Temple. Valeſ.

* He means that Standard, or Banner, which the Emperor order'd to be made, in figure like to the Croſs that appear'd to him in the face of the Heavens. See Chap. 2. of this Book.

Constant. this reason. What manner of Law-maker the Citizens of Heliopolis originally had, or what Person he was as to his Morals, I cannot certainly tell. But his Disposition is sufficiently demonstrated from that City: For the Law of their Country has commanded that the Women should be common among them, upon which Account the Children amongst them could not be known whose they were. For there was no distinction betwixt the Parents and the Children. Their Virgins they delivered to strangers that arrived amongst them, that they might deflower them. The Emperor made it his business to abolish this custom, which had so long prevailed amongst them. For having abrogated the flagitiousness of those unclean usages, by a discreet and chast Law, he brought them to know and distinguish betwixt Families: And when he had built Churches, he took care that a Bishop should be ordain'd over them, and a sacred Clergy. Thus he reformed the impious usages of the Heliopolites, and made them more modest and civil. After the like manner also he demolish'd the Temple of Venus at Aphaca near [the mount] Libanus, and abrogated those impudent and obscene Mysteries there celebrated. What need I relate how he expell'd that Devil who pretended to utter Prophecies, out of Cilicia, commanding the house in which he lurked, to be demolished even to its very Foundations. Moreover, so ardent was the Emperors love for the Christian Religion, that being about to ingage in a War with the Persians, he provided a Tabernacle made of Linen painted with divers colours, much resembling a Church (even as Moses did in the Wilderness) and this he would have carried about with him, that so in the most desert Regions he might have an Oratory ready. But this War went no further at that time: For it hapned to be immediately extinguish'd through the fear which the Persians had conceiv'd of the Emperor. But I think it unseasonable to relate here how diligent the Emperor Constantine was in repairing Cities, and how he turned many Villages into Cities; as for instance, Drepane, which bore his Mother's name, and Constantia in Palestine, so called from his Sister's Name Constantia. For our Design is not to recount all the Emperor's Actions, but them only which belong to the Christian Religion, and those more particularly which were done about the Churches. Wherefore, the Emperor's famous exploits, in regard they are of a subject different [from mine,] and require a peculiar Treatise, I leave to others, that are able to commit to writing such Matters. Indeed, I my self, had the Church continued undisturbed by Factions and Discord, had been wholly silent. For where the Subject affords not matter proper for a Narrative, the Relator's Words are superfluous and useless. But in regard a subtile, vain, and insignificant craftiness in disputing, hath disturbed, and at the same time also dissipated and distracted the Apostolick Faith of Christianity, I supposed it requisite to commit these things to writing; that so those Affairs which have been transacted in the Churches, might not be buried in silence. For the knowledge of these things does both procure great praise and commendation amongst most Men, and also renders him that is well versed therein much more solid and cautious; teaching him not to fluctuate or stagger [in his sentiments,] when any * vain bablings about words and terms shall happen to arise.

CHAP. XIX.

After what manner the Innermost Indian Nations were in the times of Constantine converted to Christianity.

NOW therefore we must record, how the Christian Religion was propagated in the times of this Emperor. For the innermost Indians, and the Iberians did then first embrace the Christian Faith. But we will briefly explain, what we mean by the addition of this Term, the Innermost. When the Apostles, about to take their Journey to the Heathens, in order to their preaching to them, had by lot divided them amongst themselves, (a) Thomas received the Apostolate of the Parthians. To Matthew was allotted Æthiopia. Bartholomew had that India assign'd to him which lyes upon the confines of Æthiopia. But this innermost India, which is inhabited by several barbarous Nations, who make use of different Languages, was not enlightned with the Doctrine of Christianity, before the Times of Constantine. What was the cause of their embracing the Christian Religion, I come now to relate. One Meropius, a Philosopher, by birth a Tyrian, made it his business to see the Country of the Indians, emulating herein (b) Metrodorus the Philosopher, who a little before him had travelled over that same Country. Meropius therefore taking along with him two Youths that were related to him, who were in no wise unskill'd in the Greek Language, arrived in this Country in a Ship. And having seen what he desired, in order to his procuring necessary Provisions, he put to Land at a Place which had a safe commodious Harbour. It hapned, that a little before [his arrival there] the League betwixt the Romans and Indians had been broken. The Indians therefore took the Philosopher, and those that were in the Ship with him, and put them all to death, except his two young Kinsmen. Having saved the Lives of the two Youths, out of a compassion to their Age, they presented them to the King of the Indians. He, much pleased with the young Men's looks, made the one of them, whose name was Ædesius, the Cup-bearer of his Table: To the other, whose name was Frumentius, he * committed the custody of his Accounts and Evidences-Royal. Not long after this, the King dying (having left behind him a Son to be his Successor, who was a minor, and his Wife,) gave these two Young Men their liberty. But the Queen, seeing her Son left in his minority, spoke to these two Persons to take care of him, till such time as he should come to maturity of Age. The young Men, in Obedience to the Queen, undertake the management of the King's Business. But Frumentius was the chief Person in managing the Affairs of State. And he was very earnest in enquiring of the Roman Merchants who then came to trade in that country, whether there were any that embrac'd Chriſtianity to be found among 'em. Having found ſome, and inform'd them who he was, he exhorted them to make choice of (c) ſome private meeting places for the performance of prayers therein, after the manner of Chriſtians. Afterwards, within ſome ſhort interval of time he built an oratory: and they, having inſtructed ſome Indians in the principles of Chriſtianity, brought them to prayers with them. But afterwards, when the young King came to a maturity of age, Frumentius reſigning to him the adminiſtration of the affairs of the Kingdom, which he had well manag'd, petitioned for leave to return into his own Country. And tho' the King and his mother entreated him to ſtay, yet they could not perſwade him, but being deſirous to ſee his own Country, he, together with Ædeſius return'd home. Ædeſius haſten'd to Tyre to ſee his Parents and Kindred: but Frumentius arriving at Alexandria, related the whole ſtory to Athanaſius, (d) who was then newly dignified with that Biſhoprick; informing him of the circumſtances of his travels, and that there was good grounds to hope that the Indians would embrace Chriſtianity: [He alſo deſir'd him] that he would ſend a Biſhop and a Clergy thither, and that he ought in no wiſe to neglect thoſe that might be brought unto ſalvation. Athanaſius having taken into conſideration what was moſt expedient to be done, entreated Frumentius himſelf to take upon him the Biſhoprick, telling him that there was no man better quallified for it than he. Which was done. (e) Frumentius therefore dignified with an Epiſcopate, returns again to the Indians Country, and there became a preacher of the Chriſtian Religion; he founded many Oratories, and being vouchſafed [the aſſiſtance of] Divine Grace, he wrought many Miracles, and cured many Men's Bodies together with their Souls. Theſe things Rufinus ſays he heard from Ædeſius's own mouth, who was afterwards dignified with a Presbyterſhip in the Church of Tyre.

(b) This is Metrodorus the Philosopher, whom Jerome has mention'd in his Chronicon; who, returning from his Travails in India, presented Constantine with many gemms and pearls, and feigned that many more of greater value were taken from him by Sapor King of the Persians: which lie of his was the occasion of the Persian War, as Am. Marcellinus attests, book 25. pag. 295. Edit. Vales. See Valesius's Notes on Amm. Marcell. pag. 304.

Conſtant.

(c) Tranſlators underſtood not this place. For Muſculus renders it thus, Ut ſeparatis locis uterentur, that they ſhould make uſe of ſeparate places. Chriſtophorſon thus, ut loca ſeparatim ſibi ſumerent, that they ſhould take to themſelves places ſeverally. In this chap. Socrates has tranſlated Rufinus (book 1. chap. 9. Eccleſiaſt. Hiſt.) almoſt word for word; and calls thoſe τὸ πρὸς ἰδιάζουσας, which Rufinus had termed Conventicula. Now Conventicula are properly private Places wherein Collects, or ſhort Prayers are made; and from theſe places Churches are diſtinguiſhed, which belong to the right of the Publick, and are not in the Power of any private Perſon. Valeſ.

(d) Rufinus ſays the ſame: Tum vero Athanaſius (nam is nuper ſacerdotium ſuſceperat,) i. e. But then Athanaſius (for he had a little before undertaken the Epiſcopate, &c.) But if we conſider the matter more attentively, theſe things cannot be. For Meropius the Philoſopher is ſaid to have travell'd into India, in imitation of the Philoſopher Metrodorus, who had taken a view of that Country before him. But Metrodorus, return'd not from his Indian Journey before the Year of Chriſt 325. For at his return from India he preſented the Emperor Conſtantine with gifts which he had receiv'd from the King of the Indians, as we remarked before in note (b.) in this chapter. Which muſt neceſſarily happen after the conqueſt of Licinius. For then Conſtantine firſt receiv'd the Empire of the Eaſt. Now, Licinius was vanquiſh'd at the latter end of the Year of Chriſt 324. Meropius therefore, in regard, following Metrodorus's Example, he attempted to travel over India, muſt have undertaken this journey ſome Years after him. Let us then ſuppoſe, that Meropius went into India in the year of our Lord 327. On the year following, when he ſhould have returned into his own Country, he was ſlain by the Barbarians. And Ædeſius and Frumentius, being as yet youths, were preſented to the Indian King; and one of them was made his Cup-bearer; the other was ſet over his Acts and Evidences Royal. In which Offices both continued to the Kings death. Now, ſuppoſe they ſerved the King three years. After this the Indian King dies, leaving his Son very young. But the Queen his mother entreated Ædeſius and Frumentius to undertake the Government of the Kingdom, till her Son were of Age. Let us alſo allow that the King's Son was about eight years old when his father died. In as much as Frumentius return'd not to Alexandria till the young King was grown a Man, it is wholly requiſite that he ſhould have manag'd the Affairs of the Kingdom at leaſt ten Years. So Frumentius return'd to Alexandria about the Year of our Lord 341; in which year Athanaſius was not newly made Biſhop, but had held that Biſhoprick above fifteen Years. From what we have ſaid 'tis apparent, that this converſion of the Indians by Frumentius hapned in the Reign of Conſtantius, not of Conſtantine, as Rufinus, and others that follow him, have related. Valeſ.

(e) Athanaſius ſpeaks of this Frumentius, in his Apologetick to the Emperor Conſtantius. And a little after mentions Conſtantius's Epiſtle to Aizanas and Sazanas the Kings of Auxumis, wherein he commands them to ſend Frumentius (whom Athanaſius had ordained Biſhop of Auxumis) to Alexandria, to George Biſhop of that City, that he might receive from him the Doctrine of the true Faith. Whence it appears, that Frumentius was at that time but newly ordain'd by Athanaſius. Now this Epiſtle was written in the Year of Chriſt 356. Baronius, (in his Annotations on the Roman Martyrology,) ſays that this Frumentius Biſhop of Auxumis muſt be differenced from the other Frumentius Biſhop of the Indians. But I do aſſert, that he that was Biſhop of Auxumis, and he that is ſtiled the Biſhop of the Indians, is one and the ſame Frumentius. For Auxumis is the Metropolis of Æthiopia. Now the Æthiopians are by the ancients uſually confounded with the Indians. So Philoſtorgius calls the Homeritæ (who were the Auxumites neighbours) Indians. Alſo, the Æthiopians who are now call'd Abyſſines, call themſelves Indians, and do acknowledge Frumentius to have been the Apoſtle of their Nation; as Lucas Holſteinus atteſts in his Notes on Baronius's Martyrology, which were lately publiſh'd at Rome. Valeſ.

CHAP. XX.

After what manner the Iberians were converted to the Chriſtian Religion.

IT is now a fit opportunity to relate after what manner the Iberians were at the ſame time converted to Chriſtianity. A Woman who led a religious and chaſt life, was, by the diſpoſal of Divine Providence, taken captive by the Iberians. Theſe Iberians dwell near the Euxine Sea; they are a colony of the Iberians in Spain. This captive woman therefore, living amongſt the Barbarians, devoted herſelf to a Philoſophick courſe of life. For together with the ſtricteſt and ſevereſt exerciſes of Chaſtity, ſhe uſed herſelf to moſt tedious and laſting faſts, and to continued prayer. The Barbarians ſeeing this, were amaz'd at the ſtrangeneſs and novelty of her actions. It hapned, that * the King's Son, being a very young child fell ſick. The Queen, according to the cuſtom of that Country, ſent the child about to other women to be cured: if perchance by long experience they might know of any cure for the diſtemper. When the young child had been carried about by his nurſe, and could find no cure from any of the women, he was at laſt brought to this captive Woman. She in the preſence of many women, apply'd not any material remedy, for ſhe had no knowledge of any ſuch Medicines. But, having taken the child, ſhe laid him upon her own bed, which was made of hair-cloath, and only ſpake theſe words: Chriſt (ſaid ſhe) who healed many, ſhall alſo cure this Child. Having added a prayer to theſe words, and invoked God's aſſiſtance, the child immediately recover'd, and from that time was very well. The report hereof was nois'd abroad among the Barbarian women, it came alſo to the Queen's ear; and the captive woman became more eminent. Not long after the Queen, being fallen into a diſtemper, ſent for the captive woman. She having refus'd to go by reaſon of her modeſty and baſhfuldiſpoſition, the Queen her ſelf was convey'd to her. The captive woman does the ſame that ſhe before had done to the child. And forthwith the ſick Queen recover'd, and return'd her thanks to the woman. But ſhe made her this anſwer, it is not I that do this, but Chriſt, who is the Son of that God, who made the world. She therefore exhorted the Queen to call upon

* See Rufinus, book 1. chap. 10 Eccl. Hiſt. Rufinus does not ſay, that this child was the King's Son; but mulier quædam parvulum ſuum, &c. a certain woman (ſays he) carried about her Son, &c.

Constant. upon him, and to acknowledge the true God. The King of the Iberians, amazed at the suddenness of her recovery from the Disease, having enquired who it was that did these cures, presented the captive Woman with Gifts. She answered, that she stood not in need of wealth, for piety was her riches. But that she should accept it as the greatest present, if he would acknowledge that God who was set forth and declared by her. With this answer she return'd his presents. The King treasured up her words in his breast. The next day this accident befel the King going out a hunting: There fell a mist and a thick darkness upon the tops of the mountains and forrests where he was hunting, so that their sport was grown troublesom, and the way impassable. The King being in a very great straight, earnestly implored [the assistance of] those Gods whom he worshipped: But finding he was never the better, at last he bethought himself of the captive-womans God, and calls upon him to be his assistant. He had no sooner prayed, but the darkness caused by the mist was dispers'd. Admiring what was done, he he return'd home with joy, and having told his Queen what had befallen him, he forthwith sent for the captive woman, and enquired of her who that God was, whom she worshipped. When the woman was come into his presence, she made the King of the Iberians to become a Preacher of Christ. For, having been perswaded by this devout woman to believe in Christ, he convened all the Iberians that were his Subjects; and when he had related to them all things concerning the cure of his wife and his child, and also what had befallen him in his hunting, he exhorted them to worship the God of the captive-woman. Thus therefore they both became Preachers of Christ, the King preach'd to the men, and the Queen to the women. Moreover, the King, informed by the captive woman of the fashion of those Churches amongst the Romans, commanded an Oratory to be built; and order'd a provision of all materials towards the building to be forthwith made. Therefore a Church was erected; and when they went about raising of the Pillars, Divine Providence attempts somewhat that might perswade the inhabitants of that Country [to embrace] the Christian Faith. For one of the Pillars continued immovable. No engine could be invented, that was able to stir it. But the ropes were broken, and the engines torn in pieces. The work-men therefore, desponding and quite out of heart, went away. Then was the captive womans Faith openly manifested. For she goes by night to the place without any bodies knowledge, and there stayed all night, spending the time in fervent prayer: and by God's Providence the Pillar was rais'd and stood fix'd in the air, higher than its basis, in such a manner that it did not in the least touch its basis. Assoonas it was day, the King, (a) well skilled in architecture, came to the building, and sees the Pillar hanging in the Air above its own Basis. Both he himself, and all his attendants were amaz'd at what had happen'd, for a little while after in their sight the Pillar descended upon its own Basis, and there stood fixt. Hereupon they all shouted, cried out that the King's Faith was true, and celebrated the praises of the captive-womans God. After this they believed [in Christ,] and raised up the rest of the Pillars with great alacrity of mind: and the whole building was in a short time perfectly finish'd. Afterwards an Embassie was sent from them to Constantine the Emperor, whereby they requested, that they might both in future be admitted to a confederacy with the Romans, and also have a Bishop and an holy Clergy sent to them. For they protested that they did sincerely believe in Christ. This relation Rufinus says he had from (b) Bacurius, who had formerly been a Prince of Iberia: but afterwards coming over to the Romans, he was (c) made a Captain within the limits of Palestine. At length he was advanced to the Office of a General, and did the Emperor Theodosius extraordinary good service, in the (d) War against Maximus the Tyrant. After this manner were the Iberians converted to the Christian Religion in the times of Constantine.

Constant.

(a) Instead of [ἔμπρων τις ὤν, well skilled in Architecture] I had rather read ἐμφερὴς ἄν, being very anxious.] I doubt not but Socrates wrote it thus. For in Rufinus (Book 1. Chap. 10. from whom Socrates borrowed this Relation) the Words are these; cum ecce matutinus & anxius cum suis omnibus ingrediens Rex, &c. when behold the King, perplex'd in his mind, coming in the morning with all his attendants, &c. Vales.

(b) The Sfort. Florent. and Allat. MSS. call this Persons name Baccurius. But in Rufinus, and others, his name is, more truly, Bacurius. Zosimus says, he was born in that Armenia which borders on Iberia, and that he was a man without all malice, or deceit, very expert in Military Affairs But Rufinus (Book 1. Chap. 10. and Book 2. Chap. 33. Eccles. Hist.) affirms he was a Prince of the Iberi; that he was a Person of great fidelity, very studious of Religion and Truth: First made a Captain within the limits of Palestine; afterwards Comes of the Domesticks; and lastly that he did Theodosius the Emperor great service in his War with Eugenius. Vales. See Valesius's notes on Amm. Marcell. pag. 430, &c.

(c) At this place Socrates mistook Rufinus's meaning. For Rufinus says, that Bacurius was a Captain, Palestini limitis, of the Palestinian limit; when he told him these things. But Socrates seems to have read in Rufinus, Palestini militis ducem, that Bacurius was a Captain o the Palestinian Milice. Vales. f

(d) Here also Socrates is out. For Bacurius served not Theodosius in the War against Maximus, but in that against Eugenius: as Rufinus attests, Book 2. Chap. 33. Eccles. Hist. and Zosimus, Book 4. Vales.

CHAP. XXI.

Concerning Antonius the Monk.

IT would be superfluous for us to say any thing concerning Antonius the Monk, who at the same time lived in the Deserts of Egypt, [or to relate] what a man he was, how he openly strove with Devils, and detected all their stratagems and attempts; and how he wrought many miracles. For Athanasius Bishop of Alexandria has prevented us, having written a particular Book concerning his Life: Such a plenty of eminent Men was there, who lived at one and the same time, in the Reign of Constantine.

CHAP. XXII.

Concerning Manes the Author of the Heresie of the Manichees, and whence he had his Original.

BUt it is usual for cockle to grow up amongst the good corn, for the envy [of the Devil] loves to lay snares for the righteous. Not long before Constantine's reign, there sprung up a kind of heathenish Christianity, together with the true Christian Religion, as heretofore false Prophets arose up together with the Prophets, and Pseudo-Apostles amongst the Apostles. For in those days one Manichæus attempted clandestinly to introduce the Opinion of Empedocles the Heathen Philosopher, into Christianity. This Man Eusebius Pamphilus indeed has mention'd in the seventh book of his Ecclesiastick History, but has not accurately

* See Eusebius Eccles. Hist. book 7. chap. 31.

Conſtant. curately explained all things concerning him. Wherefore I judge it requiſite to ſupply what he has omitted. For thereby it will be manifeſted, who this Manichæus was, whence he came, and how he arrived at ſo high a degree of audaciouſneſs. One Scythianus a Saracen, married a captive Woman, a Native of the Upper Thebais. Upon her account he lived in Ægypt, and having been inſtructed in the Literature of the Ægyptians, he introduced the Opinion of Empedocles and Pythagoras into the Chriſtian Religion: Aſſerting that there were two Natures, the one Good, the other Evil, (as Empedocles alſo did); the evil Nature he termed Diſcord; the good he called Friendſhip. One Buddas, heretofore named Terebinthus, was this Scythianus's Scholar. This Man travelling into the Country of Babylonia, which is inhabited by the Perſians, told many ſtrange and prodigious things of himſelf, ſaying, that he was born of a Virgin, and educated in the Mountains. Afterwards he wrote four Books, one he entitled [the Book] of Myſteries; another, the Goſpel; the third he called the Theſaurus, and the fourth Heads. But as he was counterfeiting the Performance of ſome myſterious ſacred Rites, he was thrown down headlong by the Devil, and ſo died. The Woman, at whoſe Houſe he ſojourned, buried him. She having poſſeſſed herſelf of his Money, bought a Boy, about ſeven years old, by name Cubricus: This Boy ſhe made free; and when ſhe had bred him a Scholar, ſhe died ſoon after, and left him all Terebinthus's Eſtate, and the Books alſo which he had written, being inſtructed by Scythianus. Cubricus, now a Free-man, takes theſe Goods along with him, and travelling into Perſia, changes his Name, calling himſelf Manes. Where he diſtributed Buddas's, or Terebinthus's Books, as his own genuine Works, amongſt his ſeduced Followers. Now theſe are the Subjects of thoſe Books; in the Words they ſeemingly aſſert the Chriſtian Religion, but [if] the Opinions [contained in them be attentively conſidered] they are [neer a kin to] Gentiliſm. For Manichæus, being an impious Perſon, does incite [his Diſciples] to worſhip a Plurality of Gods. He alſo teaches, that the (a) Sun is to be adored. Beſides, he introduces Fate, and deſtroy man's Free-will. He apparently aſſerts a Tranſmutation of Bodies, following herein the Opinions of Empedocles, Pythagoras, and the Ægyptians: He denies that Chriſt exiſted in the fleſh, ſaying, that he was a meer * Phantaſm. He does alſo reject the Law and the Prophets: And calls himſelf the Paraclete. All which Tenets, 'tis manifeſt, are wholly diſagreeable to the Orthodox [Doctrine of the] Church. Moreover, in his Letters he has been ſo audacious as to ſtile himſelf an Apoſtle. But he met with a condign puniſhment for this impudent lie of his, [which befel him] upon this occaſion. The Son of the King of Perſia happened to fall ſick; his Father, deſirous to ſave the life of his Son, left no ſtone unturned, as the common ſaying is. Having heard of Manichæus, and ſuppoſing the wonders he did to the real and true, he ſends for him, as if he had been an Apoſtle, hoping that he might preſerve his Son's life. When he was come, in a fictitious and pretended manner he takes in hand to cure the King's Son. But the King, ſeeing that his Son died under his hands, clap't him in Priſon, with a deſign forthwith to put him to death. He made his eſcape [out of Priſon] into Meſopotamia, and ſaved himſelf: But when the King of Perſia had intelligence of his abode in thoſe Parts, he [cauſed him] to be brought from thence by force, and flead him alive: And having ſtuffed his skin with chaff, he hanged it up before the City Gates. Theſe things, which we relate, are no forgeries of our own, (b) but we collected them out of a Book we read over, [intitled] The Diſputation of Archelaus, Biſhop of Caſcharum, one of the Cities of Meſopotamia. For this Archelaus ſays, that he diſputed with Manichæus face to face, and what we have written above concerning Manichæus's Life, Archelaus himſelf does relate. Thus therefore does the envy [of the Devil,] as we ſaid before, delight to entrap good Affairs when in their moſt flouriſhing poſture. But, for what reaſon the goodneſs of God ſhould permit this to be done, (whether it be that he is deſirous to have the true Opinion of the Church brought to the teſt and examined, and wholly to extirpate arrogancy, which uſually grows up together with Faith, or for what other reaſon) is a queſtion that cannot be ſolved without great difficulty and tediouſneſs: Nor can it now be opportunely diſcuſs'd by us. For, it is not our deſign to examine [the truth] of Opinions, or to make reſearches into the abſtruſe Accounts of Providence and the Judgment of God; but, according to our ability, to compoſe a narrative of the Affairs that have been tranſacted in the Churches. After what manner therefore the ſuperſtition of the Manichæans (c) ſprang up a little before the times of Conſtantine, it has been ſufficiently declared. Let us now return to [the Series of] thoſe times, that are the proper ſubject of the Hiſtory we deſign.

Conſtant.

(a) It is moſt apparent that the Manichæans adored the Sun. Libanius relates the ſame concerning them, in Book 4. Epiſt. 140. wherein he commends the Manichæans that were in Paleſtine (but ſuppreſſes their name) to Priſcianus the Preſident of Paleſtine: οἱ τὸν ἥλιον ἄτοι θεραπεύοντες, &c. i. e. Thoſe men that worſhip the Sun without blood, and honour God with the ſecond appellation, who chaſtize their belly, and account the day of their death to be gain; are found to be in many places, but are every where few in number. They injure no Man, but are moleſted by ſome. I doubt not but by theſe Words Libanius means the Manichæans; for they cannot be agreeably attributed to any other Perſons beſides them. But he deſignedly omitted the mention of their name, becauſe the name of the Manichæans was odious. Concerning the feigned faſts of the Manichæans, ſee Cyrill, in his ſixth Catechef. Valeſ.

* That is, he had only the form and figure of a man; was imaginarily, not really ſuch.

(b) The reading here muſt be [διαλόγῳ ἀρχελάου, out of Archelaus's Dialogue, or Diſputation:] which appears from the term [ἐλθόντες, we read.] This Archelaus, Biſhop, of Meſopotamia, wrote the diſpute which he maintain'd againſt Manichæus, in Syriack: which being afterwards tranſlated into Greek, was in the poſſeſſion of many perſons, as Jerome atteſts, in his Book de Scriptor. Eccleſiaſt. Cyrill of Jeruſalem has mentioned this diſpute, in his ſixth Catechiſm. A fragment of this Work is in my hands, wherein is contained the Hiſtory of the impious and perfidious Manichæus. But his diſputation with Archelaus the Biſhop, which was annexed to the cloſe of this Hiſtory, is wanting. In the room whereof is added Archelaus's Epiſtle to Diodorus the Presbyter. I am beholden to the eminent Emericus Bigotius for this monument, as alſo for many others. Valeſ. Valeſius has publiſh'd this Diſputation of Archelaus's in Latine, at the cloſe of his Annotations upon Sozomen, pag. 197, &c.

(c) In the Allat. M. S. the reading is [παρεφύει, ſprang up;] which is better than [προεφύει, ſprang up before.] After the ſame manner Socrates expreſſes himſelf in the beginning of this chapter. 'Tis a metaphor taken from Cockle, which is wont to grow up with the Corn. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXIII.

How Euſebius Biſhop of Nicomedia, and Theognis Biſhop of Nice, taking courage again, endeavoured to ſubvert the Nicene Creed, by plotting againſt Athanaſius.

EUSEBIUS and Theognis, being returned from exile, recovered their own Churches, having (as we ſaid before) extruded thoſe that had been ordained [Biſhops] in their Places: Moreover, they acquired great Intereſt and favour with the Emperor, who had an high eſteem for Constant. for them, looking upon them as Converts from an Heretical to the Orthodox Doctrine. But they abused this favour and liberty granted them, and made more disturbance in the World than formerly they had done; incited thereto by two motives: The one [proceeded] from the Arian Heresie, with which they had been formerly infected; the other from their inveterate hatred against Athanasius; because he had so vigorously opposed them in the Synod, when the Articles of Faith were discussed. First of all therefore they began to find fault with Athanasius's Ordination, as if he were unworthy of a Bishoprick, and (a) as if his Ordination had been performed by unfitting Persons. But it was afterwards demonstrated that he was Superiour to all manner of Calumny: For being seated in the Bishoprick of Alexandria, he stifly and vigorously contended for the Nicene Creed: Then Eusebius set all his wits at work to lay a plot for Athanasius, and to bring Arius again into Alexandria. For he supposed this to be the only way to eradicate the * Doctrine of Consubstantiality, and introduce Arianism. Eusebius thereforefore wrote to Athanasius that he would readmit Arius and his Companions [into the Church.] (b) And in his Letter he intreated him, but openly and in publick he threatned him. But when Athanasius could by no means be prevailed with, he attempts to perswade the Emperor to grant Arius leave to come into his presence, and that he would give him a liberty of returning to Alexandria. And by what means he prevailed so far, as to effect this, I will relate in its due place. But before these things were done, there was another commotion raised in the Churches. For her own Sons did again disturb the Peace of the Church. Eusebius Pamphilus relates, that immediately after the Synod, Egypt raised mutual Factions within itself, but he annexes not the occasion of this Division. Whence he is thought by many to have been double-tongued, because declining to set forth the Reasons [of the Discords] he had resolved with himself not to assent to what had been determined at Nice. But as we our selves have found from several Letters which the Bishops wrote to one another after the Synod, the term Homoöusios disturbed some Men's minds. Whilst they were busying themselves about this Word, and made too curious inquiries into its import and meaning, they raised an intestine War amongst themselves. And what was done herein was not unlike a Fight in the Night. For neither side seemed to understand perfectly, why they reviled one another. For they that had an aversion for the term Homoöusios, look'd upon them that approved of it as introducers of (c) Sabellius's and Montanus's Opinion. And therefore they called them Blasphemers, as being Persons that destroyed the existence of the Son of God. On the other hand, they that were maintainers of the term Homoousios, supposing the other [their Adversaries] to be introducers of [the worship of] many Gods, abominated them, as the bringers in of Gentilism. Eustathius Bishop of Antioch reviles Eusebius Pamphilus as one that adulterates the Nicene Faith. Eusebius answers, that he does in no wise infringe or Violate the Creed [published] at Nice: But accuses Eustathius, for being an Assertor of Sabellius's Opinion. For these Reasons every one [of the Bishops] wrote Volumes, as if it had been against most bitter Enemies: And although both sides asserted, that the Son of God had a * proper, real and peculiar Person and existence, and confessed that there was one God in three Persons, yet (how it came to pass, I know not) they could in no wise agree amongst themselves; and therefore would by no means endure to be at quiet.

Constant.

(a) I follow this reading] ὡς μὴ κατὰ ἀξιωτέων γεγονότα, as if his ordination, &c.

For Eusebius's Party found fault with the Ordination of Athanasius upon two Accounts; both because Athanasius was unworthy of that Honour, and also because his Ordination had been performed by Persons unfitting. See Philostorgius. Vales.

* Τὴν τῦ ὁμοουσίου πίστιν, the faith of Homoöusios; i. e. those Words in the Creed, wherein it is asserted that Christ is of the same Essence or substance with the Father.

(b) Socrates borrowed these words out of Athanasius's second Apology against the Arians; where Athanasius gives an account how Eusebius secretly joyned with the Melitians in a conspiracy against him, these are his very Words: Τὴν μὲν ἓν ἀρχὴν πρεσβέπεμπε περὶ ῥέπων δεξασθαί με τὸν ἄρειον· καὶ ἀσφάρας ἠπείλει, γράφων δὲ ἠξίου. Which words of Athanasius, Sozomen makes use of in his second Book, Chap. 18. Vales.

* Ἐνυπόστατον καὶ ἐνυπάρχοντα. The Learned Reader will find these terms incomparably well explained by Dionysius Petavius, in his Dogm. Theolog. Tom. 2. De Trinit. book 4. chap. 8. Sect. 10, &c. pag. 380. Edit. Paris. 1644.

(c) It is hard to assign a reason, why Socrates should joyn Montanus with Sabellius. For Montanus himself made no innovations in the Doctrine of the Trinity, but follow'd the Faith of the Catholick Church; as Epiphanius attests (in Hæres. Montanist.) and Theodoret (book. 3. Hæret. Fabul.) Yet some of his Disciples took away the difference of the Persons, as Sabellius did; which Theodoret attests (at the place now cited) in these words: τινὲς δὲ ἀνθρώπων, &c. But some of them have denied the three Persons of the Godhead, in like manner as Sabellius did, saying that the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are one and the same Person. And hence it is, that that in the Synodical Epistle of the Arian Bishops at Sardica, Montanus is joyned to Sabellius. Vales.

CHAP. XXIV.

Concerning the Synod convened at Antioch, which deposed Eustathius Bishop of Antioch: Upon whose Account there was a Sedition raised, by which that City was almost ruined.

THerefore, having convened a Synod at Antioch, they depose Eustathius, as one who was better affected towards Sabellius's Opinion, than towards what the Nicene Synod had determined. But, as some report, [he was deposed] for other Reasons less commendable: Which yet they have not openly declared. But this is a thing which the Bishops usually do towards all that they Depose; they load them with Reproaches, and call them impious Persons, but annex not the Reasons of their impiety. Now that they Deposed Eustathius as a favourer of Sabellius's Opinion (Cyrus Bishop of Beræa being his Accuser,) Georgius Bishop of Laodicea in Syria (one of their number who hated the term Homoüusios) has related in that Encomium (a) he wrote upon Eusebius Emisenus. Concerning this Eusebius Emisenus we will hereafter speak in its proper place. But Georgius writes [such things as do not very well hang together] concerning Eustathius. For he reports, that Eustathius was accused by Cyrus for an assertor of Sabellius's Opinion; again he says, that Cyrus was (b) condemned and Deposed for maintaining the same Error.

(a) It is strange to see how notoriously translators have been mistaken in the Version of this place; they perceiv'd not that the last Word was to expunged, as being superfluous. For whenas at first there had been a Remark set in the Margin, that in stead of [ἔγραψεν, he wrote] it should be otherwise written, thus [εἶπεν, he said:] afterwards this word [εἶπεν, he said] crept out of the Margin, into the Text. Vales.

(b) Whether Cyrus Bishop of Beræa did accuse Eustathius, as being a favourer of Sabellius's Opinion, (as Georgius of Laodicea relates,) I know not. But what Georgius writes, to wit, that Cyrus himself was afterwards deposed because he favoured Sabellius's Heresie (i. e. because he defended the Doctrine of Consubstantiality; for so these words are to be understood:) is very true. For Athanasius confirms this, in his Epistle ad Solitar. Where he reckons up in order all the Bishops thrust out by the Arians during Constantine's Reign. And in the first place he names Eustathius Bishop of Antioch, then Eutropius of Adrianople. Afterwards Euphration of the Balanci, the two Cymatius's Asclepa of Gaza, Cyrus of Beræa and others; who were banished by the Emperor's Edict, and others put into their Places. Vales.

Conſtant. But how can it be, that Cyrus ſhould accuſe Euſtathius, for being a Sabellian, who was himſelf a favourer of that Hereſie? It is probable therefore that Euſtathius was Depoſed for ſome other Reaſons. Moreover, at ſuch time as Euſtathius was Depoſed, there was a very great Sedition raiſed in Antioch. And afterwards, [at the Conferences] about the Election of a Biſhop, there was frequently kindled ſo great a flame [of Diſſention,] that it wanted but little of deſtroying the whole City, the Populace being divided into two Factions: One Party of them contended vigorouſly for the Tranſlation of Euſebius Pamphilus from Cæſarea in Paleſtine to [the See of] Antioch; the other Faction was very earneſt to have Euſtathius reſtored. The whole City in general favoured the one or the other Party [of the Chriſtians.] The Military Forces alſo were drawn up in Battle array [on both ſides] as it were againſt Enemies, in ſo much that they were juſt about making uſe of their Swords, had not God, and the fear of the Emperor repreſſed the Violence of the Multitude. For the Emperor by his Letters, (c) and Euſebius by his refuſal of the Biſhoprick, appeaſed the Tumult and Sedition. Upon which Account the Emperor admired him greatly, and writ a Letter to him, in which he commends his prudent reſolution, calling him happy, becauſe he was judged worthy to be Biſhop not of one City, but almoſt of the whole World. It is recorded therefore that after this the See of Antioch was (d) vacant eight Years. But at length, by the diligence of thoſe that plotted the ſubverſion of the Nicene Faith, (e) Euphronius is ordained Biſhop. Let thus much be related concerning the Synod convened at Antioch upon Euſtathius's Account. Soon after theſe things, Euſebius (who had long before left Berytus, and was now poſſeſs'd of the Church of Nicomedia,) made it his buſineſs, together with his confederates, to bring Arius again into Alexandria. But how they prevailed to effect this their Deſign, and after what manner the Emperor was perſwaded to admit Arius and Euzoïus into his preſence, we are now to relate.

(c) The meaning of this place is this. The Emperor, by his Letters written to Antioch, and Euſebius, by his refuſing the Biſhoprick of Antioch, appeaſed that tumult. Therefore theſe words [appeaſed the tumult and ſedition] muſt in common belong to both the preceeding clauſes. Valeſ.

(a) What Socrates here ſays, concerning the vacancy of the See of Antioch 8 years after Euſtathius was depoſed, i falſe. For immediately after Euſtithius was ejected; when Euſebius of Cæſarea had refuſed that See; Paulinus Biſhop of Tyre was tranſlated to that See, in the Year of Chriſt 329: As I before noted in the Tenth Book of Euſebius's Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory, chap. 1. note (a.) Afterwards Euphronius ſucceeded Paulinus; or, as ſome will have it, Eulalius. After whom Flaccillus was advanced to the See of Antioch, who (as Athanaſius atteſts in his ſecond Apology againſt the Arians) was at the Synod of Tyre. Valeſ.

(e) Sozomen ſays the ſame; and Theodorus Mopſueſtenus (apud Nicætam in Theſauro Orthodox. fidei.) Which is alſo confirm'd by Georgius of Laodicea, in his Encomium of Euſebius Emiſenus, Socrates quotes his Words, in Book 2. Chap. 9. (Eccleſ. Hiſt.) But Theodoret (Book 1. Chap. 22. Eccleſ. Hiſt.) puts Eulalius between Euſtathius and Euphronius, and ſays that he preſided but a very ſhort time. Philoſtorgius agrees with Theodoret. Valeſ.

Conſtant. was a favourer of Arianiſm, who was reckoned amongſt her Domeſticks. This Man, prompted thereto by Euſebius and thoſe of his Faction, did in his familiar Diſcourſe with Conſtantia let fall ſome Words concerning Arius, ſaying, that the Synod had done him wrong, and that his ſentiments were not ſuch as Report repreſented them to be. Conſtantia having heard this was eaſily induced to give credit to the Presbyter. But ſhe had not confidence to declare it to the Emperor. It happened that Conſtantia fell dangerouſly ſick. The Emperor came daily to viſit her in her ſickneſs. But when ſhe was brought into ſo dangerous a condition by her Diſtemper, that ſhe expected to die immediately, ſhe recommends the Presbyter to the Emperor, declaring to him his induſtry, piety, and how well affected he was towards his Government: And immediately after ſhe died. The Presbyter was [after this] made one of the Emperor's greateſt Confidents. And having by degrees got a greater liberty of ſpeaking, he relates to the Emperor the ſame things concerning Arius, that he before told his Siſter; affirming that Arius had no other ſentiments than what were agreeable to the Synod's determination: And that if [the Emperor] would admit him to his preſence, he would give his conſent to what the Synod had decreed: (a) Moreover, that he was falſely accuſed without the leaſt of Reaſon. Theſe Words of the Presbyters ſeemed ſtrange to the Emperor. Thus therefore he anſwered [the Presbyter,] if Arius does conſent to the Synod's determination, and has the ſame ſentiments with that, I will both admit him to my preſence, and alſo ſend him back to Alexandria with Repute and Honor. Thus he anſwered, and immediately wrote to Arius after this manner.

(a) Inſtead of [ᾧ μὴ ἀλόγως συνοχοφαντεῖσθαι, and that he was falſely accuſed not without reaſon] Sir Henry Savil, and Chriſtopherſon read [ᾧ δὴ ἀλόγως συνοχοφαντεῖσθαι, Moreover that he was falſely accuſed without the leaſt of reaſon.] This ſtory concerning the Arian Presbyter (whom Conſtantia Auguſta recommended to her brother Conſtantine) Socrates borrowed out of Rufinus, book 1. chap. 11. Eccleſ. Hiſt. But I ſuſpect the truth of it, for theſe reaſons. Firſt, becauſe Athanaſius (who does uſually detect all the frauds of the Arians) has no where made mention of it. Secondly, in regard the name of this Presbyter is ſuppreſſed: For, if this Presbyter were in ſo great favour and authority with Conſtantine, that (as Rufinus relates in the book and chapter now cited,) when the Emperor died, he ſhould leave his Will, which he had written, in the hands of this Presbyter; doubtleſs, he was worthy to have had his name mentioned. But, in my judgment, Rufinus's authority is but ſmall; for he wrote his Hiſtory very careleſly, not from the Records of Affairs tranſacted, but from fabulous ſtories, and relations grounded barely on report.

VICTOR CONSTANTINUS, MAXIMUS, AUGUSTUS, to Arius.

It has been ſometime ſince made known to your Gravity, that you ſhould repair to Our Court, in order to your being admitted to the enjoyment of Our preſence. But we much admire, that you have not immediately performed this. Wherefore aſcend forthwith a publick Chariot, and come with ſpeed to Our Court: That having experienced Our benevolence and care, you may return to your own Country. God preſerve you, beloved Brother. Dated before the fifth of the Kalends of December. This was the Emperor's Letter to Arius. Here I cannot but admire the Emperors care and zeal for Religion. For 'tis evident by this Letter, that he had before frequently exhorted Arius to a * Recantation, in regard he reproves him, that after his frequent writing to him, Arius had not forthwith returned to the Truth. Arius therefore having receiv'd the Emperor's Letters, came ſoon after to Conſtantinople. There came along

* Repentance.

CHAP. XXV.

Concerning the Presbyter, who made it his buſineſs to get Arius recalled.

THE Emperor Conſtantine had a ſiſter whoſe name was Conſtantia. She had been married to Licinius who was heretofore colleague in the Empire with Conſtantine, but afterwards he became a Tyrant and was therefore put to death. She had a confident, a Presbyter, one that Constant. along with him Euzoïus, whom Alexander had divested of his Deaconship when he depos'd Arius and his associates. The Emperor admits them to his presence, and asked them whether they would agree to the [Nicene] Faith. They having readily given their assent, the Emperor commanded them to deliver in a Libel containing [the Articles of] their Faith.

CHAP. XXVI.

How Arius being recalled [from exile,] and having given up a Libel of Repentance to the Emperor, did therein hypocritically pretend [himself an assertor of] the Nicene Creed.

HAving therefore composed a Libel, they present it to the Emperor, the contents whereof are as followeth.

'Arius and Euzoïus, to our most Religious 'and most pious Lord Constantine the Emperor. 'According to the order of your piety most ac- 'ceptable to God, (our Lord the Emperor,) we 'do declare our Faith, and in writing pro- 'fess in the presence of God, that we and all our 'adherents do believe as followeth. We believe 'in one God the Father Almighty; and in the 'Lord Jesus Christ his Son, who was made by 'him before all Worlds; God the Word, by 'whom all things were made, that are in Hea- 'ven, and that are in Earth: Who came down 'from Heaven and was incarnate, and suffer'd, 'and rose again, and ascended into the Heavens, 'who also shall come again to judge the quick 'and the dead. [We also believe] in the Holy 'Ghost, and in the Resurrection of the flesh, 'and in the life of the World to come, and in the 'Kingdom of Heaven, and in one Catholick 'Church of God [which is spread] from one 'end of the World to the other. This Faith 'we have receiv'd from the Holy Gospels, 'the Lord saying to his Disciples: Go ye Matth. 28. 19. 'and teach all Nations, baptizing them in the name 'of the Father, and of the Son, and of the holy Ghost. '(a) If we do not thus believe these things, (a) after these words, there was wanting this whole clause [εἰ μὴ ταῦτα ἔτως πιστεύομεν καὶ ἀποδεχόμεθα ἁπλῶς, πατέρα, υἱὸν, καὶ πνεῦμα ἅγιον, If we do not thus believe these things, and [if we do not truly admit of the Father, the Son, the Holy Ghost] which we have made up from the Authority of the Allatian MS. and from Sozomen, Book 2. Chap. 27. Vales. 'and [if we do not] truly admit of the Father, 'the Son, and the Holy Ghost, in such man- 'ner as the whole Catholick Church, and the 'Scriptures (which we believe in all things) 'do teach, God be our Judge, both now, and 'in the Judgment to come. We therefore be- 'seech your piety (O Emperor most accepta- 'ble to God!) that we being Ecclesiastical 'Persons, and holding the Faith and Sence of 'the Church and the holy Scriptures, may by 'your pacifick and religious piety be united (b) 'to our mother, to wit the Church; all que- 'stions and superfluous disputations being 'wholly taken away and suppressed: that so 'both we and the Church, enjoying a mutual 'Peace and Union, may joyntly offer up our 'usual Prayers for the peaceable Reign of 'your Imperial Majesty, and for your whole 'Family.

(b) In the King's M. S. and in Epiphanius Scholasticus, this place is pointed otherwise, thus [to our Mother the Church, to wit, all questions, &c.] which distinction displeases me not.

CHAP. XXVII.

Constant.

How Arius return'd to Alexandria by the Emperor's Order; and upon Athanasius's Refusal to admit him, Eusebius's Faction framed divers Accusations against Athanasius before the Emperor.

ARius having thus perswaded the Emperor, returned to Alexandria. But this specious covert was not prevalent enough to suppress the silenc'd and hidden truth. For when Athanasius denied him reception upon his arrival at Alexandria: (in regard he detested the man as an abomination:) he attempted to stir up new commotions in Alexandria, by disseminating his heresie. Moreover, at that time Eusebius did both himself write Letters, and also induced the Emperor to write, that Arius and his complices might be receiv'd [into the Church.] But Athanasius did wholly refuse to grant them reception: And he acquainted the Emperor by his Letters, that it was impossible for those, who had once rejected the Faith, and were anathematized, to be entirely readmitted again [to their degrees in the Church] at their return. But the Emperor, highly incens'd [at this return] thus threatned Athanasius in a Letter (a)

(a) After these words the Florentine MS. adds these [μέρος ἐπιστολῆς τοῦ βασιλέως, part of the Emperor's Letter.] Which are altogether necessary, that the Reader may understand, that not the Emperor's whole Epistle, but part of it only, is here inserted. Athanasius, in his second Apology against the Arians, (out of whom Socrates took these passages) producing this Epistle of Constantines, sets these very words before it; and adds, that this Epistle was brought to Alexandria by Syncletius and Guadentius, Officers belonging to the Imperial Palace. But, that which Socrates affirms (to wit, that Arius came to Alexandria) is not mentioned by Athanasius, nor do I think it is true. Vales.

Part of the Emperor's Letter.

Having therefore received the knowledge of our will, do you afford a free ingress to such as are desirous of entring into the Church. For if we shall receive information that you have prohibited any of those that are desirous [to be united] to the Church, or have hindred their admission, We will immediately send one who shall be impowered by Our order to depose you, and banish you your Country. Thus wrote the Emperor, having a regard to the good of the publick, and being unwilling that [the members of] the Church should be rent asunder. (b) For he laboured to reduce them all to a perfect Union. At that time therefore the Eusebians (who were deadly haters of Athanasius,) supposing they had gotten a fair opportunity, made use of the Emperor's indignation as instrumental for the execution of their own Design. Upon which account they made great disturbances, labouring by that means to effect Athanasius's deposition from his Bishoprick: for they hoped that the Arian opinion would become absolutely prevalent by these means only, [to wit,] by a removal of Athanasius. There was therefore by a joynt consent an attack made against him by Eusebius of Nicomedia, Theognis of Nice, Maris of Chalcedon, Ursacius of Singidunum [a City] of the Upper Mæsia, and Valens of Mursa in the Upper Pannonia. These persons hire some of the (b) After these Words from the Florentine, Sfortian, and Allatian MSS. we have added this whole Period [τὰς γὰρ πάσας ἐπὶ τῷ ὁμόνοιαν ἄγειν ἐσπούδαζε, For he laboured to reduce them all to a perfect Union:] which was wanting in the common Editions. Sozomen has almost the same words, in his second book at the close of chap. 22; but he has changed their order. Vales.

Conſtant. Melitian Hereticks, who bring in ſeveral Accuſations againſt Athanaſius. And firſt they frame a complaint [againſt him] by (c) Iſion, Eudæmon and Callinicus, who were Melitians, as if Athanaſius had ordered the Ægyptians to pay a Linnen-Garment [under the notion of tribute] to the Church of Alexandria. (d) But Alypius, and Macarius, Presbyters of the Church of Alexandria, who were then accidentally at Nicomedia, extinguiſhed this Accuſation, having informed the Emperor, that what they reported againſt Athanaſius was falſe. Wherefore the Emperor by his Letters ſharply reproved thoſe that inform'd againſt him: But he adviſed Athanaſius in a Letter to repair to him. But the Euſebian Faction, before his arrival, and in order to their preventing of it, tack another Accuſation to the firſt, far worſe than the former: As if Athanaſius, * entring into a conſpiracy againſt the Emperor's Affairs, had ſent a little cheſt full of Gold to one Philumenus. But the Emperor, having taken cognizance hereof at Pſamathia, which is the Suburbs of the City Nicomedia, and finding Athanaſius innocent, diſmiſſed him with honour; and wrote to the Church of Alexandria, that their Biſhop Athanaſius had been falſly accuſed. It would indeed have been comely and decent to have paſſed over in ſilence thoſe calumnies, which the Euſebians afterwards framed againſt Athanaſius, leſt Chriſt's Church ſhould be condemned by thoſe that do not embrace his Doctrine. But in regard they have been committed to Writing, and expoſed to the view of all Men, I therefore judged it neceſſary to treat of theſe Matters as compendiouſly as may be, which [if particularized] would require a peculiar Volume. Wherefore I will give a ſhort Account, whence both the Subject of the calumny itſelf, and alſo the contrivers of the falſe Accuſation had their Original. (e) Mareotes is a Region of Alexandria: There are in it a great many, and thoſe very populous Villages, and in them many and ſtately Churches. All theſe Churches are under [the juriſdiction of] the Biſhop of Alexandria, and ſubject to his City like Pariſhes. In this Country of Mareotes there was a Man, by name Iſchyras, who had committed a Fact worthy of a thouſand deaths. For, whenas he had never been admitted into ſacred Orders, he [nevertheleſs] took upon himſelf the name of a Presbyter, and was ſo audacious as to perform the Office of a Presbyter. This Iſchyras therefore, detected in the commiſſion of the foreſaid crime, made his eſcape thence, and arriving at Nicomedia, for refuge fled to the Euſebian Faction. They, in regard of their hatred towards Athanaſius, receive him as a Presbyter; and promiſe to prefer him to the dignity of a Biſhoprick, if he would frame an Accuſation againſt Athanaſius, they deriving a pretence [for this calumny] from thoſe ſtories which Iſchyras had contrived. For he gave out, that he had ſuffered moſt miſerably by an aſſault made upon him: And that Macarius running furiouſly [into the Oratory] as far as the Altar, overturned the Table, broke the myſtical Cup, and burnt the ſacred Books. For this Accuſation (as I have ſaid) the Euſebians promiſed him a Biſhoprick as his reward, being ſenſible that this Accuſation againſt Macarius, would (together with him that was accuſed) overthrow Athanaſius alſo who had ſent Macarius. This Accuſation therefore they charged him with afterwards. But before this [calumny, they framed] another ſtuffed with all manner of hatred and maliciouſneſs, which we muſt now ſpeak of. Having got a Man's hand (whence they had it, I know not, whether they had murdered any Man and cut off his hand; or whether they had cut it off from ſome dead body, God only knows, and they that were Authors of this Fact,) they produced it [pretending] it to be the hand of one (f) Arſenius, a Melitian Biſhop: The hand they expoſed to all Men's view, but kept Arſenius concealed. And they reported that Athanaſius had this hand in his cuſtody, and made uſe of it in the performance of ſome Magical Deluſions. This therefore was the chiefeſt and moſt important point of the Acuſation which theſe Sycophants had forged [againſt Athanaſius.] But (as it uſually happens in ſuch caſes) other Perſons accuſed him of other matters. For all thoſe who had been his Enemies before, did at this time moſt eſpecially make uſe of their utmoſt force againſt him. The Emperor, having intelligence of theſe Proceedings, writes to (g) Dalmatius the Cenſor, his Brother's Son, who then kept his reſidence at Antioch in Syria; that he ſhonld command the Perſons accuſed to be brought before him, and (after he had taken cognizance of the Caſe) order them that were convicted to be puniſh'd. He alſo ſent Euſebius and Theognis, that Athanaſius might be tryed before them. When Athanaſius knew that he was to be ſummon'd to appear before the Cenſor, he ſent into Ægypt to find out Arſenius. He had certain information that the Man was conceal'd: But he could not apprehend him becauſe he frequently changed his lurking-holes by removing from one place to another. In the interim, the Emperor ſuppreſſed the tryal which ſhould have been before the Cenſor, upon this Account.

(b) We find theſe Men's names in that Catalogue of the Melitian Biſhops which Alexander procured from Melitius. This Iſion was Biſhop in Athribis, Eudæmon in Tanis, and Callinicus in Peluſium. See Athanaſius's ſecond Apologetick. Valeſ.

(d) Athanaſius (in his Apologetick) calls this Man Apis, not Alypius. But names not the place, wherein Conſtantine took cognizance of this matter. Yet Socrates affirms it was at Nicomedia. Further, Baronius relates that theſe Affairs were tranſacted in the Year of Chriſt 329. But I would rather chooſe to place them on the Year following. For theſe things hapned after Euſtathius's depoſition, when Euſebius and Theognis, (returned from their Exile) had procured a great authority and Intereſt with Conſtantine. But what the ſame Baronius ſays (to wit, that Conſtantine's Letter, concerning Arius's readmiſſion into the Church, was written to Athanaſius in the year of Chriſt 327,) is a palpable miſtake; and he diſſents from Athanaſius, whom notwithſtanding he profeſſes to follow in all things. For Athanaſius relates, that ſoon after Conſtantine's Letter, and Arius's repulſe, the Melitians accuſed him of theſe Crimes before the Emperor. Valeſ.

* Ἐπιβελεύων τοῖς Βασιλέως πράγμασι; which words, Valeſius has thus rendred, conſpirans adverſus Principem, conſpiring againſt the Emperor.

(e) This paſſage of Socrates is verymuch enlightned by Athanaſius in his ſecond Apologetick againſt the Arians. Whoſe Words, becauſe they are miſunderſtood by his Tranſlator, I will here ſet down. Ὁ μαρεώτης χώρα τῆς Ἀλεξανδρείας ὅτι· καὶ ἐδέποτε ἐν τῇ χώρᾳ γέγονεν ἐπισκοπῶν, οὐδὲ χωρεπίσκοπος, ἀλλὰ πᾶν τῆς Ἀλεξανδρείας ἐπισκόπῳ αἱ ἐκκλησίαι πᾶσαι τῆς χώρας ἐποκεῖνται· ἕκαστος δὲ τῶν πρεσβυτέρων ἔχει τὰς ἰδίας κώμας, μεγίστας καὶ ἀριθμῷ δέκα που καὶ πλείονας. That is, Mareotes is a Region of Alexandria. In that Region there never was a Biſhop, or Deputy-Biſhop. But the Churches of that whole Region are ſubject to the Biſhop of Alexandria. Each of the Presbyters hath peculiar Villages, (which are very great,) ſometimes ten in number, or more. From theſe words it appears, that every Village of Mareotes had nor its particular Presbyter; but that one Presbyter govern'd ten Villages and ſometimes more. That Village, wherein Iſchyras was, in regard it was the leaſt of all, undoubtedly had neither its peculiar Church, nor Presbyter. To that Epiſtle which all the Presbyters and Deacons of Mareotes wrote to the Synod of Tyre (which Letter is recorded by Athanaſius in the Book now cited) there ſubſcribed fourteen Presbyters, and fifteen Deacons. Valeſ.

(f) This Arſenius was a Biſhop of the Melitians in the City Hypſelis which is in Thebaïs. In his Epiſtle, which he wrote to Athanaſius, he aſſumes to himſelf this title of honour, Ἀθανασίῳ μακαρίῳ, Πάπα Ἀρσένιος ἐπίσκοπος ἦν ποτὲ ὑπὸ μελίτιον τῆς ὑψηλιτῶν πόλεως, i. e. To Athanaſius the bleſſed, Pope Arſenius Biſhop of the City Hypſelis, one of thoſe ſometimes under Melitius. But in the Catalogue of Biſhops of the Melitian faction, which Melitius deliver'd to Alexander, no Arſenius can be found. Valeſ.

(g) Socrates took this out of Athanaſius, in his ſecond Apologetick againſt the Arians; His words are theſe; Γράφει δὲ Κωνσταντῖνος, &c. Conſtantine wrote to Antioch, to Dalmatius the Cenſor, [ordering him] to hear the Cauſe concerning the murder. The Cenſor therefore ſent to me, to prepare for my defence. Socrates thought that this Dalmatius matius was the Son of Constantine's Brother, he that some years after was made Cæsar by Constantine. But that is a great mistake. For Dalmatius the Censor was Constantine's Brother, and the Father of Dalmatius the Cæsar. The Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle confirms this, who writes thus concerning Constantine. Καὶ Δαλμάτιον τὸν υἱὸν ἀδελφοῦ αὐτοῦ Δαλματίου τοῦ κένσορος καίσαρα ἀνηγόρευσε ; i. e. and he created Dalmatius (the Son of his Brother Dalmatius the Censor) Cæsar. Certainly, Dalmatius the Son of Dalmatius was (when these things were done which are related by Athanasius) very young, and could not sit as judge in so weighty an Affair. Besides, he lived at that time at Narbona, and (together with Hannibalianus his brother) was an Hearer of Exuperius the Rhetorician. For from that City he was sent for by Constantine, and created Cæsar when very young (as Ausonius affirms in his Book de Professor. Burdigal.) in the year of Christ 335. But that tryal concerning the murder of Arsenius was before Dalmatius the Censor at Antioch, (as Athanasius attests,) in the year of Christ 332, according to Baronius's Opinion. Vales.

CHAP. XXVIII.

That the Emperor ordered a Synod of Bishops should be convened at Tyre, upon account of the accusations brought against Athanasius.

THE Emperor had ordered a Synod of Bishops to meet, that they might be present at the Consecration of the Church which he had erected at Jerusalem. He therefore issued out an Order, that those Bishops [before they met there] should first be convened at Tyre, and by the by make researches into Athanasius's case : That so [all occasions of] contention being by this means wholly taken away, they might more peaceably perform the * Solemnities of the Churches Dedication, and consecrate it unto God. (a) This was the thirtieth Year of Constantine's Empire. Moreover there were assembled at Tyre Bishops out of divers places, to the number of sixty, upon the summons of Dionysius, a Person that had born the Consulship. Macarius the Presbyter was brought from Alexandria, bound in iron chains, under the custody of a guard of Soldiers. But Athanasius would not have come thither (not that he so much dreaded the accusations brought against him : For he was not conscious to himself that he was guilty of those things he was accused for : But he was afraid least they should make any innovations there in opposition to what had by common consent been approved of at the Synod of Nice.) But yet he dreaded the Emperor's menacing Letters. For he had written to him, that if he would not come voluntarily, he should be brought by force. Therefore Athanasius also was present there, being necessitated to it.

* Τὰ ἐγκαίνια τῆς ἐκκλησίας. Concerning the import of this word, the learned Reader may consult Scaliger. Poetic. Lib. 3. Cap. 106. Epibaterion.

(a) The Synod of Tyre was held in the consulates of Constantius and Albinus, (as Athanasius attests,) in the year of Christ 335. This was the 28*th* year of Constantine's Empire. His 29*th* Year began (during the same Men's Consulates) on the 8*th* of the Calends of August, on which day Constantine celebrated his Tricennalia (i. e. the Festivals for his having arrived to the 30*th Year of his Empire*) as Idacius attests, (in Fast.) anticipating that Solemnity one whole Year. This anticipation of his Tricennalia has induced not only Socrates, but several others also, into a mistake. Vales.

CHAP. XXIX.

Concerning Arsenius, and his Hand which was reported to to have been cut off.

MOREOVER, Divine Providence forced Arsenius to go to Tyre. For having neglected the commands which the Sycophants, whose hireling he was, had given him, he came in a disguise, to see what would be done there. It accidentally hapned, that the Servants of (a) Archelaus (who was the Consularis) heard some Persons in an Inn say, that Arsenius (the Person reported to have been murthered) was there kept concealed in some [Citizens] house. When they had heard this, and had taken good notice of them that spoke these Words, they gave their Master an Account of what they had heard. He, without the least delay, immediately searched for the Man, and found him : And when he had found him, ordered he should be secured. And gives notice to Athanasius not to be in the least disturbed : For Arsenius was alive and present there. Arsenius being apprehended, denied that he was [Arsenius.] But Paul Bishop of Tyre, who had formerly known him, made it appear that he was the Person. Divine Providence having before hand disposed of these things after this manner, soon after Athanasius was summoned by the Synod. And when he had made his appearance, the Sycophants produced the hand, and enforced their Accusation [against him.] But he * demeaned himself prudently. For he enquired of those that were present, and of his Accusers, whether any of them knew Arsenius. When a great many answered that they knew him very well, he caused Arsenius to be brought in before them, having his hands hid under his upper long Garment : Then he asked them again ; is this the Man that hath lost his hand ? Hereupon, they (excepting those that knew whence the hand had been cut off) were astonish'd at the strangeness of the thing. For all the rest thought that Arsenius had really wanted a hand, and they expected that Athanasius would make his own Defence some other way. But he took Arsenius's Garment and turning it on one side, shews the Man's hand. Again, when some supposed that his other hand was wanting, he made a short stay, permitting them to continue dubious. Immediately after, without any further delay, he turned aside the other part [of his garment] and shewed Arsenius's other hand : After which he thus addressed himself to the company ; Arsenius, as you see, is found to have two hands : As for the third, let my Accusers shew the place whence it was cut off.

* Σώτας μετηλθε τὸ πρᾶγμα ordered the matter prudently: this is the import of these words, if rendred literally.

CHAP. XXX.

That Athanasius being found innocent, after his first Accusation, his Accusers made their escape by flight.

THESE Affairs concerning Arsenius having been thus transacted, they who had contriv'd this fraud, were reduc'd to a straight. But (a) Achab, (who was also called John) Athanasius's Accuser, slipt away out of the Court of Judicature, and so made his escape in the tumult. Thus Athanasius cleared himself from this accusation, without making use of any * exception. For he was confident, that the bare sight of Arsenius being alive would abash the Sycophants.

(a) In Athanasius's second Apologetick. pag. 783. Edit. Par. the words are Ἀρχὰφ ὁ καὶ Ἰωάννης. Archaph, who is also called John. In the the Epistle of Alexander Bishop of Thessalonica to Athanasius, he is also called Archaph. Therefore, this Man had two Names, he was called Archaph, by the Egyptians, which was his Country name : John was his Monastick Name. He was a Bishop of the Melitian faction at Memphis. Athanasius relates, that he was commanded by Constantine to agree with his Arch-Bishop. Athanasius means Constantines Letter to John, which he gives an Account of, at Pag. 787. of *his second Apologet. CHAP. XXXI.

That Athanaſius fled to the Emperor, upon the Biſhops not admitting of his Defence at his ſecond Accuſation.

BUT in his diſproof of the falſe accuſations brought againſt Macarius, he made uſe of legal exceptions. And firſt he excepted againſt Euſebius and his companions, as being enemies, alledging that no man ought to be judged by his adverſaries. Afterwards he ſaid, that it muſt be demonſtrated, that Iſchyras the Accuſer had really procured the dignity of a Presbyter. For ſo it was written in the Libel of Accuſation. But when the Judges would not allow of any of theſe exceptions, Macarius's cauſe was brought in. After that the Acuſers were almoſt wearied out and quite faint, the further hearing of the cauſe was deferr'd till ſuch time as ſome Perſons ſhould make a journey into Mareotes, that they might make inquiſition upon the place concerning all matters that were doubtful. But when Athanaſius perceiv'd that thoſe very perſons were ordered to go, whom he had excepted againſt; (for Theognis, Maris, Theodorus, Macedonius, Valens, and Urſacius were ſent:) he cried out that their proceedings were treacherous and fraudulent. For it is unjuſt [ſaid he] that Macarius the Presbyter ſhould be kept in bonds, and that his Accuſer, together with his Adverſaries the Judges ſhould go; and [that this was done [for this reaſon, [to wit,] that the memorials of the Acts might be made up [in favour] of one ſide only. After Athanaſius had ſpoke theſe words aloud, and made ptoteſtation before the whole Synod and Dionyſius the preſident, when he ſaw that no body took notice of him, he privately withdrew. Thoſe therefore that were ſent to Mareotes, having regiſtred the Acts in favour of one ſide only, as if thoſe things had been moſt certainly true, (a) which the Accuſer had depoſed; made [their return to Tyre.]

(a) This place is imperfect, as any one may perceive. It may be made perfect, if inſtead of [ἔχειν] we make this addition [ἔχουσι τῆς ἐπανόδου, made their return to Tyre:] which we have followed in our Verſion. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXXII.

That after Athanaſius's departure, he was depoſed by the Vote of the Synod.

ATHanaſius being gone away, fled immediately to the Emperor. The Synod in the firſt place condemn'd him in his abſence for deſerting his cauſe. But when the Acts, which had been made up in Mareotes arrived, they paſſed the ſentence of depoſition againſt him; loading him with reproaches in the (a) Libel of his depoſition but mention'd not a word how ſhameſully the Sycophants had been vanquiſh'd in the accuſation of the murder. Arſenius alſo, who was reported to have been murdered, was receiv'd by them.

(a) Muſculus and Chriſtophorſon render theſe words [ἐν τοῖς καθαιρέσεσι] thus, depoſitionis cauſas, the cauſes of his depoſition. But I ſuppoſe, that by theſe words is meant the Libel of his depoſition, or the Synodical Epiſtle concerning the condemnation and depoſition of Athanaſius. Socrates uſes the ſame term, in his ſecond Book Chap. 1. If any one be deſirous to peruſe a copy of theſe Epiſtles, there is extant a Synodical Epiſtle of the Council of Antioch, concerning the depoſition of Paul of Samoſata: alſo, the Synodical Epiſtle of the Council of Sardis, concerning the depoſition of Gregorius Alexandrinus, Valens, Urſacius, and other Arian Prelates. Valeſ.

Conſtan.

He had at firſt been a Biſhop of the Melitian Hereſie: But he ſubſcrib'd Athanaſius's depoſition, as being at that time Biſhop of the (b) Hypſelites. And thus (which was very ſtrange) he that was reported to have been murdered by Athanaſius, being alive, depoſed Athanaſius.

(b) In Athanaſius the reading is truer, thus [ὑψηλιτῶν πόλεως, of the City of the Hypſelites,] as we noted before. Stephanus (de Urbibus) ſays Hypſelis is a Town in Egypt; and that the inhabitants thereof are called Hypſelites. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXXIII.

How the Synod, having left Tyre, came to Jeruſalem, and after the Celebration of the Feaſt of Dedication of the New Jeruſalem, readmitted Arius to Communion.

IN the interim the Emperors Letters arrived, commanding the Synod to give their ſpeedy attendance at New Jeruſalem. And immediately with all poſſible expedition they haſtned from Tyre to Jeruſalem. Where after they had finiſhed the ſolemnities of the conſecration of the places, they (a) readmitted Arius and his aſſociates into the Church, ſaying, that they did it in obedience to the Emperor's Letters, by which he had ſignified to them that he was fully ſatisfi'd as touching Arius and Euzoïus's faith. Moreover, they wrote Letters to the Church of Alexandria, that all envy and hatred was now baniſh'd, and that the affairs of the Church were in a peaceable and ſedate poſture: and that Arius, in regard by his repentance he had acknowledg'd the truth, was in future to be receiv'd by them, and that deſer-

(a) In Athanaſius's ſecond Apology againſt the Arians, and in his book de Synodis Arimini and Seleucia, this Synodick Epiſtle of the Jeruſalem Council is recorded; in which Epiſtle the Biſhops who had been convened there for the Dedication of Conſtantine's Church, do atteſt, that they had received into Communion τὸν περὶ Ἄρειον, Arius and his followers: Which they had done according to the Emperor's command, who by his Letters had ſignified to them, that he himſelf knew that thoſe Mens Faith was true and Orthodox, both from their own atteſtation by word of mouth, and alſo from the Libel of Faith which they preſented to him. Which Libel Conſtantine had annex'd to his Letters. Now, he means that Libel of Faith, which Arius and Euzoïus had preſented to Conſtantine, mentioned by Socrates before, at the 26 chapter of this firſt Book; and by Sozomen, Book 2. Chap. 27. For when Arius had preſented a Libel of his Faith to Conſtantine, Conſtantine, believing his Doctrine to be agreeable to the Nicene Faith, would not himſelf give his Judgment concerning this matter; but remitted him to the examination of the Jeruſalem Council, as Rufinus and Sozomen do relate. Athanaſius alſo (in his Book de Synodis) affirms expreſly, that Arius and his aſſociates were received into communion by the Jeruſalem Synod: his words are theſe, καὶ μετὰ τὸ ἐξορισθῆναι τὸν ἐπίσκοπον τῆς Ἀλεξανδρείας Ἀθανάσιον, γεγράφασι δεῖν δεχθῆναι Ἄρειον καὶ τοὺς σὺν αὐτῷ, and after the baniſhment of Athanaſius Biſhop of Alexandria, writing that they ſhould admit to communion Arius and his followers, &c. But I ſuppoſe that Arius the Arch-Heretick is not to be meant here, but another Arius, his name ſake, who had been condemn'd by Alexander Biſhop of Alexandria, together with Arius his Ringleader. For Arius the Arch-Heretick died long before the Jeruſalem Synod, as I have evidently prov'd in my ſecond Book of Eccleſiaſtick Obſervations, chap. 2. [The Learned Reader will find three Books of Eccleſiaſtick Obſervations written by Valeſius, and publiſh'd at the latter end of the ſecond Vol. of his Greek Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtorians.] Therefore, that Arius, who together with Euzoïus, preſented a Libel of his Faith to Conſtantine, is a different Perſon from Arius the Arch-Heretick. Which may be demonſtrated by another Argument. This Arius who preſented a Libel to Conſtantine together with Euzoïus, was not reſtored before the Jeruſalem Synod, that is, before the year of Chriſt 335; nor joyned to the Catkolick Church. For he requeſts of the Emperor in the foreſaid Libel, that all altercations being taken away by his piety, he may be united to the Catholick Church. But Arius the Arch-Heretick was recalled from exile long before, and readmitted to communion, as the penitentiary Libel of Euſebius and Theognius doth atteſt. For Euſebius and Theognius do ſay there expreſly, that the Author of the whole controverſie (to wit, Arius) having given ſatisfaction, was entirely reſtored. Further, Euſebius and Theognius ſent that Libel to the Biſhops in the year of Chriſt 328. as I ſhewed before. Therefore Arius the Hæreſiarch muſt neceſſarily have been recalled at the beginning of the ſame Year. Valeſ.

Constant. vedly, as being a member of the Church. (b) [But] they obscurely intimated that Athanasius was deposed from his Bishoprick [by their saying that all envy and hatred was now banished.] Moreover they wrote to the Emperor, informing him of the same Affairs. Whilst the Bishops were transacting these things, other Letters came unlookt for from the Emperor, which signifi'd to them that Athanasius was fled to him for refuge: and that upon his account they must necessarily come to Constantinople. Now the Emperor's intervening Letter is as followeth.

(b) This place is imperfect; it is easier to pick out them meaning of it, than to correct the words. Socrates therefore would say, that the Bishops, when they say, that all envy and hatred now was banish'd, &c. Vales. in their Synodical Epistle, do obscurely mean Athanasius,

CHAP. XXXIV.

That the Emperor by his Letter summoned the Synod to attend him, that Athanasius's Case might be accurately discussed in his presence.

VICTOR CONSTANTINUS MAXIMUS AUGUSTUS, to the Bishops Assembled at Tyre.

IT is indeed unknown to Us, what hath tumultuously and tempestuously been determined by your Synod. But the Truth seemeth in a manner to be perverted by a certain turbulent disorder, to wit, whilst by reason of your mutual contention, which you are desirous should be insuperable, you consider not those things that are well pleasing to God. But it will [We hope] be the Work of Divine Providence, to dissipate the mischiefs of this pertinacious contentiousness, after they are manifestly detected; and to make it perspicious to Us, how great a care you that have been convened have had of the Truth, and whether you have determined the matters that have been discussed by you without any favour or malice. Therefore, all of you must of necessity with speed attend upon Our Piety, that you your selves may render an accurate Account of what hath been done by you. Now, for what reason we thought it requisite to write these things to you, and to summon you before our selves by this Letter, you shall understand from the sequel. As We were making our entry into Constantinople, the City that bears Our name, [scituate in] Our own most flourishing Country; (it hapned that We then rode on Horse-back:) on a sudden Athanasius the Bishop, together (a) with some Presbyters whom he had about him, approacht Us in the midst of the high way so unpectedly, that he put Us into a consternation. For God the Inspector of all things is our witness, that at first sight We were unable even to discern who he was, had not some of Our [Servants] upon Our enquiry told Us (as it was meet) both who he was, and what injuries he had suffered. At that time We neither spoke to, nor had any discourse with him. But when he requested that he might be heard, and We had refused that, and in a manner ordered he should be removed from our presence; with a greater confidence he said, that he desired nothing else but your appearance here, that (being necessitated thereto) he might in Our presence make a complaint of his sufferings. Wherefore in regard this seemed reasonable to Us, and a matter befitting Our times, We willingly gave order for the writing of these things to you: That all you, who made up the Synod convened at Tyre, should without delay hasten to the Court of Our Piety, in order to your making a real Demonstration of the integrity and unbyassedness of your determination; to wit, in the presence of Us, whom none of you can deny to be a genuine Servant of God. For by the worship we exhibit to the Deity, Peace doth every where flourish, and the name of God is sincerely praised even by the (b) Barbarians themselves, who till this time have been ignorant of the truth. Moreover, it is manifest, that he who knows not the truth, acknowledges not God. Nevertheless, as we said before, even the Barbarians have (upon Our Account, who are Gods genuine servant) acknowledg'd the Deity, and have learned to pay a Religious worship to him, by whose Providence, as they have been really and truly made sensible, we are every where protected and provided for. Upon which account chiefly they have been brought to the knowledge of God; whom they worship out of a dread towards Us. But (c) we, who seem to have a greater esteem for, (for We will not say, to defend) the holy mysteries of his Church: We say, We do nothing else, but what belongs to discord and hatred, and (to speak plainly) what tends to the destruction of mankind. But, as we said before, come all of you to Us speedily; with a full assurance, that with our utmost vigour we will endeavour the accomplishing of this, [namely] that those things [comprehended] in the Law of God may most especially be preserv'd firm and unshaken (on which no reproach or ill opinion can possibly be fixt,) to wit, by dissipating, breaking to pieces, and utterly destroying the Enemies of the Law, who under the covert of [Christs] holy Name introduce various and different sorts of Blasphemies.

(a) In Athanasius's second Apology against the Arians (where this Epistle of Constantine's is recorded) the reading is [μεθ' ἑτέρων τινῶν, together with some others.] But the reading we follow, to wit, [μετὰ ἱερέων τινῶν, with some Presbyters] is better; which is confirm'd by Epiphan. Scholasticus. Vales.

(b) Perhaps he means the Iberians, concerning whose conversion Socrates has spoken before. Vales.

(c) In Leo Allatius's M. S. and in Athanasius, the reading of this place is [οἱ τὰ ἅγια, &c. Ye, who seem to have a greater esteem for — the holy mysteries of his clemency.] Epiphanius Scholasticus read this passage thus also, as appears from his Version: where, instead of [We, who seem, &c.] it is [Ye, who seem, &c.] which is confirmed by the Florent. M. S. Vales.

CHAP. XXXV.

That, when the Synod came not to the Emperor, the Eusebians accused Athanasius, as if he had threatned, that he would prohibit the carriage of that Corn, with which Alexandria furnish'd Constantinople. Whereupon the Emperor, being incensed, banished Athanasius, confining him to the Gallia's.

THis Letter put those present at the Synod into a great perplexity of mind. Wherefore most of them returned to their own Cities. But Eusebius, Theognis, Maris, Patrophilus, Ursacius and Valens, going to Constantinople, would not suffer any further enquiry to be made concerning breaking the Cup, overturning the [Communion] Table, and the murthering of Arsenius: but they proceeded to another calumny, having informed the Emperor, that Athanasius had threatned to prohibit the sending of the Corn, which was usually convey'd from Alexandria to Constantinople: And that these words were said by Athanasius in the hearing of Adamantius, Anubion, (a) Arbathion and Peter, all Bishops. For a calumny hath a greater force and prevalency, when the false Accuser is a person of repute and credit. The Emperor thus circumvented

(a) In Athanasius's second Apology, this man is called Arbetion. But it must be read with a Diphthong, thus, Arbætion. For 'tis a Greek name derived from Arbætus; of which name there was a Consul in Constantius's reign, as I have observed in my Notes on Amm. Marellin. Vales.

Conſtant. cumvented and incenſed, puniſheth Athanaſius with baniſhment, ordering him to inhabit the Gallia's. There are thoſe that ſay this was done by the Emperor, with a deſign thereby to procure a general Union in the Church, in regard Athanaſius had wholly refuſed to communicate with Arius and his followers. But he lived [in exile] at Triers a City of Gallia.

CHAP. XXXVI.

Concerning Marcellus [Biſhop] of Ancyra, and Aſterius the Sophiſta.

THE Biſhops that were convened at Conſtantinople did alſo depoſe Marcellus Biſhop of Ancyra in Galatia the leſs, upon this Account. There was one Aſterius, a Profeſſor of Rhetorick in Cappadocia, who left the teaching of that Art, and owned himſelf a Profeſſor of the Chriſtian Religion. He alſo took in hand to write Books (which are extant to this Day) wherein he aſſerted Arius's Opinion, ſaying, that Chriſt is the Power of God in the ſame ſence that the Locuſt and Palmer-worm are in Moſes ſaid to be the Power of God, and other ſuch like [Blaſphemies] as theſe. This Aſterius was continually in company with the Biſhops, and with thoſe Biſhops moſt eſpecially that were not diſaffected to Arianiſm: Moreover, he came frequently to Synods, being very deſirous to creep into the Biſhoprick of ſome City. But he got not ſo much as a Presbyterſhip, becauſe he had ſacrificed in the time of Perſecution. He went up and down to the Cities of Syria, and (a) recited in publick the Books he had made. When Marcellus underſtood this, being deſirous to (b) oppoſe him, through an over great earneſtneſs [in his confutation of him], he fell into the contrary Error. For he audaciouſly aſſerted, that Chriſt was a meer Man, as Paul of Samoſata did. Which when the Biſhops then convened at Jeruſalem had intelligence of, they took no notice of Aſterius, becauſe he was not enrolled in the Catalogue of the Presbyters. But they required of Marcellus, as being a Prieſt, an Account of the Book (c) written by him. And when they found that he held Paul of Samoſata's Principles, they commanded him to alter his Opinion. He, aſham'd [of what he had done,] promiſed to burn his Book. But the convention of Biſhops being haſtily diſſolved, upon the Emperor's ſummoning of them to Conſtantinople; when the Euſebians came to Conſtantinople, Marcellus's Caſe was again diſcuſſed. And upon Marcellus's refuſal to burn his impious and unhappy Book according to his promiſe, the Biſhops there aſſembled depoſed him, and ſent Baſilius in his room to Ancyra. Moreover, Euſebius wrote three Books by way of Anſwer and Confutation of this Book, [of Marcellus's,] in which he manifeſtly laid open and reproved his falſe Opinion. But Marcellus afterwards recovered his Biſhoprick in the Synod of Sardis, ſaying, that his Book was not rightly underſtood, and therefore he was judged to favour Paul of Samoſata's Doctrine. But we will ſpeak of this in its proper place.

(a) Athanaſius (in his Book De Synodis) ſays that this Aſterius ſat in the Church amongſt thoſe that were of the Clergy, and recited his Books in publick. Valeſ.

(b) In the Allat. M. S. the reading is [ἀντιγεάφειν, to write againſt him.] So Epiphan. Scholaſt. ſeems to have read.

(c) This Book of Marcellus's was intitled, De ſubjectione Chriſti, concerning Chriſt's ſubjection; as Hilarius informs us, in the fragment of his book, de Synodis. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXXVII.

How, after Athanaſius was exiled, Arius, being ſent for from Alexandria by the Emperor, raiſed Diſturbances againſt Alexander Biſhop of Conſtantinople.

WHILE theſe things were tranſacted, the thirtieth Year of Conſtantine's Reign was compleated. (a) Arius and his followers being returned to Alexandria, cauſed a general diſturbance in that City again. For the populace of Alexandria were very much troubled both at Arius and his Complices's return, and alſo at the exile of their Biſhop Athanaſius. But when the Emperor underſtood the perverſeneſs of Arius's mind, he ordered him to be ſent for again to Conſtantinople, thereto give an Account of the diſturbances he had endeavour'd to rekindle. Alexander, who had ſome time before that ſucceeded Metrophanes, did then preſide over the Church of Conſtantinople. The conflict this Man had with Arius at that time, was a ſufficient Proof of his Piety and Acceptableneſs to God. For upon Arius's arrival there, both the People were divided into two Factions, and there alſo aroſe an univerſal commotion all the City over: Some of them affirming, that the Nicene Creed ought to continue unſhaken and without any alteration; and others pertinaciouſly aſſerting that Arius's Opinion was conſonant to Reaſon; Alexander was hereupon reduced to a great ſtraight. And more eſpecially, becauſe Euſebius of Nicomedia had ſorely threatned him, ſaying, that he would forthwith cauſe him to be depoſed, unleſs he would admit Arius and his followers to Communion. But Alexander was not ſo ſollicitous about his own Depoſition, as he was fearful of the enervating of the Doctrine of Faith, which they earneſtly endeavoured to ſubvert. For looking upon himſelf as the Keeper and Patron of the Determinations made by the [Nicene] Synod, he made it wholly his buſineſs to prevent the wreſting and depravation of thoſe Canons. Being therefore reduced to thoſe extremeties, he entirely bad farewel to [the aſſiſtances of] Logick, and made God his Refuge. He devoted himſelf to continual Faſts, and omitted no form or manner of Praying. Now, he made this reſolution within his own mind, and what he had reſolved he ſecretly perform'd. Having ſhut up himſelf alone in the Church which is called Irene, he went to the Altar, laid himſelf proſtate on the Ground under the (b) Holy Table, and poured forth his Prayers [to God] with tears: he continued doing this for many Nights and Days together. Moreover, he asked of God, and received [what he had deſired.] His Petition was this; That if Arius's Opinion were true, he might not ſee the Day appointed for the Diſquiſition thereof: But, if that Faith which he profeſſed were true, that Arius (in regard he was the Author of all theſe miſchiefs) might ſuffer condign puniſhment for his impiety.

(a) Socrates does here follow Rufinus, who ſays that Arius (after the Synod at Jeruſalem) return'd to Alexandria; and a little after that (when his devices would do no good there) was recalled to Conſtantinople by Euſebius. But all this is falſe, as we intimated before, in regard Arius died long before the Jeruſalem Synod. Valeſ.

(b) Rufinus (book 1. chap. 12. Eccleſ. Hiſt.) from whom Socrates borrowed this, words this paſſage thus, ſub altari jacens, lying under the altar. Sozomen tells the ſame ſtory; Book 2. Chap. 29. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

Concerning Arius's Death.

THis was the subject of Alexander's Prayer. Now the Emperor, desirous to make tryal of Arius, sends for him to the Palace, and enquired of him, whether he would give his assent to the Determinations of the Nicene Synod. He, without any delay, readily subscribed in the Emperor's presence, making use of evasive shifts to elude and avoid what had been determined concerning the Faith. The Emperor, admiring hereat, compelled him to swear. This he also did, by making use of fraud and deceit. Moreover, the manner of artifice he made use of in subscribing was, as I have heard, this. Arius, they say, wrote that Opinion he maintain'd in a piece of paper, and hid it under his armpit: and then swore that he did really think as he had written. What I have written concerning his having done this, is grounded on hearsay only. But I have collected out of the Emperor's own Letters, that he swore, besides his bare subscribing. Hereupon the Emperor believed him, and gave order to Alexander Bishop of Constantinople to admit him to Communion. It was then the Sabbath-day, and on the day following he expected that he should be a Member of the assembly of Believers. But Divine Vengeance closely follow'd Arius's audaciousness. For, when he went out of the Imperial Palace, he was attended by the Eusebian Faction, like Guards, through the midst of the City; in so much that the eyes of all people were upon him. And when he came near that place which is called Constantine's Forum, where the pillar of Porphyrie is erected, a terror [proceeding] from a consciousness [of his impieties] seiz'd Arius, which terror was accompanied with a looseness. Hereupon he enquir'd whether there was an House-of-office near, and understanding that there was one behind Constantine's Forum, he went thither. A fainting fit seiz'd him; (a) and together with his Excrements his Fundament fell down forthwith, and a great flux of blood follow'd, and his small guts, and blood gushed out, together with his Spleen and Liver. He died therefore immediately. But the House-of-office is to be seen at this day in Constantinople, as I said, behind Constantine's Forum, and behind the Shambles in the Piazza: and by every ones pointing with their finger at the jakes as they go by, the manner of Arius's death will never be forgotten by posterity. This accident happning, a fear and an anxiety seiz'd Eusebius of Nicomedia's faction: and the report hereof quickly spread it self all over the City, nay I may say over the whole World. But the Emperor did more zealously adhere to Christianity, and said that the Nicene Faith was now truly confirmed by God himself. He was also very glad, both at what had happned, and also upon the account of his three sons, whom he had proclaimed Cæsars: each of them was created at every * Decennalia of his Reign. The eldest of them (called Constantine after his own name) he created Governour over the Western parts of the Empire, in the first tenth year of his Reign. His second son, Constantius (who bore his Grandfathers name) he made Cæsar in (b) the Eastern parts of the Empire, in the twentieth year of his reign. The youngest, called Constans he created [Cæsar] in the thirtieth year of his Empire.

Constant.

* Or, every tenth year of his Empire.

(a) In Leo Allatius's M. S. (or in Theodorus Lector's Tripertite History) this place is worded thus, [ᾧ ἅμα διαχωρήμασι παρεκπίπτει ἡ ἕδρα, τό τε ὑπὸ τῶν ἰατρῶν καλούμενον ἀπόφθεσμα παραυτίκα διὰ τῆς ἕδρας ἐξέπιπτεν, αἵμα ὅς τε πολὺ ἐπακολουθεῖ, καὶ τὰ λίπλα σὺν τοῖς ἐντέροις συνέτρεχεν ἅμα αὐτῷ σπλῆνί τε καὶ ἥπατι; and together with his excrements his fundament slid secretly down, and that termed by Physicians the Apephthesma fell immediately through his fundament; which was followed by a great flux of Blood, and his small guts ran out, together with his spleen and liver.] Which passage is in my judgment incomparably well expressed. Nor do I doubt but Socrates wrote thus. 'Tis certain, Epiphanius Scholasticus does in part confirm this reading. Also, in the Sfortian M. S. it is [παρεκπίπτει, slid secretly down] instead of [ἐκπίπτει, fell down.] Vales.

(b) It should not be [τὸν δ' ἐπὶ τοῖς ἑῴοις μέρων] but [τοῖς δὲ, &c. in the Eastern parts.] And, a little before, it must be [τῷ πάππῳ ὁμώνυμον, of the same name with his Grandfather:] as it is in the Allat. M. S. But the vulgar reading is tolerable. For the Greek term [ἐπώνυμος] is used not only to signifie him who gives his name to another; but in respect to him also, who takes his name from another. So Socrates does usually stile Constantinople ἐπώνυμον Κωνσταντίνου, a City that took its name from Constantine. Vales.

CHAP. XXXIX.

How Constantine, falling into a Distemper, ended his Life.

THE year after, the Emperor Constantine, having just entred the sixty fifth year of his age, falls sick. He therefore left Constantinople, and went by water to Helenopolis, to make use of the medicinal hot Springs, situate in the Vicinage of that City. But when he was sensible that his distemper increased, he defer'd bathing. And removed from Helenopolis to Nicomedia. He kept his Court there in the Suburbs, and received Christian Baptism. He was hereupon very chearful, and made his Will, wherein he left his three sons Heirs of the Empire, alotting to every one of them their part, as he had done in his life-time. He left many Legacies both to (a) Rome and to Constantinople, and he intrusted his Will with that (b) Presbyter, by whose intercession Arius was recalled, of whom we spoke something * before: enjoining him not to deliver it into any man's hands, except his Son Constantius's, whom he had constituted Governour of the East. After he had made his Will, he lived some few days and then died. Moreover, none of his Sons were with him at his death: Therefore there was one immediately dispatcht into the East, to inform Constantius of his Father's death.

* Chap. 25. of this Book.

(a) Concerning this gift, which Constantine by his Will bequeathed to the Elder-Rome, our Eusebius is a witness; in his 4th Book of Constantine's life, Chap. 63. Vales.

(b) Socrates borrowed this out of Rufinus, Book 1. Eccles. Hist. Chap. 11. But this story seems to me very improbable. For who can believe that the Emperor Constantine, who then had many Bishops about him, (for so Eusebius says expressly;) as also Grandees and great Officers, should make choice of one Presbyter, an unknown Person, (for his name is always concealed) to whom he might commit the keeping of his Will, when he died. Wherefore, I had rather follow Philostorgius here, who says, that Constantine delivered his Will to Eusebius of Nicomedia, by whom he had been baptized a little before. Vales.

CHAP. XL.

Concerning Constantine the Emperor's Funeral.

THey that were about the Emperor, put his Corps in a Coffin of Gold, convey'd it to Constantinople, and placed it [on a Bed of State] on high in the Palace; and there they paid their honorary respects to it, and set a guard about it, as when he was alive. This course they continued, till one of his Sons came. But when Conſtant. Conſtantius arrived out of the Eaſtern parts, he was honour'd with an Imperial Sepulture, and depoſited in the Church called The Apoſtles; which he he himſelf had erected for this reaſon, that the Emperors and Prelates (a) might not be far inferior to the Reliques of the Apoſtles. The Emperor Conſtantine liv'd to the age of ſixty five years: he reigned one and thirty years: and died in the Conſulate of Felicianus and Titianus, upon the twenty ſecond day of May: which was the (b) ſecond year of the two hundredth ſeventy eighth Olympiad. Now, this Book contains in it the ſpace of thirty one years. Conſtant.

(a) Muſculus and Chriſtophorſon have rendred this place thus; ne Imperatores & Antiſtetes reliquiis apoſtolorum deſtituerentur, that the Emperors and Prelates might not be deprived of the Apoſtles reliques. But I cannot approve of this Verſion. For Conſtantine had depoſited no reliques of the Apoſtles in that Church. I would therefore rather tranſlate it thus, that the Emperors and Prelates there to be buried, might not be far inferior to the Apoſtles Reliques; but might be affected with the ſame degree of honour with them. Which interpretation Euſebius confirms, in Book 4. Chap. 40. Concerning the Life of Conſtantine Valeſ.

(b) Socrates miſtakes here. For in the conſulate of Felicianus and Titianus (which was the year of Chriſt 337) on the eleventh of the Calends of June (i. e. on the 22d of May) the fourth year of the 278th Olympiad was current. Which may be demonſtrated by moſt evident reaſons. But Socrates ſeems to have made uſe of a corrupt Copy of Euſebius's Chronicle, wherein the year of the Olympiad was erroneouſly ſet. But, at this place of Socrates, we ought rather to read The third Year. For Socrates ſays, that this firſt Book of his Hiſtory contains the ſpace of One and thirty years. For he begins from the beginning of Conſtantine's Reign, who, as he ſays, reigned One and thirty years. The beginning of his Reign he places on the firſt year of the 271 Olympiad, as we ſaw before. Now from this year to the ſecond year of the 278th Olympiad there are but thirty years, including therein the two terms. Wherefore, there muſt neceſſarily be a miſtake in this place of Socrates. Valeſ.

THE

CHAP. I.

The Preface, wherein he gives an account, why he made a new Edition of his Firſt and Second Book.

Conſtantius.

RUfinus (he that wrote an Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory in the Latin tongue,) has erred concerning [the notation of] the times. For he ſuppoſes, that what was done againſt Athanaſius, hapned after the death of Conſtantine the Emperor. He was alſo ignorant of his baniſhment into the Gallia's, and of ſeveral other things. We having at firſt follow'd Rufinus [as our Author,] wrote the firſt and ſecond Book of our Hiſtory according to his authority. But from the third to the ſeventh Book, we have made a collection of ſome paſſages, partly out of Rufinus, and partly out of various other Authors, and related others from thoſe which do yet ſurvive; and ſo have compleated our work. But when we had afterwards procured Athanaſius's Books, wherein he laments his own calamitous ſufferings, and how he was baniſh'd by the calumny of the Euſebian faction; we thought it more expedient to credit him (who had ſuffer'd theſe hardſhips) and thoſe who had been preſent at the tranſacting of theſe matters; rather than ſuch as have followed conjectures [in their relations] thereof, and for that reaſon have been miſtaken. Beſides, having gotten [ſeveral] Letters of perſons at that time very eminent, to our utmoſt ability we have diligently traced out the truth. Upon which account we have been neceſſitated *entirely to to dictate again the firſt and ſecond Book [of this Work,] making uſe [nevertheleſs] of thoſe paſſages, in the relation whereof Rufinus hath not forſaken the truth. Moreover, notice is to be taken, that in our former Edition we had not inſerted Arius's Libel of Depoſition, nor the Emperor's Letters; but had only ſet forth a bare relation of the affairs tranſacted, that we might not dull our Readers by a prolix and tedious Narration. But in regard that this alſo was to be done in favour to you ((a) O ſacred Man of God, Theodorus!) that you might not be ignorant of what the Emperors wrote in their Letters, nor of what the Biſhops (changing that Faith by little and little) promulged in divers Synods: wherefore, in this latter Edition we have made ſuch alterations and inſertions as we judged to be neceſſary. And having done this in the firſt Book, we will alſo make it our buſineſs to do the ſame in that now under our hands, we mean the ſecond. But we muſt now begin [the following Series of] our Hiſtory.

Conſtantius.

(a) Our Euſebius has given the ſame title to Paulinus Biſhop of Tyre, at the beginning of the tenth Book of his Eccleſiaſtick Hiſt. whoſe Example Socrates here follows. Who this Theodorus was, to whom Socrates dedicated his Hiſtory, is uncertain. For I cannot think that Theodorus Biſhop of Mopſueſtia is here meant. Valeſ.

* That is, to make a new Edition of, &c.

CHAP. II.

How Euſebius Biſhop of Nicomedia with his Accomplices, earneſtly endeavouring to introduce Arius's Opinion again, made diſturbances in the Churches.

THE Emperor Conſtantine being dead, Euſebius [Biſhop] of Nicomedia, and Theognis Biſhop of Nice, ſuppoſing they had now gotten a very ſeaſonable opportunity, made uſe of their utmoſt diligence and attempts to expel the * Homoöuſian Faith, and introduce Arianiſm in its ſtead. (a) But they [ſuppoſed] it impoſſible for them to effect this, if Athanaſius ſhould return [to Alexandria.] Moreover, in order to their forming and carrying on of their deſign in this matter, they made uſe of that Presbyters aſſiſtance, who had a little before been the cauſe of Arius's being recalled from baniſhment. But, how this was effected, we muſt relate. That Presbyter [we have mention'd] preſented Conſtanine's laſt will and commands, which he had received from the Emperor at his death, to the Emperor's Son Conſtantius. He having found that written in the Will which he was very deſirous

* That is, the Faith that profeſſed Chriſt to be of the ſame Subſtance or Eſſence with the Father.

(a) This place is imperfect, and faulty. It may be made good not incommodiouſly, thus; πεῤῥέπεσθαι δὲ τότε σωπήσαν ὡ. ἐκ ἂν δύναιντο; εἰ ἀνοσήσοι Ἀθανάσιος: but they underſtood that they could not effect this, if Athanaſius ſhould return. Valeſ.

Conſtantius.

deſirous of; (for by the Will the Empire of the Eaſt was committed to him) had an honorary reſpect for the Presbyter, allow'd him a great liberty of ſpeaking, and order'd he ſhould freely and with confidence come into the Palace. This liberty therefore being allowed [the Preſbyter,] made him in a ſhort time well known both to the Empreſs, and alſo to her Eunuchs. The principal perſon of the Emperor's Bedchamber at that time was an Eunuch, whoſe name was Euſebius. The Presbyter perſwaded this perſon to embrace Arius's opinion. After which, the reſt of the Eunuchs were prevailed with to be of the ſame opinion. Moreover, the Emperor's Wife alſo, by the perſwaſion of the Eunuchs and this Presbyter, became a favourer of Arius's Tenets. Not long after, this queſtion came to [the hearing of] the Emperor himſelf. And by degrees it was ſpread abroad, firſt amongſt (b) thoſe that were of the Milice in the Palace; and afterwards it was divulged amongſt the multitudes of the [Imperial] City. Thoſe of the Bed-chamber together with the women diſcourſed concerning this opinion in the Imperial Palace: and in the City, throughout every private family, there was a logical war waged. Moreover, the miſchief ſoon ſpread it ſelf over other Provinces and Cities. And (like a ſpark) this controverſie taking its riſe from a ſmall beginning, excited the hearers minds to a moſt pertinacious contention. For every perſon that enquired the reaſon of the diſturbance, immediately had an occaſion of diſputing given him; and at the very interim of his making an enquiry, he reſolved upon entring into a wrangling diſpute. By this contention all things were ſubverted. Theſe [alterations] were ſtarted in Eaſtern Cities only. For the Cities of Illyricum, and thoſe [ſituated] in the Weſtern parts [of the Empire] were in that interim at quiet: for they would by no means diſanull the determinations made at the Nicene Synod. When therefore this miſchief, thus kindled, increaſed and grew daily worſe and worſe, Euſebius of Nicomedia and his Faction began then to think the diſturbance of the Vulgar to be their gain. For [they were in hopes] of being enabled by this means only, to conſtitute a Biſhop of Alexandria, that ſhould be of the ſame opinion with them. But Athanaſius's return at that time to Alexandria prevented this their deſign, who came thither fortified with one of the Auguſtus's Letters, which Conſtantinus the Younger (who bore the ſame name with his Father) ſent from Triers a City in Gallia to the people of Alexandria. [A Copy of] which Letter I have here ſubjoyned.

(b) Chriſtophorſon rendred theſe words [τοῖς περὶ τὰ βασίλεια σπεκελευομένοις,] thus, Imperatoris ſatellites, the Emperor's Guards: which is ill tranſlated. For by this term all the Palatini are meant; not only the Protectores, the Domeſtici, and the reſt of the Scholares, (ſee Valeſius's notes on Amm. Marcellin. pag. 31. &c.) but the Miniſteriani, and Scriniarii alſo. For this was termed the Palatine Milice. Valeſ.

Conſtantius.

IT has not, we ſuppoſe, (a) eſcaped the knowledge of your Sacred Mind, that Athanaſius an Interpreter of the venerable Law, was therefore ſent into the Gallia's for a time, leſt (in regard the Barbarity of his blood-devouring Enemies and Adverſaries continually menaced his ſacred Head with imminent danger,) he ſhould undergo incurable Miſchiefs through the perverſeneſs of wicked Men. In order therefore to his fruſtrating of this [Barbarity,] he was ſnatch'd out of the Jaws of thoſe perſons that deſigned his ruin; and enjoyned to live under our Diſtrict, in ſuch a manner that, in that City wherein he was ordered to make his reſidence, he ſhould abound with all manner of Neceſſaries: although his moſt eximious Virtue, having put its confidence in the Divine Aſſiſtances, eſteems as nothing the Troubles of a rougher Fortune. Wherefore, although our Lord and Father Conſtantinus Auguſtus of bleſſed memory, had determined to reſtore this Biſhop to his own * See, * Place. and [return him] to your moſt amiable Piety: Yet in regard, being prevented by human chance, he died before the accompliſhment of his deſire; We being his Succeſſor, thought it agreeable to fulfil the mind of that Emperor of ſacred memory. [Moreover,] how great a reverence and reſpect he has procured from us, you ſhall know from himſelf, as ſoon as he ſhall come into your preſence. Nor is it a wonder that We have done any thing in favour to him: for both the repreſentation of your Love, and alſo the aſpect of ſo great a Perſonage moved and excited Our Mind hereto. May the Divine Providence preſerve you, deareſt Brethren.

(a) Inſtead of [ἀποτεθειμένας εἰς γνῶσιν] I read [ἀποπεπεισθαι γνῶσιν,] as it is in Athanaſius's ſecond Apologetick againſt the Arians. Cæſar Baronius, (in his Annals,) Dionyſius Petavius, (in his Rationarium Temporum,) Blondellus, (in his Book de Primatu Eccleſiæ,) and others do relate, that Athanaſius was recalled from baniſhment in the year of Chriſt 338, to wit, the year after Conſtantine's death; who perceiving the foreſaid Prelate to be preſſed on every ſide by the Calumnies of his Adverſaries, had for a time baniſhed him into the Gallia's. But I do maintain, that Athanaſius was reſtored in the year of Chriſt 337, when Felicianus and Titianus were Conſuls, in that very year wherein Conſtantine died: which I can make evident, as I ſuppoſe, by a moſt demonſtrable argument. For Athanaſius (in his ſecond Apology againſt the Arians, pag. 805.) relates, that he was releaſed from his baniſhment, and reſtored to his Country by Conſtantine the younger, who alſo wrote a Letter in his behalf to the Populace and Clergy of the Alexandrian Church. This Letter [as Socrates does here, ſo] Athanaſius there recites: the inſcription of it is this; Conſtantinus Cæſar, to the People of the Catholick Church of Alexandria. The ſubſcription of this Letter is thus, dated at Iriers the fifteenth of the Calends of July. As well the inſcription, as ſubſcription of this Letter, does atteſt what I ſay, to wit, that Athanaſius was releaſed from his exile ſoon after the death of Conſtantine the Great, in the year of Chriſt 337. For if he had been reſtored on the year following, then Conſtantine the younger would not have called himſelf Cæſar, but Auguſtus. Nor would Athanaſius have been reſtored by Conſtantine the younger, but by Conſtantius, to whom was allotted the Eaſtern part of the Empire. Wherefore, in regard Conſtantine ſtiles himſelf only Cæſar in that Letter, and ſince Athanaſius atteſts, that he was reſtored by Conſtantine the younger, 'tis apparent, that that was done, before the Sons of Conſtantine the elder were by the Soldiers proclaimed Auguſti. For, upon Conſtantine's Death, there was a certain interregnum: and the Roman World continued without an Emperor almoſt three Months; until the Brethren (who under the name of Cæſars Governed divers Provinces) had met together, in order to their making a diviſion of the whole Roman Empire. Conſtantine died on the eleventh of the Calends of June, and on that very year there were three Auguſti proclaimed, to wit, Conſtantinus, Conſtantius and Conſtans, on the fifth of the Ides of September; (as it is recorded in the Old Faſti, which Jacobus Sirmondus publiſhed under the falſe name of Idatius. This is that which Euſebius writes in his fourth Book of Conſtantine's Life, chap. 71. to wit, that Conſtantine retained his Empire after his death, and that all Reſcripts and Edicts bore his name, as if he had been yet alive. For this reaſon therefore Conſtantine the younger ſtiles himſelf Cæſar only, in his Letter to the Alexandrians, in regard he was not yet proclaimed Auguſtus. For the Letter was dated on the fifteenth of the Calends of July. But he was created Auguſtus (together with his brethren) on the fifth of the Ides of September. Moreover, at that time (whilſt the Brothers were ſtiled Cæſars only) Conſtantinus Junior was the chief in Authority, becauſe he was the eldeſt Brother. See Valeſius's firſt Book of Eccleſiaſtick Obſervations on Socrates and Sozomen. Chap. 1.

CHAP. III.

How Athanaſius, confiding in the Letter of Conſtantine the Younger, returned to Alexandria.

CONSTANTINUS CÆSAR, to the People of the Catholick Church of the Alexandrians.

Upon

Constantius. Upon the confidence of this Letter Athanasius comes to Alexandria, and the people of Alexandria most willingly received him. But as many as were followers of Arius's Opinion, entred into a combination and conspired against him. Hereupon continual Seditions arose, which gave an occasion to the Eusebian faction of accusing him before the Emperor, because upon his own inclination and award (without the determination of a general Council of Bishops) he had return'd and taken possession of the [Alexandrian] Church. And they made so great a proficiency in their calumnies, that the Emperor, being incensed, expelled him out of Alexandria. But, how that was effected, I will a little after this relate.

CHAP. IV.

That upon Eusebius Pamphilus's Death, Acacius succeeded in the Bishoprick of Cæsarea.

DUring this interval of time, Eusebius (who was Bishop of Cæsarea in Palestine, and had the sirname of Pamphilus) departed this life, and Acacius his Scholar succeeded him in that Bishoprick. This Acacius published many other Books, and also wrote [particularly] concerning the Life of his Master [Eusebius.]

CHAP. V.

Concerning the Death of Constantine the Younger.

NOT long after this, the Emperor Constantius's Brother, (who bore the same name with his Father,) Constantine the Younger, invading those parts [of the Empire] that belonged to his younger brother Constans, and ingaging with his Soldiers, is slain by them, in the Consulate of Acindynus and Proclus.

CHAP. VI.

How Alexander Bishop of Constantinople, at his Death, proposed Paulus and Macedonius to be elected into his Bishoprick.

AT the very same time, the City Constantinople was involv'd in another tumult (which follow'd on the neck of those [disturbances] we have before related,) raised upon this account. (a) Alexander, who presided over the Churches in that City, [a Prelate] that had couragiously opposed Arius, departed out of this life, after he had spent twenty three years in that Bishoprick, and had lived ninety eight years compleat, having ordained no body [to succeed] in his place. But he commanded those to whom the power of electing belong'd, to make choice of one of those two whom he should name. And if they were desirous of having one that should be both skilful in teaching, and also of an approved piety and uprightness of life, [he advised them] to make choice of Paulus, one that he had ordained Presbyter; a person that was a young man indeed in respect of his age, but old in understanding and prudence. But if they would rather have one commendable for an external shew of piety only, they might elect (b) Macedonius, who had long since been made a Deacon of that Church, and was now grown aged. Hereupon there hapned a great contest concerning the Ordination of a Bishop, which very much disturbed that Church. For the people were divided into two * Factions; the one side adhered to the Arian Opinion; the other embraced the determinations made at the Nicene Synod. And as long as Alexander continued alive, the † Homoousian party prevailed; the Arians disagreeing and contending daily amongst themselves concerning their own Opinion. But after Alexander's death, the success of the peoples contest was dubious. Therefore, the Homoousian party proposed Paulus to be ordained Bishop. But those that embraced Arianism, were very earnest to have Macedonius elected. And in the Church called (c) Irene (which is near that Church now named The Great Church, and the Church of Sophia,) Paulus is ordained Bishop; in which [Election] the Suffrage of Alexander, then dead, seem'd to have prevailed.

Constantius.

(a) Socrates mistakes here, (and all those that follow him,) in placing the death of Alexander Bishop of Constantinople on the Consulate of Acindynus and Proclus, in the year of Christ 340. In the second Book of my Ecclesiastick Observations upon Socrates and Sozomen [the Learned Reader will meet with Valesius's Ecclesiastick Observations upon Socrates and Sozomen, at the close of Valesius's second Volume of the Greek Ecclesiastick Historians; he may find the matter discussed at the first Chapter of the second Book of those Observations.] I have by most evident arguments demonstrated, that Alexander Bishop of Constantinople died in the Reign of Constantine the Great, and that Paul succeeded him, during the Reign of the said Constantine. Baronius, who places Alexander's death on the year of Christ 340, does manifestly contradict himself. For he says, that the Synod of the Bishops of Egypt (which was summoned to confute the Calumnies brought against Athanasius by the Eusebian Faction,) was convened in the year of Christ 339. But those Bishops do expresly atteft, in their Synodick Epistle, that at that very time Eusebius had left Nicomedia, and had lept into the Constantinopolitan See. 'Tis needless to quote the words of that Epistle here, in regard they are produced by Baronius himself, at the year of Christ 340. Now, if Eusebius had gotten the See of Constantinople in the year of Christ 339. Alexander must necessarily be supposed to have been dead before this year. Vales.

(b) This Person was afterwards promoted to the degree of Presbyter under Paul Bishop of Constantinople, and accused his own Bishop, as Athanasius relates, in his Epistle ad Solitar. Vales.

* Parts.

† That is, those that owned Christ to be of the same Substance or Essence with the Father.

(c) There were two Churches of this name in Constantinople, the one called the Old, the other the New Irene; as it is recorded in the Life of Paul the Constantinopolitan Bishop, which Photius relates in his Bibliotheca. Moreover, the Old Church called Irene was contiguous to the Great Church, which was afterwards named Sophia: nor had it separate Clergy-men; but the Clergy of the Great Church by turns ministred in that Church. The Emperor Justinian informs us of this, in the third Novel. In the old description of Constantinople, which is prefixt before the Notitia Imperii Romani, this is called the Old Church, and 'tis placed in the second Ward of the City, together with the Great Church. The Church Irene (to wit, The New Irene,) is recounted in the seventh Ward of that City. Socrates hath made mention of The Old Irene, in his first Book, Chap. 37. It is termed the Church of Saint Irene, after the same manner that the Church Sophia is called Saint Sophia; not that there was a Virgin, or Martyr, called by that name. Vales.

CHAP. VII.

How the Emperor Constantius ejected Paulus, who had been ordained Bishop: and, having sent for Eusebius from Nicomedia, entrusted him with the Bishoprick of Constantinople.

BUT the Emperor, arriving not long after at Constantinople, was highly incensed at this Ordination [of Paulus.] And having convened a Council of Bishops that embraced Arius's Opinion, he vacated Paulus's [Bishoprick.] And he translated Eusebius (a) from Nicomedia, and constituted him Bishop of Constantinople. When the Emperor had performed these things, he went to Antioch.

(a) The Allatian M. S. inserts some words here, after this manner: Εὐσέβιον δὲ ἐκ τῆς νικομηδείας καὶ περιελόμενον αὐτὸ μελασήας τῆς μεγαλοπόλεως ἐπίσκοπον ἀναδείκνυσι; i. e. and having through Eusebius's own ambition removed him from Nicomedia, he constituted him Bishop of the Great City [Constantinople.] Vales.

CHAP. VIII.

How Euſebius aſſembled another Synod at Antioch of Syria, and cauſed another Form of Faith to be publiſhed.

BUT Euſebius could by no means be at quiet: but (as the common ſaying is) moved every ſtone, that he might effect what he had deſigned. Therefore, he procures a Synod to be aſſembled at Antioch in Syria, under a pretence of dedicating a Church, which [Conſtantine] the Father of the Auguſti* had begun to build: (after whoſe death, Conſtantius his ſon finiſh'd it, in the tenth year after its foundation was laid:) but in reality, that he might ſubvert and deſtroy the Homoöuſian Faith. At this Synod there met ninety Biſhops, [who came] out of divers Cities. But Maximus Biſhop of Jeruſalem, who had ſucceeded Macarius, was not preſent at that Synod, (a) having conſider'd with himſelf that he had been before induced by fraud to ſubſcribe Athanaſius's Depoſition. Neither was Julius Biſhop of Rome the Great preſent there: Nor did he ſend any body to ſupply his place. Altho' the Eccleſiaſtick Canon doth order, that the Churches ought not to make Sanctions contrary to the Biſhop of Rome's opinion. This Synod therefore is convened at Antioch (the Emperor Conſtantius himſelf being there preſent,) in the (b) Conſulate of Marcellinus and Probinus. This was the (c) fifth year from the death of Conſtantine the Father of the Auguſti. At that time (d) Placitus, Succeſſor to Euphronius preſided over the Churches in Antioch. The Euſebians therefore made it their principal buſineſs to calumniate Athanaſius, [ſaying,] in the firſt place, that he had done contrary to that Canon, which they had then conſtituted, becauſe he had recover'd his Epiſcopal Dignity without the conſent of a general Synod of Biſhops. For, returning from his Exile, he had upon his own arbitrement and award ruſh'd into the Church: [Secondly,] that a tumult being raiſed at his entrance, (e) many had loſt their lives in that ſedition; and that ſome perſons had been ſcourged by Athanaſius, and others brought before the ſeats of Judicature. Moreover, they produced what had been done againſt Athanaſius in the City of Tyre.

* That is, he means Conſtantius, and Conſtans, Sons to the Emperor Conſtantine the Great; who had a little before this been proclaimed Auguſti. Conſtantine, the other Son of Conſtantine the Great, was now dead. See Chap. 5. of this Book.

(a) The Particle [ἐν] muſt be expunged here; and the whole Clauſe read in this continued form; Having conſidered with himſelf how he had been circumvented that he might ſubſcribe Athanaſius's depoſition. For Maximus Biſhop of Jeruſalem had, together with Paul and the reſt, ſubſcrib'd Athanaſius's depoſition, in the Council of Tyre.

In regard of his ſorrow for doing this, he refuſed afterwards to be preſent at the Council of Antioch; as Sozomen relates, in his third Book, Chap. 6. near the end. Valeſ.

(b) Athanaſius (in his Book de Synodis) ſet forth the time of this Council by theſe Notes: ἦσαν δὲ οἱ συνέλθοντες, &c. Thoſe Biſhops that met at the Dedication were ninety in number; [they were convened] in the Conſulate of Marcellinus and Probinus, in the tenth Indiction, the moſt impious Conſtantius being there preſent. Valeſ.

(c) In the Conſulate of Marcellinus and Probinus, on the eleventh of the Calends of June was compleated the fourth year from Conſtantine's death. The Synod of Antioch therefore was convened after this day, if it be true which Socrates here ſays, to wit, that it was convened in the fifth year after Conſtantine's Death. Valeſ.

(d) In Epiphanius Scholaſticus's Verſion, this perſons name is truer written, thus, Flaccillus. Nor is he otherwiſe called in Pope Julius's Epiſtle to the Biſhops convened in this Synod of Antioch. This perſon had been preſent before, at the Council of Tyre, and had with the Arians conſpired againſt Athanaſius, as the Epiſtle of the Egyptian Biſhops to Dionyſius the Comes doth inform us, which Epiſtle Athanaſius has recorded, in his ſecond defence againſt the Arians. Euſebius of Cæſarea dedicated the Books he wrote againſt Marcellus to this ſame Flaccillus. But inſtead of Flaccillus, he is almoſt every where called Placitus: only in the following chapter, the Allatian M. S. terms him Flaccillus. Valeſ.

(e) Theſe Calumnies of the Euſebians are incomparably well refuted by the Egyptian Biſhops, in their Synodick Epiſtle, which Athanaſius records, in his ſecond defence againſt the Arians. Valeſ.

CHAP. IX.

Concerning Euſebius Emiſenus.

AFter the framing of theſe Calumnies, they propoſed one to be made Biſhop of Alexandria, and in the firſt place [they named] Euſebius Emiſenus. Who this perſon was, Georgius of Laodicæa, one that was preſent at this Synod, informs us. For he ſays (in the Book he wrote concerning his Life) that this Euſebius was deſcended from noble Perſonages of Edeſſa in Meſopotamia: and that from his Childhood he (a) learned the ſacred Scriptures: that he was afterwards inſtructed in the Grecian Literature by a Maſter who then lived at Edeſſa; and in fine, that he had the ſacred Scriptures interpreted to him by Patrophilus and Euſebius; the latter of which perſons preſided over the Church in Cæſarea, and the former over that in Scythopolis. After this, when he came to Antioch, it hapned that Euſtathius, being accuſed by Cyrus of Berœa, was depoſed, as being an aſſertor of Sabellius's opinion. Wherefore Euſebius afterwards lived with Euphronius, Euſtathius's Succeſſor. Afterwards, that he might avoid being made a Biſhop, he betook himſelf to Alexandria, and their ſtudied Philoſophy. Returning from thence to Antioch, he converſed with Flaccillus, Euphronius's Succeſſor, and was at length promoted to the See of Alexandria by Euſebius Biſhop of Conſtantinople. But he went thither no more, becauſe Athanaſius was ſo much beloved by the people of Alexandria. He was therefore ſent to Emiſa. But when the Inhabitants of that City raiſed a Sedition at his Ordination, (for he was reproach'd, as being a perſon ſtudious of, and exerciſed in the Mathematicks,) he fled from thence, and went to Laodicæa, to Gregorius, who hath related ſo many paſſages concerning him. When this Georgius had brought him to Antioch, he procured him to be ſent back again to Emiſa by Flaccillus and Narciſſus. But he afterwards underwent another accuſation; for being an adherent to Sabellius's Principles. Georgius writes at large concerning his *Ordination: And in fine adds, that the Emperor, in his Expedition againſt the Barbarians, took him along with him, and that miracles were wrought by him. But hitherto we have recorded what Geoorgius hath related concerning Euſebius Emiſenus.

(a) Sozomen (in his third book, chap. 6.) explains this Paſſage in Socrates; where he ſpeaks thus concerning Euſebius Emiſenus: ἐκ νέας δὲ κατὰ πάτριον ἔθος τὰς ἱερὰς ἐκμαθὼν λόγους, &c. i. e. from his childhood (according to the cuſtom of his own Country) he learned the ſacred Scriptures by heart. Therefore the Boys of Edeſſa got by heart the books of ſacred Scripture, according to the uſage of their Anceſtors. Indeed, Eccleſiaſtick Writers do atteſt, that the Edeſſens were moſt ardent lovers of the Chriſtian Religion. Valeſ.

* Or, Reſtauration, or, Election.

CHAP. X.

That the Biſhops convened at Antioch upon Euſebius Emiſenus's refuſal [of the Biſhoprick] of Alexandria, ordained Gregorius, and altered the Expreſſions of the Nicene Faith.

BUT when Euſebius, who had been choſen Biſhop of Alexandria at Antioch, was afraid to go thither, they then propoſed Gregorius to be ordained Biſhop of Alexandria. And having done this, they alter'd the * Creed, finding finding fault indeed with nothing [that had been determined] at Nice; (a) but in reality [their design was] to subvert and destroy the Homoöusian Faith, by their continual assembling of Synods, and by their publishing sometimes one, sometimes another form of the Creed; that so by degrees [all persons] might be (b) perverted to the Arian Opinion. Moreover, how these things were done [by them,] we will manifest in the procedure of our History. But the Epistle they publish'd concerning the Faith runs thus.

(a) Instead of these Words [but in reality their design was to subvert,] the Allat. M. S. has these [but giving the beginning to a pretext by their continual, &c.] and so Epiphan. Schol. read it, as from his Version appears. Vales.

(b) In the Allat. M. S. the reading is [fall into.] Vales.

We have neither been Arius's Followers: (for how should we that are Bishops be the Followers of a Presbyter?) Nor have we embraced any other Faith, than what was from the Beginning set forth. But, being made Inquirers into, and Examiners of his Faith, we have (c) admitted and entertained, rather than followed him. And this you will understand from what shall be said. For we have learned from the Beginning to believe in one supream God, the Maker and Preserver of all things, as well intelligible as sensible. And in one only begotten Son of God, subsisting before all ages, existing together with the Father that begat him; by whom all things visible and invisible were made: who in the last days, according to the Father's good pleasure, descended, and assumed flesh from the Holy Virgin; and when he had compleatly fulfilled all his Father's will, he suffered and arose, and ascended into the Heavens, and sits at the Right Hand of the Father: and he shall come to judge the Quick and Dead, and continues a King and God ever. We believe also in the Holy Ghost. And (if it be requisite to add this) we also believe the Resurrection of the Flesh, and the Life everlasting.

(c) How these words are to be understood, I have advertized the Reader, in the second Book of my Ecclesiastick Observations, Chap. 2. for we must not suppose, that the Arch-Heretick Arius himself was admitted and entertained in the Jerusalem Synod, but his Followers only. For Arius himself was dead long before. Should any one maintain, that these Words of the Bishops of the Antiochian Council are to be understood of Arius himself, then I will answer, that the Jerusalem Synod is not meant here, but some other more ancient Synod, which admitted Arius to communion: for the Eusebian party had done that before the Synod of Jerusalem, as Athanasius attests, in his Book de Synodis, not far from the beginning. Vales.

Having written these things in their first Epistle, they sent them to [the Bishops] throughout every City. But, when they had continued sometime at Antioch, condemning as it were this [their former] Epistle, they again publish another, in these very words.

Another Exposition [of Faith.]

Agreeable to Evangelick and Apostolick tradition, We believe in one God the Father Almighty, the Framer and Maker of all things. And in one Lord Jesus Christ, his only begotten Son, God, by whom all things were made: begotten of the Father before all Worlds, God of God, Whole of Whole, Only of Only, Perfect of Perfect, King of King, Lord of Lord: the Living Word, the Wisdom, the Life, the True Light, the Way of Truth, the Resurrection, the Shepherd, the Gate: immutable and inconvertible: the most expreß Image of

And was made Man, the Mediator of God and Men, the Apostle of our Faith, and the Prince of Life, as he himself says,* * For I came down from heaven, not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me. Who suffer'd for us, and rose again for us the third day, and ascended into the Heavens, and sitteth at the right hand of the Father. And he shall come again with glory and power, to judge the Quick and Dead. And [we believe] in the Holy Ghost, who is given to Believers in order to their Consolation, Sanctification, and Perfection: according as our Lord Jesus Christ commanded his Disciples, saying, † Go ye, and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: to wit, of the Father being truly the Father, and of the Son being truly the Son, and of the Holy Ghost being truly the Holy Ghost: which terms are not simply or insignificantly * *made use of, but they do accurately manifest the proper and peculiar Person, Glory, and Order of each of those that are named. (e) I corrected this place by the assistance of the Florentine M. S. wherein it is written thus [πρὸ τοῦ τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ Θεοῦ, before the Son of God.] The Verb [γεγονέναι, was begotten] which preceded, is to be understood here. In Athanasius's Book de Synodis, the reading is [πρὸ τοῦ γεννηθῆναι, before he was begotten.] But our reading pleases us better, because it comes nearer the sense of the Arians: who asserted that the Son of God was made. Vales.

(f) In the Allat. M. S. the reading is [καὶ ἐμφόβως, and with fear:] 'Tis so also in Athanasius, and in Hilarius's Version. Vales.

Such were the Expositions of the Faith, [published] by those at that time convened at Antioch: to which also Gregorius (altho' he had not then made his Entry into Alexandria, yet) subscribed as a Bishop of that City. The Synod at that time assembled in Antioch, having done these things, and made some other Canons, was dissolved. The state of the publick affairs in the Empire hapned to be disturb'd at the very same time also. A nation (they are called The Franci) made an incursion into the Roman Territories in Gallia. At the same time also, there were terrible earthquakes in the East: (g) especially at Antioch, which City was shaken thereby [continually] for the space of one whole year.

(g) No; Antioch was by a special priviledge free from this earth-quake. For so 'tis recorded in those incomparable Fasti Consulares, (which Sirmondus has published under the name of Idatius;) in these words: *Marcellino & Probino Coss. His consulibus pugna facta est cum gente Francorum à Constante Augusto in Galliis. CHAP. XI.

That, upon Gregorius's arrival at Alexandria [guarded] with a Military force, Athanaſius fled.

WHen theſe things were done, (a) Syrianus the Captain (with the armed Soldiers under his command, being in number five thouſand,) brought Gregorius to Alexandria. Thoſe in that City who were favourers of Arius's Opinion, aſſiſted the Soldiers. Moreover, after what manner Athanaſius, being expelled out of the Church, eſcaped being taken by them, I think fit to relate. It was now (b) Evening, and the people lodg'd in the Church all night, a Communion being expected. The Captain came, and having put his Soldiers into a fighting poſture, environ'd the Church on every ſide. Athanaſius ſeeing what was done, made it his chiefeſt care, that the people might in no wiſe be damnified upon his account. And having commanded the Deacon to give the people notice of going to prayers, after that he gave order for the recitation of a Pſalm: And when there was a ſweet harmony made by reaſon of the peoples ſinging of the Pſalm together, all the Congregation went out through one of the Church doors. Whilſt this was doing, the Soldiers ſtood ſtill without ſtriking a ſtroak; and ſo Athanaſius eſcaped unhurt in the midſt of thoſe that ſang the Pſalm. Having ſecretly made his eſcape after this manner, he haſtned to Rome. Gregorius was then put into poſſeſſion of the [Alexandrian] Church. But the people of Alexandria, unable to bear what had been done, burnt that, call'd Dionyſius's Church. Thus far concerning theſe things. But Euſebius having done what he had a mind to do, (c) ſent an Embaſſage to Julius Biſhop of Rome, entreating him to become Judge of thoſe matters relating to Athanaſius, and that he would call for a diſquiſition of the controverſie before himſelf, in order to his taking cognizance thereof.

(a) In this place Socrates miſtakes, who confounds what was done at Georgius's inſtallation with thoſe things tranſacted at Gregorius's arrival. Indeed Syrianus brought Georgius to Alexandria, as Athanaſius atteſts, in his Epiſtle ad Solitar. and in his Apologetick to Conſtantius the Emperor; and in his Apology concerning his own Eſcape, when Syrianus purſued him. But theſe things hapned a long while after this, to wit, in the year of Chriſt 356. Gregorius, concerning whom Socrates ſpeaks here, was brough to Alexandria by Balacius the Captain, and Philagrius Prefect of Egypt, as Athanaſius relates, in his Epiſtle ad Solitar. But Athanaſius departed from Alexandria before their arrival, and went to Rome, whither he had been invited by Pope Julius's Letters. Valeſ.

(b) Socrates borrowed this out of Athanaſius's Apology concerning his own eſcape, about the cloſe of it. Where Athanaſius's Words are theſe: τὺξ μὲν γὰρ ἦν ἤδη νὺξ, καὶ τὸ λαὸ τινες ἐπηννύχιζον προσδοκῶντες συνάξεως, i. e. it was now night, and ſome of the people lay in the Church all night, a communion being expected. But in his Apologetick to the Emperor Conſtantius, he ſhews manifeſtly that Syrianus made this irruption in the night, and not in the evening, as Socrates here ſays. Valeſ.

(c) Our Socrates does miſtake here alſo. For Euſebius of Nicomedia did not ſend Embaſſadors to Pope Julius, to incite him againſt Athanaſius, after the Council at Antioch, but a long time before. But when the Presbyters ſent by Athanaſius had confuted Euſebius's Embaſſadors in all points before Julius, at length Euſebius's Meſſengers referred the deciſion of the whole matter to Julius. Julius therefore, according to the requeſt of the Embaſſadors, wrote Letters, both to Athanaſius, and alſo to Euſebius and the reſt of Athanaſius's adverſaries, by which he invited them to an Eccleſiaſtick judicature at Rome. But this was done before the Council at Antioch, as Athanaſius informs us, (in his ſecond Apologetick againſt the Arians,) and Julius Biſhop of Rome, (in his Epiſtle to the Biſhops convened in the Council at Antioch.) This Epiſtle of Julius's Athanaſius has inſerted at the 739th page of his works, Edit. Paris. 1627. Moreover, Socrates's relation here may be refuted alſo by theſe arguments. For, if theſe things had been done after the Council at Antioch, not only Euſebius, but the whole Synod would have ſent an Embaſſy, and Letters, to Julius. Beſides, it would have been altogether ridiculous and unſeemly, after the matter was determined in a Council, and put in execution, (Athanaſius being now expelled, and Gregorius put into his See,) to write to Julius, that he would be judge, and remove the Controverſie in order to its being diſcuſt before him; as if the matter were ſtill wholly undetermined. Sozomen (Book 3. Chap. 7.) has followed Socrates's miſtake in this relation. Valeſ.

CHAP. XII.

How, after Euſebius's Death, the People of Conſtantinople reſtored Paulus to his See again. And that the Arians made choice of Macedonius.

BUT Euſebius could never underſtand what Julius had determined concerning Athanaſius. For having ſurvived the Synod ſome ſmall time, he died. Wherefore the people of Conſtantinople introduce Paulus into the Church again. But at the ſame time the Arians ordain Macedonius, in the (a) Church dedicated to Paul. And this was done by thoſe, who formerly had been aſſiſtants to Euſebius that diſturber of all things, but were then his ſucceſſors in power and authority. Theſe are their names, Theognis of Nice, Maris of Chalcedon, Theodorus of Heraclea in Thracia, Urſacius of Singidunum in the Upper Myſia, Valens of Murſa in the Upper Pannonia. Indeed, Urſacius and Valens changing their Opinions afterwards, delivered their penitentiary Libel to Julius the Biſhop; and having conſented to the Homoöuſian Opinion, were admitted to Communion. But at that time they were hot maintainers of the Arian Religion, and *framed no trivial commotions againſt the Churches. One whereof was that made by Macedonius in the City of Conſtantinople. For from this inteſtine War amongſt the Chriſtians there hapned continual Seditions in the City, and many perſons, oppreſſed by the violence of what was done, loſt their lives.

(a) In the old deſcription of Conſtantinople this Church is mentioned; where 'tis called Paul's Church, and 'tis placed in the 7th Ward of the City. Valeſ.

* ἐπῆγεν, coagulated, or curdled, as the Runnet doth in the making of Cheeſe.

CHAP. XIII.

Concerning the Slaughter of Hermogenes the Lieutenant-General, and how Paulus was for that reaſon turned out of the Church again.

BUT, what was done came to the hearing of Conſtantius the Emperor, who then made his reſidence at Antioch. Therefore he orders Hermogenes the Lieutenant-General, (whom he had ſent into the Coaſts of Thracia,) that he ſhould incidently paſs through [Conſtantinople,] and turn Paulus out of that Church. He arriving at Conſtantinople, diſturbed the whole City, by endeavouring to caſt out the Biſhop by force. For there immediately followed a Sedition amongſt the people, and all perſons were ready to defend [the Biſhop.] But when Hermogenes with much earneſtneſs endeavour'd to expel Paulus by his Military forces, the Populace being exaſperated (as in ſuch like caſes it uſually happens,) made a more inconſiderate and raſh attack againſt him. In the firſt place they ſet his Houſe on fire: then, having (a) drawn him about by the heels, they killed him. Theſe things were done in the Conſulate of the Two Auguſti, Conſtantius being then the third, and Conſtans the ſecond time Conſul. At the ſame time, Conſtans, having vanquiſh'd the nation of the Franci, made them enter into a league with the Romans. But the Emperor Conſtantius being informed of Hermogenes's

(a) Ammianus Marcellinus had at large deſcribed this Sedition of the Conſtantinopolitans, in thoſe Books of his Hiſtory which are loſt. But he has by the by mentioned it in his 14th Book, pag. 23. Edit. Paris. 1636. Libanius means this tumult in his Oration, entitled Βασιλικὸς, and ſays it was a moſt violent Sedition. It hapned in the third Conſulate of Conſtantius, and in Conſtans's ſecond; which was the year of Chriſt 342. as it is recorded in Faſt. Idat. Valeſ. See Valeſius's Annotat. on Amm. Marcellinus, page 47.

mogenes's murther, rode post on horse-back from Antioch, and arrived at Constantinople: out of which City he expelled Paulus. He also punish'd that City, taking away more than forty thousand [bushels] of that bread-corn daily distributed, which was his Father's donation [to those Citizens.] For before that time, near eighty thousand [(b) Bushels] of wheat, brought thither from the City of Alexandria, were bestowed [amongst the Inhabitants of that City.] Moreover, he deferr'd the constituting of Macedonius Bishop of that City. (c) For he was incensed against him, not only because he had been ordained contrary to his will, but also in regard upon account of the seditions raised betwixt him and Paulus, Hermogenes his Lieutenant, and many other persons had been slain. Having therefore given him permission to gather assemblies of the people in that Church wherein he was ordained, he departed again to Antioch.

(b) It is doubtful, whether Socrates means here bushels of Bread-corn, or Loaves of Bread. The Author of the Life of Paulus Bishop of Constantinople

(which occurs in Photius's Bibliotheca, pag. 1421. Edit. David. Hoeschell. 1611.) supposed, that in this place Loaves were meant. For thus he says: ἦν δὲ τὸ ὅλον τῆς δωρεᾶς, ἡμερήσιοι ἄρτοι μυριάδες ὀκτώ· i.e. the whole donation was, eighty thousand loaves daily [distributed.] But I am rather of opinion, (and so Epiphanius Scholasticus understands it,) that Bushels are meant. For the term [σῖτος, of wheat] imports bushels of wheat, rather then loaves. Besides, how could eighty thousand loaves be sufficient for that multitude of Citizens which inhabited Constantinople? should any one wonder at this vast quantity of bread-corn usually distributed every day, let him hear Eunapius in the Life of Ædesius, pag. 38. Edit. Comm. 1596. thus: ἐν δὲ τοῖς καθ' ἡμᾶς καιροῖς, &c. i. e. But in our age, neither the Ships loaden with Corn which come from Ægypt, nor that vast quantity of Wheat brought out of all Asia, Syria, Phœnicia, and the rest of the Provinces (upon the consideration of tribute) is sufficient to fill and satisfie that drunken multitude of people, which Constantine (by emptying of other Cities) hath transported to Byzantium. Concerning this prescript about bread-corn for the supply of Constantinople, (appointed by Constantine of blessed memory, and afterwards increased by Theodosius,) See the second Law in Cod. Theod. de frumento urbis Constantinop. Vales.

(c) From the Authority of the Allat. M. S. this place is to be amended, thus; ὠρίζετο γὰρ καθ' αὐτὸν, ἃ μόνον ὅτι παρὰ γνώμην, &c. For he was incensed against him, not only because he had been ordained, &c. Thus also the reading is in the Life of Paulus Constantinop. Vales.

CHAP. XIV.

That the Arians, having removed Gregorius from [the See of] Alexandria, put Georgius into his place.

(a) Socrates mistakes here also. For Gregorius (who was created Bishop of Alexandria in the Synod of Antioch) held that Bishoprick six years, until the Council of Serdica: in which he was deposed, and excommunicated, as it is related in the Synodical Epistle of that Council. And when he had survived this sentence about six months, he died, as Athanasius attests, in Epistol. ad Solitar. Theodoret has corrected this mistake of Socrates's and Sozomen's, in Book 2. of his Eccles. Hist. Georgius was made Bishop of Alexandria by the Arians long after Gregorius, in the year of Christ 356. Vales.

AT the same time the Arians (a) removed Gregorius from [the See of] Alexandria, (b) as being a person odious, both upon account of his burning the Church, and also because he was not zealous enough in defending their opinion. Into his See they sent Georgius, a person born in Cappadocia, who had gotten the repute of being a very skilful maintainer of their Tenets.

(b) This place was corrupted by a transposition of the words; which gave Translators an occasion of mistaking here. But the words might have been easily put into their order, after this manner; ὡς μισάνθρωπον διὰ τὸν τῆς ἐκκλησίας ἐμπρησμόν· οὐ ταύτῳ δὲ καὶ ὅτι, &c. as being a person odious, both upon account of his burning the Church; and also because, &c. Socrates does here assign two reasons, why the Arians deprived Gregorius of his Bishoprick. The first is, because Gregorius was a person hated by all Men, upon account of his burning Dionysius's Church; which Socrates has mentioned before; Athanasius also takes notice of it, in Epist. ad Solitar. The other reason is, because he seemed not zealous enough in defending their opinion. The same is confirmed by Sozomen, Book 3. Chap. 7. Eccles. Hist. Vales.

CHAP. XV.

How Athanasius and Paulus going to Rome, and being fortified with Bishop Julius's Letters, recovered their own Sees again.

MOreover, Athanasius with much difficulty at last gat over into Italy. Constans the youngest of Constantine's sons had then the sole power in the Western parts [of the Empire,] his brother Constantine having been killed by the Soldiers, as we have before related. (a) At the same time also Paulus Bishop of Constantinople, Asclepas of Gaza, Marcellus of Ancyra a City of Galatia the Less, and Lucius of Adrianople, having been accused, one for one thing, another for another, and driven from their Churches, arrived at the Imperial City Rome. They acquaint therefore Julius Bishop of Rome with their case. He (in regard the Church of Rome's priviledge is such,) fortified them with his Letters, wherein he made use of a great deal of liberty, and sent them back into the East, (b) restoring to each of them his own See, and sharply rebuking those who had inconsiderately deposed them. They, having left Rome, and confiding in Bishop Julius's Letters, possest themselves of their own Churches, and send the Letters to those whom they were written to. These persons having received [Julius's Letters,] look'd upon his reprehension as an injury and reproach to them. And having assembled themselves in a (c) Synod called at Antioch, they most severely rebuke Julius in a Letter written by the joynt consent of them all, making it apparent, that it ought not to be determined by him, if they should have a mind to expel some [Bishops] from their Churches. For [they said] that they did not make any opposition when Novatus was by *them ejected out of the Church. Thus wrote the Eastern Bishops in answer to Julius Bishop of Rome. But in regard, upon (d) Athanasius's entry into Alexandria there hapned a disturbance, caused by those who were adherents to Georgius the Arian; upon which disturbance there followed, as they say, seditions and slaughters of men: and [because] the Arians ascribe the infamy and blame of all these mischiefs to Athanasius, as being the Author thereof;

(a) After the murder Hermogenes the Emperor, Lieutenant-General, Constantius put Paulus into Iron Chains, and banish'd him to Singar a Town of Mesopotamia, whence he removed him afterwards to Emisa, as I have remarked out of Athanasius, in my second Book of Ecclesiastick Observations, Chap. 6. Therefore what Socrates here says is false, to wit, that Paulus was at Rome at the same time that Athanasius was there.

* The Church of Rome. See Euseb. Eccles. Hist. book 6. chap. 43.

Indeed, Marcellus Bishop of Ancyra was at Rome together with Athanasius; as we are informed from Julius's Letter to the Eastern Bishops; which is also ascertained from Marcellus's Libel which he presented to Julius. But Julius speaks not a word concerning Paulus in his foresaid Epistle; whom he would doubtless have mentioned, had he been then at Rome with Athanasius and Marcellus. Vales.

(b) Julius restored not one of the forementioned Bishops, not Athanasius himself, to his own See. For, in the Roman Synod, wherein Athanasius's and Marcellus's cause was discust, Athanasius was only pronounced innocent, and admmitted to communion by Julius and the rest of the Bishops. But against Athanasius's accusers, who refused to make their personal appearance in judgment, nothing was determined; as I have observed out of Athanasius in my first Book of Ecclesiastick Observations. Nor was Athanasius, Marcellus, Asclepas, or Lucius restored before the Synod of Serdica. Vales.

(c) After the Roman Synod, wherein Athanasius was pronounced innocent, when Julius had sent a Letter by Gabianus the Comes to the Eastern Bishops, who had met in a Synod at Antioch at such time as the Church was dedicated; (see Chap 8. of this Book,) the Eastern Bishops, in order to their answering of this Letter, were convened again at Antioch in the year of Christ 343. And they wrote back an elegant and sharp Letter to Julius, the sense whereof Sozomen relates, Book 3. Chap. 8. Vales.

(d) What Socrates here says, to wit, that Athanasius returned at that time to Alexandria, is false. For Athanasius went not back to that City, till after the Council at Serdica, that is, till after the year of Christ 348. Vales.

thereof; it is requiſite that we ſpeak briefly concerning theſe things. Indeed, God, the Judge of truth it ſelf, only knows the true cauſes hereof. But, that ſuch accidents do frequently and uſually happen, when the multitude is divided into inteſtine factions, is a thing not unknown to prudent perſons. In vain therefore do Athanaſius's ſlanderers attribute the cauſe hereof to him; and eſpecially Sabinus a Biſhop of the Macedonian Hereſie. Who (had he conſidered with himſelf, how great miſchiefs the Arians have wrought againſt Athanaſius and the reſt that embrace the Homoöuſian Faith; or (e) how many complaints the Synods convened upon Athanaſius's account have made thereof, or what Macedonius himſelf, (f) that Arch-heretick, has practiſed throughout all the Churches) would either have been wholly ſilent; or, if he had ſpoken any thing, (g) would inſtead of theſe [reproaches] have highly commended [Athanaſius.] But now, having [deſignedly] paſſed all theſe things over in ſilence, he falſly accuſes the affairs [done by Athanaſius.] Nor has he made the leaſt mention of that Arch-heretick [Macedonius,] being deſirous wholly to conceal his tragick and audacious villanies. And (which is much more wonderful,) he has not ſpoken ill of the Arians, whom notwithſtanding he abhorr'd. But the Ordination of Macedonius (whoſe Hereſie he was a follower of,) he has ſilently concealed. For had he mention'd that, he muſt neceſſarily have recorded his impieties, which thoſe things done at that Ordination do ſufficiently demonſtrate. But thus much concerning this perſon.

CHAP. XVI.

That the Emperor ſent an Order by Philippus Præfect of the Prætorium, that Paulus ſhould be ejected and baniſhed, and that Macedonius ſhould be enſtalled Biſhop in his See.

MOreover, the Emperor Conſtantius (reſiding at Antioch) being informed that Paulus had taken poſſeſſion of his See again, was highly incenſed at what was done. He therefore wrote an order, and ſends it to (a) Philippus Præfect of the Prætorium, who had a greater power than the other Governors of Provinces; and was ſtiled the ſecond perſon from the Emperor; that he ſhould eject Paulus out of the Church, and introduce Macedonius into it in his room. Philippus therefore the Præfect being afraid that the multitude would raiſe a tumult, attempted to circumvent Paulus by ſubtlety. He keeps the Emperor's Order conceal'd in his own poſſeſſion: and, pretending to take care of ſome publick affairs, he goes to the publick Bath, called Zeuxippus. Thither he ſends for Paulus with a great ſhew of reſpect and honour, [acquainting him] that he muſt neceſſarily come to him, and he came. After he was come upon his being ſent for, the Præfect immediately ſhews him the Emperor's Order. The Biſhop patiently bore his being condemned without having his cauſe heard. But the Præfect, fearing the rage of the multitude that ſtood round; (for great numbers of perſons had flock'd together about the publick Bath, [whoſe meeting there was cauſed] by the report of a ſuſpicion) orders one of the Bath doors to be open'd, (b) through which Paulus was carried into the Imperial Palace, put into a ſhip provided for that purpoſe, and forthwith ſent away into baniſhment. The Præfect commanded him to go to (c) Theſſalonica the chief City of Macedonia, wherein Paulus had had his original extract from his Anceſtors: in that City [he order'd him] to reſide, and gave him the liberty of going to other Cities alſo, [to wit] thoſe in Illyricum: but he forbad his paſſage into the Eaſtern parts [of the Empire.] Paulus therefore being (contrary to expectation) caſt out of the Church, and at the ſame time alſo [driven] from the City, was immediately carried away. But Philippus the Emperor's Præfect went forthwith from the publick Bath into the Church. Macedonius was with him, being * thrown into his preſence by an engine as it were; he ſat with the Præfect in his chariot, and was expoſed to the view of all men: they were ſurrounded by a military Guard with their ſwords drawn. [Upon ſight hereof] a dread forthwith ſeiz'd the multitude: and all of them, as well the Homoöuſians as the Arians, flockt to the †Church; every one earneſtly endeavouring to get in thither. When the Præfect together with Macedonius came near the Church, an irrational fear ſeized both the multitudes and alſo the ſoldiers themſelves. For, becauſe the perſons preſent were ſo numerous, that there could be no paſſage made for the Præfect to bring in Macedonius, the ſoldiers began to thruſt away the crowd of people by violence. But when the multitude wedg'd together in a crowd, could not poſſibly retire by reaſon of the places narrowneſs; the ſoldiers, ſuppoſing that the multitude made a reſiſtance, and deſignedly ſtopp'd the paſſage, made uſe of their naked ſwords, as if they had been engaging an enemy, and began to cut thoſe that ſtood in the way. There were deſtroy'd therefore, as report ſays, about three thouſand one hundred and fifty perſons: ſome of whom the ſoldiers ſlew; others were killed by

Conſtantius.

(b) At this place there was wanting this whole line [δι' ἧς ἐπὶ τὰς βασιλικὰς αὐλὰς ἀπαχθείς, through which [Paulus] was carried into the Imperial Palace] which I have made good from the Florentine and Sfortian M.S. In Leo Allatius's M. S. there is ſomething more added here, after this manner: συνελαλήθησαν περὶ τὸ δημόσιον ἐν φήμης ἀπόρῳ συλλεχθέντες, ἐμφερεχῦναι διὰ τὸ φθεσαναι πάσαις ταῖς ὁδοῖς τὸν δῆμον, μίαν τὸ λαὸν συνέδρα κελεύει, δι' ἧς ἐπὶ τὰς βασιλικὰς αὐλὰς ἀχθεὶς ὁ Παῦλος, &c. i.e. They had flockt about the publick Bath, being gathered together there by the report of a ſuſpicion; becauſe the people environed all the paſſages out, he ordered one of the Bath doors to be opened, thorough which Paulus was conveyed into the Imperial Palace, &c. Valeſ.

(c) How Philippus could baniſh Paulus to Theſſalonica, I ſee not. For Socrates relates theſe things as done whilſt Conſtans was yet living, and before the Council of Serdica. But at that time Theſſalonica was under the Government of Conſtans Auguſtus. How therefore could Philippus (who was Præfect of the Prætorium to Conſtantius) baniſh Paulus to Theſſalonica, and permit him to live in the Cities of Illyricum; but wholly forbid him entring into the Eaſtern parts [of the Empire.] Valeſ.

* See Euſeb. Eccleſ. Hiſtory, Book 6. Chap. 43. Note (e.) Pag. 113.

†Churches

(a) Socrates (as alſo Sozomen) is miſtaken here. For Paulus was by Philippus Præfect of the Prætorium baniſhed not to Theſſalonica, but to Cucuſus, and was there ſtrangled by the Arians; as Athanaſius informs us, in his Epiſt. ad Solitar. But theſe things hapned a long while after this, to wit, when Conſtans Auguſtus was dead, in the year of our Lord 350, or 351. as Baronius will have it, who long ſince perceived this error of Socrates's. Further, 'tis eaſie to confute Socrates out of Athanaſius. For Athanaſius relates, that Philippus (after he had baniſhed Paulus, and cauſed him to be cruelly murdered by the Arians) was within leſs than a year depoſed from his Prefecture, deprived of his Goods, and ended his life miſerably. Now, Philippus was Conſul in the year of Chriſt 348, and on the year following he bore the Office of Præfect of the Prætorium, as may be collected from the Laws extant in the Theodoſian Code directed to him. The ſame Philippus was after this ſent Embaſſador by Conſtantius to Magnentius, a little before the fight at Murſa, as Zoſimus relates in his ſecond Book. Which hapned in the year of Chriſt 351. Let us therefore ſuppoſe that Philippus died on the year following, which was the year of Chriſt 352. Then Paulus might have been baniſhed by him in the year of Our Lord 351; which is Baronius's opinion. And from this year Macedonius's Preſidency over the Conſtantinopolitan Church muſt be begun. Valeſ.

by the Crowd. After such brave exploits as these, Macedonius, as if he had done no mischief at all, but were clear and guiltless of what had hapned, was seated in the Episcopal Chair by the Præfect, rather than by the Ecclesiastick Canon. Thus therefore did Macedonius and the Arians take possession of Churches by so great and numerous slaughters of men. At the same time also, the Emperor built (d) The Great Church, which is now called Sophia. It was joyned to that Church named Irene, which, being before a little one, the Emperor's Father had very much beautified and enlarged. And both of them are to be seen at this present time, encompassed within one and the same wall, and called by the name of one Church.

(d) This Great Church was consecrated by Eusebius Bishop of Constantinople, (he that before had been Bishop of Nicomedia) if we may credit Cedrenus. For at the ninth year of Constantius he writes thus: καὶ συνελεσθεῖσαν τὴν τοῦ Θεοῦ μεγάλην ἐκκλησίαν ἀπὸ κωνσανλίου, &c. i. e. And Eusebius consecrated the Church of God, called the Great Church, which was finished by Constantius, according to the order of Constantine the Great in his Will. And he brought the reliques of the holy Martyr Pamphilus, and those of his Companions, Theodulus, Porphyrius, and Paulus, from Antioch, and deposited them therein. But Cedrenus mistakes in his notation of the time. For if this Consecration were performed by Eusebius of Nicomedia, it must be placed on the third or fourth year of Constantius, at which time Eusebius governed the See of Constantinople. The same Cedrenus relates, that this Church, being afterwards ruined, and re-edified by Constantius, was consecrated by Eudoxius. Vales.

CHAP. XVII.

That Athanasius, being afraid of the Emperor's Menaces, returned to Rome again.

AT the same time, there was another false accusation patcht together against Athanasius by the Arians, who invented this occasion for it. The * Father of the Augusti had heretofore given a yearly allowance of Bread-corn to the Church of Alexandria for the relief of those that were indigent. It was reported by the Arians, that Athanasius had usually sold this Bread-corn for money, and had converted the money to his own gain. The Emperor therefore, having given credit to this report, threaten'd Athanasius with death. He, being made sensible of the Emperor's menaces, made his escape, and absconded. But when Julius Bishop of Rome understood what the Arians had done against Athanasius, having also received Eusebius's Letter who was now dead, he (a) invites Athanasius to come to him; being informed of the place where he lay concealed. At the same time arrived the (b) Letter, which those [Bishops] that before that had been convened at Antioch, wrote to him. Another (c) Letter also was sent to him by the Bishops in Egypt, informing him, that those things objected against Athanasius were false. These Letters so directly contradicting one another, having been sent to Julius, he returned an answer to those [Bishops] convened at Antioch, wherein he (d) blamed them, first for the bitterness of their Letter: then [he told them] they had done contrary to the Canons, because they had not called him to the Synod; it being commanded by the Ecclesiastick Rule, that the Churches ought not to make Sanctions contrary to the Bishop of Rome's sentiment. [He complained] also, that they had clandestinely adulterated the Faith. And moreover, that what was heretofore done at Tyre, had been fraudulently and corruptly transacted, in regard the Memorials of the Acts done at Mareotes had been made up of one side only. Further, that what had been objected concerning Arsenius's murther, was apparently demonstrated to have been a false accusation. These, and such like passages as these, Julius wrote at large to the [Bishops] convened at Antioch. Moreover, we had inserted here the Letters to Julius, and his answer also; had not the prolixity thereof hindred that design of ours. But Sabinus, a follower of the Macedonian Heresie, whom we have mention'd before, has not put Julius's Letters into his Collection [of the Acts] of Synods. Although, he has not left out that [Epistle] written from those [convened] at Antioch to Julius. But this is usually done by Sabinus. For, such Letters as either make no mention at all of, or reject the term Homoüsios, those [Epistles, I say,] he carefully inserts: but the contrary hereto he voluntarily and on set purpose omits. Thus much concerning these things. Not long after this, Paulus pretending a journey to Corinth, arrived in Italy. Both the [* Bishops] therefore make their condition known to the Emperor of those parts.

* Constantine the Great.

(a) Socrates does here confound all things, and repeats the same things twice, as if they had been done again. For he says that Athanasius fled to Rome twice. The same is asserted by Baronius (in his Annals) by Petavius (in his Rationarium Temporum,) and by Blondellus in his Book de primatu.) But we have sufficiently refuted this mistake, in our first Book of Ecclesiastick Observations, Chap. 6. Socrates makes the same mistake, in his asserting that Paulus Bishop of Constantinople came twice to Rome. Moreover, Julius received Eusebius of Nicomedia's Letter, before that Council of Antioch, which was held at the Consecration of the New Jerusalem, as we remarked before. And at the same time he invited Athanasius and his adversaries to Rome, in order to the discussion of their cause, as 'tis manifest from Athanasius's relation. Vales.

(b) The Bishops who had been convened at Antioch at the Consecration, having received Julius's Letter written to Eusebius of Nicomedia, (in which he invited him and the rest of the Eusebians to Rome, in order to the having their cause discussed there on a set day, whereon a Council was there to be held:) detained Julius's Messengers (Elpidius and Philoxenus,) beyond the day appointed. Then, after they had held their Synod, they dismissed the Messengers, and gave them a Letter to Julius. Upon receipt whereof he wrote back that famous Letter, which Athanasius hath inserted, in his second Apology against the Arians; pag. 739, &c. Edit. Paris. 1627. Vales.

Constantius.

(c) He means the Synodical Epistle, which the Bishops of Egypt wrote to all the Bishops every where: which is inserted in the first place by Athanasius in his forecited Apology pag. 722. Edit. ut prius. Julius, speaks concerning this Synodical Epistle, in that Letter he wrote to the Eastern Bishpps convened at Antioch: ἔγραψαν δὲ καὶ πλείονες, &c. Moreover, many Bishops (says he) wrote from Egypt and from other Provinces, in defence of Athanasius. Vales.

(d) I read [ἐμέμψατο, he blamed] not [ἐπέμψατο, he sent:] Sir Henry Savil hath mended this place, in the Margin of his Copy, and made it agreeable to our reading. In the Allat. M. S. this place is written thus: ἐπεμέμφετο πρῶτον μὲν τὸ ἐπαχθὲς τῆς αὐτῶν ἐπιστολῆς; i. e. in the first place he found fault with the bitterness of their Epistle. This Letter of Julius's is still extant, preserved for us by Athanasius, in his second Apology against the Arians: pag. 739, &c. Edit. ut prius. In that Letter Julius reprehends the Insolency and Pride, which the Eastern Bishops had used in their Letters to him. But, that which Socrates here adds (to wit, that Julius complained, because they had not invited him to the Synod: and that it was the Ecclesiastick rule, that nothing should be determined in the Church without the Bishop of Rome's consent:) is not to be found in that Letter. Indeed, Julius complains in that Epistle, because the Eastern Bishops (upon their receipt of his Letter, wherein he invited them to the Synod at Rome,) disregarding this his invitation, had ordained Gregorius Bishop in Athanasius's See. But he says not one word concerning this Ecclesiastick Rule or Canon. And yet Sozomen (Chap. 2. Book 10. Eccles. History) says the same that Socrates does here Vales.

* That is, Athanasius and Paulus.

How the Emperor of the Weſtern parts requeſted of his Brother, that ſuch perſons might be ſent, as could give an account of [the Depoſition of] Athanaſius and Paulus. And, that they who were ſent publiſhed another Form of the Creed.

BUT the Emperor of the Weſtern parts, being inform'd of *their ſufferings,(a) ſympathized with them. And he ſends a Letter to his Brother, ſignifying his deſire to have three Biſhops ſent to him, who might give an account of Paulus's and Athanaſius's Depoſition. (b) The perſons ſent were Narciſſus the Cilician, Theodorus the Thracian, Maris the Chalcedonian, and Marcus the Syrian. Who being arrived, would in no wiſe admit of a Congreſs with Athanaſius. But, having ſuppreſs'd the Creed publiſh'd at Antioch, and patch'd up another Form, they preſented it to the Emperor Conſtans; the words whereof were theſe.

* That is, Paulus and Athanaſius's ſufferings.

(a) The reading here, and in Robert Stephens Edition, is [γνὲς, τὰ καθ' ἑαυτὲς ἰδιοπαθῆ.] But I ſuppoſe it ſhould be thus [γνὲς τὰ καθ' αὐτ'ς, ἰδιοπαθῆ, underſtanding their ſufferings, ſympathized, with them:] for the word ἰδιοπαθεῖν has the ſame import with συμπαθεῖν to ſuffer with. But the reading may be [διοπαθῆ was very much troubled at:] which Emendation is the beſt. Valeſ.

(b) Some few months after the Synod at Antioch, which was held at the Dedication, the Eaſtern Biſhops made another form of the Creed, and ſent it to Conſtans Auguſtus, and to the Weſtern Biſhops, by Narciſſus, Theodorus, Maris, and Marcus, as if it had been dictated by the Synod at Antioch. So Athanaſius atteſts in his Book de Synod. Arimin. and Seleuc. This therefore hapned in the year of Chriſt 342. Socrates does evidently agree with Athanaſius. For he ſays, that thoſe Meſſengers ſent by the Eaſtern Biſhops ſuppreſſed that form of the Creed compoſed by the Antiochian Synod; and inſtead thereof produced another, which themſelves had made. Valeſ.

[Another Expoſition of the Faith.]

We believe in one God, the Father Almighty, the Creator and Maker of all things, * Of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named. And in his only begotten Son, our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who was begotten of the Father before all Worlds. God of God. Light of Light. By whom all things in Heaven and Earth, viſible and inviſible, were made. Who is the Word, and the Wiſdom: and the Power, and the Life, and the True Light. Who in the laſt days was for our ſakes made Man, and was born of the Holy Virgin. He was crucified and died: and was buried, and aroſe from the dead on the third day; and aſcended into the Heavens, and was ſeated at the right hand of the Father, and ſhall come at the end of World, to judge the Quick and Dead, and ſhall render to every perſon according to his works; whoſe Kingdom being perpetual, ſhall continue unto infinite ages. For He ſhall ſit at the right hand of the Father, not only in this preſent World, but in that alſo which is to come. And [we believe] in the Holy Ghoſt; that is, in the † Paraclete: whom [Chriſt] having promiſed to the Apoſtles, after his aſſent into the Heavens, he ſent him, ‖ That he might teach them and bring all things to their remembrance. By whom alſo thoſe Souls who have ſincerely believed in him, ſhall be ſanctified. But thoſe who ſay that the Son [exiſted] of things which are not, or of another ſubſtance, and not of God; and that there was a time when he was not, theſe perſons the Catholick Church hath determined to be Aliens [from it.]

Having delivered theſe things, and exhibited many other to the Emperor, they departed without doing any thing further. Moreover, whilſt there was hitherto an inſeparable Communion between the Weſtern and Eaſtern [Biſhops,] another Hereſie ſprang up at Sirmium, which is a City of Illyricum. For Photinus, (who preſided over the Churches there,) a perſon born in Galatia the Leſs, a Diſciple of that * Marcellus who had been depoſed, following his Maſter's ſteps, aſſerted the Son [of God] to be a meer Man. CHAP. XIX.

Concerning the large Explanation [of the Faith.]

(a) THE ſpace of three years being compleatly paſſed after theſe things, the Eaſtern Biſhops having again aſſembled a Synod, and compoſed another [Form of] Faith, ſend it to thoſe in Italy, by Eudoxius at that time Biſhop of Germanicia, Martyrius and Macedonius who was Biſhop of Mopſueſtia in Cilicia. This [Form of the] Creed, being written a great deal more at large, and containing many more additions than thoſe Forms publiſhed before, was ſet forth in theſe very words.

(a) Athanaſius (in his Book de Synodis) ſays the ſame: his Words are theſe: Ἐπὶ τύτοις ὥσπερ μεταγνόντες, συλλέγυσι πάλιν τὸ συνέδριον ἑωτῶν μετὰ τρία ἔτη τελα, &c. i. e. Afterwards, repenting as it were [of what they had done,] they again aſſemble a Synod of their own party, three years after. And they ſend Eudoxius, Martyrius, and Macedonius of Cilicia, and ſome other perſons with them, into the parts of Italy; who carried along with them a prolix [form of] faith, &c. Baronius (in his Annals) ſays, that this ſecond Council of Antioch (wherein that prolix form of faith was promulged) was convened in the year of Chriſt 344. And he thinks that he proves this from Athanaſius and Socrates. But, in my judgment, he is much miſtaken. For firſt, this expreſſion of Athanaſius's [μετὰ τρία ἔτη τελα, after three years] ſignifies the fourth year, not the third. For it denotes, that years were now paſt. In this ſenſe alſo Socrates underſtood the paſſage in Athanaſius; in regard he ſays [τελείας δὲ ἐν τῷ μέσῳ διαφερομένῳ χρόνῳ, i. e. the ſpace of three years being compleatly paſſed after theſe things. Since therefore that Synod of Antioch which had been convened at the Conſecration, was held in the year of Chriſt 341; this ſecond Antiochian Synod ought more truly to be placed on the year of Chriſt 345. Secondly, Athanaſius does not ſay, that the ſecond Antiochian Synod (wherein the large form of Faith was compoſed,) was aſſembled three years after that Synod at the Conſecration had been convened there: but he ſays, it was aſſembled three years after Narciſſus, Theodorus, Maris, and Marcus had brought that new form of Faith to Conſtans Auguſtus, pretending it to have been compoſed at Antioch. Now, he ſays that this was done ſome few Months after the Antiochian Synod held at the Conſecration. From whence that which I have ſaid is made apparent; to wit, that that Council (in which the large form of Faith had been compoſed,) was convened in the year of Chriſt 345; not in the year 344, as Baronius would have it. Valeſ.

We believe in one God, the Father Almighty, the Creator and Maker of all things, * Of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named. And in his only begotten Son Jeſus Chriſt, *our Lord; begotten of the Father before all ages. God of God. Light of Light. By whom all things in the Heavens and in Earth, viſible and inviſible, were made. Who is the Word, the Wiſdom, the Power, the Life, and the True Light. Who in the laſt days was for our ſakes made Man, and was born of the holy Virgin: He was crucified, and died, and was buried, and roſe again from the dead on the third day, and aſcended into heaven, and ſitteth at the right hand of the Father. perpetual, shall continue unto infinite Ages. For he sitteth at the right hand of the Father, not only in this present World, but in that also which is to come. We believe likewise in the Holy Ghost, that is, in the * Praclete. Whom [Christ] having promised to the Apostles, after his ascent into Heaven he sent him † That he might teach them and bring all things to their remembrance. By whom also those Souls that sincerely believe in him are sanctified. But those who assert that the Son [existed] of things which are not, or of another substance, and not of God, and that there was a Time or Age when he was not, the Holy Catholick Church hath determined to be aliens [from it.] In like manner also, those that affirm there are three Gods, or that Christ is not God before [all] Ages, or that he is not Christ, or the Son of God, or that the same Person is the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, or that the Son is not begotten, or (b) that the Father begat not the Son of his own Will and Pleasure; [these Persons] the Holy and Catholick Church Anathematizes. For neither is it safe to assert, that the Son [existed] of things which are not: in regard this is no where declared concerning him in the divinely inspired Scriptures. Nor have we learned, [that he had his essence] from any other pre-existing substance besides the Father, but that he was truly and genuinely begotten of the Father only. For the Divine Word teacheth, that there is one unbegotten [Principle which is] without beginning, [to wit] the Father of Christ. Nor must they (who without Authority of Scripture do dangerously assert this [proposition,] there was a time when he was not) preconceive in their minds then any foregoing interval of time, but God only who begat him without time. For both times and Ages were made by him. (c) Nor must it be thought, that the Son is without an Original, or unbegotten as the Father is. For no Father, or Son can properly be said to be co-inoriginate and co-unbegotten. But we have determined, that the Father, being alone without an Original and Incomprehensible hath incomprehensibly and in a manner to all men imperceptible begotten: but that the Son was begotten before Ages, and that he is not unbegotten like the Father, but hath a beginning, [to wit,] the Father who begat him. * For the Head of Christ is God. Nor although we acknowledge three things and Persons, [to wit,] of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, according to the Scriptures; do we therefore make three Gods. For we know, that there is one only God, perfect of himself, unbegotten, inoriginate, and invisible, [that is,] the God and Father of the only begotten, who of himself only hath his own existence, and who only does abundantly and freely give existence to all other things. But, although we do assert that there is One God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who only is unbegotten; we do not therefore deny Christ to be God before Ages, as the Followers of * Paul of Samosata do, who affirm that after his incarnation he was by a promotion deified, whereas by Nature he was a meer Man. For we know that he (although he hath been made subject unto the Father and unto God, yet nevertheless) was begotten of God, and is by nature true and perfect God, and was not afterwards made God of * Man: But was for our sakes made Man of God, and that he hath never ceased to be God. Moreover, we abominate and anathematize those who falsely stile him the bare and meer word of God, [and affirm] that he has no real existence, but hath his Essence in another: One while [terming him] as it were that Word called by some (d) The Word outwardly utter'd by the mouth; at another, as it were the mental or internal Word: Being of Opinion, that before Ages he was not Christ, nor the Son of God, nor the Mediator, nor the Image of God: but that (e) he was made Christ, and the Son of God, from such time as he took our flesh from the Virgin four hundred years ago. For from that time they assert Christ to have had the beginning of his Kingdom, und that it shall have an end after the Consummation and the Judgment. Such manner of Persons as these are the followers of Marcellus and Photinus the Ancyro-Galatians: who reject the Eternal existence and deity of Christ, and his endless Kingdom, in like manner as do (f) the Jews, upon a pretence of seeming to constitute a monarchy. For we understand him to be, not barely The word of God outwardly uttered by the mouth, or his mental or internal Word, but the Living God the Word, and subsisting of himself; and the Son of God, and Christ: who existed with his Father and was conversant with him before Ages, not by fore-knowledge only, and ministred unto him at the Creation of all things whether visible or invisible: But is the Word of God really subsisting, and is the God of God. For it is he to whom the Father said, * Let us make man in our Image, after our likeness: Who in his own Person appeared to the Fathers, gave the Law, and spake by the Prophets; and being at last made Man, he manifested his Father to all men, and reigns unto perpetual Ages. For Christ hath attained no new dignity: But we believe him to have been perfect from the beginning, and in all things like unto his Father. We also deservedly expel out of the Church those who affirm, that the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are the same Person, impiously supposing the three names to mean one and the same Thing and Person; because by an incarnation they make the incomprehensible and impassible Father subject to be comprehended, and to suffer. Of which sort [of Hereticks] are those termed amongst the Romans (g) Patropassians, but

(b) This was the opinion of the Arians. The Easterns explain this sentiment of theirs better hereafter, towit, that the Father may be understood to have begotten the Son willingly, without compulsion. Vales.

(c) In Robert Stephens's Edition of Socrates (Fol. 197. Edit. Paris. 1594.) these words [ὅτε μὴν συναναρχον, ὅτε συναΐδιον τὸν υἱὸν τῷ πατρὶ ἔχει, νομιστέον, i. e. Nor must it be thought, that the Son is without an Original, or unbegotten as the Father is] are wanting. The said Robert Stephens's Edition does in the following Words also differ something from this Copy of the Creed here. Athanasius has inserted this whole Creed, in his book de Synod. Arimin. & Seleuc. pag. 896, &c. Edit. Paris 1627. Athanasius's copy and this in Valesius's Edition of Socrates do agree: whom we have follow'd in our Version.

(d) Instead of [ὡ, τὸ προφορικὸν λεγόμενον] it should be [ὡς τὸν προφορικὸν, &c. and ὡς τὸν ἐνδιάθετον] as it is in the Allat. M.S. and in Athanasius, in his book de Synodis. By [λόγος προφορικὸς] Philosophers mean, That word which is uttered by the mouth. Hilarius calls it Verbum prolativum. To which is opposed [ὁ ἐνδιάθετος λόγος,] which modern Philosophers do term the word of the mind. Vales.

(e) By these words the Eastern Bishops mean, the Heresie of Marcellus Ancyranus, who asserted that Christ's Kingdom began from his Nativity, about four hundred years before that time; making use of a certain number for an uncertain. The Synodick Epistle of the Eastern Bishops at Serdica informs us hereof; which Epistle Hilarius has inserted, in his fragments. For these are their words in that Letter. Extitit namque temporibus nostris Marcellus, &c. i. e. For there hath risen up in our days one Marcellus of Galatia, the most execrable pest of all Hereticks, who with a sacrilegious mind, and impious mouth, and a wicked Argument, will needs set bounds to the perpetual, eternal, and timeless Kingdom of our Lord Christ, saying, that he began his reign 400 Years since, and shall end it at the Dissolution of this present World. Vales.

(f) We made good this place, by adding the Word [Judæis, the Jews:] which is not in Robert Stephens's Edit. but it occurs in Athanasius, and in the Allat. M.S. Vales.

(g) The Heresie of the Patropassians (or Patripassians) was very ancient, and far diffused. Tertullian (Adv. Prax. cap. 1, and 2.) chargeth this Heresie upon Praxeas. The same was maintained by Hermogenes, whence they were termed Hermogeniani. After whom Noëtus maintained the same, who (says Epiphanius) lived 130 Years before his time: (See Epiphan. Heres. 57.) From Noëtus they had the name of Noëtiani; and from Sabellius, Noëtus's Disciple, they were called Sabelliani. After whom succeeded Friscillianus in the same Heresie; from him they they had the name of Priſcillianiſtæ. The ſum and ſubſtance of this Hereſie, thus propagated by theſe ſucceeding aſſertors of it, was this: They affirmed there was but one Perſon in the Deity, to wit the Father; that he only ſubſiſted, and was the Maker of all Things; that he came not only into the World, and was incarnate, and did all things which we ſay were done by the Son. In order to the Excluſion of theſe Hereticks, the Aquileian Church added theſe two terms [inviſible and impaſſible] to the firſt Article of the Creed; ſhewing by the firſt, that the Father was not incarnate, and by the ſecond, that he was not crucified.

amongſt us they are called * Sabellians. For we know, that the Father, who ſent, continued in the proper nature of his own immutable Deity: But the Son who was ſent, fulfill'd the † Oeconomy of his incarnation. In like manner, we determine thoſe to be Perſons moſt impious and ſtrangers to truth, who irreligiouſly aſſert, that Chriſt was begotten not by the will and pleaſure [of the Father,] to wit, attributing to God an unwilling and involuntary neceſſity, as if he had begotten the Son by conſtraint: Becauſe they have audaciouſly determined ſuch things as theſe concerning the Father, which are contrary both to the common notions of God, and alſo to the ſenſe and meaning of the Scripture given by Divine Inſpiration. For we, knowing God to have free and plenary Power, and to be Lord of himſelf, do piouſly think, that he begat the Son voluntarily and of his own accord. Moreover, although with fear and reverence we do believe this which is ſpoken concerning him, || The Lord created me the beginning of his ways, upon account of his Works: yet we ſuppoſe not, that the Son was made in the ſame manner with the reſt of the Creatures and works made by him. For it is impious, and repugnant to the Eccleſiaſtick Faith, to compare the Creator, with the Works created by him, and to think that he hath the ſame manner of Generation with the things of a different nature from him. For the ſacred Scriptures do teach us, that the one and alone-only-begotten Son was genuinely and truely begotten. But, although we do aſſert, that the Son is of himſelf, and that he doth live and ſubſiſt in like manner as the Father doth; yet we do not therefore ſeperate him from the Father, imagining in our minds in a corporal manner any ſpaces or intervalls of place between their conjunction. For we believe that they are conjoyned without any intervening Medium, and without any ſpace or diſtance, and that they cannot be ſeparated one from the other: the (h) whole Father embracing the Son in his boſome; and the whole Son hanging upon and cleaving cloſe to the Father, in whoſe boſome he alone continually reſteth. Believing therefore the moſt abſolutely perfect and moſt holy Trinity, and aſſerting that the Father is God, and that the Son alſo is God; notwithſtanding this, we do not acknowledge two, but one God, by reaſon of the Majeſty of the Diety, and the one abſolutely-entire conjunction of the Kingdom: the Father ruling over all things in general, and over the Son himſelf alſo: and the Son being made ſubject to the Father, but (excepting him) reigning over all things which were made after him and by him, and by his Fathers will liberally beſtowing the grace of the holy Spirit upon the Saints. For the ſacred Scriptures have informed us, that the manner of the Monarchy which is in Chriſt is thus manifeſted. We were neceſſitated to make a perfect explanation of theſe things at large (after the publication of our ſhorter form of the Creed,) not upon account of our exceſſive ambition: but that we might clear our ſelves from all ſtrange ſuſpicion concerning our ſentiments, amongſt ſuch as are ignorant of our opinions: and that all perſons inhabiting the Weſtern parts might know both the impudent and audacious calumny of thoſe who diſſent from us, and alſo the Eccleſiaſtick ſentiments of the Eaſtern [Biſhops] concerning Chriſt, which is without violence confirmed by the teſtimony of the divinely inſpired Scriptures, (i) amongſt thoſe whoſe minds are not depraved. Conſtantius.

Concerning the Synod at Serdica.

(a) THE Biſhops in the Weſtern parts [of the (a) This confeſſion of faith (for ſo Athanaſius calls it) the Embaſſadors of the Eaſtern Biſhops preſented to the Weſtern Prelates aſſembled at Millaine. For ſome Biſhops together with the Presbyters of the Church of Rome had gone thither, to intreat Conſtans Auguſtus, that he would write to his brother Conſtantius about the aſſembling of a General Synod, in order to the determining of thoſe diſſentions in an Eccleſiaſtick Judicature, which had been raiſed in diverſe Churches: thus we are informed by Athanaſius in his Apology to Conſtantius. Moreover, when the Eaſterns had preſented this draught of the Creed to thoſe of the Weſt, they requeſted them to ſubſcribe it. But the Weſtern Biſhops made anſwer, that, as to what belonged to the Articles of Faith, the Nicene Creed was to them ſufficient, to which nothing was to be added, nor any thing to be taken from it. And as concerning the condemnation of thoſe Hereticks who were diſallowed of in that confeſſion, they requeſted of the Eaſtern Biſhops Embaſſadors, that they would in the firſt place condemn the Arian Hereſie. But, upon their refuſal to do that, the Eaſtern Embaſſadors being angry went away from the Council; as Liberius relates, in his Epiſtle to the Emperor Conſtantius, in theſe words: Quæ eſt pax, Clementiſſime Imperator, &c. What peace is there, moſt Gracious Emperor, whenas there are four Biſhops of their party, Demofilus, Macedonius, Eudoxius, and Martyrius, who above eight years ſince, when they would not condemn Arius's Heretical opinion at Millaine, departed from the Council in anger? notwithſtanding, the Weſtern Biſhops condemned Photinus's Hereſie in that Synod. But they pronounced no ſentence againſt Marcellus, becauſe he had before been judged clear from all manner of Hereſie in the Roman Synod. In the ſame Synod Urſacius and Valens (who had lain under a ſuſpicion of being Arians) having preſented a Libel wherein they condemned Arius's perfidiouſneſs and Photinus's Hereſie, were admitted to communion, as the Synodick Epiſtle of the Ariminum Council informs us. The ſame is atteſted by Urſacius and Valens themſelves, in another Libel afterwards preſented to Julius Biſhop of Rome, in theſe words: Item Anathema dicimus, &c. Alſo we anathematize thoſe, who deny, that Chriſt is God and the Son of God from all eternity, according to our former Libel, which we preſented at Millaine, &c. We thought good to be more large in theſe remarks of ours concerning the Millaine Synod, becauſe the memory thereof is very obſcure in the Eccleſiaſtick Annals. Dionyſius Petavius is the firſt perſon that hath taken notice of this Synod, who (in his diſſertation de duplici Synodo Sirmienſi) hath made many very learned obſervations concerning this Synod. But he hath miſtaken the year whereon it was convened. For he ſays it was held in the year of Chriſt 347, a little before the Council of Serdica. Which can in no wiſe be true. Therefore Jacobus Sirmondus (in his ſecond Diatriba, which he wrote againſt Petavius) has in this particular deſervedly reproved him. Baronius (who affirms that the long draught of the Creed (which Socrates has recorded in the foregoing chapter) was drawn up at the Antiochian Synod in the year of Chriſt 344,) places this Embaſſie of the Eaſtern Biſhops and the Millaine Council, on the ſame year alſo. But Sirmondus (in the foremontioned Diatriba) aſſigns this Council to the year of Chriſt 346. Which opinion is in my judgment the truer. For, in the firſt place, Athanaſius (in his Apologetick to Conſtantius,) relates, that on the fourth year after his coming to Rome he was by Conſtans Auguſtus ſummoned to Millaine, whither ſome Biſhops where then gone. Now Athanaſius came to Rome in the year of Chriſt 341. Secondly, Hilarius (in fragmentis) relates, that the Millaine Synod) wherein Photinus was condemned) was held two years before Urſacius and Valens offered their Libel of ſatisfaction to Julius Biſhop of Rome. For after he has recorded that Libel, Libel, he adds these Words, Hæc Epistola post biennium missa est, quàm hæresis Photini à Romanis damnata est, i. e. This Letter was sent two years after the Romans had condemned Photinus's Heresie. Since therefore Ursacius and Valens wrote that Letter in the year of Christ 349, as Petavius attests; the Millain Council must needs have been celebrated on the third year before that: that is, on the year of Christ 346. For that expression [post biennium, two years after] imports thus much, to wit, on the third year after that; which Petavius did not consider. Vales.

Constantius. Empire,] both because (b) they were unskilled in the Greek language, and also in regard they understood not these things, admitted not of them; saying, that the Nicene Creed was sufficient, and that there was no necessity of making any further disquisitions. But when, upon the * Emperors writing again, (ordering that Paulus and Athanasius should be restored to their own Sees,) nothing could be done further in that affair: (For there was a continued Sedition amongst the Populace:) Paulus and Athanasius requested that another Synod might be convened, that both their cause, and also the matters of faith might be determined by an * Oecumenical Synod: and they made it apparent, that they had been deposed for no other reason but this, that the Faith might be subverted. Another Oecumenical Synod therefore is summoned [to meet] at Serdica (which is a City of Illyricum,) by the determination of the two Emperors; the one of them requesting this by his Letters, and the other (to wit, the Emperor of the East) readily complying with him. (c) It was then the eleventh year from the death of the Father of the Augusti: Rufinus and Eusebius were Consuls, at such time as the Synod at Serdica was assembled. About three hundred Bishops of the Western parts met there, as (d) Athanasius attests. But from the Eastern parts Sabinus says there came but seventy, amongst which number Ischyras, Bishop of Mareotes was recounted, whom they who had depos'd Athanasius, Ordained Bishop of that Country. Some of them pretended infirmity of body: others (e) complained of the shortness of the time that was set, laying the blame thereof upon Julius Bishop of (b) Baronius does deservedly blame Socrates here, for his saying that the reason why the Western Bishops rejected this draught of the Dreed was, because they understood not the Greek Tongue. As if there were not then many in Italy who were well skilled in the Greek language. Moreover, Theodorus Lector has with good reason found fault with this cause of their refusal. For, instead of Socrates's Words here, he has substituted these; διὰ τὸ πρόδηλον τῆς βλασφημίας, because of its manifest Blasphemy. Vales.

* He means Constans.

* General.

(c) From the Consulate of Felicianus and Titianus, (which was in the year of Christ 337,) to the Consulate of Rufinus and Eusebius, which was in the year of our Lord 347,) there are Ten years compleat. Therefore, if the Council of Serdica was convened in the eleventh year after Constantine's death, it must of necessity have been assembled after the twenty second day of May. Vales.

(d) Athanasius does not say, that about three hundred Bishops of the Western Churches met at the Council of Serdica. He only says this, that as well those who were present at the Council of Serdica, as those who subscribed the Synodick Epistle afterwards sent to them; also those who before the Council at Serdica had written Synodick Epistles in his behalf, out of Phrygia, Asia, and Isauria, were in all three hundred and forty. This passage of Athanasius's occurs in his second defence against the Arians, pag. 768; Edit. Paris. 1627. Moreover, the same Athanasius (in his Epistle ad Solitar. pag. 818.) does expressly attest, that the Bishops, who met at the Council of Serdica, as well those out of the Western as the Eastern parts, were no more than 170. His words are these: συνέρχονται τοίνυν, &c. There met therefore, both from the East and from the West, at the City of Serdica, 170 Bishops, neither more nor less. In the Mogunt. Edit. after the Canons of the Synod of Serdica, there is this note; & subscripserunt, &c. i. e. and all the Bishops of divers Provinces and Cities subscribed, being in number 121. Vales.

(e) In this place Socrates seems to have been mistaken, in referring those things to the Council of Serdica, which belong to the Roman Synod. For when Julius had invited the Eastern Bishops to a Synod at Rome, that Athanasius's case might there be inquired into; the Eastern Bishops refused to come thither, pretending amongst other reasons, the narrowness of the time set; as Julius informs us in his Epistle to the said Eastern Bishops, recorded by Athanasius, pag. 744. Indeed Socrates's following words, to wit [although there had passed a year and six months, after such time as the Synod had been summoned, and during which space Athanasius made his abode at Rome, &c.] do manifestly confirm what I have said. For Athanasius, invited by Julius's Letters, came to Rome; where he abode a whole year and six months expecting his Adversaries, and the Synod which had been summon'd at Rome. Julius attest this, in his forequoted Epistle. pag. 748. Vales.

Rome: altho' there had passed a year and six months, after such time as the Synod had been summoned, and during which space Athanasius made his abode at Rome, expecting the meeting of the Synod. When therefore they were all convened at Serdica, the Eastern Bishops refused to come into the presence of the Western, saying, that they would not enter into discourse with them, unless they would banish Athanasius and Paulus from the convention. But when Protogenes Bishop of Serdica, and Hosius Bishop of Corduba (which is a City in Spain, as we said before) would by no means suffer (f) Paulus and Athanasius to be absent [from the Synod, the Eastern Bishops] went away immediately. And returning to Philippopolis, a City of Thracia, they made up a Synod apart by themselves. Wherein they openly anathematized the term Homoöusios: and having (g) inserted the (h) Anomoian opinion into their Epistles, they sent them about to all places. But the Bishops at Serdica in the first place condemned them for deserting [the Council.] Afterwards they divested Athanasius's Accusers of their dignities. And having confirmed that form of the Creed published at Nice, and rejected the term * Anomoios, they made a more manifest publication of [the term] † Homoöusious: concerning which they wrote Letters. and (as the others did) sent them about to all places. Moreover, both parties were of opinion, that they had done what was right and true; the Eastern Bishops [thought so,] because the Western [Prelates] had approved of and entertained those persons whom they had deposed: and the Western Bishops [were of that Opinion,] because they who had deposed these persons, fled away before their cause had been discussed, and because * they were the preservers and defenders of the Nicene Faith, but † these had been so audacious as to adulterate it. They therefore restored (i) Paulus and Athanasius to their Sees; as also Marcellus [Bishop] of Ancyra [a City] in Galatia the less. He had been deposed a long time before, as we have made mention in our foregoing || book: but (f) Paulus Bishop of Constantinople was not present at the Synod of Serdica, as Theodoret attests, (book 2. chap. 5. Eccles. Histor.) which is also confirmed by the Synodick Epistle of the Eastern Bishops at Serdica, which occurs in Hilarius's Fragments, at Pag. 434. Edit. Paris. 1631. Vales.

(g) Instead of [ἐπιστολὰς συγγράψαντες, having written Letters] the reading in the Allat. M.S. is truer; which is thus, [ἐπιστολαῖς ἐγγράψαντες, having inserted in their Letters.] But what Socrates here says, (to wit, that the Eastern Bishops at Serdica established the Opinion of the Anomoiani (see the following note in this chapter) in their Synodick Epistle.) is altogether false. Their Synodick Epistle is extant in Hilarius's Fragments, at pag. 434. Edit. Paris. 1631; and at the end of it there is a confession of faith added. In which confession there is nothing which in the least savours of the Anomoians opinion. The said Hilarius, relating (in his book de Synodis) the same draught of the Creed published by the Eastern Bishops at Serdica, owns it as Catholick, and explains it. And Hilarius is so far from believing that they disseminated the Anomoians opinion, that he affirms them to have obstructed that opinion on every side. His words are these: Ex omni autem parte, &c. But on all sides, whithersoever sollicitude could turn it self, the passage is stopt up by the wit of the Hereticks, lest it should be Preach'd, that there is any diversity or unlikeliness in the Son [from the Father.] Vales.

(h) The Anomoians were such as asserted, that the Son had a substance or essence, different from, or unlike to the Father.

* That is, different, or unlike.

but then he uſed his utmoſt diligence † to get the ſentence revoked which had been pronounced againſt him; declaring that the expreſſions of the book written by him were not underſtood, and that he therefore lay under a ſuſpicion [of maintaining] Paul of Samoſata's Opinion. But you muſt take notice that Euſebius Pamphilus confuted Marcellus's book in a diſcourſe againſt him, comprized in * three entire books which he entitled Againſt Marcellus. He quotes Marcellus's own words [in thoſe Books,] and in his diſcourſe againſt them maintains, that Marcellus does aſſert (in like manner as Sabellius the Libyan and Paul of Samoſata did) that the Lord [Chriſt] is a meer Man.

There are prefixt before them two books, entitled κατὰ μαρκέλλου, that is, Againſt Marcellus; wherein he reproves his deſign, malice, and envy. Euſebius atteſts (in the cloſe of his ſecond Book againſt Marcellus) that he wrote theſe Books by the order of thoſe Biſhops, who had condemned Marcellus in the Conſtantinopolitan Synod. Further, it is uncertain whether or no Socrates had ever ſeen thoſe two former Books againſt Marcellus, in regard he has made no mention of them. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXI.

An Apology for Euſebius Phamphilus.

BUt in regard ſome have attempted to reproach this perſon, (I mean Euſebius Pamphilus) as if he were an Aſſertor of Arius's Opinion in the books he hath publiſh'd; I judge it not unſeaſonable to ſay ſomething concerning him. In the firſt place therefore, he was preſent at, and conſented to, the Nicene Synod, which determin'd that the Son was coeſſential with the Father. Moreover, in is third Book concerning the Life of Conſtantine*, he ſays word for word thus: But the Emperor incited them all to an unity of mind, until he had at that time reduced them all to be of the ſame mind and to have the ſame ſentiments in relation to all thoſe points, concerning which they had before diſagreed. In ſo much that at Nice they did all perfectly agree in the [points] of Faith. Since therefore Euſebius, making mention of the Nicene Synod, does ſay, that all things about which they diſagreed were compoſed, and that they were all brought to be of one and the ſame mind and opinion; how can any Perſons judge him to be a maintainer of Arius's Opinion? The Arians alſo themſelves are miſtaken, in their ſuppoſing him to be a favourer of their Tenets. But ſome body will perhaps ſay, that in his writings he ſeems to Arianize*, in regard he always ſays † By Chriſt. To whom we anſwer, that Eccleſiaſtick Writers have frequently made uſe of this Expreſſion, and many other ſuch like, which do ſignifie the diſpenſation of our Saviours Humanity. And before all theſe [Writers] the Apoſtle Paul hath made uſe of theſe very expreſſions; and he was never thought to be the Teacher of a perverſe opinion. Moreover, in regard Arius has been ſo audacious, as to ſtile the Son a Creature like unto one of thoſe other [Creatures made by God;] hear what Euſebius ſaith (in his firſt book againſt Marcellus,) concerning this; theſe are his very words: He only, and no other, hath been declared to be, and is, the only begotten Son of God; upon which account they are deſervedly to be reprehended, who have audaciouſly ſtiled him a Creature, made of nothing like the reſt of the Creatures. For how ſhould he be a Son? How ſhould he be God's only begotten, who is entitled to the very ſame Nature with the reſt of the Creatures, (a) and would be one of thoſe common Creatures, in regard he (like them) is made a partaker of a Creation from nothing? But the ſacred Oracles do not inſtruct us after this manner concerning him. Then, after the interpoſition of ſome few words, he continues. Whoſoever therefore doth determine that the Son is made of things which are not, and that he is a (b) *Creature produced out of nothing, that perſon hath forgotten, that he beſtows upon him a name only, but in reality he denies him to be a Son. For he that is made of nothing, cannot truly be the Son of God, nor can any thing elſe which is made [be his Son.] But the true Son of God, in regard he is begotten of him as of a Father, ought deſervedly to be ſtiled the only begotten and beloved of the Father. And therefore he muſt be God. For what can the offſpring of God be elſe, but moſt exactly like to him that hath begotten him? A King indeed builds a City, but he begets not a City: but he is ſaid to beget, not to build, a Son. And an Artificer may be ſaid to be the Framer, not the Father, of that which he hath made. But he can in no wiſe be ſtiled the Framer of the Son who is begotten by him. So alſo, the ſupream God is the Father of his Son: but he is juſtly to be called the Maker and Framer of the world. And although this ſaying may be once found * ſomewhere in the Scripture,* The Lord created me the beginning of his ways in order to his works, yet we ought duly to inſpect the meaning of thoſe words, (which I will explain afterwards;) and not (as Marcellus doth) ſubvert a principal point [aſſerted by] the Church upon account of one word. Theſe and many other ſuch like expreſſions Euſebius Pamphilus utters, in his Firſt Book againſt Marcellus. And in his Third Book [of that work,] the ſame Authour, declaring in what ſenſe the term Creature is to be taken, ſays thus. Theſe things therefore having been after this manner proved and confirmed, the conſequence is (agreeable to all things explained by us before,) that theſe words alſo, The Lord created me the beginning of his ways in order to his works, muſt have been ſpoken [concerning the ſame perſon.] But, although he ſays he was created, yet he muſt not be ſo underſtood, as if he ſhould ſay, that he had arrived to what he is from things which are not, and that he alſo was made of

Conſtantius.

(a) Before theſe words there is a whole line wanting, (which (from the Firſt Book of Euſebius de Eccleſiaſtica Theologia, Chap. 9.) is thus to be made up; ταύτη γὰρ ἀδελφὸς ἂν τούτων γένοιτο μᾶλλον, ἢ κατὰ μίμησιν τοῦ Θεοῦ· τῶν τε πολλῶν ἓν τῶν ἔσται εἷς. i. e. For by this means he would be their brother, rather then the Son of God: and would be one of thoſe common Creatures, &c. Valeſ.

(b) Inſtead of [πεποίημένον] the reading ſhould be [ποιούμενον, produced] as Euſebius words it, at the place before cited. It ſhould alſo be [γενητὸν] not [γεννητὸν.] For theſe two words, although they are diſtinguiſhed but by one Letter, yet do very much differ in their ſignifications. For the term [γεννητὸν] ſignifies that which is born or begotten; but [γενητὸν] imports that which is made. Valeſ.

* That is, to aſſert Arius's Opinion.

† Socrates means thoſe Doxologies, that occur at the end of Euſebius's Sermons; which Euſebius doth always put into this form: Glory to be the unborn Father by his only begotten Son, &c. This may plainly be ſeen in thoſe Tracts of Euſebius's, which Jacobus Sirmondus hath publiſhed. For example, in the end of his firſt Book againſt Sabellius, theſe are his words: Gloria uni non nato Deo, &c. i. e. Glory be to the one unborn God, by the one only begotten God the Son of God, in one holy Spirit, both now, and always, and throughout all ages of ages. Amen. And ſo concerning the reſt. Alſo, in the Oration Euſebius made at the Conſecration of the Church at Tyre, (which occurs at the Tenth book of his Eccleſ. Hiſtor. chap. 4.) we meet with the ſame clauſe, at the cloſe of that Speech; δι' οὗ αὐτῷ ἡ δόξα, &c. by whom be glory to him. For ſo we have worded that Place, agreeable to three of our M. S.S. Further, 'tis manifeſtly known, that the Arians attributed this prepoſition [per quem, by whom] to the Son, upon this deſign, that they might make him ſubject to the Father. Nor can they demonstrate, that Eusebius doth attribute a beginning of Essence to the Son of God, although they may find him frequently making use of the expression of dispensation: especially, because he was a great Emulator and Admirer of Origen's Writings, wherein such as are able to understand Origen's Books, will find [this] every where [asserted, to wit,] that the Son is begotten of the Father. CHAP. XXII.

That the Synod of Serdica restored Paulus and Athanasius to their Sees; and that upon the Eastern Emperors refusal, to admit them, the Emperor of the West threatned him with War.

BUT the [Bishops,] as well those convened at Serdica, as they who made up a particular Synod by themselves at Philippopolis [a City] of Thracia, having perform'd whatsoever each party thought requisite to be done, return'd to their own Cities. [Thence forward] therefore the Western Church was severed from the Eastern: and the boundary of communion between them, was the mountain call'd (a) Soucis, which parts the Illyrians from the Thracians. As far as that mountain there was a promiscuous communion, altho' their Faith was different. But they (b) communicated not with those who lived beyond it. Such was the confusion of the Churches Affairs at that time. Soon after this, the Emperor of the Western Parts acquaints his Brother Constantius with what had been done at Serdica, and entreats him to restore Paulus and Athanasius to their own Sees. But when Constantius made demurrs to what he had written, the Emperor of the Western Parts in another Letter gave him his choice, [to wit,] that he should either admit Paulus and Athanasius to their own former Dignities, and restore their Churches to them; or else (if he did not this) he must look upon him to be his Enemy, and expect a War.

(a) In our Annotations on the twentyfirst Book of Am. Marcellinus, we have long since remarked, that this mountains name should be Soucis; and that hereby is meant the streights of the Succi, which Am. Marcellinus describes in his twenty firſt book, pag. 189. Edit. Paris. 1635. Philostorgius mentions the same streights, (in book 3. Eccles. Hist.) and calls them σύκεις, i. e. Succi; being scituated between Dacia and Thracia. He describes them thus: Δίοδοι εἰσὶ στεναὶ μεγίστων ὀρῶν, &c. i. e. They are streight passages of vast mountains, which are crouded together on each side into one place, in such a manner that they seem to embrace one another. He means to the mountains, Hæmus and Rhodope, which arising from different places, make an angle in that place, and do as it were kiss one another. Which gave the Ancients an occasion of feigning Hæmus to be a young man, and Rhodope a maid, and that heretofore they fell in love with one another. You may meet with the story in Ovid Metamorph. book 6. at the beginning. Busbequius (in 1 Epist. Legat. Turci.) says that the Turks do now call this narrow passage Capi deruent, i. e. the Gate of narrownesses. Vales.

(b) These words must have a favourable sense put upon them; and are not so to be understood, as if Socrates should have said, that after the Synod of Serdica the Western Bishops held no communion with the Eastern. For in the Synod of Sirmium (which was convened by the Western Bishops against Photinus, two years after the Synod at Serdica) the Western Bishops sent their determinations to the Eastern upon account of preserving a communion. And the Eastern Bishops wrote back to them, as Hilarius informs us, in his Fragments. Thus therefore Socrates's words here must be understood: to wit; after the Synod of Serdica the Western Bishops did (not readily and rashly, but) with a great deal of cautiousness communicate with the Eastern. Vales.

The (c) Letter he wrote to his Brother was this.

(c) Const. Augustus's Letter to his Brother Constantius, which is hererecorded by Socrates, is in my judgment not to be lookt upon as genuine. For Athanasius makes no mention of this Letter: and Paulus's name (which is extant in it) doth upon good grounds render it suspicious. For at that time Paulus enjoy'd his Bishoprick: neither was he present at the Synod of Serdica; nor restor'd by the determination thereof; as we shew'd before. Wherefore, if this Letter of Constans's be genuine,

Paulus and Athanasius are indeed here with Us. But upon enquiry we find that they are Persecuted upon account of their piety. If therefore you will promise to restore them to their Sees, and punish those who have causelesly injur'd them, We will send the Men to you. But if You shall refuse to do as We have said, know for certain, that We Our self will come thither, and restore them to their own Sees whether you will or no.

it muſt neceſſarily have been written before the Council of Serdica. Laſtly, Conſtantius's firſt Letter to Athanaſius (which Socrates has inſerted in the following Chapter) evidently ſhews this to be a forged Letter. For Conſtantius in that Epiſtle ſaith, that by a Letter written to his Brother he hath requeſted him to give Athanaſius leave to return to his See. Valeſ.

Conſtantius.

CHAP. XXIII.

That Conſtantius, being afraid of his Brothers menaces, by his Letters ordered Athanaſius to appear, and ſend him to Alexandria.

THE Emperor of the Eaſt underſtanding theſe things, was reduced to a very great ſtreight. And having forthwith ſent for moſt of the Eaſtern Biſhops, he made them acquainted with the option his brother had propoſed to him, and enquired of them what was to be done. They made anſwer, that it was better [for him] to grant Athanaſius the Churches, than to undertake a Civil War. Wherefore the Emperor, being neceſſitated thereto, ſummoned Athanaſius to appear before him. At that very interim the Weſtern Emperor ſends Paulus to Conſtantinople, accompanied with two Biſhops and other honorary Proviſions, having fortified him both with his own Letters, and alſo with thoſe from the Synod. But whilſt Athanaſius was yet fearful, and in doubt whether he ſhould go to Conſtantius or not: (For he was afraid of the treacherous attempts of the Sycophants:) the Eaſtern Emperor invited him [to his Court] not only once, but a ſecond and a third time; as it is evident from his Letters, the Contents whereof, being tranſlated out of the Latin Tongue [into the Greek,] are theſe.

Conſtantius's Epiſtle to Athanaſius.

CONSTANTIUS VICTOR AUGUSTUS, to Athanaſius the Biſhop.

(a) This, and the two following Letters, are in Athanaſius's ſecond defence, pag. 769. Edit. Paris. Valeſ.

(a) The humanity of Our clemency hath not permitted you to be any longer toſſed in and diſquieted with the boyſterous ſurges (as it were) of the Sea. Our indefatigable piety hath not neglected you during your being deprived of your native habitation, whilſt you wanted your goods, and wandred up and down in deſert and impaſſable places. And although We have too long deferr'd the acquainting you by Letters with the purpoſe of Our mind, expecting you would of your own accord have come to Us, and requeſted a Remedy for your troubles: Yet becauſe peradventure fear hath hindered that purpoſe of your mind, We have therefore ſent to your Gravity, Letters filled with indulgence, that you ſhould haſten to make your ſudden appearance in Our preſence without fear; whereby you might enjoy your deſire, and, having made experiment of Our humanity, be reſtored to your own habitation For upon this account we made a requeſt for you to Our Lord and Brother Conſtans Victor Auguſtus, that He would grant you the liberty of coming, to the end that being reſtored to your Country by both Our conſents, you ſhould have this pledge and aſſurance of Our favour.

Another Epiſtle to Athanaſius.

CONSTANTIUS VICTOR AUGUSTUS, to Athanaſius the Biſhop.

Although We have made it ſufficiently known to you by Our former Letter, that you might ſecurely come to Our Court, in regard We are earneſtly (a) deſirous to ſend you to your own habitation: yet We have now (b) ſent this Letter to your Gravity. Wherefore We entreat you to take a publick Chariot, and haſten to Us without any miſtruſt or fear, that you may enjoy what you deſire.

Conſtantius.

(a) In Athanaſius, inſtead of [βουλεύεσθαι determined] the reading is [βούλεσθαι deſired.] Valeſ.

(b) In Athanaſius, it is [δεδώκαμεν ſent] not [δεδηλώκαμεν manifeſted.] Valeſ.

CONSTANTIUS VICTOR AUGUSUTS, to Athanaſius the Biſhop.

Whilſt we made Our reſidence at Edeſſa, (your Presbyters being preſent there,) We were pleaſed, by ſending a Presbyter to you, to haſten your coming to Our Court, to the end that after you were come into Our Preſence, you might go immediately to Alexandria. But, in regard a conſiderable ſpace of time is now paſt, ſince your receipt of Our Letter, and you have not yet come; We therefore took care to put you in mind by this, that you ſhould now haſten to make your ſudden appearance in Our Preſence, that ſo you may be reſtored to your own Country; and obtain your deſire. And that you might be moſt fully certified hereof, We have ſent Achetas the Deacon, from whom you may underſtand both the purpoſe of Our mind, and alſo that you ſhall readily obtain what you deſire.

Athanaſius having received theſe Letters at Aquileia, (for (c) there he abode after his departure from Serdica,) haſtned immediately to (d) Rome. And having ſhown the Letters to Julius the Biſhop, he cauſed great joy in the Roman Church. For they ſuppoſed, that the Emperor of the Eaſt had now given his aſſent to their Faith, in regard he invited Athanaſius to come to him. But Julius wrote this Epiſtle to the Clergy and Laity in Alexandria concerning Athanaſius.

(c) After the Synod of Serdica, Athanaſius made his abode firſt at Naiſſus in Dacia. In which City he received the Letters written to him by Conſtans Auguſtus. Afterwards, he left Naiſſus, and went to Aquileia, as he himſelf atteſts, in his Apologetick to Conſtantius, pag. 676. Valeſ.

(d) Athanaſius relates the reaſon of this journey of his to Rome in his Second defence againſt the Arians; to wit, that he might take his leave of Julius the Biſhop, and the Roman Church, by whom he had been ſo kindly entertained. For that is the meaning of theſe words of Athanaſius: Ἐλθὼν δὲ ἐξεδάμουν, ἀνῆλθον εἰς τὴν Ῥώμην σωτάξασθαι τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ καὶ τῷ ἐπισκόπῳ· i. e. But I, upon receipt of theſe Letters, went to Rome, to bid the Roman Church and the Biſhop farewel: For the term [συντάξασθαι] ſignifies valedicere, to take leave of, or to bid farewel: As we have obſerv'd and prov'd in our Annot. on Euſebius's Life of Conſtantine; Book 3. Chap. 21. Valeſ.

The Epiſtle of Julius Biſhop of Rome, to thoſe of Alexandria.

Julius (e) to the Biſhops and Presbyters, and Deacons, and to the Laity inhabiting Alexandria, his beloved Brethren, health in the Lord.

(e) In the Allat. M.S. and in Athanaſius (in his ſecond Apology againſt the Arians) theſe words [the Biſhops and] are wanting. Inſtead hereof Epiphanius Scholaſticus ſeems to have read [Julius the Biſhop to the Presbyters, &c.] which reading Chriſtophorſon hath followed. Valeſ.

I alſo rejoyce with you, beloved Brethren, becauſe you now ſee before your Eyes the fruit of your Faith. For that this is truly ſo, any one may ſee in our Brother and Fellow Biſhop Athanaſius: Whom God hath reſtored to you, upon account both of his purity of Life, and alſo of your prayers. Hence it is apparent, that you have continually offered up to God Prayers which were pure and full of Charity. For, being mindful of the Celeſtial promiſes, and (f) of the courſe of Life tending thereto, which you have been inſtructed in by the Doctrine of our fore- foresaid Brother; you certainly knew, and (according to that true Faith which is implanted in you) were apprehensive of this, that your Bishop could not be perpetually separated from you, whom you carried in your pious Minds, as being continually present. Wherefore, I need not make use of many words in this my Letter to you. For your Faith hath prevented whatever could have been said by me: And by the Grace of Christ those things have been fulfill'd, which you in common prayed for and desired. I rejoyce therefore with you, (for I will say it again,) because you have preserved your Souls inexpugnable in [your defending of] the Faith. Nor do I any whit less rejoyce with my Brother Athanasius, because although he hath undergone many sharp afflictions, yet) he was not one hour unmindful of your Love, and your Desire. For although he seemed to have been withdrawn from you for a time, yet he was continually conversant with you in Spirit. And I am of opinion, Beloved, that all the tryals and troubles which have hapned to him, are not inglorious. For both your, and his Faith hath thereby been made known, and approved amongst all Men. For, had not so many and great afflictions befel him, who would have believed, either that you should have had so great a respect and love for so eminent a Bishop, or that he should have been adorned with such excellent Virtues, by reason of which he is in no wise to be defrauded of his hope in the heavens? He hath therefore obtained a testimony of confession every way glorious, both in this, and in the World to come. For after his many and various sufferings both by Land and Sea, he hath trodden under foot all the treacheries of the Arian Heresie; and after his having been frequently assaulted and brought into danger through envy, he hath despised death, being guarded by Almighty God, and our Lord Jesus Christ: hoping that he should not only avoid his Enemies Plots, but also be restored in order to your consolation, bringing back to you greater Trophies by reason of your being conscious [of having done what was just and good.] Upon which account he hath been rendred glorious even as far as the ends of the whole Earth, being approved for his [integrity of] Life, undauntedly persisting in the defence of his resolution of Mind, and Celestial Doctrine, and evidently declared by your constant and perpetual judgment, to be entirely beloved by you. He returns therefore to you now far more bright and glorious, than when he departed from you. For, if the fire tries and refines pretious Metals, I mean Gold and Silver, what can be said of so eminent a Personage according to his worth, who having vanquished the fire of so great afflictions, and so many (g) Instead of [ἀποδεχθὲς, received] in the Allat. M.S. and in Athanasius, the reading is [ἀποδειχθὲις declared: which I account the better reading. Vales. Perils, is now restored to you, having been (g) declared innocent, not by our determination only, but by that of the whole Synod? Receive therefore (Beloved Brethren) with all Divine Glory and Joy your Bishop Athanasius, (h) together with those who have been his Fellow-sufferers. And rejoyce, in that you enjoy your desires, who have nourished and quenched the thirst of your pastor, hungring (if I may so speak,) and thirsting after your Piety, with your comfortable writings. For you were a consolation to him during his abode in strange Countries: And you have cherished him with your most faithful Souls and Minds, whilst he was persecuted, and assaulted with treacheries. Indeed, I rejoyce already, whilst I consider and foresee in my mind the joy of every one of you at his return, and the most pious meetings [which will be given him] by the Populace, and the glorious Solemnity of those which will be assembled, and what manner of day that will be, wherein our brother shall make his return: When forepast Calamities shall have an end, and his pretious and wish'd for return shall unite all Persons in an alacrity of mind [expresst by] the highest degree of Joy. Such a Joy as this does, as to the greatest part of it, reach even as far as us, to whom Heaven, ('tis manifest) hath granted this favour, that we should be able to come to the Knowledge of so eminent a Personage. It is fit therefore, that we should close this Letter with a Prayer. May God Almighty, and his Son our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ afford you this perpetual Grace, rendring you the reward of your admirable Faith, which you have demonstrated towards your Bishop by a Glorious Testimony: That better things may await you and your Posterity both in this, and in the World to come, which * Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entred into the heart of man, the things that God hath prepared for them that love him, through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom Glory be to Almighty God for ever and ever, Amen. I wish you good health, beloved Brethren. * 1. Cor. 2. 9.

Constantius.

Athanasius confiding in these Letters, went into the East. The Emperor Constantius received him not then with an incensed mind. But upon the suggestion of the Arians, he attempted to circumvent him, And speaks to him thus. You have indeed recovered your See by the Synods determination, and our consent. But, in regard there are some of the people in Alexandria, who do (i) refuse to hold communion with you, suffer them to have one Church in the City. To which request Athanasius immediately made this return, and says, It is in your power, O Emperor, to command and do what you will. I also ask and request this favour of you, which I desire you would grant me. When the Emperor had readily promised him to grant it, Athanasius forthwith added, that he desired to receive the same favour, that the Emperor had required should be granted him: For he also requested that throughout every City one Church might be allowed to those who refused to communicate with the Arians. When the Arians understood that Athanasius's opinion would (k) incommode [their party,] they made answer that that business was to be deferred till another time: But they permitted the Emperor to do what pleased him. Wherefore, the Emperor restored Athanasius, Paulus and Marcellus to their own Sees: As also, Asclepas of Gaza, and Lucius of Adrianople. For they also had been received by the Synod of Serdica; Asclepas [was received] upon his exhibiting the Acts, whereby it was manifest, that Eusebius Pamphilus (together with many others) having taken cognizance of his cause, had restored him to his dignity, and Lucius, because those that accused him were fled. Therefore, the Emperors Edicts were sent to their Cities, giving order that they should be readily admitted. Upon Basilius's being turn'd out of Ancyra, and Marcellus's entrance into that City, there was no trivial disturbance made, which gave those that were his Adversaries an occasion of reproaching him. But the Gazites willingly received Asclepas. In Constantinople, Macedonius did for some small time give place to Paulus, and convened assemblies by himself separately, in a private Church of that City.

(i) This passage Socrates had from Rufinus. There is no mention of it in Athanasius. Vales.

(k) The reading must be be [ἀλυσιτελῆ, incommode;] which emendaton Rufinus confirms, (book 1. chap. 19. Eccles. Hist.) and so doth Epiphanius, in his Version. Vales.

[Τῆς πρὸς ἀυτὸς ἀγωγῆς,] which I like not. For it must be [πρὸς ἀυτὰς ἀγωγῆς, of the course of life tending to them;] that is, the promises. Or else the reading may be [τῆς πρὸς ἀυτὸς ἀγάπης, of your mutual love:] which reading Epiphan. Scholastic. followed. Vales.

(g) Instead of [ἀποδεχθὲς, received] in the Allat. M.S. and in Athanasius, the reading is [ἀποδειχθὲις declared: which I account the better reading. Vales.

(h) In the Allat. M.S. the reading of this place is thus: μετὰ τότε ᾧ οἵτινες ἀυτῷ ᾗ τῶν τοσούτων καμάτων κοινωνοὶ γεγόνασι, and together with him as many as have been partakers of so great labours with him. The reading in Athanasius is almost the same. But our Copies and Epiphanius Scholasticus do confirm the common reading. Vales.

Conſtantius.

City. But, in behalf of Athanaſius, the Emperor wrote to the Biſhops, to the Clergy, and to the Laity, that they ſhould willingly receive him. Moreover, he gave orders by other Letters, that what had been enacted againſt him in the Courts of Judicature, ſhould be abrogated. The contents of his Letters concerning both theſe Particulars are theſe.

Conſtantius's Letter, in behalf of Athanaſius.

VICTOR CONSTANTIUS MAXIMUS AUGUSTUS, to the Biſhops and Presbyters of the Catholick Church.

The moſt Reverend Biſhop Athanaſius hath not been deſerted by the Grace of God. But although he was for a ſhort time ſubjected to human tryal, yet he hath received a juſt ſentence from Divine Providence which inſpects all things: having been reſtored, by the will of God, and our determination, both to his own Country, and Church, over which by Divine permiſſion he preſided. It was meet, that what is agreeable hereto ſhould be performed by our Clemency. That ſo, all things which have heretofore been determined againſt thoſe who have held communion with him, ſhould now wholly be forgotten, and that all ſuſpicion [entertained] againſt him ſhould in future ceaſe, and that the immunity, which thoſe Clergymen that are with him did heretofore enjoy, ſhould (as it is meet) be confirmed to them. Moreover, We thought it equitable to make this addition to Our Indulgence in favour of him, that all Perſons belonging to the ſacred order of the Clergy might underſtand, that ſecurity is granted to all thoſe that have adhered to him, whether they be Biſhops, or Clerks: And a firm Union with him ſhall be a ſufficient teſtimony of every one's good reſolution of mind. For, what Perſons ſoever (making uſe of a better judgment, and becoming followers of a ſounder Opinion,) ſhall embrace his Communion. We have ordered, that all ſuch ſhall enjoy that indulgence (according to the *Likeneſs. * Pattern of the preceding providence) which We have now granted agreeable to the will of God.

Another Letter ſent to the Alexandrians.

VICTOR CONSTANTIUS MAXIMUS AUGUSTUS, to to the Populace of the Catholick Church in Alexandria.

In regard We make (l) your good Government Our aim in all things, and knowing that you have for ſome time been deprived of an Epiſcopal Providence, We have thought good to ſend back to you again Athanaſius *the Biſhop, a Perſon well known to all Men for his ſanctity of Life and moral honeſty. When you ſhall have received this Perſon according to your uſual manner, and as it is meet; and ſhall conſtitute him your aſſiſtant in your Prayers to God; make it your buſineſs to preſerve continually a Concord and Peace, befitting your ſelves, and grateful to Us, according to the Sanction of the Church. For it is diſagreeable to reaſon, that there ſhould be any diſſention or faction raiſed amongſt you, contrary to the felicity of Our times. Our deſires and wiſhes are, that you may be wholly freed from this miſchief. And we exhort you to perſiſt continually in your uſual Prayers to God, making uſe of him your Prelate and your aſſiſtant, as was ſaid before. That ſo this reſolution of yours being convey'd to the (m) ears of all Men, even thoſe Gentiles as yet * enſlaved in the erroneous Worſhip of Idols, may with the greateſt alacrity haſten to the knowledge of the ſacred Religion, (moſt dear* Alexandrians*!) We therefore again exhort you to perſiſt in what hath been ſaid before. Do you willingly receive your Biſhop, ſent to you by God's Decree and Our determination, and look upon him as worthy to be embraced (n) with your own Souls and Minds. For that doth both become you, and is alſo manifeſtly agreeable to Our Clemency. And that all manner of (o) diſturbance and occaſion of Sedition may be taken from ſuch as are endow'd with malevolent and factious minds, We have by Our Letters given order to the Judges amongſt you, that they ſhould render all thoſe liable to undergo the Penalty of the Laws, whom upon inquiry they ſhall find to have been Seditious. Taking therefore into your conſideration theſe two things, both God's and Our determination, and alſo the care we have taken about your agreement, and the puniſhment [we have commanded to be inflicted] upon thoſe that are diſorder'd; make it your chief buſineſs to have a diligent regard to whatever doth become and agree with the Sanctions of the ſacred Religion, and with all reverence to honor the * foreſaid [Prelate,] that ſo you together with him may offer up Prayers to the ſupream God and Father, both for your Selves, and alſo for the good Government and Concord of Mankind in general.*

(m) I doubt, not but inſtead of [εὐχὰς, prayers] it ſhould be [ἀκοὰς, ears, or hearing:] and ſo we have render'd it. Valeſ.

* Or, eminently addicted to.

Conſtantius.

(n) In the Allat. M.S. and in Athanaſius, the reading here is [πᾶσι ψυχῇ ὑγιεῖ γνώμῃ with your whole ſouls & minds.] Valeſ.

(o) Inſtead of [πᾶσαν ἀνασκευὴν, all manner of confutation] the reading in the Allat. and Sfortian M.SS. is [ἀνασκευὴν πᾶσαν, all manner of diſturbance.] Valeſ.

* Athanaſius.

An Epiſtle concerning the abrogating what had been enacted againſt Athanaſius.

VICTOR CONSTANTIUS AUGUSTUS, to Neſtorius. And in the ſame Copy, to the Preſidents of (p) Auguſtamnica, Thebais, and Lybia.

(p) In the Allat. MS. it is Auguſtonica: in Athanaſius it is called Auguſtamnica. The name of this Province is uſually writtendivers ways. For ſome term it Auguſtamnica, others Augustanica: ſo I found it written in many both Greek and Latin M.SS. Others call'd it Auguſtonica, to wit, from Auguſtus's Victory. In the ſubſcriptions of the Biſhops, who approved of Acacius's draught of the Creed, (which the Reader will meet withat at the 40*th* Chapter of this ſecond Book,) whoſe names Epiphanius has recorded, (in Hereſ. Semiarian.) we read amongſt others; Πτολεμαῖος ἐπίσκοπος Δημούεως Αυσκονίκης, i. e. Ptolemeus Biſhop of Thmuis [a City] of Auguſtonica. Valeſ.

If any thing be found to have been heretofore done to the detriment and injury of thoſe who communicate with Athanaſius the Biſhop, Our Will is, that that be now wholly abrogated. For Our Pleaſure is, that thoſe of his Clergy ſhould again have the ſame immunity, which they formerly had. And We command, that this Order of Ours be kept: That ſo (Athanaſius the Biſhop having been reſtored to his Church,) they who communicate with him may have the ſame Priviledge which they always had, and which the other Clergymen now have: Whereby their Affairs being thus ſetled, they alſo may rejoyce.

CHAP. XXIV.

That Athanaſius, paſſing through Jeruſalem in his return to Alexandria, was received into Communion by Maximus, and convened a Synod of Biſhops which confirmed the Nicene Faith.

ATHANASIUS the Biſhop being fortified with theſe Letters, paſſed thorow Syria, and came into Paleſtine. And arriving at Jeruſalem, he made known to Maximus the Biſhop, both what Constantius. what had been done in the Synod of Serdica, and also that Constantius the Emperor had consented to their determination: and he makes it his business to have a Synod of Bishops convened in that City. Maximus without any delay sent for some of the Bishops in Syria and Palestine: and having constituted a Synod, he also restored to Athanasius communion, and his [former] dignity. Moreover, this Synod † wrote to the Alexandrians, and to all the Bishops in Egypt and Lybia, declaring to them what had been Determined and Decreed concerning Athanasius. Upon which Account, those who were Athanasius's Enemies egregiously derided Maximus, because he had before deposed Athanasius; but then altering his mind again, (as if nothing had been done before,) he gave his Suffrage for Athanasius, and restored to him communion and his dignity. Ursacius and Valens (who had before been hot maintainers of Arianism,) understanding these thing, having at that time rejected their former industry [in asserting that Opinion,] went to Rome. And presented a penitentiary Libel to Julius the Bishop, after which they embraced the Homoöusian Faith. And having written Letters to Athanasius, they professed they would in future hold communion with him. Ursacius therefore and Valens were at that time in such a manner vanquish'd by Athanasius's prosperous Success, that (as I said) they gave their consent to the Homoöusian Faith. But Athanasius passed thro' Pelusium in his Journey to Alexandria. And he admonished all the Cities through which he passed, to have an aversion for the Arians, and to embrace those that professed the Homoöusian Faith. He ordained also in some of the Churches. Which gave beginning to another accusation against him, * because he attempted to ordain in other [Bishops] Dioceses. Such was the posture of Athanasius's Affairs at that Time.

† This Epistle of the Jerusalem Synod is extant in Athanasius's second defence against the Arians; together with the names of those Bishops who subscribed to that Synod. But we may here by the by take notice of the Bishop of Jerusalem's Authority, who (although he was no Metropolitane yet) summoned the neighbouring Bishops to a Synod, without the Permission of the Bishop of Cæsarea. Vales.

* Socrates speaks here concerning the Ordinations performed by Athanasius in Egypt. For he says that was done after he arrived at Pelusium; which is the first City of Egypt to those that come out of Syria. If this be so, that Opinion can no ways be maintained, which some now a days assert, to wit, that all Ordinations (as well of Bishops as of Presbyters) throughout Egypt belonged to the Bishop of Alexandria: But we have sufficiently refuted this Opinion in our Third Book of Ecclesiastick Observations, published at the close of our Annotations on Socrates and Sozomen. Vales.

CHAP. XXV.

Concerning the Tyrants Magnentius and Vetranio.

BUT in the interim a disturbance in no wise trivial seized the publick affairs of the Empire. It is necessary that we should give a summary account only concerning it, by running over the chief heads thereof. When the * Builder of the City of Constantinople was dead, his three Sons succeeded him in the Empire, as we have mentioned in our First Book. (a) But you must know, that together with them reigned their

* Constantine the Great.

(a) The emendation of this place, (which is very corrupt in Robert Stephens's Edition) we owe to the Allat. M. S. where the reading is [ἰστέον δὲ ὅτι συνεβασίλευσε τούτοις ἀνεψιὸς αὐτῶν, ᾧ ὄνομα Δαλμάτιος ὁμώνυμος τῷ ἰδίῳ πατρί· i. e. But you must know, that together with them reigned their Cousin-german, whose name was Dalmatius of the same name with his own Father.] See Socrat. Book 1. chap. 27. note (g.) The Florent. and Sfortian M. S. S. alter not the Vulgar reading here. But the reading of the Allat. M.S. is evidently confirmed by Epiphanius Scholasticus's Version. Only he calls Dalmatius, Constantius's Cousin-german by the Mother's side. But Dalmatius was Constantius's Cousin german by the Father's side; for he was son to Dalmatius, Constantine the Great's Brother. Vales.

Constantius. Cousin-german, whose name was Dalmatius of the same name with his own Father. After he had been Colleague with them in the Empire some small time, the Soldiers slew him; Constantius neither (b) commanding him to be murdered, nor yet forbidding it. After what manner Constantius Junior (invading those parts of the Empire which belonged to his Brother,) was also slain in an engagement with the Soldiers, we have more than once mentioned * before. After his slaughter, the Persian War was raised against the Romans, wherein Constantius performed no Action that was fortunate. For, there hapning an † Engagement by night about the limits of the Romans and Persians, the latter seem'd then for some little time to have been Conquerors. At the same time, the posture of the Christians affairs was little less sedate: but upon Athanasius's account, and by reason of the term Homoöusios, there was a War throughout the Churches. During this state of Affairs, there arose a Tyrant in the Western Parts [of the Empire,] one Magmentius. Who by treachery slew Constans the Emperor of the Western Parts, residing at that time in the Gallia's. After which there was a mighty Civil War kindled. For the Tyrant Magnentius conquer'd all Italy, he also reduc'd Africa and Lybia under his own Dominion, and had possession even of the Gallia's. In Illyricum likewise at the City Sirmium, another Tyrant was * set up by the Soldiers; his name Vetranio. Moreover, Rome was involv'd in a disturbance. For † Constantine had a Sisters Son, by name Nepotianus, who being guarded by a Party of the Gladiators, had by violence seized upon the Empire. This Nepotianus was slain by Magnentius's Forces. But Magnentius himself invaded the rest of the Western Provinces, and made all Places desolate.

(b) Eutropius relates the same: Dalmatius Cæsar (says he,) Haud multò post oppressus est factione Militari, Constantio patruele suo finente potius quam jubente: i. e. Not long after, Dalmatius Cæsar was slain by a faction of the Soldiers, Constantius his Cosin-german by the Father's side suffering, rather than commanding, it. Vales.

* See Socrat. Book 2. Chap. 5.

† He means the fight by night between the Romans and Persians, at Singar, a fortress of Mesopotamia, wherein the Son of Sapor King of Persia was slain: but the Romans had a very great slaughter made amongst them, as Amm. Marcellinus relates, book 18. pag. 122. Edit. Paris. 1636. See our Annotations on that passage; pag. 156. This Engagement hapned in the year of Christ 348, when Philippus and Salias were Consuls; as Idatius relates, in his Fasti. Vales.

* Or crept up by the Soldiers means.

† In the Greek the reading is [Constantius had a Sister's Son, &c.] But it must be [Constantine had &c.] For Nepotianus was Son to Eutropia Constantine's Sister; as Victor tells us, in his Epitome: and, as we are inform'd by Eutropius, Epiphanius Scholasticus's reading agrees with our emendation; but he mistakes in calling Nepotianus [fratuelem Constantini. i. e. Constantine's Brothers Son,] in regard he was his Sisters Son. Vales.

CHAP. XXVI.

How, after the death of [Constans] the Western Emperor, Paulus and Athanasius were Ejected out of their own Sees again. And, that Paulus, after his being carried into banishment, was slain. But Athanasius made his escape by flight.

A Conflux of all these mischiefs hapned almost at one and the same time. For these things were done on the fourth year after the Synod

Constantius.

Synod at Serdica in the (a) Consulate of Sergius and * Nigrinianus. Upon the relation hereof, the whole Roman Empire seemed to be devolved upon Constantius only: who being proclaimed (b) Emperor in the Eastern parts, was wholly intent in making preparations against the Tyrants. In the interim, Athanasius's adversaries, supposing they had gotten a very seasonable opportunity, did again frame mosthorid false accusations against him, he having not yet entred Alexandria: they inform the Emperor Constantius, that he would subvert all Egypt and Libya. That which made the greatest addition to their calumny was that Athanasius had Ordained in other [Bishops] Dioceses, Athanasius arriving at Alexandria during this troublesome posture of affairs, assembled a Synod of Bishops in Egypt. Who by an unanimous consent made the same determinations with those convened at Serdica, and with that Synod assembled at Jerusalem by Maximus. But the Emperor, who had long before embraced the Arian opinion, wholly altered all things which he had a little before decreed. And in the first place, he gave order, that Paulus the Bishop of Constantinople should be banished, who was strangled by those that carried him into banishment, at (c) Cucusus in Cappadocia. Marcellus also being ejected, Basilius was again put into possession of the Church of Ancyra. Lucius of Adrianpole was bound in iron chains, and died in Prison. Moreover, what was reported concerning Athanasius made so prevalent an impression upon the Emperor, that he fell into an unmeasurable rage, and gave order that he should be slain whenever he could be found: and together with him, (d) Theodulus and Olympius, Prelates of Churches in Thracia. But Athanasius was not ignorant of what Orders the Emperour had given. But, having been made sensible thereof before-hand, he betook himself to flight again, and so avoided the Emperors menaces. The Arians calumniated him for this his escape, especially Narcissus Bishop of Neroniades a City of Cilicia, Georgius of Laodicæa, and (e) Leontius who then presided over the Church at Antioch. This Leontius, when he was a Presbyter, was divested of that dignity, because he lived continually with a woman whose name was Eustolium, and endeavouring to conceal the suspicion of his unclean converse with her, he cut of his own genitals; after which he was conversant with her, with a greater confidence and liberty, in regard he wanted those things upon account whereof he had fallen into that suspicion. But by the Decree and Diligence of the Emperor Constantius he was promoted to the Bishoprick of the Antiochian Church after Stephanus, who had before succeeded Flaccillus. Thus far concerning this Person.

* Or Nigrianus.

(a) The same is recorded in Idatius's Fasti; in those words: Sergio & Nigriniano Coss. his Consulibus Constans occisus est in Gallijs a Magnentio, & levatus est Magnentius die 15. Kal. Februar. Et Vetranio apud Sirmium Kal. Martii. Eo anno, & Nepotianus Romæ tertio Nonas Junias. Et pugna magna fuit cum Romanis & Magnentianis: i. e. Sergius and Nigrinianus being Consuls, Constans was slain in the Gallia's by Magnentius, and Magnentius was set up on the 15th of the Kalends of February. And Vetranio at Sirmium on the Kalends of March. On the same year, Nepotianus also at Rome on the third of the Nones of June. And there was a great battle between the Romans and Magnentians. The same is recorded in the Alexandrian Chronicle; but there, these passages are placed on the Consulate of Limenius and Catullinus, when as they hapned on the year following. Which was the year of Christ, 350. Vales.

(b) Constantius was long before Emperor of the East. But when Constans was dead, who Governed the Western Empire; he was by the Soldiers filed Emperor of the whole Roman world. Vales.

(c) In the Florent. M.S. this Towns name is written with a double s, thus Cucusſus. Vales.

(d) Olympius was Bishop of Aenum a City of Thracia: Theodulus was Bishop of Trajanople, as Athanasius attests, (in Epist. ad Solitar.) He mentions the same Bishops, in his Apologetick de Fuga sua, pag. 703. But these passages are preposterously related by Socrates. For they were not done before the Magnentian war, as Socrates says, but when that war was ended, in the year of Christ 356; as Baronius hath truly remarked. Vales.

(e) This person has a great Elogue given him in the Alexandrian Chronicle, at the Consulate of Sergius and Nigrinianus: which commedation was taken out of some Semi-Arian writer. Athanasius doth every where speak sharply concerning this Leontius. His crafty disposition is incomparably well described by Theodoret; book 2. chap. 24. Eccles. Histor. Vales.

CHAP. XXVII.

That Macedonius, having got possession of the See [of Constantinople,] did much mischief to those that in opinion dissented from him.

MOreover, at that time Macedonius was put into the possession of the Churches in Constantinople, Paulus being dispatch'd in the forementioned manner. And having procured a very great interest in the Emperor, he raised a war amongst the Christians, not inferior to that waged by the Tyrants at the same time. For, having by his perswasions induced the Emperor to countenance him with his assistance in destroying of the Churches, he procur'd whatever wicked acts he had a mind to do, to be establish'd by Law. From that time therefore an Edict was publickly proposed throughout every City. And a military force appointed to see the Emperors Decrees put in execution. Those who asserted the Homoöusian Faith were driven not only out of the Churches, but from the Cities also. At first indeed they made it their business to expel them only. But afterwards, the mischief growing worse and worse, they betook themselves to a forcing of them to communicate with them, being very little sollicitous about the Churches. And this forcible constraint was nothing inferior to that heretofore made use of by them, who necessitated the Christians to worship Idols. For they made use of all manner of scourgings, various tortures, and proscriptions of their goods. Many were punish'd with exile. Some died under their tortures, others were murdered, during their being led away to banishment. These things were done throughout all the Eastern Cities, but more especially at Constantinople. This intestine Persecution therefore, being but small before, was much increased by Macedonius, after he had gotten the Bishoprick. But the Cities of Achaia and Illyricum, and the Western parts of the Empire, continued as yet undisturbed, in regard they both mutually agreed, and also retained the Rule of Faith delivered by the Nicene Synod.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Concerning what was done at Alexandria by Georgius the Arian; from Athanasius's own Relation.

BUT what [Villanies] Georgius during the same time committed at Alexandria, you may understand from Athanasius's own relation, who was present at, and a sufferer in those [miseries.] For, in his Apologetick concerning his own flight, he speaks word for word thus, concerning what had been done there. For they came from thence to Alexandria, making search for me again, that they might murder me. And what hapned then was worse than that they had done before. For on a suddain the Soldiers surrounded Conſtantius. ſurrounded the Church, and inſtead of going to prayers, there hapned a fight. After this, Georgius (ſent by them out of Cappadocia, (arriving in Lent, increaſed thoſe miſchiefs which he had learnt from them. For after Easter-week, the Virgins were caſt into Priſon: The Biſhops, bound in chains, were led away by the Soldiers: The Houſes of Orphans and Widows were plunder'd, and the ſtock of Bread-corn [was pillaged:] they broke into Houſes. And the Chriſtians were carried out [to burial] in the night. The Houſes were ſeal'd up: And the Brethren of thoſe that were Clergy-men, were in danger upon their Brethrens Account. Theſe things were horrid: but thoſe afterwards committed were much more horrid. For the week after the Holy Pentecoſt, the People, after they had faſted, went out to the Cœmetery to pray, becauſe they all abominated Georgius's Communion. But that Villanous wretch underſtanding this, inſtigated Sebaſtianus the Captain, who was a Manichæan, againſt them. He with a company of Soldiers, carrying Armour, naked Swords, Bows, and Darts, made a violent attack upon the People on the very Lords Day. And finding ſome few at their Prayers (for moſt of them were gone away by reaſon of the time of the day;) he did ſuch exploits as became the Arians to have performed amongſt them. For having kindled a fire, he ſet the Virgins cloſe to it, forced them to ſay that they profeſſed the Arian Faith. But when he perceived they were not to be vanquiſh'd, and that they deſpiſed the fire, he afterwards ſtript them, and beat them on the face in ſuch a manner, that for a time they could ſcarce be known. And having ſeized forty men, he beat them after a new and unuſual manner. For he forthwith cut Rods from off Palm-trees, which yet had their pricks on them, and flea'd their backs after ſuch manner, that ſome of them by reaſon of the pricks that ſtuck in their fleſh, were forced to make frequent uſe of Chirurgeons: others of them, not able to endure [the pain,] died. Immediately he took all the reſt, that were left, and together with them a Virgin, and (a) baniſhed them into Oaſis the Great. Moreover, they would not at firſt ſuffer the bodies of thoſe that were dead to be given to their relations: but caſting them forth unburied, they hid them as they thought good, that they might ſeem not to know of ſo barbarous a cruelty. And this theſe madmen did, having a blindneſs upon their minds. For, in as much as the Relations of thoſe that were dead, rejoyced upon account of their confeſſion, but mourned becauſe their Bodies lay unburied; their impiety and barbarity was ſo much the more plainly detected and divulged. Soon after this, they carried away into baniſhment out of Egypt and both the Libya's theſe Biſhops, Ammonius, Thmuis, Cajus, Philo, Hermes, Plinius, Pſenoſiris, Nilammon, Agatho, Anagamphus, Ammonius, Marcus, Dracontius, Adelphius, another Ammonius, another Marcus, and Athenodorus: and theſe Presbyters, Hierax, and Dioſcorus. And they treated them ſo cruelly in their conveying them into baniſhment, that ſome of them died in the Journey, and others in the very place of their exile. They (b) drove away more then thirty Biſhops. For it was their earneſt deſire, according as Ahab did, wholly, if poſſible, to deſtroy the truth. Thus much Athanaſius hath related in his own words concerning the Villanies committed by Georgius at Alexandria. But the Emperor marcht his Army into Illyricum. For the neceſſity of the publick affairs required his preſence there; more eſpecially, becauſe Vetranio was proclaimed Emperor there by the Soldiers. Being come to Sirmium, he made a League with Vetranio, after which he diſcourſed with him, and brought Affairs to ſuch a paſs, that thoſe Soldiers, who had proclaimed Vetranio, revolted from him to Conſtantius's ſide. Having therefore deſerted Vetranio, they cryed out that only Conſtantius was Auguſtus, King and Emperor. No mention was made of Vetranio in their acclamation. Vetranio, becoming ſenſible immediately that he was betrayed, laid himſelf proſtrate at the feet of the Emperor. Conſtantius took his Imperial Crown and Purple from him, and treated him kindly, exhorting him to lead a more ſedate and quiet life in the habit of a private perſon. For [he told him] that a life void of diſquietude was much more ſutable for a man of his years, than to have a name full of care and ſollicitude. Such was the concluſion of Vetranio's Affairs. But the Emperor ordered, that he ſhould be allowed an ample revenue out of the publick tribute. Afterwards he wrote frequently to the Emperor whilſt he made his reſidence at Pruſa in Bithynia, declaring to him, that he had been the Author of the greateſt happineſs to him, in that he had freed him from cares, and the troubles that accompany a Crown: and ſaid, that he himſelf did not do well, becauſe he would not enjoy that happineſs which he had beſtow'd upon him. Thus far concerning theſe things. At the ſame time the Emperor Conſtantius, having created Gallus, his Father's Brother's Son, Cæſar, and giving him his own name, ſent him to Antioch of Syria, deſigning that he ſhould guard the Eaſtern parts. Whilſt he was making his entry into Antioch, the † Sign of our Saviour appeared in the Eaſt. For a Pillar in the form of a Croſs appearing in the heavens, ſtruck the beholders with a great amazement. The reſt of his chief Commanders he ſent againſt Magnentius, at the head of a very great Army. In the interim, he himſelf made his reſidence at Sirmium, expecting the iſſue of affairs.

Conſtantius.

† The ſame is recorded In Idatius's Faſti, after the Conſulate of Sergius and Nigrinianus, in theſe words: His Coſſ. Levatus eſt Conſtantius Cæſar Id. Martii, & apparuit in Oriente Signum Salvatoris die 3. Kal. Februar. Lunæ 28. i. e. During theſe mens conſulate, Conſtantius [Gallus] was created Cæſar on the Ides of March, and the Sign of our Saviour appeared in the Eaſt, on the third of the Kalends of February, on the 28th. of the Moon. But the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle ſays, this Sign was ſeen in the Eaſt, on the Nones of May about the day of Pentecoſt. To whom agrees Cyrillus, Philoſtorgius and Cedrenus. And Socrates ſeems to confirm the ſame in this place. For he ſaith, that this Sign appeared in the Eaſt, when Gallus Cæſar entered Antioch. Now Gallus was created Cæſar on the Ides of March as (beſides Idatius) the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle doth affirm. Valeſ.

(a) In Athanaſius the reading is [ἐξώρισαν they baniſhed.] But in the Florent. and Sfortian M.SS. the reading (which I like better) is [ἐξώρισεν he baniſhed.] To ſhew, that this is to be underſtood of Sebaſtianus the Captain of Egypt, who then adjudged Matters in a deteſtable courſe. Moreover, all theſe things are (as I have ſaid) related in a prepoſterous manner by Socrates; in regard they were done in the Year of Chriſt, 356. Valeſ.

(b) The reading is the ſame in Athanaſius. But in Theodoret (book 2. chap. 14. where this paſſage of Athanaſius's is inſerted) the reading is [They murdered.] Valeſ.

CHAP. XXIX

Concerning Photinus the Arch-Heretick.

MOreover, at that time Photinus who preſided over the Church in that * City, did more openly divulge that opinion which he had invented. Wherefore, when there aroſe a diſturbance occaſioned thereby, the Emperor order'd, that that a(a) Synod of Biſhops ſhould be convened at Sirmium. Therefore, there met together in that City, of the Eaſtern [Biſhops,] (b) Marcus of Arethuſa, (c] Georgius of Alexandria, whom the Arian party (having remov'd Gregorius, as we ſaid * before) put into his See; alſo Baſilius, (who preſided over the Church at Ancyra, Marcellus having been ejected,) Pancratius [Biſhop] of Peleucium, and (d) Hypatianus of Heraclea. Of the Weſtern Biſhops, [there met there] Valens [Biſhop] of Murſa, and Hoſius Biſhop of Corduba in Spain (a Perſon eminently famous at that time) was preſent againſt his Will. Theſe [Prelates] being convened at Sirmium, after the Conſulate of Sergius and Nigrinianus, (in which year, by reaſon of the tumults cauſed by the Wars, no Conſul publiſh'd the ſolemn (e) Shews and Plays uſually exhibited at their entrance upon their Conſulate,) and having upon examination found, that Photinus aſſerted the Opinion of Sabellius the Libyan and Paul of Samoſata; they immediately depoſed him. And this determination of theirs was by all Men, both then and afterwards, approved of as good and equitable. (f) But thoſe [Biſhops] who ſtaid behind [at Sirmium] did that which was not grateful to all Men.

(a) It is not agreed amongſt the Learn'd, in what year the Synod of Sirmium (wherein Photinus was deprived of his Biſhoprick) was held. Socrates and Sozomen affirm it to have been celebrated after the Conſulate of Sergius and Nigrinianus: in which Year, by reaſon of the diſturbances cauſed by the

* See chap. 14. of this Book.

Yivil War, there were no Conſuls in the Eaſt; but in the Weſtern parts Magnentius Auguſtus as Conſul with Gaiſo. Baronius (in his Eccleſiaſtick Annals aſſerts, that that Synod was convened in the year of Chriſt, 357. when Conſtantius Auguſtus was the Ninth time Conſul, and Julianus Cæſar the Second time. But Dionyſius Petavius (Firſt in his Animadverſions on Epiphanius, and Secondly in his diſertation de duplici Synodo Sirmienſi,) doth by moſt evident arguments demonſtrate, that the year of that Synod is truly aſſigned by Socrates, after the Conſulate of Sergius and Nigrinianus, which was the year of Chriſt 351. I know Jacobus Sirmondus hath written two books, wherein he has endeavoured to maintain Baronius's opinion againſt Dionyſius Petavius. But in regard he himſelf did not publiſh thoſe books, that is an evidence ſufficient, that at length he acknowledged his own opinion to be falſe. Valeſ.

(b) The Biſhops here named by Socrates, ſat not in that Synod of Sirmium, which was convened againſt Photinus, after the Conſulate of Sergius and Nigrinianus, in the year of Chriſt 351: but in that other Synod which was convened there when Euſebius and Hypatius were Conſuls, in the year of Chriſt 359. a little before the Council of Ariminum: which Latter Synod at Sirmium did alſo ſet forth that draught of the Creed, which was afterwards recited at Ariminum; before which the Conſuls names were perfixt. And this is evidently made out by Germinius, in his Epiſtle to Valens, which is recorded in Hilarius's Fragments; and by Epiphanius, in Hæreſ. Semiarian. In the former Sirmium-Synod, aſſembled againſt Photinus, the Eaſtern Biſhops only were preſent this is atteſted by Hilarius, in his book de Synodis, and by Vigilus Biſhop of Tapſis in his Fifth Book againſt Eutyches. Valeſ.

(c) Georgius was not at this time (viz. after the Conſulate of Sergius and Nigrinianus) Biſhop of Alexandria. For he was created Biſhop there in the eighth Conſulate of Conſtantius Auguſtus, and in the Firſt Conſulate of Julianus Cæſar, which was in the year of Chriſt 356. Wherefore, he could not ſit in the former Sirmium Synod, which depoſed Photinus in the year of Chriſt 351. The ſame muſt be ſaid of Hoſius alſo who at that time lived under Magnentius's juriſdiction: nor was he as yet baniſhed to Sirmium. Valeſ.

(d) Theodorus continued to be Biſhop of Heraclea in Thracia in the year of Chriſt 356, as it is manifeſt from Athanaſius's Cicular Epiſtle to the Biſhops of Egypt and Libya, pag. 290: which Epiſtle Athanaſius wrote in the year of Chriſt 356, after Georgius's entrance into the See of Alexandria. Wherefore, Hypatianus muſt neceſſarily have been made Biſhop of Heraclea after the year 356. Sozomen hath made mention of the ſame Hypatianus, book 6. chap. 7. Eccleſ. Hiſt. Valeſ.

(e) Socrates here means by ὑπαλείας, the Ludi Circenſes, which the Conſuls, exhibited at their entrance upon their Conſulate: which by the Latines is termed Conſulatum dare. Some Conſuls, beſides the Ludi Circenſes, entertained the people with Scenical Plays, and with hunting of wild beaſts in the Amphitheatre. Valeſ.

(f) At this place we follow the Sfortian M. S. in which Copy this paſſage is more fully expreſt, thus: Οἱδὲ ἐπιμείναντες ἔπραξαν ὅπερ ἅπασιν ἦν ἄριστον; i. e. But thoſe [Biſhops] who ſtaid behind, &c.] Incomparably well in my Judgment. Indeed, that draught of the Creed, which was publiſh'd in the Synod of Sirmium againſt Photinus, is approved of by Hilarius, (in his Book de Synodis,) as being Catholick: But Athanaſius (in his Book de Synodis Arimini & Seleuciæ) condemns and rejects it, in the ſame manner with the other Creeds compoſed by the Arians. Nor do Hilarius and Athanaſius diſagree with one another concerning this one form of the Creed, but about other draughts of it alſo; for example, about the Antiochian draught. For Hilarius confeſſeth, that the Eaſtern Biſhops had good reaſon to compoſe new forms of the Creed, when new Hereſies aroſe againſt the Church. But Athanaſius doth maintain, that thoſe new draughts of the Creed were craftily compoſed by the Arians with a deſign to deſtroy the Nicene Creed. Further, at this place of Socrates, inſtead of [ὃ πᾶσιν ἦν ἄριστον, that which was not beſt for all Men] I had rather read [ὃ πᾶσιν ἦν ἄρεστον, that which was not grateful to all Men.] And ſo I have render'd it. Valeſ.

Conſtantius.

CHAP. XXX.

Concerning the [forms of the] Creed publiſhed at Sirmium, in the preſence of the Emperor Conſtantius.

FOr, as if they would condemn what they had heretofore determined concerning the Faith, they again compoſed, ratified, and publiſhed other * draughts of the Creed: (a) one whereof was dictated in the Greek Tongue by Marcus of Arethuſa: (b) two more were drawn up in the Latin Tongue, which neither agreed one with the other (either in the expreſſions, or in the compoſure,) nor yet with that Greek one, which the Biſhop of Arethuſa dictated. Moreover, the one of thoſe Creeds drawn up in Latin, I will here ſubjoin to that compoſed by Marcus: the other (which they afterwards recited at (c) Sirmium,) we will ſet at it's proper place, where we ſhall declare what was done at Ariminum. But you muſt know that they were both tranſlated into the Greek Language. The Draught of the Creed dictated by Marcus, runs thus.

* Or, other explanations concerning the Faith.

(a) Socrates (and with him Sozomen,) is here doubly miſtaken. Firſt, becauſe he ſuppoſed, that there were three forms of the Creed drawn up in the Synod of Sirmium againſt Photinus; whereas there was one form only compoſed in that Synod; which (beſides Socrates) is recorded by Athanaſius, Pag. 900. and by Hilarius, in his Book de Synodis 338. Edit. Paris. 1631. Secondly, in regard he aſſerts, that that form of the Creed, which was publiſh'd in the Greek Tongue at the Synod of Sirmium againſt Photinus, was dictated by Marcus of Arethuſa. Marcus of Arethuſa did not dictate that Form I have mention'd. But another; before which the Conſuls Names were prefixt, and which was afterwards recited at Ariminum, as Nickolaus Faber hath already obſerved (in the Preface he wrote to Hilarius's Fragments) from Germinius's Epiſtle. We muſt therefore diſtinguiſh between the three Synods of Sirmium, each of which publiſh'd their Form of the Creed. The firſt was convened againſt Photinus, in the year of Chriſt 351. The ſecond was aſſembled in the Year of our Lord 357: wherein the Blaſphemy of Hoſius and Potamius was compoſed. The third was celebrated when Euſebius and Hypatius were Conſuls, in the Year of Chriſt 359; wherein that Creed was drawn up, which Marcus of Arethuſa dictated. Valeſ.

(b) Inſtead of [ἀλλὴν another] the reading muſt be [ἀλλὰς δὲ, the other two, or two more] as it is in the Allat. M.S, For Socrates here recounts three draughts of the Creed compoſed at Sirmium; the two latter whereof he ſaith were written at firſt in Latin, and afterwards tranſlated into Greek. Which in my judgment is not true. I grant indeed, that that Creed, which by Hilarius is termed Hoſius's Blaſphemy, was at firſt publiſhed in Latine. But the other which had the Conſuls name prefix'd before it, was undoubtedly at firſt dictated in the Greek Tongue. For he that dictated it, (viz. Marcus of Arethuſa) and the reſt of the Biſhops then aſſembled were almoſt all Grecians. Laſtly, the Subſcriptions of the Biſhops, who ſubſcrib'd this form, are extant in Greek, in Epiphanius (in Hæreſ. Semiarian.) Valeſ.

(c) Without doubt it muſt be [Ariminum.] not [Sirmium:] which reading Epiphan. Scholaſticus followed, as appears from his Verſion. See chap. 37. of this ſecond Book.

We believe in one God the Father Almighty, the Creator and Framer of all things: * Of whom the whole Family in Heaven and Earth is named: *and in his only begotten Son, our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, born of the Father before all Worlds, God of God, Light of Light, by whom all things, which are in the Heavens, and which are upon the Earth, viſible and inviſible, were made. Whose Kingdom being perpetual continueth unto infinite ages. For he shall sit on the right hand of the Father, not only in this present world, but in that also which is to come. And [We believe] in the Holy Ghost, that is the Paraclete; whom [our Lord,] (having promised he would send him to the Apostles after his ascent into the Heavens, that he might teach and put them in mind of all things,) sent. By whom also those Souls, which have sincerely believed in him, are sanctified. But those who affirm, that the Son [exists] of things * Are not. which * were not, or of another substance, and not of God; and that there was a time or an age when he was not, the Holy and Catholick Church hath certainly known to be Aliens [from her.] We say it therefore again, if any one doth affirm the Father and the Son to be two Gods, let him be Anathema. For neither did he come down to (h) Sodom without his Fathers will: nor did he rain from himself, but from the Lord, that is from the Father, who hath the supream authority. Nor does he sit at his Fathers right hand of himself, but he hears the Father, saying, * Sit thou at my right hand, let him be Anathema. If any one shall affirm, that the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are one person, let him be Anathema. If any terming the Holy Ghost the Paraclete, shall call him the unbegotten God, let him be Anathema. If any one does say that the Paraclete is no other [person] than the Son, (as the Son himself hath taught us; for he has said, † the Father, whom I will ask, shall send you another Comforter,) let him be Anathema. If any one shall say, that the Spirit is part of the Father and of the Son, let him be Anathema. If any one shall affirm, that the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost are three Gods, let him be Anathema. If any one shall say, that the Son of God was made like one of the Creatures, by the will of God, let him be Anathema. If any one shall affirm, that the Son was begotten against the will of the Father, let him be Anathema. (i) For the Father was not forced by a physical necessity, nor did he beget the Son as if he were unwilling: but as soon as he was willing, he has declared that he begat him of himself without time and without passion, let him be Anathema. If any one shall say, that the Son is unborn and without a beginning, affirming as it were that there are two [Principles] without a beginning and unborn, and so making two Gods, let him be Anathema. For the Son is the Head and Beginning of all things. * But the Head of Christ is God. For thus we piously refer all things by the Son to One who is without a beginning,

Constantius.

(d) Hilarius seems to have read otherwise. For in his Book de Synodis, where he records this Creed, he renders this passage thus: & si quis, &c. and if any one affirming one God, but shall not profess Christ to be God the Son of God before ages, &c. Valesius.

(e) In the Allat. MS. and in Athanasius's Book de Synodis, this Anathema is thus worded: εἴ τις τὸν μονογενῆ υἱὸν τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐσταυρωμένον ἀκέαν, τὴν θεότητα αὐτοῦ φθορὰν ἢ πάθος, &c. and we have rendred it accordingly: After the same manner Hilarius read this passage, as from his Version appears. Valesius.

† Gen. 1. 26.

(f) This whole Anathematism was omitted here: it occurs in Anathasius's and Hilarius's Copy of this Creed; and therefore we inserted it. Valesius. The Learned Reader will find it in Robert Stephens's Edition also.

(g) This Anathematism is differently worded in all the Authors (we have seen) wherein this Creed occurs. Valesius says, that he has published it according to the reading of the Florent. and Sfortian M.SS. which Copies we have followed in our English Version: where it is thus worded in the Greek: εἴτις οὐκ λέγων κύριον τὸν πατέρα, καὶ τὸν υἱὸν κύριον; καὶ κύριον τὸν πατέρα καὶ τὸν υἱὸν εἶπεν, καὶ κύριος ἐκ κυρίου λέγων δύο λέγει θεούς, ἀνάθεμα ἔστω. The reading in Robert Stephens is different from this; and so is that in Athanasius, pag. 901: where 'tis thus worded: εἴτις οὐκ λέγων κύριον τὸν πατέρα, καὶ τὸν υἱὸν κύριον, καὶ κύριον, τὸν πατέρα καὶ τὸν υἱὸν· ἐπεὶ κύριος ἐκ κυρίου, δύο λέγει θεούς, &c. Hilarius has translated otherwise, as appears from his Version, at pag. 339. Edit. Paris. 1631. His words are these: Si quis dominum & dominum patrem & filium quasi dominum à domino intelligat: quia dominum & dominum duos dicat deos: Anathema sit. Thus variously is this Anathematism represented. The Learned Reader may take the liberty (as we have done,) to follow which Copy he pleases.

(h) We follow the reading in Hilarius, and in Athanasius; where it is [ἐπὶ σόδομα to Sodom.] In Robert Stephens the reading is [οὔτε γὰρ κατῆλθεν εἰς σῶμα, For neither did he descend into the body.] † See John 14. 16.

(i) Here we follow the reading in Athanasius, which is thus: ἐπεὶ βιασθεὶς ὁ πατὴρ, &c. For the Father was not forced, &c. which reading is confirmed by Epiphanius Scholasticus, and by Hilarius. Valesius.

ning, the beginning of all things. Furthermore, we, making an accurate explanation of [their] ſentiments [who profeſt] the Chriſtian Religion, do aſſert, that if any one ſhall not affirm Chriſt Jeſus to have been the Son of God before ages, and to have miniſtred to the Father at the framing of all things, but [ſhall ſay] that he was called the Son and Chriſt from ſuch time only as he was born of Mary, and that he then received the beginning of his Deity; let him be Anathema, like [Paul] of Samoſata.

(k) Athanaſius has the ſame Words in his Book de Synodis Arimini & Seleuciæ: where, after he had inſerted this foregoing Creed, he adds theſe Words concerning this which follows;

(k) Another [Draught of the] Creed publiſhed at Sirmium in the Latin tongue, and rendred into Greek.

In regard there ſeemeth to have been ſome difference concerning the Faith, all things were diligently inquired into and diſcuſs'd at Sirmium, in the preſence of Valens, Urſacius, Germinius (l) and the reſt. It is manifeſt that there is one God the Father Almighty, according as it is declared over the whole world: and his one only begotten Son Jeſus Chriſt our Lord (m) and God and Saviour, begotten of his Father before ages. But it muſt not be aſſerted that there are two Gods, becauſe the Lord himſelf hath ſaid, * I go unto my Father, and your Father, and to my God, and your God. Therefore he is God even of ταῦτα πάντα παρωσάμενοι, &c. Having rejected all theſe things, as if they had invented better, they promulge another Creed, which they wrote at Sirmium in Latin, but it was tranſlated into Greek. But Hilarius recording this Creed in his Book de Synodis, prefixes this title before it: Exemplum Blaſphemiæ, &c. A Copy of the Blaſphemy compoſed at Sirmium by Hoſius and Potamius. Which title Hilarius made himſelf, and deſervedly calls this Creed Blaſphemy. Who this Potamius, here joyned with Hoſius was, Marcellinus Presbyter informs us in the Supplicatory Libel which he preſented to the Emperor Theodoſius. Where, amongſt the corrupters of the Divine and Apoſtolick Faith, after Arius, he in the firſt place names this perſon: His Words are theſe: Potamius Odyſſiponæ civitatis Epiſcopus, &c. i. e. Potamius Biſhop of Lisbon was at firſt a Defender of the Catholick Faith, but afterwards induced by the reward of a Farm belonging to the Emperor's Revenue (which he was very deſirous of,) he corrupted the Faith. Hoſius of Corduba amongſt the Churches in Spain detected this Man, and repelled him as being an impious Heretick. But, even Hoſius himſelf, ſummoned before the Emperor Conſtantius by the complaint of this Potamius, and terrified with threats, was fearful (being old and rich) of baniſhment, or proſcription, and ſo yielded to the impiety. Valeſ

(l) Theſe three words [καὶ τῶν λοιπῶν, and the reſt] occur not in the Latin Copy of this Draught of the Creed. But they are extant in Athanaſius, and in all our M. SS. Copies. Hence 'tis manifeſt that many Biſhops were at that time convened at Sirmium. Indeed Phœbadius Biſhop of Angoleſm [in France,] in the Epiſtle he wrote againſt this Draught of the Creed, does expreſly affirm that it was publiſhed in a Synod of Biſhops. The ſame is ſufficiently confirmed by Athanaſius, in the forequoted place. Laſtly, in regard Hilarius (in his foreſaid Book) does atteſt, that this Creed, after it had been dictated at Sirmium, was forthwith ſent to all the Eaſtern and Weſtern Biſhops to be approved by them; he evidently ſhews it to have been dictated in a Synod. Nor can the Draught of a Creed be any where dictated but in a Synod of Biſhops. Further, that Germinius here mentioned, was Biſhop of Sirmium, put into Photinus's See upon his being ejected, in the year of Chriſt 351. Nicolaus Faber (in his Preface to Hilarius's Fragments,) ſays that this Germinius had before been Biſhop of Cyzicum: which I do not believe. That place in Athanaſius (in his Epiſt. ad Solitar. pag. 860; where he reproves the Emperor Conſtantius, becauſe, contrary to the Eccleſiaſtick Canons, he would ſend obſcure fellows, born in remote Countries, to be Biſhops in the Cities;) deceived that Learned Man: Athanaſius's words there are theſe: ἔτω γεηγόειον ἀπὸ καππαδοκίας ἔπεμψεν εἰς ἀλεξανδρείαν, &c. So he ſent Gregorius from Cappadocia to Alexandria. And Germinius was by him ſent from the City Cyzicum to Sirmium. From Laodicea he ſent Cecropius to Nicomedia. From theſe Words of Athanaſius it cannot be concluded, that Germinius had been Biſhop of Cyzicum before. Otherwiſe the ſame muſt be ſaid concerning Gregorius and Cecropius, that the latter had been before Biſhop of Laodicea, and the former in Cappadocia, which, in regard 'tis evidently falſe in theſe two, cannot be ſaid of Germinius. This Germinius was preferred to the Epiſcopate of Sirmium by the Arians, becauſe he was a moſt eager defender of their opinion. This we are informed of by Athanaſius, in his circular Letter to the Biſhops of Egypt and Libya, pag. 290. Valeſ.

(m) In the Allat. and Sfortian M. SS. and in Epiphanius's Verſion theſe words [καὶ θεὸν, and God] occur; in Athanaſius and Hilarius they are wanting. Valeſ.

all, as the Apoſtle alſo hath taught, † Is he the God of the Jews only? Is he not alſo of the Gentiles? Yes, of the Gentiles alſo: Seeing it is one God who ſhall juſtifie the Circumciſion by Faith. Moreover, all other things agree, nor have they any ambiguity. But whereas very many are diſturbed about that term which in Latin is called * Subſtantia, and in Greek Ouſia; (that is, that it may be more accurately underſtood, the word † Homoöuſion or * Homoiöuſion,) theſe terms ought in no wiſe to be mentioned, nor diſcourſed of publickly in the Church, for this reaſon, and upon this account, becauſe there is nothing recorded concerning them in the Divine Scriptures, and in regard theſe things are above the reach of human knowledge and mind of man; nor can any one declare the Son's generation, according as it is written, || And who ſhall declare his generation? For 'tis manifeſt that only the Father knows how he begat the Son; and again, that the Son [only knows] how he was begotten of the Father. It cannot be doubtful to any man that the Father is greater in honour, dignity, and divinity; and that he is greater in that very name of a Father: the Son himſelf atteſting, † The Father who ſent me is greater than I. No man is ignorant that this is Catholick [Doctrine,] that there are two perſons of the Father and of the Son, and that the Father is the greater: but that the Son is made ſubject, together with all other things which the Father hath ſubjected to himſelf. And that no man knows his generation, (as was ſaid before,) but only the Father. That the Son himſelf our Lord and God, took fleſh, or a body, that is [was made] man, acccording as the Angel evangelized. And according as all the Scriptures do teach, and eſpecially the Apoſtle himſelf, the Teacher of the Gentiles, Chriſt received Humanity of the Virgin Mary, by which he ſuffered. This is the principal Head of the whole Faith, and its Confirmation, that the Trinity muſt be always preſerved according as we read in the Goſpel: † Go ye and diſciple all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt. The number of the Trinity is entire and perfect. But the Paraclete, the Holy Ghoſt, was ſent by the Son, and he came according to promiſe, that he might ſanctifie and (n) teach the Apoſtles and all Believers.

They attempted to perſwade Photinus to give his *conſent to, and ſubſcribe theſe things, even after his depoſition, promiſing that they would reſtore him his Biſhoprick, in caſe by altering his mind he would anathematize the opinion which he had invented, and conſent to their ſentiments. But he accepted not of that propoſition, but challeng'd them to diſpute. A day therefore being ſet, by the Emperor's own appointment, the Biſhops there preſent met, and alſo not a few of the (o) Senatorian Order, whom the Emperor commanded to be preſent at the diſpute.

† See John 14. 28.

* See Chap. 29. note (b.)

(o) Epiphanius (in Hæreſ. Photinian.) relates, that Photinus, after he had been condemned and depoſed in the Synod of Sirmium, (for ſo the reading muſt be, not, in the Synod of Serdica,) went to Conſtantius, and requeſted that he might diſpute concerning the Faith before Judges by him nominated: and that Conſtantius enjoyned Baſilius Biſhop of Ancyra to undertake the diſputation againſt Photinus, and gave leave, that Thalaſſius, Datianus, Cerealis, and Taurus, who were Counts, ſhould be Judges or Auditors of that diſputation. Amongſt theſe Thalaſſius was the chief perſon in favour and authority with the Emperor (as Zoſimus tells us in his ſecond Book.) And was ſent Præfect of the Prætorium into the Eaſt together with Gallus Cæſar, in the year of Chriſt 351. He died in the year of our Lord 353. in the ſixth Conſulate of Conſtantius Auguſtus, and in the ſecond of Gallus Cæſar; as Amm. Marcellinus relates Book 14. Therefore the Synod of Sirmium, and the diſputation tation of Basilius against Photinus cannot fall on the year of Christ 357, as Baronius asserts, Besides, Epiphanius says further, that in Basilius's disputation against Photinus, Callicrates was a Notary, who had before been Notary to Rufinus Præfect of the Prætorium. Now, Rufinus was Præfect of the Prætorium in the Gallia's, in the sixth Consulate of Constantius Augustus, and in the second of Gallus Cæsar, as Amm. Marcellinus tells us Book 14. But, two years before he had been Præfect of Illyricum. Now, in the year of Christ 357, Anatolius, not Rufinus, bore the Præfecture of the Prætorium in Illyricum. Further, it may be evidently concluded from Germinius's being made Bishop, that the Synod of Sirmium against Photinus (wherein Photinus was ejected out of his Bishoprick,) was not held in the year of Christ 357. For, Germinius was Bishop of Sirmium, before Georgius intruded himself into the See of Alexandria upon Athanasius's Ejectment, as Athanasius relates in the Circular Letter he wrote to the Bishops of Egypt and Libya, at such time as Georgius was in possession of the Alexandrian See. Moreover, Georgius entred upon the See of Alexandria in the beginning of the year 356, as it is evident from the protestation of the Alexandrians, which is extant at the close of Athanasius's Epistle ad Solitar. Seeing therefore Germinius was Bishop of Sirmium before the year of our Lord 356, Photinus also (whom Germinius succeeded) must necessarily have been deposed before this year. Athanasius (in Epist. ad Solitar. pag. 860, where he recounts the Ordinations of extraneous Persons made by Constantius;) does in the first place mention Gregorius's Ordination; then, Germinius's and Cecropius's; afterwards Auxentius's; and at last Georgius's. Amongst these Persons, Gregorius was made Bishop of Alexandria in the year of Christ 341. Germinius succeeded Photinus in the Episcopate of Sirmium in the year 351: After he had been sent for by Constantius then residing at Sirmium, as Athanasius relates in the fore-quoted place; which the Latin Translator has rendred ill. On the same year Cecropius was made Bishop of Nicomedia, as it may be concluded from the foresaid passage in Athanasius. Lastly, Auxentius was preferred to the Bishoprick of Millain in the year of our Lord 355: and on the year following Georgius thrust himself into the See of Alexandria. Vales.

Constantius.

In their presence, Basilius, who at that time presided over the Church at Ancyra, opposed Photinus, the Notaries taking their words in writing. There was a very great contest on both sides during their dispute; wherein Photinus being vanquish'd, was condemned. Spending the residue of his life in exile, he wrote a (p) Book in † both Languages, for he was not unskill'd in the Latin tongue. He wrote also against all Heresies, asserting his own Opinion only. Let thus much be said concerning Photinus. Moreover, you must know, that the Bishops convened at Sirmium were afterwards (q) displeas'd with that Draught of the Creed publish'd by them in Latin. For it seem'd to them, after its publication, to contain many contradictions. Wherefore they earnestly endeavour'd to get it out of their hands who had transcribed it. But, in regard many hid it, the Emperor by his Edicts order'd, that all the Copies of it should be diligently searched for and gather'd up, threatning to punish those that should be found concealing of it. But his menaces were unable to suppress it when once published, in regard it had fallen into many mens hands. Thus far concerning this.

(p) In the Allat. M. S. it is [λόγους συνέγραψεν, he wrote Books] which reading is confirm'd by Epiphanius Scholasticus's Version. Vales.

† That is, in Greek, and Latin.

(q) Socrates borrow'd this passage out of Athanasius's Book de Synodis Arimin. & Seleucia. But herein he mistakes; viz. what Athanasius has said concerning the third form of the Creed drawn up at Sirmium, (before which the Consuls names were prefixt,) Socrates attributes to the second, composed by Hosius and Potamius. The place in Athanasius is extant at pag. 904. But in regard of its length we forbear quoting the words here. Petavius (in his Animadversions on Epiphanius, pag. 318.) has followed this mistake of Socrates's. Vales.

CHAP. XXXI.

Concerning Hosius Bishop of Corduba.

BUT, in regard we have mention'd Hosius the Spaniard, as being against his will present [at Sirmium,] we must say something very briefly concerning him. For a little before, this person had been sent into (a) Banishment by the fraudulent practices of the Arians. But then, through the earnest desire of those convened at Sirmium, the Emperor sent for him, being desirous either to perswade, or else by force to compel him to give consent with those [Bishops] present there. For if this could be accomplish'd, an evident testimony would seem to be given to their Faith. For this reason therefore, he was present (as I said) being necessitated thereto against his will. But when he refused to give his consent, they inflicted stripes and tortures upon the old man. Upon which account he was necessitated both to consent to, and subscribe those Expositions of the Faith then publish'd. Such was the conclusion of affairs at that time transacted at Sirmium. Moreover, the Emperor Constantius continued at Sirmium, expecting the event of the War against Magnentius, of Christ 357, as Baronius has truly observed.

(a) I noted before, that Hosius's banishment to Sirmium, and the form of the Creed drawn up by him, are here preposterously related by Socrates. For Hosius's lapse hapned in the year Vales.

CHAP. XXXII.

Concerning the Overthrow of Magnentius the Tyrant.

IN the interim, Magnentius having possessed himself of the Imperial City Rome, slew many of the Senatorian Order, and destroy'd several of the Populace. But as soon as Constantius's Commanders, having got together a body of Romans, marched out against him, he left Rome, and went into the Gallia's. Where there hapned continual engagements; and sometimes one side, sometimes the other got the better. But in fine, Magnentius having been worsted about Mursa, which is a Fort of the Gallia's, was besieged there. In which Fort such a miraculous accident as this is said to have hapned. Magnentius attempting to encourage his Soldiers disheartned at their overthrow, ascended a lofty tribunal. His men, desirous to receive him with the shouts and acclamations usually given to the Emperors, contrary to their intent diverted them to Constantius. For by a general consent they all cried out, not Magnentius, but Constantius Augustus. Magnentius looking upon this to be an * Omen of his imminent ruin, departed immediately out of the Garrison, and fled to the further parts of the Gallia's. Constantius's Commanders follow'd him with very close pursuit. Whereupon there hapned another engagement at a place called (a) The Mountain Seleucus: wherein Magnentius being totally routed, fled alone to Lyons a City of Gallia, three days journey distant from the Fort at Mursa. Magnentius having got into Lyons, in the first place killed his own mother. Then he slew his brother, whom he had created Cæsar; and at last laid violent hands upon himself. This was done in the sixth Consulate of Constantius, and in Constantius Gallus's second Consulate, (b) about the fifteenth of the month August. Not long after, another of Magnentius's brothers, his name Decentius, finished his own life, by hang-

(a) In the Allat. M. S. this place is called [μονλοσέλευκ, Montoselecus.] Epiphanius Scholasticus terms it The Mountain Seleucus. We have the site of this place in the Jerusalem Itinerary. Vales.

(b) It is something otherwise in Idatius's Fasti: thus; in the sixth Consulate of Constantius the second of Constantius Gallus, Magnentius killed himself in the Gallia's at Lyons, on the third of the Ides of August; and Decentius, brother to Magnentius, hanged himself on the fifteenth of the Kalends of September. In the Alexandr. Chronicle, the year of Magnentius's death is falsely set down; but the day is noted to have been on the fourteenth of the Ides of August. Vales.

But the publick Affairs of the Empire return'd not to a perfect degree of tranquility: For ſoon after this another Tyrant aroſe, by name Silvanus. But Conſtantius's Commanders quickly deſtroy'd him, whiſt he was making diſturbances in the Gallia's.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Concerning the Jews inhabiting Dio-Cæſarea in Paleſtine.

AT the ſame time alſo that theſe things hapned, there aroſe another inteſtine War in the Eaſt. For the Jews who inhabited Dio-Cæſarea in Paleſtine, took arms againſt the Romans, and over-ran and deſtroy'd the adjacent places. But Gallus (who was alſo named Conſtantius, whom the Emperor, having created him Cæſar, had ſent into the Eaſt) ſent an Army againſt them, and routed them. And by his order their City Dio-Cæſarea was totally deſtroy'd.

CHAP. XXXIV.

Concerning Gallus Cæſar.

Gallus having done this, was unable [with moderation] to bear his proſperous ſucceſs: but immediately attempted to raiſe innovations againſt him by whom he had been created Cæſar, and he himſelf was alſo reſolv'd to play the Tyrant. But, whereas his deſign was ſoon diſcover'd by Conſtantius: (For Gallus had upon his own authority order'd Domitianus, at that time Præfect of the Prætorium in the Eaſt, and Magnus the Quæſtor to be ſlain, becauſe they had (a) acquainted the Emperor with his deſign.) Conſtantius highly incenſed thereat, ſent for Gallus to him. He, being in a very great fear, went unwillingly. When he arrived in the Weſtern parts, and was come as far as the Iſland Flanona, Conſtantius order'd he ſhould be ſlain. Not long after, he created Julianus, Gallus's Brother, Cæſar, and ſent him againſt the Barbarians in Gallia. Moreover, Gallus (called alſo Conſtantius) was ſlain in the ſeventh Conſulate of the Emperor Conſtantius, when he himſelf was Conſul the third time. On the year following, in the Conſulate of Arbetion and Lollianus, Julianus was created Cæſar, on the ſixth of the month November. Concerning Julianus we ſhall make a further mention in our following Book. But Conſtantius having got rid of his preſent miſchiefs and diſquietudes, bent his mind again to an Eccleſiaſtick War. For going from Sirmium to the Imperial City Rome, he again ſummon'd a Synod of Biſhops, and ordered ſome of the Eaſtern Biſhops to haſten into (b) Italy; and at the ſame time commanded the Weſtern Biſhops to meet there alſo. But in the interim that they were making preparation to go into Italy, this accident hapned: (c) Julius Biſhop of Rome died, having preſided over the Church there fifteen years: Liberius ſucceeded him in his Biſhoprick.

Conſtantius.

(c) Julius Biſhop of Rome died on the twelfth of April, when Conſtantius Auguſtus was Conſul the fifth time, and Conſtantius Cæſar the firſt time; which was the year of Chriſt 352: after he had ſat Biſhop fifteen years, one month, and eleven days; as it is recorded in the Antient Book concerning the Roman Biſhops, which is publiſhed together with Victorius Aquitanus's Cycle. Valeſ.

(a) I corrected this place by the aſſiſtance of the Allat. M. S. of Sozomen, and Cedrenus. In the Allat. M. S. the reading is [ἀνεῖλε μηνύσαντας βασιλεῖ τὸν σκοπὸν αὐτῶ. He ſlew them becauſe they had acquainted the Emperor with his deſign.] Sozomen's words Book 4. Chap. 7.) are almoſt the ſame. But Epiphanius, our M. SS. Copies, and the Alexandrian Chronicle retain the Vulgar reading, to wit, μὴ μηνύσας τῷ βασιλεῖ, He (that is) Gallus) having not acquainted the Emperor with his deſign of ſlaying Domitianus, &c. Valeſ.

(b) Inſtead of [ὅπι τὴν Γαλλίαν, into Gallia] the reading in the Allat. M. S. is truer; which is [ὅπι τὴν Ἰταλίαν into Italy:] which reading we have followed in our Verſion. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXXV.

Concerning Aëtius the Syrian, Eunomius's Maſter.

AT Antioch in Syria there aroſe another Arch-Heretick, Aëtius, ſirnamed Atheus. He had the ſame Sentiments with Arius, and maintained the ſame Opinion: but he ſeparated himſelf from the Arian Party, becauſe they had admitted Arius into communion. For Arius (as I ſaid * before) eſpouſing one Opinion in his mind, made an open profeſſion of another with his mouth, when he hypocritically conſented to and ſubſcribed the Form of the Creed [drawn up] at the Synod of Nice, that he might deceive the then Emperor. Upon this account therefore Aëtius ſeparated himſelf from the Arians. Moreover, Aëtius had formerly been an heretical perſon, and a very zealous defender of Arius's Opinion. For after he had been a little inſtructed at Alexandria, he returned from thence: And arriving at Antioch in Syria (for there he was born) he was ordained Deacon by Leontius, at that time Biſhop of Antioch. Immediately therefore he aſtoniſh'd thoſe that diſcourſed him with the novelty of his Speeches. And this he did, truſting in Ariſtotle's Categories; (that Book is ſo entitled by its Author,) from the Rules whereof he diſcourſed, but was inſenſible of his framing fallacious arguments in order to deceiving of his own ſelf, nor had he learned the ſcope of Ariſtotle from knowing perſons. For Ariſtotle, upon account of the Sophiſters who at that time derided Philoſophy, wrote that Exercitation for Young men, and oppoſed the Sophiſters with the art of diſcourſe by ſubtil reaſonings. Wherefore the (a) Ephecticks who expound Plato's and Plotinus's works, do find fault with what Ariſtotle has ſubtilly and artificially aſſerted [in that work.] But Aëtius, having never had an Academick Maſter, ſtuck cloſe to the Sophiſms of the Categories. Upon which account he could neither underſtand how there could be a Generation (b) without a beginning, nor how he that was begotten could be coeternal with him who begat him. Yea, Aëtius was a man of ſo little learning, ſo unſkilled in the ſacred Scriptures, and ſo wholly exerciſed in and addicted to a contentious and diſputative humour, (which every Ruſtick may eaſily do;) that he was not in (a) Who theſe Ephecticks were, we may know from Diogenes Laërtius: Τῶν δὲ φιλοσόφων, διιμὴ γένασι, δογματικοί εἰσὶ καὶ ἐφεκτικοί, &c. Philoſophers (ſays he) were generally divided into two ſorts; ſome were termed Dogmatici, who diſcourſed concerning things as they might be comprehended: others were called Ephecticí, who define nothing, and diſpute of things ſo as they cannot be comprehended. See Diogen Laërt. in *Proëm. de Vit. in the least studious in the perusal of those ancient Writers who have explained the Sacred Books of the Christian Religion, but wholly rejected Clemens, Africanus, and Origen, persons expert in all manner of knowledge and literature. But he patch'd together Epistles, both to the Emperor Constantius, and to some other persons, knitting together therein trifling and contentious disputes, and inventing subtil and fallacious arguments. Upon which account he was surnamed * Atheus. But altho' his assertions were the same with those of the Arians; yet because they were unable to understand his difficult and perplexed † Syllogisms, he who had the same Sentiments with them, was by those of his own party judg'd to be an Heretick. And for this reason he was driven from their Church; but he himself pretended that he would not communicate with them. There are at this present some Hereticks propagated from him, [to wit,] those who were heretofore called Aëtians, but now they are termed Eunomians. For Eunomius (who had been Aëtius's Notary,) having been instructed in that (c) Heretical Opinion by him, afterwards headed that Sect. But we shall speak concerning Eunomius in due place.

Concerning the Synod at Millain.

AT that time the Bishops met in Italy; there came not very many of the Eastern Bishops, in regard most of them were hindred from coming, either by their great age, or by the length of the journey: but of the Western Bishops there met above (a) three hundred. For it was the Emperor's order, that a Synod should be held at the City of Millain. Where being met together, the Eastern Bishops requested that in the first place sentence might by a general consent be pronounced against Athanasius: that so, that having been effected, he might in future be perfectly disabled from returning to Alexandria. But when (b) Paulinus Bishop of Triers in Gallia, and Dionysius, and Eusebius, (the former of whom was Bishop of (c) Alba the Metropolis of Italy, and the latter of Vercellæ which is a City of Liguria in Italy,) were sensible, that the Eastern Bishops, by a ratification of the sentence against Athanasius, attempted the subversion of the Faith, they arose, and with great earnestness cry'd out, that deceit and fraud was covertly design'd against the Christian Religion by what was transacted: for they said, that the accusation against Athanasius was not true, but that these things were invented by them in order to the depravation of the Faith. After they had with loud voices spoken all this, the Congress of Bishops was for that time dissolv'd.

(a) We meet with the same number in Sozomen, Book 4. Chap. 9. But 'tis scarce credible that so great a number of Bishops should have been convened at this Council of Millain: I should rather think that the copies of Socrates and Sozomen were false; and that instead of [τριακοσίοις three hundred] it should be [τριάκοντα thirty.] In the Epistle of the Council of Millain sent to Eusebius Bishop of Vercellæ, there are the names of thirty Bishops only, who consented to the condemnation of Athanasius, Marcellus, and Photinus. Amongst whom some Eastern Bishops are recounted, as you may see in Baronius, at the year of Christ 355. Vales.

(b) Paulinus Bishop of Triers was not present at the Council of Millain, but at that of Orleance, which had been convened two years before, in the year of Christ 353. See Baronius. Vales.

(c) The reading is the same in Sozomen, Book 4. Chap. 9. But Baronius has long since remarked, that Alba is here put instead of Millain. For Millain (not Alba) was the Metropolis of Italy. And Dionysius, who then opposed Constantius and the Arians, was not Bishop of Alba, but of Millain, as Athanasius attests in his Epistle ad Solitar. Vales.

Concerning the Synod at Ariminum, and concerning the [Draught of the] Creed which was published there.

WHen the Emperor understood this, he removed * them out of the way by banishment. And resolved to convene a General Council, that so, by drawing all the Eastern Bishops into the West, he might (if it were possible) reduce them all to an agreement in opinion. But in regard the tediousness of the Journey rendred this design of his difficult, he order'd the Synod should be divided into two parts, permitting those then present to meet at Ariminum [a City] of Italy. But by his Letters he gave the Eastern Bishops order to assemble at Nicomedia [a City] of Bithynia. (a) The Emperor issued out these orders with a design to unite them in opinion. But, this design of his had not a successful event. For neither of the Synods agreed among themselves, but each of them was divided into contrary factions. For neither could they convened at Ariminum be brought to agree in one and the same opinion: and those Eastern Bishops gather'd together at Seleucia of Isauria raised another Schism. Moreover, after what manner all these matters were transacted we will declare in the procedure of our History, having first made mention of some few passages concerning Eudoxius. For about that time (b) Leontius (who had ordain'd Aëtius the Heretick Deacon) departing this life, Eudoxius Bishop of Germanicia, a City of Syria, being then present at Rome, consider'd with himself that he was to make haste. And having framed a cunning discourse with the Emperor, as if the City Germanicia stood in need of his consolation and defence, he requested that leave might be granted him to make a sudden return. The Emperor foreseeing nothing [of a design,] sent him away. But he, having procured the chiefest Persons of the Bedchamber to the Emperor to be his assistants, left his own City [Germanicia,] and * clancularly possest himself of the Episcopate of Antioch: immediately after which he attempted to favour Aëtius, and made it his business to assemble a Synod of Bishops, and (c) restore him to his dignity, [to wit,] his † Diaconate. But he was in no wise able to effect this, because the hatred conceived against Aëtius was more prevalent than Eudoxius's earnestness for him. Thus much concerning these things. But when the Bishops were assembled at Ariminum,

* That is, Paulinus, Dionysius, and Eusebius.

(c) Leontius Bishop of Antioch, had at first preferr'd Aëtius to a Diaconate: but being afterwards reproved by Diodorus and Flavianus, because he had advanced a person to Sacred Orders who had been bred up in ill studies, and was an assertor of impious Tenets; he divested him of his Deaconship, as Theodoret relates (Eccles. Hist. Book 2. Chap. 24.) Eudoxius therefore, as soon as he had gotten the Bishoprick of Antioch, attempted to restore Aëtius to his former preferment. Vales.

Conſtantius. the Eaſtern Prelates affirmed that they were come to the Council with a deſign wholly to omit the mention of the accuſations againſt Athanaſius. This deſire and reſolution of theirs was aſſiſted by Urſacius and Valens, who at the beginning had been defenders of Arius's Opinion: but [afterwards] they publickly conſented to the term Homoöuſi s, by their Libel given in to the Biſhop of Rome, as we ſaid * before. For theſe perſons always inclined to the ſtrongeſt ſide. They were aſſiſted by Germinius, Auxentius, Demophilus, and Caius. When therefore ſome were ready to propoſe one thing in the Congreſs of Biſhops then preſent, and ſome another; Urſacius and Valens ſaid, that all Forms of the Creed heretofore publiſh'd were to be accounted null and void; and that that laſt draught was to be admitted and approved of, which they had a little before publiſhed in their Convention at Sirmium. Having ſaid this, they cauſed a paper, which they had in their hands, to be read; [wherein was contained] another Form of the Creed (which they had drawn up before at Sirmium, but concealed it there, as I ſaid * before) which they then made publick at Ariminum. This (d) Creed was tranſlated out of Latin [into Greek;] the Contents thereof are theſe.

Further, theſe words [ἢ τὶς ἐκ ῥωμαϊκῆ μὲν ἡρμηνεύθη, ὅτι δὲ ἐν τέλοις τοῖς ῥήμασι, i.e. This Creed was tranſlated out of Latin [into Greek,] the contents thereof are theſe] are wanting in Robert Stephens's Edition; nor are they in Epiphanius Scholaſticus's Verſion. This Catholick Creed was publiſhed in the preſence of our Lord Conſtantius, in the Conſulate of the moſt Eminent Flavius Euſebius and Hypatius, at Sirmium, on the eleventh of the Kalends of June.

We believe in One Only and True God, the Father Almighty, Creator and Framer of all things. And in One Only begotten Son of God, who was begotten of God, without paſſion, before all Ages, and before every Beginning, and before all time conceivable in the mind, and before every comprehenſible (e) Notion: by whom the Ages were framed, and all things were made. Who was begotten the only Begotten of the Father, the Only of the Only, God of God, like to the Father who begat him, according to the Scriptures. Whoſe Generation no perſon knoweth, but only the Father who begat him. We know that this Only Begotten Son of God, by his Father's appointment, came down from Heaven in order to the aboliſhing of Sin: And was born of the Virgin Mary, and converſed with the Diſciples, and fulfilled every Diſpenſation according to his Father's Will: and was crucified, and died, and deſcended into the Infernal parts, and ſet in order what was to be done there: At the ſight of whom the Doorkeepers of Hell trembled. He aroſe again on the third day, and converſed with his Diſciples: and after the completion of forty days, he aſcended into the Heavens, and ſits at the Right Hand of his Father. And he ſhall come in the laſt day in his Father's Glory, and render to every man according to his works. And [we believe] in the Holy Ghoſt, whom the Only Begotten Son of God Jeſus Chriſt himſelf promiſed to ſend as a Comforter to Mankind, according as it is written: I go away to my Father, and I will pray my Father, and he ſhall ſend you another Comforter, the Spirit of truth. He ſhall receive of mine, and ſhall teach you, and bring all things to your remembrance. But for the term * Ouſia, in regard it has been uſed by the Fathers in a more plain and ordinary ſenſe, and, being not underſtood by the people, gives an offence to many, in as much as it is not contained in the Scriptures, we thought good to have it wholly removed, and in future to make no mention at all of this term Ouſia, when God is ſpoken of, in regard the ſacred Scriptures have no where mentioned the Subſtance of the Father and of the Son. But (f) we do aſſert, that the Son is in all things like the Father, as the ſacred Scriptures do affirm and teach.

(f) The latter part of this Sirmian

(e) In Athanaſius's Book de Synodis pag. 875. the reading is [περὶ πάσης κατανοήσεως ἁγίας, before every comprehenſible ſubſtance.] Valeſ.

Creed is ſet down by Germinius in his Epiſtle to Rufianus, Palladius, and others, in theſe words: Nam ſub bonæ memoriæ Conſtantio Imperatore, &c. For under the Emperor Conſtantius of good memory, when there began to be a diſſention amongſt ſome concerning the Faith; in the preſence of the ſaid Empeor, there being alſo preſent Georgius Biſhop of the Alexandrian Church, Pancratius of Peluſum, Baſilius at that time Biſhop of Anquiritum, Valens, Urſacius, and our ſlenderneſs; after a diſpute had concerning the Faith until night, when it was reduced to a certain Rule, Marcus was choſen by us all to dictate it: In which Creed it is thus written, The Son is in all things like the Father, as the divine Scriptures do affirm and teach. To which entire Profeſſion of Faith we all gave our conſent, and ſubſcribed it with our hands. The ſubſcriptions are extant in Epiphanius (in Hæreſ. Semiarian. Chap. 22.) which ought to be annexed to this draught of the Creed. The ſame form of the Sirmian Creed is mentioned in the Expoſition of the Faith at Seleucia, which Epiphanius hath recorded in the foreſaid Hereſie, Chap. 25. in theſe Words: ὅτι δὲ ταύτῃ τῇ πίστει ἰσοδυναμεῖ καὶ ἡ ἐν σιρμίῳ πρώην ἐκτεθεῖσα πίστις, &c. i. e. Moreover, that that Draught of the Creed heretofore publiſhed at Sirmium in the preſence of the piety of our Emperor [Conſtantius] does exactly agree with this form of the Creed, is very well known by them who have read that Creed; which was ſubſcribed by them that were then preſent, to wit, Baſilius, Marcus, Georgius Biſhop of Alexandria, Pancratius, Hypatianus, and moſt of the Weſtern Biſhops. Valeſ.

After the reading of this Paper, thoſe who were diſpleaſed with the contents thereof, roſe up and ſaid; We came not hither becauſe we wanted a Creed: For we keep that entire, which we have received from our Anceſtors. But [we are met,] that if any innovation hath hapned concerning it, we might repreſs it. If therefore what hath been recited doth contain nothing of novelty in it, do you now openly Anathematize the Arian Hereſie, in ſuch ſort as the ancient Rule of the Church hath rejected other Hereſies, as being blaſphemous. For it has been made manifeſt to the whole World, that Arius's impious opinion hath been the occaſion of thoſe tumults and diſturbances, which have hapned in the Church until this preſent time. This propoſal, being not admitted of by Urſacius, Valens, Germinius, Auxentius, Demophilus, and Caius, wholly rent in ſunder the Church. For theſe perſons adhered to what had been recited in the Synod of Ariminum. But the others did again confirm the Nicene Creed. Moreover, they derided the inſcription prefixt before the Creed which had been read. And eſpecially (g) Athanaſius, in the Epiſtle he ſent to his acqaintance, where he writes word for word thus.

(g) The paſſage in Athanaſius here quoted by Socrates, occurs at the beginning of his Epiſtle de Synodis Arimini & Seleuciæ. Valeſ.

For what was wanting to the Doctrine of the Catholick Church as concerning Piety, that Diſquiſitions ſhould now be made about the the Faith, and that they ſhould prefix the Conſulate of the preſent times before that Draught of the Creed (forſooth!) which they have publiſhed? For Urſacius, Valens, and Germinius, have done that which never was done, or ſo much as ever heard of amongſt Chriſtians. For having compoſed ſuch a form form of the Creed as they were willing to admit of, they prefix'd before it the Consulate, the Month, and the Day of the present Year, in order to their making it manifest to all prudent persons, that their Faith had not its beginning before, but now under the Reign of Constantius. For, they have written (b) all things with a respect had to their own Heresie. Besides, pretending to write concerning the Lord, they name another to be their Lord, [to wit,] Constantius. For he it was, who influenced and authorized their Impiety. And they who deny the Son to be eternal, have stiled him (i) Eternal Emperor: Such bitter Enemies are they against Christ, by reason of their Impiety! But perhaps, the Holy Prophets specifying of the time [wherein they propheſied,] gave them an occasion of assigning the Consulate. Now, should they be so audacious as to assert this, they would most egregiously betray their own ignorance. For the Propheſies of those holy persons do indeed contain a mention of the times. Isaiah and Hosea lived * in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah. Jeremiah, † in the days of Josiah. Ezekiel and Daniel [flourished] under Cyrus and Darius. And others propheſied in other times: But they did not then lay the Foundations of Religion: for that was in being before their times, and always was, even before the Foundation of the World, God having prepared it for us by Christ. Nor did they thereby manifest the times of their own Faith. For even before those times they themselves were Believers. But the times [which they mention] were the times of the Promise [which God made] by them. Now, the chief and principal Head of the Promise was concerning our Saviour's Advent. And by way of * Appendix those things were added which should in future happen to Israel and to the Gentiles. These were the times manifested [by them, whereby was declared] not the beginning of Faith, as we said before, but the times wherein those Prophets themselves lived and foretold these things. But these † Wise Men in our days (whenas they neither compose Histories, nor predict future things, but) having written [those words,] The Catholick Faith was published, immediately add the Consulate, the Month, and the Day. And, as those holy persons wrote the History of Affairs [in their age, and noted] the times of their own ministration; so these men do manifest the time of their own Faith. And would to God they had written concerning their own Faith only; (for now they first began to believe:) and had not attempted [to write] concerning the Catholick [Faith!] For they have not written, Thus we believe: But after this manner, The Catholick Faith was published. The audaciousneſs therefore of this design does reprehend their Impiety: But the novelty of the * Expression by them invented is altogether like the Arian Heresie. For by their writing after this manner they have informed [all persons,] when they themselves began first to believe; and from what instant they are desirous their Faith should be preached. And according to that saying of Luke the Evangelist, * A Decree [of Enrolment] was published; (which [Edict] was not before, but it began from those times, and was published by him that wrote it:) So these persons by writing thus, The Faith is now published, have demonstrated, that the Tenets of their Heresie are novitious, and were not in former times. But, in as much as they add the term Catholick, they are insensible of their falling into the (k) impious Opinion of the † Cataphrygæ: and as they did, so do these assert, [saying,] The Faith of the Christians was first reveal'd to us, and took its beginning from us. And, as they stiled Maximilla and Montanus, so these term Constantius their Lord and Master, instead of Christ. But if, according to them, the Faith took its beginning from this Consulate, what will the Fathers, and the blessed Martyrs do? Moreover, what will they themselves do with such persons as were catechized and instructed by them, and died before this Consulate? How will they raise them to life again, that they may root out of their minds what they seemed to have taught them, and implant in them those [Sentiments,] which, as they write, are newly invented by them? To such a degree of ignorance are they arrived, being only well skilled in framing Pretexts, and they such as are undecent and improbable, and which may be presently confuted.

Constantius.

* See Luk. 2. 1.

Thus wrote Athanasius to those of his acquaintance. Such as are lovers of learning (after they have found out this letter) may understand the powerful expressions therein contained. For we, having an aversion for prolixity, have inserted but part thereof here. Further, you are to take notice, that the Synod deposed Valens, Ursacius, Auxentius, Germinius, Caius, and Demophilus, because they would not anathematize the Arian Opinion. Wherefore they highly resenting their Deposition, hastned forthwith to the Emperor, carrying along with them that Draught of the Creed which had been read in the Synod. And the Synod acquainted the Emperor with their determinations, by their letter: the purport whereof, being translated out of Latin into Greek, is this.

The Letter of the Ariminum Synod to the Emperor Constantius.

(l) By God's Will, and the Command of your Piety, we believe order has been taken, that we Western

(l) This Letter of the Ariminum Synod is extant in Latin, in Hilarius, amongst the Fragments of his Book de Synodis, pag. 451. Edit. Paris, 1631. out of whom we have transcribed it, and placed it here instead of a Version. It ought not to seem strange to any Person, to see so great a disagreement between the Greek Version and the original Latin Copy of this Epistle. For this is an usual thing with Greek Translators, as often as they render Latin into Greek; which may be easily perceived from the Emperor's Rescripts, which occur in Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History. But, we need not fetch examples hereof from any other place, than from this Letter: in which do occur almost as many mistakes in the Greek translation of it, as there are periods in the Letter. But, the beginning of this Letter is commonly thus worded in Hilarius: Lubente Deo ex præcepto pietatis Tuæ credimus fuisse dispositum, &c. By Gods pleasure we believe it hath been ordered by the Command of your Piety, &c. But in the M.S. Copy made use of by Jacobus Sirmondus, the reading is thus: Jubente Deo, &c. By God's will, &c. So the Greek Translator reads it: whom we have followed in this place. Any one may with good reason conjecture, that [Jubente Deo, By God's will] is written instead of [Juvante Deo, By God's assistance.] Vales.

(i) For this is the title prefixt before the exposition of Faith at Sirmium [Ἐξετέθη ἡ πίστις· ἡ καθολικὴ ὧδε παρουσίᾳ τοῦ δεσπότου μοῦ τοῦ εὐσεβεστάτου καὶ καλλινίκου Σεβαστοῦ, &c. This Catholick Creed was expounded and published in the presence of our Lord the most Pious and Victorious Emperor Constantius Augustus, Eternal Augustus, &c.] as it is extant in Athanasius, at the forequoted place. Which Words I therefore annext here, because our Socrates, in his recitation of that Draught of the Creed, has omitted these titles. Indeed Constantius did so readily give credence to such Flatteries as these, that speaking of himself in his Edicts and Letters, he would sometimes assert his own eternity. This is attested by Amm. Marcellinus, not far from the beginning of his fifteenth Book, in these Words: Quo ille (speaking of Constantius) studio blanditiarum exquisito sublatus immunemq; se deinde fore ab omni mortalitatis incommodo fidenter existimans, confestim à justitia declinavit ita intemperanter, ut ÆTERNITATEM MEAM aliquoties subsereret ipse dictando, &c. Vales.

(b) We read [πάντα, all things] as it is in Athanasius: See the forequoted passage. Vales.

(k) In Athanasius the reading is [εἰς τὴν παραφροσύνην, into the madness:] which is the better reading: for he means the Montanists, to whom madness is deservedly attributed. The term here, in Socrates, is [παραφροσύνην, impious opinion.] Vales.

Conſtantius. Biſhops ſhould come out of divers Provinces to the * City of Ariminum: That the Faith of the Catholick Church might be made apparent to all men, and that Hereticks might be notified. For whilſt all of us (who entertain ſuch ſentiments as are true) could review and conſider matters, our determination was to hold the Faith which hath continued from [all] antiquity, which we have received by (the Prophets, Goſpels, and Apoſtles, by God himſelf and our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, the Preſerver of your Empire and Donor of your † Safety. For we accounted it a thing deteſtable to maim any of thoſe matters which have been rightly and juſtly determined; and [to take away any thing] from thoſe perſons, who were Aſſeſſors in the Nicene * Treaty, together with Conſtantine of glorious memory, the Father of your Piety. Which Treaty hath been manifeſted and inſinuated into the minds of the people, and is found to have been then oppoſed to the Arian Hereſie, in ſuch manner that not only that, but other Hereſies alſo have thereby been vanquiſhed. From which Treaty ſhould any thing be taken away, a paſſage would be opened to the Poiſon of Hereticks. (m) Therefore Urſacius and Valens ſome time lay under a ſuſpicion of [being adherents to] the ſame Arian Hereſie, and they were ſuſpended from communion. They alſo begged pardon, as the Contents of their Libel do manifeſt. Which they procured at that time from the (n) Council of Millain, the Embaſſadors of the Church of Rome alſo aſſiſting. Conſtantine being preſent in this [Conſult,] in regard after a ſearching Diſquiſition, that [Creed] had been drawn up, (which he believing, and being baptized, departed to God's reſt,) we look upon it as a thing deteſtable, to make any † Mutilations therein, or in any thing to ſet aſide ſo many Saints, Confeſſors, and Succeſſors of the Martyrs, who were Compoſers of that Treaty; in regard they have kept all things [aſſerted by] the paſt Writers of the Catholick Church. And it hath continued to theſe very times, wherein your Piety hath received the power of ruling the World from God the Father by God and our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. But [theſe] wretched Men, endued with an unhappy * Senſe, have again by a temerarious attempt proclaimed themſelves the ſetters forth of impious Doctrine: and even now they endeavour to ſhake what had been founded in reaſon. For when the Letters of Your Piety ordered that the Faith ſhould be treated of, there was propoſed to us by the forenamed Diſturbers of the Churches (Germinius, Auxentius, and Caius having joyned themſelves to them,) a new [Creed] to be conſidered of, which contained much perverſe Doctrine. But when the Creed they propoſed publickly in the Council ſeemed to diſpleaſe, their ſentiments were that it was to be drawn up otherwiſe. And it is manifeſt, that they (p) have in a ſhort time often (p) altered theſe things. But leſt the Churches ſhould be frequently diſturbed, we have determined that the ancient Sanctions ought to be kept ratified and inviolable; and that the foremention'd Perſons ſhould be removed from our Communion. In order therefore to the informing of Your Clemency, we have directed our Legates, who by our Letter will declare the Opinion of the Council. To whom we have given this Particular only in charge, that they ſhould diſpatch their Embaſſie no otherwiſe, than that the ancient Sanctions may continue firm and inviolable: As alſo that your Wiſdom might know, that Peace cannot be accompliſhed by this which the forenamed Valens, Urſacius, Germinius, and Caius have promiſed, if any thing had been * altered. For how can peace be kept by thoſe who ſubvert peace? For all Regions, and eſpecially the Roman Church hath been involved in greater diſturbances. Upon which account we beſeech your Clemency, that you would hear and look upon all our Legates with favourable Ears, and a ſerene Countenance: (q) and that your Clemency would not permit any thing to be reverſed to the injury of the Ancients, but that all things may continue which we have received from our Anceſtors, who (we are confident) were prudent Perſons, and acted not without the Holy Spirit of God. Becauſe, not only the believing Populace are diſquieted by that novelty, but alſo Infidels are prohibited from making their approaches to a (r) credulity. We alſo intreat, that You would give order, that as many Biſhops as are detained at Ariminum (amongſt which there are many that are enfeebled with age and poverty,) may return to their Province; leſt the Populace of the Churches ſuffer damage by being deſtitute of their Biſhops. But we do with more earneſtneſs petition for this, that no innovation may be made, nothing may be diminiſhed; but thoſe things may remain uncorrupted which have continued in the times of the Father of your holy Piety, and in your own religious days. And, that your Holy Prudence would not ſuffer us to be wearied out, and raviſht from our Sees: but that the Biſhops with their Laity, free from diſquietude, may always attend the [putting up their] Petitions, which they * make for your Health, for your Empire, and for Peace, which may the Divinity grant You to be profound and perpetual, according to your deſerts. Our Embaſſadors will bring both the Subſcriptions and alſo the Names of the Biſhops or Legates; as they will inform your (ſ) Holy and Religious Prudence by another writing.

Thus wrote the Synod, and ſent it by the Biſhops. But Urſacius and Valens having prevented their arrival, did before-hand calumniate the Synod, ſhewing [the Emperor] the Draught of the Creed, which they had brought along with them. The Emperor, whoſe mind had been long ſince wholly addicted to the Arian opinion, was highly incenſed againſt the Synod: but had a great eſteem and honour for Valens and Urſacius. Wherefore the perſons ſent by the Synod ſtaid a long while, being unable to get an

(t) This Letter of Conſtantius's, together with the anſwer of the Biſhops at Ariminum is extant in Athanaſius's Book de Synodis, near the cloſe of it. Valeſ.

(t) CONSTANTIUS VICTOR and TRIUMPHATOR AUGUSTUS, to all the Biſhops convened at Ariminum.

That our chiefeſt care is always employ'd about the Divine and Venerable Law, even your Goodneſs is not ignorant. Notwithſtanding, We could not hitherto ſee the twenty Biſhops ſent from your Prudence, who undertook the diſpatch of the Embaſſie from you. For we are wholly intent upon an Expedition againſt the Barbarians. And, as you know, 'tis fit that a mind exerciſed about the Divine Law, ſhould be vacated from all care and ſollicitude. Wherefore We have order'd the Biſhops to expect Our return to Adrianople, that, after the publick affairs ſhould be put into a good and ſettled poſture, we may at length hear and deliberate upon what they ſhall propoſe. In the interim, let it not ſeem troubleſome to your Gravity to wait for their return, in regard, when they ſhall come back and bring you our anſwer, you will be enabled to bring to a concluſion ſuch things as appertain to the utility of the Catholick Church. When the Biſhops had received this Letter, they return'd an anſwer after this manner.

*We have received Your Clemencies Letter, (Lord Emperor moſt dear to God!) wherein is contained, that by reaſon of the preſſing neceſſity of publick buſineſs, You could not hitherto ſee our Embaſſadors. And You order us to expect their return, till ſuch time as Your Piety ſhall underſtand from them what hath been determined by us agreeable to [the Tradition of] our Anceſtors. But we do by this Letter profeſs and affirm, that we do in no wiſe recede from our reſolution. And this we have given in charge to our Embaſſadors. We deſire therefore, that with a ſerene countenance You would order this preſent Letter of our Meanneſs to be read; and alſo graciouſly admit of thoſe things which we have given in charge to our Embaſſadors. Undoubtedly Your Mildneſs, as well as we, doth perceive, how great the grief and ſadneſs at preſent is [every where,] in regard ſo many Churches are deſtitute of their Biſhops in theſe moſt bleſſed times of Yours. And therefore we again beſeech Your Clemency, (Lord Emperor moſt dear to God!) that before the ſharpneſs of Winter (if it may pleaſe Your Piety,) You would command us to return to our Churches, in order to our being enabled to * put up our uſual Prayers together with the People, to Almighty God, and to our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt, his only begotten Son, in behalf of Your Empire, in ſuch manner as we have always done, and now moſt earneſtly deſire to do.*

* Or, perform.

After they had written this Letter, and continued together ſome ſmall time; in regard the Emperor would not vouchſafe them an anſwer, they departed every one to his own City. But the Emperor had long before had a deſign of diſſeminating the Arian Opinion throughout the Churches: Which he then earneſtly endeavouring to effect, made their departure a pretext of contumely, ſaying, that he was deſpiſed by them, in regard they had diſſolved [the Council] contrary to his will. Wherefore, he gave Urſacius's party free liberty of doing what they pleaſed againſt the Churches. He alſo commanded, that the Draught of the Creed which had been read at Ariminum, ſhould be ſent to the Churches throughout Italy, giving order that ſuch as would not ſubſcribe it, ſhould be put out of the Churches, and others ſubſtituted in their places. And in the firſt place (u) Liberius Biſhop of Rome, having refuſed to give his conſent to that Creed, is baniſh'd, the * Urſacians having ſubſtituted Felix in his place. This Felix being a Deacon in the Church of Rome, (x) embraced the Arian Opinion, and was prefer'd to that Biſhoprick. But there are ſome who affirm, that he was not addicted to the Arian Opinion, but was by force neceſſitated to be ordain'd Biſhop. At that time therefore all places in the Weſt were filled with innovations and diſturbances, ſome being ejected and baniſh'd, and others put into their places. And theſe things were tranſacted by force, and the authority of the Imperial Edicts, which were alſo ſent into the Eaſtern parts. Indeed, not long after Liberius was recalled from baniſhment, and recover'd his own See; the people of Rome having raiſed a ſedition, and ejected Felix out of the Church: At which time the Emperor gave them his conſent thereto againſt his will. But the Urſacians left Italy, went into the Eaſtern parts, and arriv'd at a City of Thracia, the name whereof was Nice. Wherein after they had continued ſome ſmall time, they made up (y) another Synod there. And having tranſlated that Form of the Creed, read at Ariminum, into the Greek tongue, (as it has been before related,) they publiſh'd and confirm'd it, giving out that that Creed, which was made publick by them at Nice, had been dictated by an Oecumenical Synod; their deſign being to impoſe upon the ſimpler ſort of people by the likeneſs of the [Cities] name. For ſuch perſons were ready to think that it was the Creed publiſh'd at Nicæa a City of Bithynia. But this cheat was not at all advantagious to them: for it was ſoon detected; and they themſelves continued to be expoſed to the reproach and laughter of all men. Let thus much be ſaid concerning what was tranfacted in the Weſtern parts. We muſt now paſs to the relation of what was done at the ſame time in the Eaſt: And our Narrative muſt begin from hence.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

Concerning the Cruelty of Macedonius, and the Tumults by him raiſed.

THE Biſhops of the Arian party aſſumed a greater degree of boldneſs from the Imperial Edicts. And upon what account they attempted to convene a Synod, we will relate a little afterwards. But we will firſt briefly recite thoſe things done by them before the Synod, Acacius and Patrophilus having ejected Maximus Biſhop

Conſtantius. Biſhop of Jeruſalem, placed Cyrillus in his See. Macedonius ſubverted the Provinces and Cities (a) lying near to Conſtantinople, preferring thoſe that were embarqu'd in the ſame wicked deſign with him againſt the Churches. He ordained Eleuſius Biſhop of Cyzicum; and Marathonius Biſhop of Nicomedia, who had before been a Deacon, placed under Macedonius: he was alſo very diligent in founding Monaſteries of men and women. But after what manner Macedonius ſubverted the Provinces and Cities which lay round Conſtantinople, we are now to declare. This perſon therefore, having poſſeſt himſelf of the Biſhoprick in ſuch a manner as is * before related, did innumerable miſchiefs to thoſe who would not entertain the ſame ſentiments with him. Nor did he perſecute thoſe only who were diſcerned [to be Members] of the Church, but the Novatians alſo, knowing that they alſo embraced the Homoöuſian Faith. Theſe therefore were together with the others diſquieted, undergoing moſt deplorable ſufferings. † Their Biſhop, by name Agelius, made his eſcape by flight: But many of them, eminent for their piety, were taken and tortured, becauſe they wou'd not communicate with him. And after their tortures they forcibly conſtrained the men to partake of the Holy * Myſteries. For they wreſted their mouths open with a piece of wood, and thruſt the Sacrament into them. Such perſons as underwent this uſage, look'd upon it to be a puniſhment far exceeding all other tortures. Moreover, they ſnatch'd up the women and children, and forc'd them to be initiated [by Baptiſm.] And if any one refuſed, or otherwiſe ſpoke againſt this ſtripes immediately follow'd, and after ſtripes bonds, impriſonments, and other acute tortures. One or two [inſtances] whereof I will mention, that I may render the hearers ſenſible of the apparent barbarity and cruelty of Macedonius and thoſe perſons who were then in power. They ſqueez'd the breaſts of thoſe women who refuſed to be communicants with them in the Sacrament, between [the doors of] † Preſſes, and cut them off with a Saw. They burnt the ſame members of other women, partly with iron, and partly with eggs exceedingly heated in the fire. This new ſort of torture, which even the Heathens never uſed towards us, was invented by thoſe who profeſt themſelves Chriſtians. Theſe things I heard from the long-liv'd Auxano, of whom I have made mention in the firſt Book. He was a Presbyter in the Church of the Novatians. And he reported that he himſelf endured not a few miſeries [inflicted upon him] by the Arians, before he received the dignity of a Presbyter. For he ſaid that he was caſt into priſon together with Alexander Paphlagon, (who with him led a Monaſtick life,) and ſuſtain'd innumerable ſtripes. Which tortures [as he related] he was enabled to indure: but Alexander died in priſon by reaſon of his ſtripes. His Sepulchre is now [to be ſeen,] on the right hand as you ſail into the Byzantine Bay, which is named (b) Ceras, near the Rivers: where there is a Church of the Novatians, which bears Alexander's name. Moreover, the Arians, by Macedonius's order, demoliſh'd many other Churches in divers Cities; as alſo a Church of the Novatians, ſituate in Conſtantinople near Pelargus. Why I have made particular mention of this Church, I will here declare as I heard it from the very aged (c) Auxano. The Emperor's Edict and Macedonius's violence gave order for the demoliſhing of their Churches who embraced the Homoöuſian opinion. This Edict and Violence * threatned this Church alſo with ruin, and they were at hand, to whom the execution hereof was committed. I can't chooſe but admire, when I reflect upon the great zeal and earneſtneſs of the Novatians towards their Church, and the kindneſs which they had for thoſe perſons, who at that time were ejected out of the Church by the Arians, but do now peaceably and quietly enjoy their Churches! When therefore they, to whom the execution hereof was enjoyn'd, were urgent to demoliſh this Church alſo, a great multitude of people that were Novatians, and others who embraced the ſame ſentiments with them, flockt together thither. And when they had pull'd down their Church, they conveyed it to another place. This place is ſituate over-againſt the City [Conſtantinople;] the name of it is Sycæ, and 'tis the thirteenth Ward of the City. Moreover, the removal of the Church was perform'd in a very ſhort time, it being carried away by a numerous multitude of people with an incredible alacrity of mind: for one carried Tiles; another Stones; a third Timber. Some took up one thing, ſome another, and carried it to Sycæ. Yea, the very women and little children aſſiſted in this buſineſs, looking upon it as an accompliſhment of their deſires, and eſteeming it as a great gain, that they were vouchſafed to be pure and faithful preſervers of the things conſecrated to God. In this manner therefore was the Church of the Novatians at that time remov'd to Sycæ. But afterwards, when Conſtantius was dead, the Emperor Julian ordered the place to be reſtored to them, and permitted them to rebuild their Church. At which time

(a) This place is in an eſpecial manner to be taken notice of. For from it we conclude, that the Biſhop of Conſtantinople had even then a right of ordaining throughout Helleſpont and Bithynia, before the Council of Conſtantinople [was held.] The ſame is confirmed from the Acts of Eudoxius Biſhop of Conſtantinople, who made Eutomius Biſhop of Cyzicum. Indeed, the Biſhops of Byzantium had a very great addition of authority and power, from the time that the Emperor Conſtantine gave that City his own name, and ordered it ſhould be equal to the Senior Rome. Alſo, Euſebius of Nicomedia, after his tranſlation to that See, brought no ſmall increaſe [of juriſdiction] to it. For he was the moſt potent Prelate of his own times. Further, the Reader is to take notice, that the reading ſhould be [τὰς γειτνιαζούσας τῇ Κωνσταντινουπόλει, lying near to Conſtantinople;] ſo Epiphanius Scholaſticus reads it. Unleſs we ſhould ſay, that the words are tranſpoſed here, (as it frequently happens in theſe Books,) and that the place is thus to be conſtrued [Μακεδόνιος δὲ ἐν Κωνσταντινουπόλει τὰς γειτνιαζούσας ἐπαρχίας, &c. Macedonius in Conſtantinople ſubverted the neighbouring Provinces, &c. (b) Polybius ſays the ſame, in the fourth Book of his Hiſtory, and Strabo, in his ſixth Book, to wit, that Ceras is a Bay near Byzantium, ſo termed from its likeneſs to an Harts-horn. But Pliny calls a promontory by this name, ſcituated in that Bay. To whom agrees Amm. Marcellinus, Book 22. pag. 212. Edit. Paris. 1636. which place (becauſe the common reading of it is very corrupt, and is not yet mended in our Edition,) ſhall be here ſet down by me, as it ought to be read; thus: Et promontorium Ceras, prælucentem navibus vehens conſtructam celſius turrim: quapropter Ceratas appellatur ventus inde ſuetus oriri prægelidus: i. e. and the promontory Ceras, on which ſtands a Tower built very high, which gives light to the Ships: Wherefore, that extream cold Wind, which uſually ariſes from thence, is termed Ceratas. Thus I have corrected this place, having followed the footſteps of the written reading: for the common reading, (which is this, Et promontorium Ceras prælucentem navibus vehens conſtructam celſius turrim, quapropter pharos appellatur: Et vetus inde fons Euripus prægelidus.) The Author whereof was Petrus Caſtellus, is without any ſenſe. It was the uſage of the ancients to name the Winds from thoſe places whence they blew. Thus, the Athenians called the North-Weſt Wind Scironites, becauſe it blew from the promontory Sciron, as Strabo relates. After the ſame manner therefore, that Wind was by the Conſtantinopolitans called Ceratas, which blew from the promontory Ceras. Valeſ.

(c) In the Allat. M. S. and in Epiphanius Scholaſticus, this old Man is called Auxonius. But at the beginning of this Chapter, and in Socrates's firſt Book, he is named Auxano. time the people, in the same manner as before, carried the materials back again, and built the Church in its former place: and having made it more beautiful and stately, they would have it call'd * Anastasia, a name apposite and significative. This Church therefore was afterwards erected again, as I said, in the Reign of Julian. But then both parties, as well the Catholicks as the Novatians, were after the same manner persecuted. Wherefore the Catholicks abhor'd to (d) pray in those Oratories, wherein the Arians assembled themselves. But, in the other three Churches (for so many Oratories the Novatians had within the City [Constantinople]) the Catholicks assembled with them, and pray'd together. And there wanted but little of their being entirely united, had not the Novatians, who observ'd their old injunction, refused to do that. But as to other matters, they preserv'd such a singular benevolence and kindness mutually, that * Or, they were ready to die for one another. Therefore both parties were at the same time persecuted, not only in the City Constantinople, but in other Provinces and Cities also. For in Cyzicum, Eleusius the Bishop there did the same things against the Christians that were acted by Macedonius, putting them to flight, and disquieting them every where. He also totally demolish'd the Church of the Novatians at Cyzicum. But Macedonius finish'd the enormous Villanies he had perpetrated, after this manner. Being inform'd that in the Province of Paphlagonia, and especially at Mantinium, there were very many persons of the Novatian Sect, and perceiving that so great a multitude could not be driven [from their habitations] by Ecclesiastick persons, he procured four *Companies of Soldiers to be by the Emperor's order sent into Paphlagonia, that being terrified by those armed men, they might be induced to embrace the Arian Opinion. But they who inhabited Mantinium, out of a zeal to [defend] their Sect, made use of desperation against the Soldiers. And many of them getting together in one body, and providing themselves with long Hooks and Hatchets, and whatever weapon they could lay hands on, they march'd out to meet the Soldiers. An Engagement therefore hapning, many of the Paphlagonians were therein slain: but all the Soldiers (except a very few) were cut off. This I heard from a Countryman of Paphlagonia, who said he was present at that action. But many other Paphlagonians do affirm the same. Of this sort were Macedonius's brave exploits in defence of Christianity, [to wit,] Murthers, Fights, Captivities, and intestine Wars. But these practices of Macedonius's raised a deserved † Odium against him, not only amongst those he had injured, but amongst them also who were his adherents. Yea, the Emperor himself was offended at him, both upon this account, and also for another reason, which was this. The Church, wherein lay the Coffin that contain'd the body of the Emperor Constantine, was threatened with ruin. (e) Wherefore for this reason, as well they who had entred that Church, as those that continued in it and pray'd, were in a great fear. Macedonius therefore resolv'd to remove the Emperor's bones, that the Coffin might not be (f) spoiled by the ruin [of the Church.] The people understanding this, attempted to hinder it, saying, that the Emperor's Bones ought not to be removed; in regard that would be the same, as if they were dug up again. Immediately the people were divided into two parties: the one affirmed, that no hurt could be done to the dead body by its being removed: the other side asserted it to be an impious thing. Those of the Homoöusian Opinion met together also, and opposed the doing hereof. But Macedonius, disregarding those that resisted him, removes the body of the Emperor into that Church, wherein lies Acacius the Martyr's body. This being done, the multitude, divided into two parties, ran forthwith to that Church: and when the two Factions were drawn up against each other, immediately an engagement followed; wherein so great a number of men were slain, that that Church-yard was full of blood; (g) and the Well therein overflowed with blood, which ran even into the adjacent Portico, and from thence into the very Street. The Emperor, inform'd of this calamitous accident, was incensed against Macedonius, both upon account of those that were slain, and also because he had been so audacious as to remove his Father's body without his consent. Having therefore left Julianus the Cæsar to take care of the Western parts of the Empire, he himself went into the East. But, how Macedonius was soon after deposed, and underwent a punishment short of his enormous impieties, I will relate a little afterwards.

Constantius.

(d) Instead of [ἔυχεσθαι] the reading must undoubtedly be [εὐχεσθαι, to pray;] which I wonder Christophorson did not perceive. Further, what Socrates relates here, to wit, that the Catholicks prayed in the Churches of the Novatians, seems to me incredible. Our Socrates was, in my judgment imposed upon by old Auxano, who fixed that upon all the Catholicks, which was perhaps done by some few Christians, who were less cautious. For there is nothing more contrary to Ecclesiastick Discipline, than to communicate with Hereticks, either in the Sacraments, or in Prayer. But in my opinion they are mistaken, who from this relation do conclude Socrates to have been a Novatian: yea, it is evidently manifest from this place, that he was a Catholick. For in this Chapter he frequently terms the Catholicks, τὰς τῆς ἐκκλησίας, those of the Church; and opposes them to the Novatians. Therefore he lookt upon the Novatians to be without the Church. Vales.

S. this place is enlarged but by one word only, thus [ἦσαν ἓν διὰ τοῦτο ὅτε προεδρεύοντες, &c. Wherefore for this reason they who presided over, &c.] But this Chasm is made up by the Allatian M. S. to which agrees Epiphan. Scholasticus's Version. But his rendring [προεδρεύοντες, Custodes, Keepers] I like not, I should rather translate the term thus, those that made their abode for some time in the Church, upon account of praying there. Vales.

(g) I made good this place from the incomparable Allat. M. S. CHAP. XXXIX.

Concerning the Synod at Seleucia [a City] of Isauria.

BUT at present, I must give an account of the other Synod, which by the Emperor's Edict was to emulate that at Ariminum in the East. At first it was determined, that the Bishops should be convened at Nicomedia in Bithynia. But, a great earthquake, whereby the City Nicomedia hapned to be ruin'd, hindred their being convened at that place. This hapned in the Con-

Conſulate of (a) Dacianus and Cerealis, about the eight and twentieth day of the month Auguſt. They reſolved therefore upon removing the Synod to the City Nicæa which was near to it. But this reſolution was again altered: and it ſeemed [more convenient] to meet at Tarſus a City of Cilicia. When this diſpleaſed them alſo, they were aſſembled at Seleucia [a City] of Iſauria, which is ſirnamed Aſpera. This they did on the (b) ſame year [wherebn the Ariminum Council was held,] in the Conſulate of Eu-

(a) This perſons name ſhould not be Tatianus, but Dacianus. For ſo he is called in the Faſti Conſulares, and in Ammianus Marcellinus. This Man was one of Libanius's chiefeſt Friends: to whom Libanius wrote very many of his Epiſtles, which are extant in the fourth Book of his Epiſtles. In the 71 Epiſtle of that Book he mentions his Conſulate, and ſays he was Scholar to one of the Emperors, and Maſter to the other: His words are theſe: τὸ δὲ σὸν λαμπρόν τε καὶ κρεῖττον ἢ σβεσθῆναι, &c. i. e. But your actions are illuſtrious, and better than that they ſhould be extinguiſh'd. For your Conſulate, and the honours beſtowed upon you by the Emperors, and your having been one of the Emperor's Scholars, and the others Maſter: Moreover, the ſtatelineſs of your Houſes, and the numerouſneſs, largeneſs, and handſomeneſs of your Bathes: All theſe things will for ever retain your name, although your body does depart. In the 146 Epiſtle of the ſame Book, there is extant this Elogue of Datianus: τὸ γὰρ τοσαῦτ' ἀνδρὸς, &c. For, to hear ſuch and ſo many brave exploits of a perſon, who has erected ſo many Kingdoms, and has been beneficial to ſo many Men, nor has ever hurt any body, who is eminent for prudence, and has filled the Earth and Sea with the Glory of his name; is, to a Man of diſcretion greater than all preſent or future wealth. And, at the cloſe of the ſame Epiſtle, he intimates, that the ſame Datianus had a Seat at Conſtantinople; and that in Antioch and the Suburbs thereof, he had Houſes and Palaces beautified with Fountains and Baths; to take a view thereof he invites him, Valeſ.

(b) At this place occurs no trivial difficulty. For the deſtruction of the City Nicomedia hapned when Datianus and Cerealis were Conſuls, in the year of Chriſt 358, on the month of Auguſt. But the Council of Seleucia was held on the year following, in the Conſulate of Euſebius and Hypatius, in the month of September. Theſe things therefore hapned not in one and the ſame year. Wherefore it ſeemeth, that the reading at this place ſhould be [τῷ ἐχομένῳ ἐνιαυτῷ, on the year following.] Or, if the common reading muſt be retained, we muſt underſtand our Author's meaning to be, that the Council of Biſhops at Seleucia was held on the ſame year with the Ariminum Council. Valeſ.

ſebius and Hypatius. The perſons convened were in number an hundred and ſixty. There was preſent with them a perſonage eminent in the Imperial Palace, his name (c) Leonas; in whoſe preſence, as the Emperor had given order by his Edict, the diſquiſition about the Faith was to be propoſed. Lauricius alſo the Commander in chief of the Soldiers throughout Iſauria, was order'd to be there, to provide the Biſhops with what neceſſaries they might ſtand in need of. At this place therefore [the Biſhops] were convened in the preſence of theſe perſons, on the twenty ſeventh of the month September, and began to diſpute about making of publick Acts. For there were Notaries preſent alſo, who were to take in writing what was ſpoken by every one of them. A particular account of all matters then tranſacted, the ſtudious Readers may find in Sabinus's Collection, where they are ſet forth at large. But we ſhall only curſorily relate the chief Heads thereof. On the firſt day of their being convened, Leonas order'd every one to propoſe what they would. But ſuch as were preſent ſaid, that no diſpute ought to be raiſed, before the perſons abſent were come. For theſe Biſhops were wanting, Macedonius of Conſtantinople, Baſilius of Ancyra, and ſome others, who ſuſpected they ſhould be accuſed. Macedonius excuſed his abſence by ſaying he was ſick. Patrophilus affirmed he had a diſtemper in his eyes, and was therefore neceſſitated to continue in the Suburbs of Seleucia. All the reſt propoſed one occaſion or other of their being abſent. But, in regard Leonas ſaid, that, notwithſtanding the abſence of theſe perſons, the queſtion was to be propoſed; thoſe that were preſent made anſwer again, that they would in no wiſe enter into any debate, before the * Morals of thoſe accuſed were enquired into. For Cyrillus of Jeruſalem, Euſtathius of Sebaſtia in Armenia, and ſome others had been accuſed ſome time before. Hereupon aroſe a ſharp conteſt amongſt thoſe that were preſent. For ſome affirmed, that the Morals of ſuch as had been accuſed were in the firſt place to be look'd into: others were of opinion, that no controverſie ought to be diſcuſs'd before [that concerning] the Faith. This conteſt was rais'd by the different opinion of the Emperor. For his Letter was produced, in one paſſage whereof he gave order for the debating of this matter in the firſt place, in another for that. A diſagreement therefore hapning concerning this matter, a Schiſm was made amongſt the perſons preſent. And this was the original cauſe of the Seleucian-Synods being divided into two parties. The one Faction was headed by Acacius [Biſhop] of Cæſarea in Paleſtine, Georgius of Alexandria, Uranius of Tyre, and Eudoxius of Antioch: of the ſame mind with whom there were only two and thirty other [Biſhops.] The principal perſons of the other Faction were Georgius of Laodicea in Syria, Sophronius of Pompeiopolis in Paphlagonia, and Eleuſius of Cyzicum; who were followed by the major part. When therefore that ſide prevailed, which was for debating in the firſt place concerning the Faith, Acacius's party manifeſtly rejected the Nicene Creed, and intimated the publication of another. But thoſe of the other Faction, who were ſuperior in number, approved of all other matters [determined] in the Nicene Synod; excepting only the term Homoöuſios, which they found fault with. Therefore, after a very ſharp conteſt amongſt one another until evening, at length Silvanus (who preſided over the Church at Tarſus) ſpake aloud, ſaying, there was no neceſſity of publiſhing a new Draught of the Creed, but that they ought rather to confirm that ſet forth at Antioch, at the Conſecration of the Church. When he ſaid this, Acacius's party ſecretly withdrew [out of the Council:] but the other Faction produced the Creed [compoſed] at Antioch; after the reading whereof the Council broke up for that day. On the next day they met in a Church in Seleucia, and having ſhut the doors, they red that Creed, and confirmed it by their Subſcriptions. Inſtead of ſome [Biſhops] who were abſent, the Readers and Deacons there preſent ſubſcribed, by whom the abſent perſons had profeſs'd, that they would acquieſce in that Draught [of the Creed.]

(c) This Leonas was Queſtor of the ſacred Palace: and Lauricius was Comes of Iſauria, as Ammianus Marcellinas doth atteſt. Valeſ.

CHAP. XL.

That Acacius [Biſhop] of Cæſarea dictated another Draught of the Creed, in the Synod at Seleucia.

BUT Acacius, and thoſe of his party found fault with what was done, becauſe they had ſubſcrib'd covertly when the Church-doors were ſhut. For matters, ſaid he, tranſacted in ſecret were naught, and to be ſuſpected. He made theſe objections, becauſe he was deſirous of publiſhing another Draught of the Creed inſtead of that [ſubſcribed by them,] which [Form] he had about him, ready drawn up, and had before recited it to Lauricius and Leonas the Governours: and he made it his whole buſineſs to get that Draught only eſtabliſh'd and confirmed. Theſe were the tranſactions of the ſecond day when nothing elſe was done. On the third

Constantius. day, Leonas was again very earneſt to procure a meeting of both Parties. At which time neither Macedonius of Conſtantinople, nor Baſilius of Ancyra were abſent. When therefore both theſe perſons had joyn'd themſelves to one and the ſame Faction, the Acacians were again unwilling to meet, ſaying, that as well thoſe who had before been depoſed, as them at preſent accuſed, ought in the firſt place to be put out of the Aſſembly. After a great conteſt on both ſides, at length this opinion was prevalent, the perſons charged with an accuſation went out; and the Acacians came in. Then Leonas ſaid, that Acacius had deliver'd a Libel unto him; [Leonas] not diſcovering it to be a Draught of the Creed, which in ſome paſſages ſecretly, in others openly contradicted the former. When ſilence was made amongſt thoſe that were preſent, (they ſuppoſing the Libel to contain any thing elſe, rather than a Form of the Creed;) Acacius's compoſure of the Creed with a Preface thereto was then recited, the Contents whereof are theſe.

We having met together at Seleucia [a City] of Iſauria (according to the Emperor's command) yeſterday, which was before the fifth of the Calends of October, uſed our utmoſt endeavour with all modeſty to preſerve the peace of the Church, ſtedfaſtly to determine concerning the Faith (as our Emperor Conſtantius moſt dear to God hath ordered) according to the Prophetick and Evangelick expreſſions, and to introduce nothing into the Eccleſiaſtick Faith contrary to the Divine Scriptures. But in regard certain perſons in the Synod have injured ſome of us; have ſtopt the mouths of others, not permitting them to ſpeak; have excluded other-ſome againſt their wills; have brought along with them out of divers Provinces perſons depoſed; and have in their company ſuch as have been ordained contrary to the Canon [of the Church:] in ſo much that the Synod is on all ſides filled with tumult, (a) of which the moſt eminent Lauricius, Preſident of the Province, and the moſt Illuſtrious Leonas the Comes, have been eye-witneſſes: upon this account we interpoſe theſe things. Not that we forſake the authentick Faith publiſh'd at the Conſecration at Antioch, but we give that the preference, eſpecially in regard our Fathers concurred about the propoſition at that time in controverſie. But whereas the terms Homoöuſion and * Homoiöuſion have in times paſt diſturbed very many, and do ſtill diſquiet them: and moreover, whereas 'tis ſaid, that there is an Innovation lately coyn'd by ſome, who aſſert a diſſimilitude of the Son to the Father. Upon this account we reject Homoöuſion and Homoiöuſion, as being terms not to be met with in the Scriptures; but we anathematize the term † Anomoion: and do look upon all ſuch, as are aſſertors thereof, to be perſons alienated from the Church. But we do manifeſtly profeſs the likeneſs of the Son to the Father, agreeable to the Apoſtle that hath ſaid concerning the Son, || Who is the Image of the Inviſible God.

We acknowledge therefore, and believe in one God, the Father Almighty; the Maker of Heaven and Earth, of things viſible and inviſible. Moreover, We believe in our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, his Son, begotten of him without any paſſion before all ages; God the Word, the only begotten of God, the Light, the Life, the Truth, the Wiſdom; by whom all things were made, which are in the Heavens, and which are on the Earth, whether viſible or inviſible. We believe him to have aſſumed Fleſh from the Holy Virgin Mary, at the Conſummation of Ages, in order to the abolition of Sin: and that he was made Man, that he ſuffer'd for our Sins, and roſe again, and was taken up into the Heavens, and ſitteth at the Right Hand of the Father: and that he ſhall come again in Glory to judge the Quick and Dead. We believe alſo in the Holy Ghoſt, whom our Lord and Saviour hath termed The Paraclete, having promiſed, after his departure, to ſend him to his Diſciples, and he ſent him. By whom alſo he ſanctifies [all] Believers in the Church, who are baptized in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghoſt. But thoſe who preach any thing contrary to this Creed, [(b) we look upon] to be alienated from the Catholick Church. Conſtantius.

(a) The reading of this place is in the Allat. M. S. more full, thus, [καθὼς καὶ ὁ λαμπρότατος ἡγεμὼν τῆς ἐπαρχίας λαυείσιος, καὶ ὁ λαμπρότατος κόμης λεωνᾶς παρέλαβον αὐτοψία] which we have expreſt in our Verſion; it being confirmed by Epiphanius Scholaſticus, (only he puts Leonas before Lauricius, which is undoubtedly trueſt:) and by Epiphanius, in Hæreſ. Semiarian. cap. 25. where this profeſſion of Faith is recorded entire. Valeſ. See Epiphanius, Edit. Petav. pag. 872, &c.

|| Coloſ. 1. 15.

(b) This word [νομίζομεν, we look upon, or account] is wanting in our M. SS. It was firſt inſerted by the Publiſhers of the Geneva Edition, from Chriſtophorſon's Verſion. But in regard we found not this reading in any Manuſcript Copy, we took the boldneſs to expunge it. In Epiphanius, (in Hæreſ. Semiarian, pag. 872.) and in Athanaſius (in his Book de Synod. Arimini & Seleuciæ;) the reading of this place is thus [ἀλλοτρίους ὅτι ἐν ἁγίᾳ καθολικῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ, The Catholick Church hath determined them to be alienated [from it.] I found the ſame reading in the Allat. M. S. After theſe words there follow (in Epiphanius) the names of thoſe Biſhops, who ſubſcribed this Draught of the Creed; being in number about forty. But before thoſe Subſcriptions, ſomething is added there, which deſerves to be ſet down here. The words therefore in Dionyſius Petavius's Edition are theſe: ὅτι δὴ ταύτῃ τῇ πίστει ἰσοδυναμεῖ καὶ ἡ ἐν σιρμίῳ πρόσφατος ἐκτεθεῖσα πίστις, ἐπὶ τῆς εὐσεβείας τοῦ βασιλέως ἡμῶν, γνωρίζουσιν οἱ ἐντυγχανόντες τῇ πίστει· i. e. now, that that Creed lately publiſhed at Sirmium, in the preſence of the piety of our Emperor, does exactly agree with this Creed, is a thing manifeſtly known to thoſe who have read that Creed. Then follows another Chapter, after this manner; Καὶ ἔγραψαν οἱ παρόντες Βασίλειος, μάρκος καὶ γεώργιος ὁ τῆς ἀλεξανδρείας ἐπίσκοπος παγκράτιος καὶ ὑπατιανὸς καὶ οἱ πλεῖστοι ἐπίσκοποι τῆς δύσεως; (I doubt not but the reading ſhould be ᾧ ὑπέγραψαν, to which ſubſcribed.) i. e. To which they who were preſent ſubſcribed, Baſilius, Marcus, Georgius Biſhop of Alexandria, Pancratius. Hypatianus, and moſt of the Weſtern Biſhops. Valeſ.

This is the Draught of the Creed publiſhed by Acacius. The perſons who ſubſcribed it were Acacius himſelf, and ſuch as adhered to his opinion, being as many in number, as we have mentioned a little before. After the recitation hereof, Sophronius [Biſhop] of Pompeiopolis in Paphlagonia ſpake theſe words aloud: If to explain our own particular opinion every day be the expoſition of the Faith, we ſhall be deſtitute of the exact diſcuſſion of the truth. Theſe words were ſpoken by Sophronius. And I do affirm, that if as well thoſe who lived before theſe men, as they that ſucceeded them, had at firſt entertained ſuch ſentiments concerning the Nicene Creed; all contentious diſputes would have ceaſed, nor would a violent and irrational diſturbance have been prevalent in the Churches. But let ſuch as are prudent paſs their judgment concerning the ſtate of theſe matters. After they had mutually ſpoken and heard many things concerning this buſineſs, and concerning the perſons accuſed, the Convention was for that time diſſolved. On the fourth day they all met again in the ſame place, and with the ſame contentiouſneſs began to diſpute again. Amongſt whom Acacius explained his opinion in theſe words: in as much as the Nicene Creed has been once, and after that frequently altered, nothing hinders, but a new Creed may be now publiſhed. Hereto Eleuſius [Biſhop] of Cyzicum made a return, and ſaid; the Synod is at preſent convened, not that it ſhould learn (c) what it had not the knowledge of before, nor to receive a Creed

(c) In the Florent. and Allat. M. SS as ſays Valeſ. the reading is [ἃ μὴ μεμάθηκεν] which we have expreſt in our Verſion. But Valeſius follows the other reading, which is [ἃ μεμάθηκεν, what it had the knowledge of before.] which it was not heretofore in poſſeſſion of: but that, proceeding on in the Creed of the Fathers, it ſhould never recede from it, either during life, or at the time of death. With theſe words Eleuſius oppoſed Acacius's Opinion, terming that Creed publiſh'd at Antioch the Father's Creed. But any one might have anſwer'd him alſo, in theſe words: How is it, that you ſtile thoſe convened at Antioch the Fathers, O Eleuſius, whereas you acknowledge not their Fathers? For they who were aſſembled at Nice, and by their conſent firmed the Homoöuſian Faith, ought more properly to be term'd the Fathers, both becauſe they preceded in time, and alſo in regard thoſe convened at Antioch were by them promoted to the Sacerdotal Dignity. Now, if thoſe [aſſembled] at Antioch have rejected their own Fathers, they who come after them do not perceive themſelves to be followers of Parricides. Moreover, how can they have admitted their Ordination to be legitimate, whoſe Faith they have rejected as impious? For if thoſe perſons had not the Holy Ghoſt, which is infuſed by Ordination, theſe have not received the Prieſthood. For how could theſe have received [it] from them, who had it not to give? Theſe words might have been ſpoken in oppoſition to what was ſaid by Eleuſius. After this they proceeded to another queſtion. For, in regard the Acacians aſſerted in that Draught of the Creed which had been recited, that the Son was like the Father, they enquired of one another, in what reſpect the Son was like the Father. The Acacians aſſerted, that the Son was like the Father in reſpect of his Will only, not as to his Eſſence. But all the reſt maintained, [that he was like the Father] in reſpect of his Eſſence alſo. They ſpent the whole day in their Altercations about this Query; and they confuted Acacius, becauſe in the Books by him compoſed and publiſh'd, he had aſſerted that the Son is in all things like the Father. And how can you (ſaid they) now deny the likeneſs of the Son to the Father as to his Eſſence? Acacius made this anſwer, no modern or ancient Author was ever condemned out of his own Writings. When they had maintain'd a tedious, fierce, and ſubtle diſpute againſt one another concerning this queſtion, and could in no wiſe be brought to an agreement, Leonas aroſe and diſſolved the Council. And this was the concluſion, which the Synod held at Seleucia had. For on the day after, Leonas being intreated, refuſed to come any more into the Congreſs, ſaying, that he had been ſent by the Emperor, to be preſent at an unanimous Synod. But in regard ſome of you do diſagree, I cannot (ſaid he) be there; go therefore and prate in the Church. The Acacians looking upon what had been done to be a great advantage to them, refuſed to meet alſo. But thoſe of the other party met together in the Church, and ſent for the Acacians, that cognizance might be taken of the Caſe of Cyrillus Biſhop of Jeruſalem. For you muſt know that Cyrillus had been accuſed before; upon what account, I cannot tell. But he was depoſed, becauſe having been frequently ſummon'd in order to the examination of his cauſe, he had not made his appearance during the ſpace of two whole years. Nevertheleſs when he was depoſed, he ſent an Appellatory Libel to them who had depoſed him, and appealed to an higher Court of Judicature. To which appeal of his the Emperor Conſtantius gave his aſſent. Indeed, Cyrillus was the (d) firſt and only perſon, who (contrary to the uſage of the Eccleſiaſtick Canon) did this, [to wit,] made uſe of appeals, as 'tis uſually done in the publick [ſecular] Courts of Judicature. He was at that time preſent at Seleucia, ready to put himſelf upon his tryal: and therefore the Biſhops called the Acacians into the aſſembly, (as we have ſaid a little before,) that (e) by a general conſent they might paſs a definitive ſentence againſt perſons accuſed. For they had cited ſome other perſons beſides, that were accuſed, who for refuge had joyn'd themſelves to Acacius's party. But in regard, after their being frequently ſummon'd, they refuſed to meet, [the Biſhops] depoſed both Acacius himſelf, and alſo Georgius of Alexandria, (f) Uranius of Tyre, (g) Theodulus of Chæretapi in Phrygia, Theodoſius of Philadelphia in Lydia, Evagrius of the Iſland Mytilene, Leontius of Tripolis in Lydia, and Eudoxius who had heretofore been Biſhop of Germanicia, but had afterwards crept into the Biſhoprick of Antioch in Syria. Moreover, they depoſed (h) Patrophilus, becauſe being accuſed by Dorotheus a Presbyter, and ſummoned by them to make his defence, he was contumacious. Theſe perſons they depoſed. But they Excommunicated Aſterius, Euſebius, Abgarus, Baſilicus, Phœbus, Fidelis, Eutychius, Magnus, and Euſtathius: determining they ſhould continue excommunicate, till ſuch time as by *making ſatisfaction they had cleared themſelves of their Accuſations. Having done this, and written Letters concerning thoſe Biſhops they had depoſed, to each of their Churches, they conſtitute a Biſhop of Antioch, in the room of Eudoxius, whoſe name was Annianus: Whom the Acacians [ſoon after] apprehended, and delivered him to Leonas and Lauricius, by whom he was baniſhed. Thoſe Biſhops who had ordained Annianus [being incenſed] hereat, depoſited (i) Conteſtatory Libels againſt the Acacians with Leonas and Lauricius, by which they openly declared, that the determination of the Synod was injured. And when nothing further could be done, they went to Conſtantinople, to inform the Emperor concerning the matters determined by them.

* Or, by making their defence.

Conſtantius.

(d) Nay; long before Cyril, the Donatiſts appealed from the determination of the Council of Orleans. For thus the Emperor Conſtantine ſpeaks concerning them in his Epiſtle: O rabida furoris audacia! Sicut in cauſis Gentilium ſolet, appellationem interpoſuerunt: i. e. O the outragious audaciouſneſs of fury! As 'tis uſually done in the caſes of the Heathens, they have put in an appeal. Valeſ.

(e) Theſe two lines [Διαγιόντες κοινὴν ἐξενέγκωσι ψῆφον· ἐκάλουν δὲ καὶ τινας ἄλλους πρὸ κατηγορείων, by a general conſent they might paſs a definitive ſentence againſt the perſons accuſed. For they had cited ſome other perſons beſides, that were accuſed,] were at this place, wanting in the common Editions; we have inſerted them from the Florentine and Sfortian M. SS. To which agrees Epiphanius Scholaſticus's Verſion. But Chriſtophorſon made up the chaſm at this place very unhappily by conjecture: whence it appears, that he had no Manuſcript Copies of Socrates, but various readings only, gathered from the Margins of Printed Copies. Valeſ.

(f) This Perſons name ſhould be Uranius (not Urſacius; ſo he is called in Athanaſius's Book, de Synod. Arimin. & Seleuciæ. pag. 880. which name alſo Epiphanius Scholaſticus gives him; as does likewiſe Epiphanius, (in Hæreſ. Semiarian.) who names him among the Biſhops that ſubſcribed the Acacian Creed. Valeſ.

(g) In the Florentine and Allatian M. SS. this perſon is named (not Theodorus, but more truly) Theodulus. For that is his name in Athanaſius, Epiphanius, and Philoſtorgius. When this Theodulus had been diveſted of the Biſhoprick of Chæretapi, in the Council held at Seleucia, he was afterwards ordained Biſhop of Paleſtina by the Eunomians, as Philoſtorgius relates. Concerning Leontius of Tripolis you may meet with many paſſages in Philoſtorgius. Valeſ.

(h) Into his See they put one Philippus a Presbyter of Scythopolis, as Epiphanius atteſts, in Hæreſ. Semiarian. Valeſ.

(i) It ſhould be but one word, thus, Διαμαρτυρίας, ſo the Greeks term the Libels of proteſtation, (or, proteſts,) which were uſually depoſited with the Acts. We meet with a form of one of theſe Libels, at the cloſe of Athanaſius's Epiſtle ad Solitarios. I ſuppoſe, that two Libels of proteſtation were delivered by the Council; one to Leonas the Comes; another to Lauricius Preſident of Iſauria. Valeſ.

CHAP. XLI.

That, upon the Emperor's return from the Western Parts, the Acacians were convened in the City of Constantinople, and firmed the Ariminum Creed, making some Additions to it.

FOR the Emperor, being return'd from the Western parts, resided [in that City :] at which time also he made a person whose name was (a) Honoratus, the first Præfect of Constantinople; having (b) abolish'd the Proconsul's Office. But the Acacians prevented and calumniated them before-hand to the Emperor, having inform'd him, that the (c) Creed which they had set forth was not admitted by them. Whereupon the Emperor was highly incensed, and resolved to disperse them, having commanded by an Edict [which he publish'd,] that such of them as were subject to publick Offices, should be reduced to their former condition. For several of them were liable to [publick] Offices; some [were subject to the bearing of those Offices belonging] to the City Magistracy; others [to them appertaining] to the (d) Sodalities of Officials or Apparitors in several Provinces. These persons being after this manner disturb'd, the Acacians abode for some time at Constantinople, and assembled another Synod, to which they sent for the Bishops of Bithynia. When therefore they were all met together, being (e) fifty in number, amongst whom was Maris of Chalcedon, they confirmed the Creed publish'd at Ariminum, which had the Consuls names prefixt. Which Creed it would have been superflous to have inserted here, had they made no additions to it. But in regard they added some words thereto, we thought it necessary to set it down at this place again. The Contents of it are these.

(a) In the Old Fasti (put forth by Jacobus Sirmondus under the name of Idatius,) there is this Recorded concerning this thing: Eusebio & Hypatio, his consulibus primum processit Constantinopoli præfectus Urbis, nomine Honoratus, die tertio Idûs Decembris: i. e. in the Consulate of Eusebius and Hypatius a Præfect of Constantinople was first made, his name Honoratus, on the third of the Ides of December. Valesius.

(b) Before the Emperor Constantius had made a Præfect of the City at Constantinople) the Province Europa (the chief City whereof was Constantinople) was governed by a Proconsul, as Socrates here attests. Athanasius mentions this Proconsul, in his Apologetick de Fugâ suâ, not far from the beginning; where he says that the Emperor Constantius wrote Letters to Donatus the Proconsul, against Olympius Bishop of Thracia. In the Emperor Constantius's Epistle also, which he wrote to the Senate and Constantinopolitan-people concerning the praises of Themistius, there is mention of this Proconsul; at the close of that Epistle. Valesius.

(c) That is, the Creed which had the Consuls names præfixt. Valesius.

(d) Τῶν ἐν ταῖς ἐπαρχίαις τάξεων· So this place is worded in the Original. What the τάξεις were, I have long since explained in my Notes on Amm. Marcellinus: to wit, the Bodies or Sodalities of Officials or Apparitors who attended upon the Presidents and Governours of Provinces. It was their duty to collect the tribute from the Inhabitants of the Provinces, and to put in execution the Presidents Orders. Further, as they who had lifted themselves in the Camp-milice, stood obliged by a Military-oath, and enjoyed not a compleat liberty, but were bound in a servitude as it were, till such time as they were disbanded, (as Suidas declares, in the word βέλεαρος·) so those Officials, who followed the City-milice, were bound to this employment as it were, and lyable to the Offices of their Milice; and their Farms, as well as those of the Decurions, were incumbred with these burdens, as 'tis apparent from the Theodosian Code. Valesius.

(e) In the Alexandrian Chronicle, seventy two Bishops are said to have been present at the Constantinopolitan Synod, in the year of Christ, 360. Valesius.

We believe in one only God, the Father Almighty, of whom are all things. And in the only begotten Son of God, begotten of God before all ages, and before every beginning: by whom all things, visible and invisible, were made. * Who is the only begotten born of the Father, the only of the only, God of God, like to the Father (who begat him) according to the Scriptures. Whose generation no person knoweth, but the Father only, who begat him. We know this Person [to be] the only begotten Son of God, who upon his Father's sending of him, came down from the Heavens, according as 'tis written, upon account of the destruction of Sin and Death: and was born of the Holy Ghost, and of the Virgin Mary according to the flesh, as 'tis written, and conversed with the Disciples; and having fulfilled every dispensation according to his Fathers will, he was crucified and died, and was buried, and descended into the parts beneath the Earth. At whom Hell it self trembled. Who arose from the Dead on the third day, and was conversant with the Disciples: and after the completion of forty days, he was taken up into the Heavens, and sitteth on the Right Hand of the Father; he shall come in the last day of the Resurrection in his Fathers Glory, that he may render to every Man according to his works. And [we believe in] the Holy Ghost, whom he himself the only Begotten of God, Christ our Lord and God, promised to send as an Advocate to Mankind, according as 'tis written, the Spirit of Truth; whom he sent unto them, after he was assumed into the Heavens. But we thought good to remove the term * Ousia, (which was used by the Fathers in a more plain and ordinary sense; and being not understood by the People, has given offence,) in regard 'tis not contained in the Sacred Scriptures; and that in future not the least mention should be made thereof, for as much as the Sacred Scriptures have no where mentioned the Substance of the Father and of the Son. (f) Nor ought the Subsistence of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, to be so much as named. But we assert the Son to be like the Father, in such a manner as the Sacred Scriptures do affirm and teach. Moreover, let all the Heresies, which have been heretofore condemned, and which may have risen of late, being opposite to this Creed published [by us,] be Anathema.

Constantius.

* Or, who is the only begotten born, the only of the only Father, &c.

* Substance.

(f) In Athanasius's Book de Synodis, pag. 906. the reading is [οὐδὲ ὀφείλει, Nor ought, &c.] to which agrees the Version of the Latin Translator. Which is also confirmed by Athanasius himself, in the same Book, pag. 905. the place we will quote by and by. Valesius.

This Creed was at that time recited at Constantinople. Having now at length passed through the Labyrinth of the Expositions of Faith, we will reckon up their number. After the Creed [publish'd] at Nice, they set forth two Epositions of the Faith at Antioch, at the Dedication. A third was that delivered to the Emperor Constans in the Gallia's, by Narcissus and those that accompanied him. The fourth was that sent by Eudoxius into Italy. Three [Draughts of the Creed were publish'd at Sirmium, one whereof was recited at Ariminum, which had the name of the Consuls prefixt. The eighth was that which the Acacians promulged at Seleucia. The last was set forth at the City Constantinople, with an addition. For hereto was annex'd, that neither substance nor subsistence ought to be mention'd in relation to God. Moreover, Ulfila Bishop of the Goths did at that time first agree to this Creed. For before this he had embraced the Nicene Creed; being Theophilus's Follower, who was Bishop of the Goths, and had been present at, and subscribed the Nicene Synod. Thus far concerning these things.

That upon Macedonius's being deposed, Eudoxius obtained the Bishoprick of Constantinople.

side depose some persons of the contrary party. Now, you must know, that neither of the factions decreed these depositions upon account of Religion, but for other pretences. For, tho' they dissented about the Faith, yet they found not fault with one another's Faith in their mutual depositions of one another. Those therefore of Acacius's party, making use of the Emperor's indignation, (which he had kept [concealed in his mind,] and earnestly endeavour'd to wreak it against others, but most especially against Macedonius) do in the first place depose Macedonius, both because he had been the occasion of many murders, and also in regard he had admitted a Deacon taken in Fornication to Communion. Then, [they depose] Eleusius [Bishop] of Cyzicum, because he had baptiz'd one Heraclius, Hercules's Priest at Tyre, a person known to be a Conjurer, and ordain'd him Deacon. [In the next place they depose] Basilius, (or Basilas, for so he was also called) who had been constituted [Bishop] of Ancyra in the room of Marcellus, as having unjustly tortured a certain person, bound him with iron-chains, and confined him to prison; also, because he had fastned calumnies upon some persons; and moreover, in regard by his Letters he had disturbed the Churches in Africa. Dracontius [was deposed by them,] because he had remov'd from Galatia to Pergamus. Moreover, they deposed Neonas [Bishop] of Seleucia, in which City the Synod had been convened, as also Sophronius of Pompeiopolis in Paphlagonia, Elpidius of (a) Satala in Macedonia, and Cyrillus of Jerusalem; and others were ejected by them for other reasons.

(a) Satala was a Town in Armenia; of which there is frequent mention amongst the Ancients. But in Macedonia, no mention is made of a City of this name by the Ancients. Wherefore I judge, that instead of Macedonia, it should be Armenia, here in the Greek Text. Vales.

CHAP. XLIII.

Concerning Eustathius Bishop of Sebastia.

BUT Eustathius [Bishop] of Sebastia in Armenia, was not so much as admitted to make his defence, because he had been long before deposed by Eulalius his own Father, who was Bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, in regard he wore a garment misbecoming the Sacerdotal function. You are to know, that in Eustathius's room Meletius was constituted Bishop, concerning whom we will speak hereafter. But Eustathius was afterwards condemn'd in a Synod convened upon his account at Gangra [a City] of Paphlagonia, because, after his deposition in the Synod at (a) Cæsarea, he had done many things repugnant to the Ecclesiastick Laws. For he had forbidden marriage, and maintain'd that meats were to be abstain'd from; and upon this account he separated many who had contracted marriages, from their Wives, and perswaded (b) those who had an aversion for the Churches, to communicate at home. He also entic'd away servants from their masters by a pretext of piety. He himself wore the habit of a Philosopher, and caused his followers to make use of a new and unusual garb, and gave order that women should be shorn. He [asserted] that set Fasts were to be avoided; but maintain'd fasting on Sundays. He forbad prayers to be made in the houses of those who were married; and taught, that the Blessing and Communion of a Presbyter who had a wife (whom he had lawfully married during his being a Laick) ought to be declined as a thing most detestable. Upon his doing and teaching these and several other such-like things as these, a Synod (as I have said) convened at Gangra in Paphlagonia deposed him, and anathematized his opinions. (c) These things were done afterwards. But Macedonius being then ejected, Eudoxius, despising the See of Antioch, is constituted [Bishop] of Constantinople, being consecrated by the Acacians; who forgot themselves, in that they decreed what was contradictory to their former determinations. For they who had deposed Dracontius because of his translation from Galatia to Pergamus, consider'd not with themselves, that by ordaining Eudoxius, who then made a second remove [to another Bishoprick,] they did what was contrary to their own Sanctions. Having done these things, they sent the Creed which had been read (d) to Ariminum, together with its Supplement, corrected by them; and gave order, that such as would not subscribe it, should be banished, according to the Emperor's Edict. [Lastly,] they made known what they had done both to others in the East, who entertain'd the same sentiments with them, and also to Patrophilus [Bishop] of Scythopolis. For he went from Seleucia forthwith to his own City. Further, Eudoxius having been constituted [Bishop] of the * Great City, the (e) Great Church named Sophia was at that time consecrated, in Constantius's Tenth, and Julianus Cæsar's third Consulate, on the fifteenth of the month February. As soon as Eudoxius was seated in that See, he was the first that utter'd this sentence which is [still]

(a) Sozomen, Book 4. chap. 24. says 'twas at Neocæsarea. Vales.

(b) These words of Socrates [ἀπεχομένους, those who had an aversion for, or, detested the Churches] are not to be understood of all those who declined the Churches; but they must be joined to the foregoing words, and are to be meant of those persons, who by Eustathius's perswasion had separated themselves from the converse of their Wives. Eustathius perswaded these men to avoid the Churches assemblies, and not to communicate with other believers; but that, being as it were pure and perfect, they should participate of the sacred Mysteries by themselves at home. See what Epiphanius has related concerning this Eustathius, in his Hæresie of the Aëriani; and Basilius, in his Epistles. Vales.

Constantius.

(c) I am not of Socrates's opinion, who makes the Synod of Gangra (wherein Eustathius was condemned) to have been after that assembled at Seleucia, and after the Constantinopolitan Synod. Sozomen (Book 4. Chap. 24. makes the Synod of Gangra to be ancienter than the Council of Antioch, which was held at the Dedication in the year of Christ 341. Indeed Baronius (at the year of Christ 361.) places the Synod of Gangra in the Reign of Constantine the Great. But he is confuted both by Socrates and Sozomen. For Socrates makes that Synod to be later than the Seleucian and Constantinopolitan Synod. But Sozomen places it after Eustathius's deposition, which was done by Eusebius Bishop of Constantinople. Now, Eusebius thrust himself into the Constantinopolitan See in Constantius's reign, as 'tis agreed amongst all Men. Lastly, Basilius (in his seventy fourth Epistle, which he wrote to the Western Bishops against Eustathius Bishop of Sebastia) makes no mention of the Council of Gangra. Whence 'tis manifest, that at such time as Basilius wrote that Epistle (which he did in Valens's reign,) the Council of Gangra, wherein Eustathius was condemned, had not been held. Some one will peradventure say, (which is objected by Baronius) that that Eustathius condemned in the Synod of Gangra was a different Person from Eustathius of Sebastia. But this is gratis dictum, nor is it founded on the authority of any Author. Vales.

(d) I have rendred this place so, as to refer these Words [to Ariminum] to these [they sent:] which Version of ours is confirmed by Athanasius, in his Book de Synodis, pag. 905. his Words are these: ταῦτα γεγράφασι ἐν τῇ Ἰσαυρίᾳ, &c. Having written these things in Isauria, they departed to Constantinople, and repenting as it were [of what they had done,] according to their usual manner they altered their Draught: And when they had added some words, [to wit] that [the term] subsistence should not be used in relation to the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost, they sent this [form of] the Creed to those at Ariminum, &c. Which passage in Athanasius, Socrates does seem to transcribe here. Epiphanius Scholasticus and Christophorson have rendred this place to this effect; Having done this, they sent the Creed read at Ariminum together with its supplement, &c. Vales.

(e) I perfected and mended this place from the Florentine and Sfortian Copies. Concerning the Consecration of this Church, it is thus recorded in Idatius's Fasti: Constantii decimo, &c. In Constantius's Tenth and Julianus's Third Consulate, the Great Church at Constantinople was consecrated, on the fifteenth of the Kalends of March. Cedrenus (in his Chronicon) says this was the second Consecration of this Church. For it was first consecrated, says he, by Eusebius Bishop of Constantinople. But being afterwards ruined, it was re-edified by Constantius Augustus, and consecrated by Eudoxius. See the Chronicon Alexandrinum, where many passages (in no wise trivial) occur concerning this Consecration. Vales.

When Eudoxius had spoken these words, the tumult was appeased; but instead of the disturbance, there was a great laughter raised in the Church. And this saying of his continues to be a ridicule even to this day. Such Cavils the Arch-Hereticks made use of, and busied themselves about such expressions as these, rending the Church in sunder [thereby.] This was the conclusion that the Synod had, which was convened at Constantinople.

CHAP. XLIV.

Concerning Meletius Bishop of Antioch.

IT now remains, that we speak concerning Meletius: For he (as we said a little before) was made Bishop of Sebastia in Armenia, after Eustathius's deposition. He was afterwards translated from Sebastia to (a) Berœa [a City] of Syria. When he had been present at the Synod in Seleucia, and subscrib'd the Creed publish'd there by Acacius, he went directly from thence to Berœa. Upon the Convention of the Synod at Constantinople, when the Antiochians understood that Eudoxius had despised [the Presidency over their Church, and removed to the wealth of the Constantinopolitan See, they sent for (b) Meletius from Berœa, and instal him [Bishop] over the Church of Antioch. At first he superseded making any discourses about points of Faith, and deliver'd moral Doctrine only to his hearers. But after his continuance there some time, he expounded the Nicene Creed, and asserted the Homoüsian opinion. Which when the Emperor understood, he gave order that he should be banish'd: and caused Euzoius (who had before been deposed together with Arius) to be ordain'd Bishop of Antioch. But as many as reserv'd an affection for Meletius, left the Arian congregation, and made assemblies apart by themselves; [altho'] those who originally embraced the Homoüsian opinion, would not communicate with them, because Meletius had receiv'd his Ordination from the Suffrages of the Arians, and because his followers had been baptized by them. After this manner was the Antiochian Church affected towards the other party, altho' they agreed with them in the points of Faith. But the Emperor understanding that the Persians were raising another War against the Romans, went in great haste to Antioch.

(a) I can scarce believe, that Meletius was translated from Sebastia in Armenia to the Episcopate of Berœa. For Sozomen and Theodoret, and (before them) Jerome do affirm, that he was translated from Sebastia in Armenia to the See of Antioch, making no mention of his being Bishop of Berœa. Theodoret says only thus much; that upon Meletius's being promoted to the Bishoprick of Sebastia, perceiving a contumacy in those under his charge, he retired from thence to some other place. Then therefore he went to Berœa, as I conjecture; but he presided not over the City of Berœa. This mistake of Socrates's was perceived by Baronius, at the year of Christ 360. Which he corrects so, as to affirm, that Meletius was translated from Berœa to Sebastia, not from Sebastia to Berœa. Which, as I suppose, is not true, in regard neither Theodoret nor Sozomen have affirmed that concerning Meletius. Vales.

(b) This Person's name is written sometimes with an [e] thus Meletius; sometimes with an [i] thus Melitius. See Eusebius's Eccles. Histor. Book 7. Chap. 32. Note (a) pag. 138.

CHAP. XLV.

Concerning Macedonius's Heresie.

BUT Macedonius, who had been ejected out of Constantinople, being unable to bear his condemnation, could by no means endure to be at quiet. But joyn'd himself to those of the other party, who had deposed Acacius and his followers at Seleucia. He therefore sent an Embassy to Sophronius and Eleusius, exhorting them to adhere to that Creed which was at first publish'd at Antioch, and afterwards confirm'd at Seleucia, and that they should give it an (a) adulterate name, [to wit] the Homoiöusian Creed. Wherefore many of his acquaintance and friends flock'd to him, who are now from him call'd Macedoniani. And as many as dissented from the Acacians at the Synod of Seleucia, from thence forward manifestly asserted the term * Homoiöusios, (b) whereas, before this they had not openly own'd it. But there is a report, which has been prevalent amongst many men, that this [term Homoiöusios] was not Macedonius's invention; but Marathonius's rather, whom they had made Bishop of Nicomedia a little before. Upon which account they call the followers of this opinion Marathoniani also. In like manner Eustathius (who had been ejected out of Sebastia for that reason which we have mention'd a little before) joyn'd himself to that party. But after Macedonius refused to include the Holy Ghost in the Divinity of the Trinity, then Eustathius said, I cannot assent to the terming of the Holy Ghost God, nor dare I call him a Creature. Upon which account, those that embrace the Homoüsian opinion, give these persons the name of * Pneumatomachi. The reason why these Macedoniani are so numerous in (c) Hellespont, I will declare in its due place. Now, the Acacians used their utmost endeavours that they might be convened again at Antioch, in regard they repented their having asserted the Son to be wholly like the Father. On the year following therefore, wherein Taurus and Florentius were Consuls, they met at Antioch in Syria, (over which Church Euzoius presided, in which City the Emperor also resided [at that time]) when some few of them resumed a debate of those points which they had determin'd before, saying, that the term † Homoios ought to be expung'd out of the Creed, which had been publish'd both at Ariminum and at Constantinople. Nor did they any longer keep their Vizors on, but affirm'd bare-fac'd, that the Son was in all respects unlike the Father, not only as to his Essence, but in relation to his Will also. And they openly asserted (according as Arius had affirm'd) that he was made of nothing. To this opinion those, who at that time were followers of Aetius's Heresie at Antioch, gave their assent. Wherefore, besides their having the appellation of Arians, they were also called * Anomoei, and

Constantius.

(a) Translators understood not this place. And yet they might have been informed from Harpocration's Lexicon, that παράσημος (the term here used,) does signifie adulterate, or counterfeit; by a Metaphor taken from money which has a false stamp. Socrates therefore calls Homoiöusios. (For so 'tis to be written, agreeable to the Florentine and Sfortian Manuscripts; and the import of the term is, that the Son is of a substance, or Essence like to the Father:) an adulterate name, because 'tis corrupted, and counterfeitly put instead of Homoüsios (i. e. that the Son is of the same Substance, or Essence with the Father:) which is the name of the true and uncorrupted Creed. Further, the Acacians rejected as well the term Homoiousios, as Homoüsios; and retained only Homoios (i. e. like the Father;) and wholly abhorred the term Ousia (i. e. Substance.) Vales.

* That is, that the Son is of a Substance, or Essence like to the Father.

(b) This place is corrupted by a transposition of the Words; which may easily be rectified thus; ἤδη μὲν φανερῶς τὸ ὁμοιούσιον ἐδογμάτισαν, τὸ πρότερον οὐκ ὁμολογοῦντες αὐτό, from thence forward manifestly asserted the term Homoiousios, whereas before this they had not openly owned it. Nor do I doubt but Socrates wrote thus. Christophorson and Musculus apprehended not the meaning of this place. But Epiphanius Scholasticus's Rendition of it agrees with our Version: only instead of [ὅσοι τε, and as many as;] the reading in his Copy seems to have been [ὅσοι γὲ, for as many as] which displeaseth us not. Vales.

and †Exucontii, by those at Antioch who embrac'd the Homoöusian opinion, who [notwithstanding] were at that time divided amongst themselves upon Meletius's account, as has been said before. When therefore they were ask'd by the Homoöusians, why they were so audacious, as to term the Son to be unlike the Father, and to affirm that he exists of nothing; whenas in the Creed publish'd by them they had said he was God of God; they attempted to elude this objection by such fallacious artifices as these: The phrase God of God (said they) has the same import with those words of the Apostle, * but all things of God. Wherefore, the Son is of God, he being one of those all things. And upon this account, in the Editions of the Creed, these words, according to the Scriptures are added. Georgius Bishop of Laodicea was the Author of this † Sophism: Who being a person unskill'd in such expressions, was ignorant after what manner Origen had in former times discuss'd and interpreted such peculiar phrases of the Apostle. But, notwithstanding their attempt to cavil after this manner, yet in regard of their inability to bear the reproaches and contempt [thrown upon them,] they recited the same Creed, which they had before [publish'd] at Constantinople; and so departed every one to his own City. Georgius therefore returning to Alexandria, continued his Presidency over the Churches there, (Athanasius as yet absconding) and persecuted those in Alexandria who embraced not his sentiments. He was also cruel and severe towards the Populace of that City; to most of whom he was very odious. At Jerusalem, (d) Harrenius was ordain'd in Cyrillus's room. You must also know, that after him (e) Heraclius was constituted [Bishop there,] who was succeeded by Hilarius. But at length Cyrillus return'd to Jerusalem, and recover'd the Presidency over the Church there. Moreover, at the same time there sprang up another Heresie, upon this account.

† They had this name, in regard they maintained the Son to be made of nothing, or, of things which are not. See Athanasius, pag. 906. Edit. Paris; whence Socrates borrowed these names for these Heretick.

† Or, Fallacy.

(d) In the Allatian M. S. he is called Erennius; where this whole passage is thus worded: ἐν δὲ τοῖς Ἱεροσολύμοις κυρίλλου καθαιρεθέντος, ὡς εἴρηται, παραλαμβάνει τὴν ἱεροσολύμων ἐκκλησίαν Ἐρέννιος· ὃν μετ' ἐκεῖνον ἐβδόμης· ἐπ' ἕξης δὲ τούτῳ Ἰλάριος, i. e. At Jerusalem, Cyrillus having been deposed, as has been said, Erennius succeeded in that Church; after whom, Erracius: and after him Hilarius. But Jerome (in his Chronicon) calls him Irenius: For this is the reading in the most correct Copies, and in Johannes Miræus's Edition; Maximus Hierosolymorum Episcopus moritur. Post quem, Ecclesiam Ariani invadunt, id est Cyrillus, Eutychius, rursum Cyrillus, Irenius, tertio Cyrillus, Hilarius, quarto Cyrillus: id est, Maximus Bishop of Jerusalem dies; after whom, the Arians invade that Church, that is, Cyrillus, Eutychius, Cyrillus the second, Irenius, Cyrillus the third, Hilarius, Cyrillus the fourth. In Nicephorus Constantinopolitanus's Chronicon, he is very corruptly called Arsenius. Vales.

(e) Maximus Bishop of Jerusalem had at his death ordained Heraclius to be his Successor. But Acacius Bishop of Cæsarea, together with some other Arian Bishops, slighting his Ordination, substituted Cyrillus in the room of Maximus being now dead. This Cyrillus degraded Heraclius from his Episcopal dignity, and reduced him to the degree of a Presbyter; as Jerome relates in his Chronicon. Vales.

CHAP. XLVI.

Concerning the Apollinaristæ, and their Heresie.

AT Laodicea in Syria, there were two men of the same name, the Father and the Son: For each of their names was Apollinaris. The Father was dignified with a Presbyterate in that Church; the Son had a Readers place. They were both Teachers of Grecian Literature; the Father taught Grammar, the Son Rhetorick. The Father was by birth an Alexandrian, and having at first taught at Berytus, he removed afterwards to Laodicea, where he married, and begat his son Apollinaris. They both flourish'd at the same time with Epiphanius the Sophista, and being very intimate friends, they conversed together with him. But Theodotus Bishop of Laodicea, fearing that by their continual converse with that person they should be perverted to Gentilism, forbad their going to him. They regarding the Bishop's [prohibition] very little, continued their intimacy with Epiphanius. After this, Georgius, Successor to Theodotus, endeavour'd to reform [and wean] them from conversing with Epiphanius; but being unable to perswade them by any means, he punish'd them both with Excommunication. Apollinaris the son look'd upon what was done to be an injury, and confiding in the fluentness of his Sophistick faculty of speaking, he also framed a new Heresie, which flourisheth at this present, and bears the name of its Inventor. But some do report, that they dissented from Georgius, not so much upon account of the foremention'd reason, but because they saw he maintain'd absurdities; sometimes professing the Son to be like the Father (according as it had been determined [in the Synod] at Seleucia;) at others inclining to the Arian opinion. Laying hold therefore of this specious pretext, they made a separation [from him.] But when they saw no body adhered to them, they introduce a [new] Scheme of Religion: and at first asserted that (a) Humanity was assumed by God the Word in the Oeconomy of his Incarnation, without the Soul. But afterward, rectifying their former error, by repentance as it were, they added, that that the Soul was indeed assumed; but that it had not a Mind, but that God the Word was in the place of a Mind, in his assumption of Humanity. As to this point only these [Hereticks] do affirm that they dissent [from Catholicks] who from them are now called Apollinaristæ. For they assert that the Trinity is Consubstantial. But we shall mention the two Apollinaris's again in due place.

Constantius.

(a) The Arians asserted a tenet near of kin to this of the Apollinaristæ, or Apollinarians. Ἀρειομανῖται δὲ ἐκφανῶς μόνην, &c. Arius (says Athanasius de Adv. Christi,) professes the flesh only to be the Cover of the Deity; and asserts the Word to have been in the flesh, in the stead of our Inner man, that is, the soul. In this opinion he was followed by Eunomius, as Theodoret informs us, Contr. Hæres. Book 5. Chap. 11. But the Apollinarians differed from him: for they distinguished (as we may see from this passage in our Socrates) between the Soul and Mind of Man; acknowledging (in the second Edition of their Heresie) that God the Word assumed an humane Body and a Soul; (which latter Arius and his Crew denied) but not the Mind, or Spirit of Man; the place whereof was supplied, said they, by the Word it self. This Philosophick notion (making Man consist of three parts, a Body, a Soul, and a Mind;) they borrowed from Plotinus; so says Nemesius in his de Nat. Hom.

Concerning the Death of the Emperor Constantius.

MOreover, whilst the Emperor Constantius resided at Antioch, Julianus Cæsar engages with a numerous army of Barbarians in the Gallia's. And having obtain'd a victory, was for that reason greatly belov'd by all the Soldiers, by whom he is proclaim'd Emperor. This being told to the Emperor Constantius put him into an agony. He was therfore baptiz'd by Euzoius, and * undertakes an expedition against Julianus. But arriving between Cappadocia and Cilicia, he ended his life at Mopsucrenæ, (being seiz'd with an Apoplexy by reason of his too great solicitude) in the Consulate of Taurus and Florentius, on the third of November. This was the first year of the two hundred eighty fifth Olympiad. Constantius lived forty five years, and reigned thirty eight. He was his Fathers Colleague in the Empire thirteen years: after whose death [he govern'd] twenty five; which space of years this Book doth contain.

Concerning Julianus, his Extract and Education. And how, upon his being made Emperor, he revolted to Gentiliſm.

Julianus. THE Emperor Conſtantius ended his life on the Confines of Cilicia, about the third of November, in the Conſulate of Taurus and Florentius. During the ſame perſons Conſulate, Julianus arriving from the Weſtern parts (a) about the eleventh of December next enſuing, made his Entry into Conſtantinople, where he was proclaimed Emperor. Now whereas 'tis our deſign to ſay ſomething concerning the Emperor Julianus, a perſon famed for his eloquence; let none of thoſe who were his Intimado's, expect we ſhould do it in a pompous and majeſtick ſtyle, as if it were neceſſary, that a character of ſo eminent a perſon ſhould in every particular Correſpond with his greatneſs of whom 'tis given. But, the compoſure of an Hiſtory of the Chriſtian Religion being our buſineſs, we will continue making uſe of a low, plain, and mean ſtyle for perſpicuity's ſake. And this we promiſed [to do] at the beginning. Being therefore to ſpeak concerning him, his Extract, Education, and how he came to the Empire; in order to our performing hereof, we muſt begin a little higher. Conſtantius, he who gave Byzantium his own name, had two Brothers begotten by the ſame Father, but not born of the ſame Mother. The name of the one was Dalmatius, the other was called Conſtantinus. Dalmatius had a Son who bore his own name. Conſtantius begat two Sons, Gallus and Julianus. After the death of [Conſtantine] the Builder of Conſtantinople, when the Soldiers had murther'd Dalmatius the younger, at that time theſe * two alſo being Orphans, wanted but a little of falling into the ſame danger with Dalmatius; had not a diſtemper which ſeem'd to be mortal deliver'd Gallus [from their violence:] and the tenderneſs of Julianus's age (for he was not then eight years old compleat) protected him. But, after the Emperor's rage againſt them was mollified, Gallus frequented the Schools at Epheſus in Ionia, in which Country they had large poſſeſſions left them by their Anceſtors. And Julianus being grown up, was an Auditor in the Schools at Conſtantinople; going into the Palace (where there were then Schools) in a private habit, and was tutor'd by Macedonius the Eunuch. (b) Nicocles the Laconian taught him the Grammar; he had for his Rhetoric-maſter Ecebolius the Sophiſta, who was at that time a Chriſtian. For the Emperor Conſtantius took great care, leſt by his being an hearer of a Pagan-maſter, he ſhould revolt to the ſuperſtition [of the Gentiles:] For Julianus was at firſt a Chriſtian. Upon his making a great progreſs in Literature, a rumour [began] to be ſpread amongſt the people, that he was fit to govern the Roman Empire. Which report being more openly divulged, much diſturb'd the Emperor's mind. Wherefore, he removed him from the * Great City to Nicomedia, ordering him not to frequent [the School] of Libanius the Syrian Sophiſta. For at that time Libanius, having been expelled Conſtantinople by the School-maſters, had opened a School at Nicomedia. Wherefore, he vented his gall againſt the School-maſters, in an (c) Oration which he wrote againſt them. But Julianus was forbidden to go to him, becauſe Libanius was as to his Religion a Pagan. Nevertheleſs, being a great admirer of Libanius's Orations, he procured them privately, and peruſed them frequently and ſtudiouſly. When he had made a great proficiency in Rhetorick, there came to Nicomedia, Maximus the Philoſopher, not Julianus. * That is, Gallus and Julianus.

* That is, Conſtantinople.

(a) We have the ſame account in Idatius's Faſti: Tauro & Florentio his Coſſ. &c. in the Conſulate of Taurus and Florentius, Conſtantius Auguſtus died at Mopſucrinæ in the confines of Cilicia a Province of Phœnicia, on the third of November. And Julianus made his entry into Conſtantinople on the eleventh of December. But, what Socrates adds, to wit, that Julian was proclaimed Emperor in that City, muſt be ſo underſtood, not as if that were the firſt time of his being ſaluted Emperor: For he had been proclaimed Emperor in the Gallia's a long while before, whilſt Conſtantius was alive: But, upon his entry into Conſtantinople, he was declared Emperor by the Senate and Conſtantinopolitans, and took poſſeſſion of the Empire of the Eaſt. Valeſ.

(b) There are ſeveral Epiſtles of Libanius's extant, written to this Nicocles; particularly the ſeventh Epiſtle of his 4th Book, wherein Libanius excuſes the inſolency of a Citizen of Antioch, who had abuſed him: Amongſt other paſſages he ſays, that the fault of one Citizen was not to be aſcribed to the whole City. For in a City containing an hundred and fifty thouſand Inhabitants, 'tis not to be wondred at, if one bad Citizen be found: Whereas, neither in your Sparta (which yet has Lycurgus for its Law-giver) all are alike good and generous. Valeſ.

(c) This Oration of Libanius's againſt the School-maſters, is not (to my knowledge) now extant. Valeſ.

Julianus. (d) Maximus of Byzantium, Euclid's Father, but Maximus the Epheſian, whom the Emperor Valentinianus order'd to be ſlain afterwards, as being a practiſer of Magick. But this hapned a long while after. At that time, his coming to Nicomedia was occaſion'd by nothing elſe but Julianus's fame, which induc'd him to go thither. Julianus having had a taſte of Philoſophick Literature from him, began forthwith to imitate his Maſter's Religion, who alſo inſtill'd into his mind a deſire of the Empire. When the Emperor was made acquainted with theſe things, Julianus being betwixt hope and fear, became very deſirous of avoiding ſuſpicion; and he who had before been a ſincere Chriſtian, then began to act the Hypocrite. Being therefore ſhav'd to the very skin, he pretended to lead a Monaſtick life. Privately he employ'd himſelf about the ſtudy of Philoſophy; but in publick he read the Sacred Writings of the Chriſtians. Moreover, he was made a Reader in the Church of Nicomedia; and by this ſpecious pretext he avoided the Emperor's fury. All this he did out of fear. But [in the interim] he receded not from his hope, but told many of his friends, that thoſe would be happy times, when he ſhould be poſſeſt of the Empire. Whilſt his affairs were in this poſture, his Brother Gallus was created Cæſar, and in his journey into the Eaſt came to Nicomedia, to give him a viſit. Not long after this Gallus was ſlain, immediately upon which the Emperor grew ſuſpicious of Julianus. Wherefore he order'd a guard ſhould be ſet upon him. But as ſoon as he could get an opportunity of ſlipping away from his Keepers, he removed from place to place, and by that means made his eſcape. At length the Emperor's Wife Euſebia, having found him out during his abſconding, perſwades the Emperor to do him no harm, but to allow him a liberty of going to Athens, to ſtudy Philoſophy. From whence (that I may be brief) the Emperor ſent for him, and created him Cæſar. After which he married him to his Siſter Helena, and ſent him into the Gallia's againſt the Barbarians. For the Barbarians (whom the Emperor Conſtantius had a little before hired to be his Auxiliaries againſt Magnentius,) having been employ'd in no ſervice againſt the Tyrant, fell to deſtroying the Roman Cities. And in regard Julianus was as yet but young, he ordered him not to enter upon any thing of action without the advice of the Commanders of the Army. Who having receiv'd ſo large a Commiſſion, grew negligent in their management of affairs; upon which account the Barbarians increaſed in ſtrength. Julianus permitted the Commanders to ſpend their time in luxury and drinking; but he made the Soldiers more couragious, by promiſing a ſet reward to him who ſhould kill a Barbarian. This was the original cauſe, whereby both the Barbarians Forces were diminiſh'd, and alſo he himſelf was rendred more acceptable to the Soldiers. There is a report, that as he was entring into a Town, a (e) Crown, with which they [uſually] adorn the Cities, being hung up by Ropes between two pillars, fell down upon his head, and fitted it exactly, at which all that were preſent gave a ſhout; for by this ſign [it ſeem'd] to be portended, that he ſhould be Emperor. There are thoſe who ſay, that Conſtantius therefore ſent him againſt the Barbarians, that he might periſh there, in an engagement with them. But I know not whether they who report this, ſpeak the truth. For ſhould he have framed ſuch a deſign againſt him, after he had joyn'd him in marriage to his own Siſter, it would have been no other than a conſpiracy againſt himſelf. But let every one judge of this matter according to his own pleaſure. Moreover, upon Julianus's making a complaint to the Emperor of the ſlothfulneſs of his Military Officers, there was another Commander ſent to him, exactly agreeable to Julianus's courage. Having got ſuch an aſſiſtant, he made a bold attack upon the Barbarians. They diſpatch'd away an Embaſſador to him, informing him, that they were order'd by the Emperor's Letters to march into the Roman Territories, and the Letters were produced to him. But he clapt their Embaſſador into priſon; and having engaged their forces, routed them totally. He alſo took the King of the Barbarians priſoner, and ſent him to Conſtantius. Upon this fortunate ſucceſs, he is proclaim'd Emperor by the Soldiers. But becauſe they wanted an Imperial Crown, one of his Guards took the Chain which he wore about his own neck, and put it upon Julianus's head. After this manner therefore Julianus came to be Emperor. But what he did afterwards, let the hearers judge, whether or no they became a Philoſopher: For he neither ſent an Embaſſador to Conſtantius, nor did he ſhew him that reverence which was due to him, as being his Benefactor, but managed all affairs according to his own arbitrement. He changed the Governours of Provinces, and reproach'd Conſtantius in every City, by reciting in publick his Letters ſent to the Barbarians. Whereupon [thoſe inhabitants] revolted from Conſtantius, and came over to him. At that time he manifeſtly pull'd off his Mask of Chriſtianity. For he went from City to City, open'd the Heathen Temples, offer'd ſacrifice to idols, and term'd himſelf the * Pontifex Maximus. And ſuch as profeſſed Gentiliſm celebrated their heatheniſh Feſtivals [after their own manner.] By theſe proceedings of his he (f) takes an occaſion of raiſing a Civil War againſt Conſtantius. And, as far as in him lay, [he took care] that all thoſe Calamities ſhould have hapned, which are the conſequents of a War. For this Philoſopher's deſire could not have been (g) fulfilled without much blood-ſhed.

(d) Maximus of Epirus, or the Philoſopher of Byzantium is mentioned by Suidas: he wrote concerning inſoluble Queſtions, and concerning numbers; as alſo a Comment upon Ariſtotle, which he dedicated to Julianus the Emperor, his Scholar. Now, if this be true, Julianus had two Maximus's his maſters in Philoſophy, the one an Epirote, or a Byzantine; the other an Epheſian. There is extant an Elegie of Maximus the Epheſian in Libanius's forty firſt Epiſtle of his fifth Book, his words are theſe: χὴ φιλοσοφίας ἣν ἐδέξατο παρὰ μαξίμου τὴν φιλοσοφίαν ἀυξήσαντος τὲ ἡνίκα ἔζη, καὶ σβέσαντος τῇ τελευτῇ· i. e. and the Philoſophy, which he received from Maximus the Improver of Philoſophy whilſt he lived, and its Extinguiſher when he died. Valeſ.

(e) Epiphanius Scholaſticus renders thus ὅρους φοίνικος, a Crown of Laurel, with which the Cities were uſually adorned. Indeed the Provinces of the Roman Empire were wont to be repreſented in this habit, wearing Crowns like Towers upon their heads; as may be ſeen in the Notitia Imperii Romani. Yet any one may conjecture, that this place ſhould be thus worded: ἀφ' ὧν αἱ πόλεις τὰς βασιλέας κοσμοῦσι, with which the Cities adorn the Emperors. Valeſ.

* Or, Chief-Prieſt.

(f) Πολυπραγμονῶν τὰς ἀφορμὰς, (which is the phraſe here in the original) is by Epiphanius Scholaſticus rendred thus; quæſitâ occaſione, he took an occaſion, &c. But there may be another rendition of theſe words, thus: By doing hereof, he raiſed a Civil War againſt Conſtantius, having undertaken an expedition againſt him. Valeſ.

(g) The term διανύεσθαι muſt ſignifie here, to be fulfilled, compleated, or perfected, Epiphanius Scholaſticus therefore renders it thus: Non enim ſine multo ſanguine ſtudium ejus Philoſophi poterat adimpleri, i. e. for the deſire of this Philoſopher could not have been accompliſhed without much blood. Muſculus's Verſion (which is, declarari, could not have been declared) and alſo Chriſtophorſon's (which is, internoſci, could not have been diſcerned) are in my judgment abſurd. Valeſ.

But

Julianus. But God the Arbiter of his own Counſels, repreſs'd the * Impetus of one of theſe two Antagoniſts without any †damage to the Republick. For when Julianus arriv'd amongſt the Thracians, news was brought him, that Conſtantius was dead. And thus the Roman Empire at that time eſcaped a Civil War. But Julianus having made his entry into Conſtantinople, began immediately to conſider with himſelf, after what manner he might win the favour of the people, and procure their benevolence towards himſelf. He makes uſe therefore of this artifice. He very well underſtood, that Conſtantius was odious to all ſuch as embraced the Homoöuſian opinion, both becauſe he had driven them from their Churches, and alſo in regard he had proſcribed and baniſh'd the Biſhops belonging to them. He aſſuredly knew alſo, that the Heathens were ſorely vexed, becauſe they were prohibited ſacrificing to their Gods; and that they were very deſirous of getting an opportunity, wherein their Temples might be open'd, and they have a liberty of offering ſacrifices to their Idols. He was ſenſible, that for theſe reaſons both thoſe ſorts of people had privately rancor'd minds againſt his Predeceſſor [Conſtantius.] He alſo found, that all people in general highly reſented the violence of the Eunuchs, and the rapines (h) of Euſebius the principal perſon of the Bed-chamber to him. He therefore treated them all with a great deal of craft and ſubtlety. With ſome he diſſembled: Others he obliged by kindneſſes, being a great affecter of vain-glory. But he made it evident to all in general how he was affected towards the ſuperſtition [of the Heathens.] And firſt, that he might make Conſtantius odious for his cruelty towards his Subjects, and render him infamous amongſt the Vulgar, he commanded that the exiled Biſhops ſhould be recalled; and reſtored to them their Eſtates which had been confiſcated. Then he iſſued out an Order to his Confidents, that the Heathen-Temples ſhould be forthwith open'd. He alſo order'd, that ſuch perſons as had been injured by the Eunuchs, ſhould be repoſſeſſed of their goods which were unjuſtly taken from them. He puniſh'd Euſebius the principal perſon of the Imperial Bed-chamber with death, not only becauſe many perſons had been wronged by him, but alſo in regard he was aſſured, that his Brother Gallus had been murther'd upon account of his calumny [againſt him.] He took care that Conſtantius's body ſhould be honour'd with an Imperial funeral. He expelled the Eunuchs, Barbers, and Cooks out of his Palace: The Eunuchs, becauſe he had loſt his Wife, after whoſe death he reſolv'd not to marry any other; the Cooks, in regard he fed upon a very ſlender and mean diet: And the Barbers, becauſe, ſaid he, one is ſufficient for a great many. For theſe reaſons he put theſe ſorts of men out [of the Palace.] Moſt of the Notaries he reduced to their former condition, and ordered that the reſt ſhould be allow'd a ſalary befitting a Notary. He alſo retrenched the (i) publick way of conveyance of neceſſaries for [publick] uſes. Julianus. For example, [the uſe] of Mules, Oxen, and Aſſes; and permitted Horſes only to ſerve for ſuch publick conveniences. Theſe Acts of his are commended by ſome few perſons; but moſt men diſcommend them, becauſe the grandeur and magnificence of the Imperial riches being loſt, which creates an admiration in the minds of the Vulgar, he thereby rendred the dignity of an Emperor deſpicable, and obnoxious to contempt. Moreover he ſat up all night, compoſing Orations, which he recited at his going into the Senate-houſe: For he was the firſt and only Emperor ſince Julius Cæſar's times, that made Speeches in the Senate-houſe. He had an high eſteem for ſuch as were ſtudious about [any part of] Literature; but more eſpecially for thoſe who profeſſed Philoſophy. Wherefore, the report hereof brought ſuch as were pretenders to this ſort of Learning from all parts to the Palace, who wore their * Palliums, and were moſt of them more conſpicuous for their Garb, than their Learning. But they were all troubleſome to the Chriſtians, being perſons that were Impoſtors, and who always own'd the ſame Religion with the Emperor. He himſelf alſo was ſo exceſſively vain-glorious, that he reviled all his Predeceſſors in the Empire, in a Book he compoſed, which he entitled The Cæſars. The ſame proud temper of mind excited him to write Books againſt the Chriſtians alſo. His expulſion of the Cooks and Barbers was an act [befitting] a Philoſopher indeed, but not an Emperor. But in his reproaching and reviling [of others,] he did neither like a Philoſopher, nor an Emperor. For both thoſe ſorts of perſons are to be [of a temper of mind] ſuperior to all detraction and envy. An Emperor may indeed be a Philoſopher, in what bears a reſpect to modeſty and temperance: But a Philoſopher, ſhould he imitate an Emperor in all things, would tranſgreſs his Rules. Let thus much be curſorily ſaid concerning the Emperor Julianus, his Extract, Education, and Diſpoſition, and after what manner he came to the Empire.

* Or, Force. † Or, without the damage of others.

(h) Tranſlators perceived not that this place was faulty. I doubt not but Socrates wrote thus: [Εὐσεβίῳ τὲ τῷ πραιποσίτῳ τὰς ἁρπαγὰς, and the rapines of Euſebius the principal Perſon of the Bed-chamber to him.] For πραιπόσιτος ſignifies the Provoſt, or chief Officer of the ſacred Bed-chamber, which Office Euſebius then bore. Socrates does frequently uſe this word in this ſenſe; as we may ſee in his ſecond Book, Chap. 2. Valeſ.

(i) Gregory Nazianzen, in his former Invective againſt Julian, does confeſs alſo that the publick way, or manner of travelling and conveying of neceſſaries from place to place, was well rectified by Julian. For Conſtantius had impaired it much, by allowing the Biſhops every-where the uſe thereof, that they might come to the Synods convened by him. But, what regulations Julianus made in this matter, 'tis hard to determine. And yet we may conjecture from Socrates's words, that the way of travelling by Chariots (which was alſo called the Curſus Clavularis,) was put down by him, and that travelling on Horſe-back (upon Horſes provided for publick uſes) remained only in uſe. Johannes Lydus has treated at large de publico Curſu, in his Book de Menſibus. CHAP. II.

WE come now to mention what was tranſacted in the Churches at that time. In the great City Alexandria there hapned a diſturbance upon this account. There was a place in that City, which had for a long time lain waſte and neglected, (being filled with a great deal of filth,) wherein the Heathens had formerly celebrated their Myſteries to || Mithra, and had ſacrificed men. This place being vacant and uſeleſs, Conſtantius had ſome time before beſtow'd upon the Church of the Alexandrians. Georgius, deſirous to erect an Oratory therein, gave order that the place ſhould be cleanſed. Whilſt they were clearing of it, there was an † Adytum diſcover'd, of a vaſt depth, wherein were hid the Myſteries of the Heathens. Which were the Skulls of many Men, young and old, who, as report ſays, had heretofore been ſlain, at ſuch time as the Heathens made uſe of Divinations by the inſpection of entrails, and performed Magick ſacrifices in order to the inchantment of Mens Souls. The Chriſtians therefore, upon their diſcovery of theſe things in the Adytum of the Temple of Mithra, made it their buſineſs to expoſe theſe Heatheniſh myſteries to the view and deriſion of all men. And they began forthwith to carry them in triumph as 'twere about the City, ſhewing the multitude mens bare Skulls. When the Heathens that were at Alexandria beheld this, being unable to endure this ignominious affront, they became highly enraged: and making uſe of what came next to hand for a weapon, they fell with great violence upon the Chriſtians, and deſtroy'd many of them (a) by various ſorts of death. Some of them they killed with ſwords, others with clubs and ſtones: Others they ſtrangled with ropes: Some they crucified, inflicting this ſort of death on them deſignedly, in contumely to the Croſs [of Chriſt.] They wounded moſt of them. At which time, as it uſually happens in ſuch [Riots,] they ſpared not their neareſt Friends and Relatives. But one Friend ſlew another; Brother [murther'd] Brother; Parents their Children, outragiouſly embrueing their hands in one anothers blood. For which reaſon the Chriſtians left off cleanſing Mithra's Temple: But the Heathens dragg'd Georgius out of the Church, and having bound him to a Camel, tore him to pieces, after which they burnt him, together with the Camel.

|| The Perſians ſuppoſe Mithra to be the Sun to whom they offer many ſacrifices. No Perſon was initiated into the Myſteries hereof, before he had arrived to them by certain degrees of torture, and had declared himſelf holy, and approved by ſufferings.

† That is, A ſecret place in the Heathen Temples, to which none but their Prieſts had acceſs.

CHAP. III.

That the Emperor, incenſed at Georgius's Murther, ſharply rebuked the Alexandrians by his Letter.

BUT the Emperor highly reſented Georgius's murther, and by his Letter ſeverely reprehended the Citizens of Alexandria. There was a report ſpread abroad, as if they had done this to Georgius, who hated him upon Athanaſius's account. But my opinion is, that ſuch as entertain malice and hatred in their minds, do uſually put themſelves into their company who make inſurrections againſt unjuſt perſons. The Emperor's Letter, 'tis certain, lays the blame upon the Populace, rather than upon the Chriſtians. But Georgius was then, and had before (a) appear'd, troubleſome and offenſive to all perſons. And for this reaſon the multitude was incenſed againſt him in ſuch an high degree. But, that the Emperor [as I ſaid] does rather blame the People, you may hear from the Letter it ſelf.

(a) For an account of the reaſons of the Alexandrians hatred towards Georgius, conſult Ammianus Marcellinus, Book 22. pag. 223, &c. Edit. Pariſ. 1631. See alſo Epiphanius, in Hereſ. 76, to wit, that of the Anomœi. Valeſ.

EMPEROR CÆSAR JULIANUS, MAXIMUS, AUGUSTUS, to the Citizens of Alexandria.

Although you have no reverence for Alexander the Builder of your City, and (which is more) for that Great God the moſt holy Serapis; yet how is it that you have forgot both that Humanity and * Decorum, due to mankind in general? We will add, [which is due] to Us alſo, to whom all the Gods, eſpecially the Great Serapis, have aſſigned the Empire of the World. For whom it was fit you ſhould have reſerved the Cognizance of their caſe who had injured you. But perhaps, you were impoſed upon by anger and rage, which where it inhabits the mind, does uſually perpetrate moſt enormous facts. (b) But when you had repreſſed your fury, you afterwards added the commiſſion of an unjuſt act to what had on a ſudden been adviſedly reſolved by you. Nor were you of the Commonalty aſhamed of perpetrating thoſe things, for which you deſervedly hated them. For, declare to Us, [We adjure you] by Serapis, for what unjuſt acts were you incenſed againſt Georgius? You will undoubtedly make anſwer, becauſe he exaſperated Conſtantius, of bleſſed memory, againſt us: Alſo, becauſe he brought an Army into the ſacred City, and the (c) King of Egypt poſſeſt himſelf of God's moſt Holy Temple, and took away from thence the Images, the conſecrated Gifts, and the Furniture in thoſe ſacred places. At which when (as it was meet) you were highly incenſed, and attempted to defend God, (or rather his Goods and Poſſeſſions,) from violence; He, contrary to Juſtice, Law, and Piety, audaciouſly ſent armed men againſt you. [But] perhaps (in regard he was more afraid of Georgius than Conſtantius (d) He had made better proviſion for his own ſafety, had he at firſt behaved himſelf more moderately and civilly towards you, and not ſo tyrannically. You being therefore for theſe reaſons enraged againſt Georgius the enemy of the Gods, have again polluted your ſacred City, whenas you might have brought him to his Tryal before the Judges. For by this means neither murther, nor any other unlawful fact had been committed: but juſtice had been equitably and exactly done, which would have preſerv'd you guiltleſs from all manner of wickedneſs, and would have puniſh'd him who had impiouſly committed ſuch enormous crimes, and [laſtly] would have curbed all thoſe who contemn the Gods, and diſrepect ſo great Cities and ſuch a flouriſhing people; making the barbarity they practiſed againſt them the Præludium [as it were of]

Julianus.

* Or, good-behaviour.

(b) In the Florentine and Sfortian M. SS. inſtead of [ἀναστέλας] the reading is [ἀναστέλαντες] wherefore, I doubt not but this whole place is to be thus reſtored: εἶτα τῆς ὀεμῆς ἀναστέλαντες, τοῖς παρ' χρήμα βεβουλευμένοις καλῶς, ὕστερον ἐπηγάγετε τὴν παρανομίαν; But when you had repreſſed your fury, &c. Valeſ.

(c) He means Artemius, Commander in chief of the Forces in Egypt; as he is ſtiled by Theodoret, (Book 3. Chap. 17. Eccleſ. Hiſtor.) who relates, that he was deprived of his eſtate, and beheaded by Julian; becauſe, being Captain of Egypt in the reign of Conſtantius, he had broken many Images. It was he, who allowed Georgius the Arian a guard of Soldiers for his aſſiſtance, whilſt he deſtroyed the heathen Temples in Alexandria. See our notes on Amm. Marcellinus, Book 22. pag. 228. The Martrydom of this Artemius is extant in Simeon Metaphraſtes, in which many things are contained that do much illuſtrate the Hiſtory of theſe times. Valeſ.

(d) In that Edition of Julianus's works publiſhed by Petavius, printed at Paris 1630, (where this Letter of Julianus's to the Alexandrians is reckoned to be his tenth Epiſtle:) and in Nicephorus (Book 10. Chap. 7.) the reading and punctation of this paſſage is thus: ἑαυτὸν παρεφύλαττεν, εἰ μετειώτερον ὑμῖν ἢ πόλιτικώτερον, ἀλλὰ μὴ τυραννικώτερον πόρρωθεν προσεφέρετο. The beſt Verſion of which paſſage (for no leſs than four have rendred it into Latin) is Langus's; who has rendred it thus: Qui melius ſibi ipſi conſuluiſſet, ſi moderate vobiſcum & civiliter, nec tam tyrannicè ab initio egiſſet. We have followed the ſame ſenſe in our Rendition. But Chriſtophorſon's Verſion is reprovable, both for his inſerting the word [γὰρ, for] contrary to the authority of all Copies; and alſo, becauſe he excuſes Artemius Commander of the Forces in Egypt, as if he had carried himſelf civilly and moderately at the beginning of his Government. It would certainly have been moſt abſurd, ſhould Julian have excus'd him, whom he had ordered to be executed as a Criminal. If any one therefore has a mind to follow our Verſion, 'tis but inſerting one Particle only thus: ἴσως δέ.

But perhaps, &c. But Petavius (in his notes on this Epiſtle of Julianus, ſee the forementiond Edition) has produced another Emendation from ſome M. SS. Copies; after this manner, ὃς αὐτὸν παρεφύλαττεν, who had preſerved himſelf, &c. Valeſ.

their power. Compare therefore this Our Letter (e) with that We sent a while since, and consider the difference between them. How highly did We then commend you? But now, by the [immortal] Gods! When We should praise you, We cannot, by reason of your heinous Offence. The People are so audacious as to tear a Man piece-meal like Dogs. Nor are they afterwards abashed or careful of preserving their Hands pure, that they * may stretch them out undefiled with Blood in the presence of the Gods. But Georgius deserved to undergo these Sufferings. We might perhaps grant, [that he deserved] more horrid and acute Tortures. And should you say, [he deserved them] upon your account, We also assent to that. But should you add, [he deserved to have this inflicted on him] by you; that We can in no wise allow. For you have Laws, which ought to be observ'd and revered by you all, as well privately, as in publick. Now, suppose it happens, that some private persons do violate these Laws, yet the Community must be regulated by good Laws, and you are to pay obedience to those Laws, and not transgress what has from the beginning been well and prudently constituted. It has hapned very fortunately for you, O ye Alexandrians! that you have perpetrated such a Fact as this in Our Reign; Who, by reason of Our Reverence towards God, and upon account of Our (f) Grandfather and Uncle whose name We bear, (who governed Egypt and your City,) do retain a fraternal Affection for you. Certainly, that Power which suffers not it self to be disrespected, and such a Government as is severe, entire, and of an healthy Constitution, (g) could not connive at such an audacious insolence in its Subjects, but would diligently purge out that deadly Distemper as it were by a more acute Medicine. But We, for the reasons now mentioned, make use of that most mild and gentle Remedy in your Case, [to wit,] Exhortation and Discourse. To which, We are confident, We shall find you more readily submissive, because, (as We are informed) you are not only Grecians by original extract, (h) but do also still retain in your Minds and Endeavours a splendid and generous Character of that your Noble Descent. (i) Let it be published to Our Citizens of Alexandria. Thus wrote the Emperor.

(r) The reading in the Florent. M.S. and in Nicephorus is better than that in the vulgar Editions: it is thus [τῷ μικρῷ πρώην ἐπιστείλα, with that we sent, &c.] Vale.

* Or, produce them undefiled with blood before the Gods.

(f) In Nicephorus the reading is truer; where the term [πάππου Grandfather] is left out; and the clause is thus worded [διὰ τὸν θεῖον ἡμῶν καὶ ὁμώνυμον, upon account of our Uncle whose name we bear] He means Julian Exprefect of Egypt; concerning whom Amm. Marcellinus relates much. In Julianus's Epistles, both readings are retained thus: διὰ τὸν πάππον ἡμῶν καὶ τὸν θεῖον ὁμώνυμον, upon account of our Grandfather and Uncle whose name we bear. But this reading is not to be endured; for, what reason has Julianus to mention his Grandfather here? Sozomen does confirm Nicephorus's reading, as we may see, Book 5. Chap. 7. Eccles. Hist. Vales.

(g) I doubt not but this place should be thus worded; ἵνα δὴ μὴ θαῤῥοῦσιν τόλμημα; and we have rendred it accordingly. Vales.

(h) The reading should doubtless be [καὶ ταυτὸν ἔτι, τῆς εὐγενείας ἐκείνης, &c. but do also still, &c.

(i) It must be [προσταττέσθω Let it be published.] We have spoken concerning this clause (which was usually annext to the Emperors Edicts) in our Annotations on Eusebius, and think it superfluous to repeat it here. Vales.

CHAP. IV.

How, upon Georgius's being murthered, Athanasius returned to Alexandria, and recovered his own Church.

NOT long after, Athanasius returning from his Exile, was kindly received by the people of Alexandria, who at that time expelled the Arians out of the Churches; and gave Athanasius possession of the Oratories. But the Arians assembled themselves in some obscure and mean Houses, and Ordained Lucius in the place of Georgius. Such was the state of affairs then at Alexandria.

CHAP. V.

Concerning Lucifer, and Eusebius.

AT the same time Lucifer and Eusebius were by an Imperial Order recalled from banishment. Lucifer was Bishop of Caralis, a City of Sardinia: Eusebius of Vercellæ, which is a City of the Lygurians in Italy, as we have said before. Both these persons therefore returning from Exile out of the Upper Thebais, (a) held a consult how they might hinder the impaired Laws of the Church from being violated and despised.

(a) Eusebius and Lucifer were not the only Persons who entred into a consult about repairing the decayed state of the Church, and establishing the Canon of Faith; but other Bishops besides them, who by Julianus's Edict were at that time recalled from Exile: to wit, Hilarius, Asterius, and the rest, as Theodoret truly remarks, Book 3. Chap. 4. Eccles. Histor. These Prelates, moved thereto by a Zeal to the Catholick Faith, took in hand to reduce Hereticks and Schismaticks to the path of Truth, and recal them to their former Concord. Therefore, what Baronius says, to wit, that Eusebius and Lucifer were created Legates of the Apostolick See by Liberius, in order to their repairing the state of the Church, can in no wise be true. For the same must have been said concerning Hilarius and the other Prelates. Besides, Rufinus does expresly disprove this. For he relates, that Eusebius and Lucifer were Commissionated with this Legantine power by the Alexandrian Synod. Vales.

CHAP. VI.

How Lucifer arriving at Antioch, Ordained Paulinus.

IT was concluded therefore, that Lucifer should go to Antioch in Syria, and Eusebius to Alexandria: that, by assembling a Synod together with Athanasius, they might confirm the opinions of the Church. (a) Lucifer sent a Deacon as his Substitute, by whom he promised his assent to what should be determined by the Synod. But he himself went to Antioch, and finds that Church in a great disturbance: for the People disagreed amongst themselves. For, not only the Arian Heresie, which had been inttoduc'd by Euzoïus, divided the Church: but (as we have said * before) Meletius's followers also, by reason of their affection towards their Master, differ'd from those who embraced the same sentiments with them. Lucifer therefore, when he had constituted Paulinus Bishop over them, departed from thence again.

(a) Socrates borrow'd this out of Rufinus; who (in Book 1. Chap. 27. Eccles. Histor.) has these words: Lucifer autem cùm exoraretur ab Eusebio, &c. But Lucifer being entreated by Eusebius, that they might go together to see Athanasius at Alexandria, and in a general Consult with those Prelates that were left, determine concerning the state of the Church; refused to be present himself, but sends his Deacon as his Deputy. But from the Synodick Epistle, which Athanasius wrote in the name of the Alexandrian Synod to the Catholick Bishops which were in the City of Antioch, we are informed that Lucifer sent two of his Deacons to the Synod of Alexandria, Herennius and Agapetus; whom he sent after he had Ordained Paulinus Bishop of Antioch. For the Legates of Paulinus himself were present at this Synod, and subscribed Athanasius's Synodick Epistle. For these things were transacted thus. Soon after Eusebius's going to the Alexandrian Synod, Lucifer together with these two Bishops Cymatius and Anatolius (the one whereof was Bishop of Paltus, the other of Beræa,) created Paulinus Bishop of Antioch. Who, immediately after his Ordination, sent his Legates Maximus and Calamerus to the Alexandrian Synod. Also, Apollinaris Bishop of Laodicea (who had a peculiar Sect, and a Bishop of his own faction, at Antioch) sent his Legates at the same time. The Bishops of Egypt therefore who were met at Alexandria, when they had heard that Euſebius, Aſterius, and Lucifer's Legates were ſent by Lucifer, Cymatius, and Anatolius, and when they had admitted the Legates ſent by Paulinus and Apollinaris; departed every one to their own Sees, and gave order to Athanaſius and ſome other Biſhops who continued at Alexandria, that they ſhould write a Letter to the Biſhops convened at Antioch, concerning receiving the Hereticks and Schiſmaticks into communion, how they ought to behave themſelves in that affair. In obedience to their Order, Athanaſius wrote a Letter to the Biſhops convened at Antioch, to wit, to Lucifer, Euſebius, and Aſterius, (for theſe were now returned from the Alexandrian Synod:) Cymatius, and Anatolius. This Letter is extant in Athanaſius's works, which Baronius ſuppoſed to be the Synodick Epiſtle of the Alexandrian Synod. But 'tis manifeſt from the Contents of that Letter, that it was not written from the Synod it ſelf, but from Athanaſius; nor was it ſent to all the Biſhops, but to thoſe of Antioch in particular. Which may be concluded both from the inſcription it ſelf, and alſo from the Text of the whole Letter. For he treats therein concerning the affairs of the Antiochian Church only, as (beſides others) we are informed from this paſſage: Πάντας τοίνυν τοὺς ἐκλομβύους εἰρηνεύειν πρὸς ὑμᾶς, μάλιστα τοὺς ἐν τῇ παλαιᾷ συναγομβύους, καὶ τοὺς ἀπὸ τῶν Ἀρειανῶν, προσαλέπτεσθε παρ' ἑαυτοῖς. Which place Athanaſius's Tranſlator has rendred ill: The import of it in Engliſh is this; Invite therefore to you all thoſe that are deſirous of continuing in peace with you, eſpecially thoſe who celebrate their Conventions in the Old City, and ſuch as [come] from the Arians. Athanaſius means thoſe that adhered to Meletius Biſhop of Antioch. For they, being Separatiſts from the Euſtathians, had their Religious Meetings in the Palæa (that is, in the Old City,) as Theodoret atteſts, Book 2. Chap. 31. and Book 3. Chap. 4. Eccleſ. Hiſtor. Athanaſius ſpeaks of the ſame Perſons afterwards in the ſaid Epiſtle; [and diſtinguiſhes thoſe that had their meetings in the Old City, from the followers of Paulinus, that is, the Euſtathians. For Paulinus was one of their number. Thoſe therefore that had their Aſſemblies in the Palæa can be no other than Meletius's favourers, whom Athanaſius does moſt eſpecially commend. Valeſ.

CHAP. VII.

How Euſebius and Athanaſius accorded together, and aſſembled a Synod of Biſhops at Alexandria, wherein they expreſly declared, that the Trinity is Conſubſtantial.

BUT, as ſoon as Euſebius arrived at Alexandria, he, together with Athanaſius, was very diligent about convening a Synod. There aſſembled Biſhops out of ſeveral Cities, and conferred amongſt themſelves concerning many and moſt weighty matters. In this Synod they aſſerted the Divinity of the Holy Ghoſt, and included him in the Conſubſtantial Trinity. They likewiſe determined that Chriſt at his Incarnation aſſumed not only fleſh but an Human Soul, which was alſo the opinion of the primitive Eccleſiaſticks. For they introduced not any new Doctrine, invented by them, into the Church, but [confirmed] thoſe points which Eccleſiaſtick tradition had from the beginning aſſerted, and which the learneſt perſons amongſt the Chriſtians had demonſtratively affirm'd. For ſuch ſentiments as theſe all the Antients in their Diſputations concerning this Point have left us in their Writings. Irenæus, Clemens, Apollinaris of Hierapolis, and Serapion Preſident of the Church in Antioch, do aſſert this in the Books by them compoſed, (a) as an opinion by general conſent acknowledg'd, [to wit,] that Chriſt at his aſſumption of Fleſh was endow'd with a [Human] Soul. Moreover, the Synod convened upon (b) Berillus's account, who was Biſhop of Philadelphia in Arabia, in their Letter to the ſaid Berillus hath maintain'd the ſame Doctrine. Origen alſo doth acknowledge every where, in his Works which are extant, that Chriſt at his Incarnation aſſum'd an Human Soul: but more particularly, in the ninth Tome of his Comments upon Geneſis, he has explain'd the myſtery hereof; where he hath copiouſly prov'd, that Adam is a Type of Chriſt, and Eve of the Church. Holy Pamphilus, and Euſebius who borrow'd his ſirname from him, perſons worthy to be credited, do atteſt this. For both theſe perſons (who club'd in their drawing up the Life of Origen in writing, and anſwered ſuch as were prepoſſeſt with a prejudice againſt that perſon, in thoſe famous Books, wherein they made an Apology in defence of him,) do affirm, that Origen was not the firſt perſon engaged in this ſubject, but that he interpreted the myſtical Tradition of the Church. But, thoſe Biſhops preſent at the Synod of Alexandria, omitted not their reſearches into this queſtion, to wit, concerning * Ouſia and † Hypoſtaſis. For Hoſius Biſhop of Corduba in Spain (whom we formerly mention'd) who was ſent before by Conſtantine the Emperor, to compoſe the diſturbance at that time raiſed by Arius, being deſirous to root out the opinion of || Sabellius the Libyan, raiſed a diſpute concerning Ouſia and Hypoſtaſis, which was the occaſion of another diſſention. But the Nicene Synod, which was ſoon after convened, made not the leaſt mention of this diſpute. Notwithſtanding, in regard ſome perſons were afterwards deſirous of contending about this matter, for that reaſon theſe determinations were made in this Synod concerning Ouſia and Hypoſtaſis. (c) It was reſolved by them, that theſe terms ought not to be uſed concerning God. For, [they ſaid that] the

(a) This clauſe is thus worded in the Greek [ὡς ὁμολογούμενον αὐτοῖς;] where the term [αὐτοῖς] ought in my judgment to be expunged, as being unneceſſarily inſerted here by ſome careleſs Tranſcriber out of the foregoing line, where it occurs. But Nicephorus (Book 10. Chap. 14. where he writes out this paſſage of Socrates) makes uſe of the term [ὁμούσιον,] inſtead of [ὁμολογούμενον;] either becauſe that was the reading in his Copy; or elſe in regard he thought [ὁμολογούμενον] was to be ſo explained, Valeſ.

(b) Nicephorus (at the Book and Chapter now mentioned) calls this perſon Cyrillus. But, from the authority of the Florentine and Sfortian M. SS. we have termed him Berillus. Our emendation is confirmed by Epiphanius Scholaſticus's Verſion. Berillus was not Biſhop of Philadelphia, as Socrates ſays here, but of Boſtra (or of Boſtri) in Arabia: he denied Chriſt to have been God before his Incarnation, as Euſebius informs us, Book 6. Chap. 33. of his Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory; where ſee note (a.) That paſſage of Origen's muſt be underſtood concerning this Hereſie of Berillus's, which occurs in his Comment on the Epiſtle to Titus: where his words are theſe: Sed & eos qui hominem dicunt Dominum Jeſum, &c. Alſo thoſe, who affirm the Lord Jeſus to be a Man fore known, and predeſigned, who before his coming in the fleſh had no peculiar exiſtence of his own, but that being born Man he had the Deity of the Father only in him; theſe perſons, I ſay, cannot, without great danger, be accounted members of the Church. This paſſage occurs alſo in Pamphilus's Apologetick in defence of Origen. And Gennadius has mentioned it, in his Book De Dogmatibus Eccleſiaſticis, Cap. 4. Valeſ.

(c) The Acts of the Synod of Alexandria are not now extant; but 'tis ſufficiently apparent, both from that Synodick Epiſtle which Athanaſius wrote in the name of that Council, and alſo from hence, becauſe the Great Athanaſius was preſent at that Synod, that what Socrates here ſays is falſe. For, as to the Synodick Epiſtle, there occurs no ſuch paſſage in that, as this, that the terms Ouſia and Hypoſtaſis are not to be uſed as often as we ſpeak concerning God. Nor, would Athanaſius ever have ſuffered that to have been determined in his Synod, which does manifeſtly contradict the Nicene Creed. For in that Creed the term Ouſia does occur. Socrates ſeems to have been deceived by this paſſage in the Synodick Epiſtle: Πάντες τε τῇ τοῦ Θεοῦ χάριτι, &c. And, by the grace of God, all perſons, after ſuch interpretations of thoſe terms, unanimouſly agreed, that that Creed, which the Fathers made profeſſion of at Nice, was better and more accurate, and that in future, it was ſufficient, that the terms thereof ſhould be made uſe of. In which words, the terms Ouſia and Hypoſtaſis are not condemned: But this only is aſſerted, that it is more ſafe to uſe the terms of the Nicene Creed, than theſe, of three Hypoſtaſis's and of one Hypoſtaſis. For the debate at that time was only concerning theſe words; ſome affirming there were three Hypoſtaſis's in the ſacred Trinity, as did the followers of Meletius: Others, with Paulinus, profeſſing there was but one Hypoſtaſis. But no queſtion was then ſtarted concerning the term Ouſia. For both ſides aſſerted that there was one ſubſtance in the Trinity. How therefore can that which Socrates here ſays ſtand good, to wit, that it was Decreed in the Alexandrian Synod, that theſe terms Ouſia and Hypoſtaſis were not to be uſed concerning God? Perhaps alſo Sabinus (whoſe Collection Socrates had diligently peruſed) had led him into this miſtake. Valeſ.

Julianus. term Ousia was not so much as mention'd in the sacred Scriptures: and, that the * Apostle, obliged thereto upon a necessity of [delivering some] Opinions, had not rightly used the word Hypostasis. But they decreed, that these terms were to be admitted of upon another account, to wit, when they refute Sabellius's Opinion, lest, for want of expressive words, we should suppose [the Trinity to be] one thing called by a triple name; but we must rather believe every one (d) of those named in the Trinity, to be truly God in his proper person. These were the determinations of the Synod at that time. But nothing hinders, but we may briefly declare our knowledge concerning [the terms] Ousia and Hypostasis. Such persons amongst the Greeks as were Expositors of their Philosophy, have given various definitions of Ousia; but they have not made the least mention of Hypostasis. (e) Irenæus Grammaticus, in his Alphabetical Lexicon, entitled Atticistes, affirms this word [Hypostasis] to be a barbarous term: for it is not, [says he,] used by any of the Antients: but should it be any where found occurring, it is not taken in that sense wherein 'tis now used. For, in Sophocles (in [his Tragedy entitled] Phœnix) the term Hypostasis signifies Treachery. In Menander it imports] Sauces; (f) as if any one should term the Lees in any Hogshead of Wine Hypostasis. But, you must know, that altho' the ancient Philosophers did not make use of this term Hypostasis, yet the more modern Philosophick Writers used it frequently instead of * Ousia. Moreover, they have given us (as we said) various definitions of Ousia. But if Ousia may be circumscribed by a definition, how can we properly make use of this term in reference to God, who is incomprehensible? Evagrius, [in his piece intitled] Monachicus, dissuades us from discoursing rashly and inconsiderately concerning God. But he altogether forbids the defining of the Divinity, in regard it is a most † simple thing. For definitions, says he, belong to things that are compounded. The same Author delivers these very words. Every position, says he, has either a Genus which is prædicated, or a Species, or a Differentia, or a Proprium, or an Accidens, or what is compounded of these; but none of these can be supposed to be in the Sacred Trinity. Let that therefore which is inexplicable, be adored with silence. Thus [argues] Evagrius, concerning whom we shall speak hereafter. But, altho' we may seem to have made a digression by relating these things; yet we have mention'd them here, in regard they are useful and pertinent to the subject of our History.

They mean, I suppose those words of the Apostle at Hebr. 1. 3. Χαρακτὴρ τῆς ὑποστάσεως αὐτοῦ, the Character of his Subsistence, or (as our English Version words it) the express image of his person. Some of the Antients were very cautious about acknowledging three Hypostases in the Deity. Particularly St. Jerome, who thought that the term Hypostasis in this Text signified Substantia: and therefore in his Version 'tis thus rendred, figura substantiæ ejus, the figure of his substance. See Dr. Owen's account of this phrase, in his Exposition on the Hebrews, p. 55. &c. *Edit. CHAP. VIII.

AT the same time Athanasius recited the Apologetick he had formerly made concerning his own Flight, in the audience of those that were present. Some passages whereof, being useful and profitable, I will here insert, and leave the whole Book, in regard 'tis large, to be enquired out and perused by the studious. Behold [says he] these are the audacious Villanies of those impious wretches. These are their practises, and yet they blush not at the mischiefs they have formerly (a) contrived against us, but do even at this time accuse us, because we were able to escape their murdering hands. Yea rather, they are sorely troubled, because they have not quite dispatch'd us. In fine, under a pretence and colour they upbraid us with fear, but are ignorant that whilst they make a noise about this, they retort the crime upon themselves. For, if it be bad to fly, it is much worse to pursue. For the one absconds that he may not be murdered: but the other pursues with a design to murder. Yea, the Scripture informs us, that we must fly. But, he that seeks an occasion to murder, violates the Law, and does himself give [others] an occasion of flying. If therefore they upbraid us with our flight, they should rather be ashamed of their own pursuit. Let them leave plotting, and those that fly will soon desist from making their escape. But they cease not from acting their own Villanies; but do all they can to apprehend: being very sensible, that the flight of such as are pursued is a great evidence against them that pursue: For no body flies from a meek and good-natured person, but rather from one that is of a barbarous and malicious disposition. And therefore, * Every one that was discontented and in debt, fled from Saul to David. Wherefore, these persons also endeavour to slay such as conceal themselves, that there may seem to be no evidence to convince them of their wickedness. But in this case also these mistaken persons seem to be blinded. For by how much the more manifest the flight is, by so much will the slaughters caused by their treacheries, and the banishments be more evidently exposed to the view of all men. For, whether they kill, death will make a greater noise against them; or again, whether they banish, they do in every place † erect monuments of their own injustice against themselves. Were they therefore sound as to their Intellectuals, they might perceive themselves intangled herein, and egregiously mistaken in their own measures. But in regard they are infatuated, for that reason they are incited to persecute, and whilst they

(a) In Athanasius, pag. 705. the reading is [καθ' ἡμῶν ἐτυράννησαν, Tyrannically acted against us:] But I do rather approve of Nicephorus's reading, to wit, [καθ' ἡμῶν ἐτύρευσαν, contrived against us;] which Epiphanius Scholasticus has followed in his Version. Vales.

(d) Instead of [τῶν ὀνομάτων, of the names,] which is the common reading; the Florentine M. S. words it thus [τῶν ὀνομαζομένων, of those named.] But Nicephorus maintains the common reading; for he has recorded this passage of Socrates thus: ἀλλὰ ἕκαστον τῶν ἐν τῇ τειάδι παραλαμβανομένων ὀνομάτων ἐν ἰδίᾳ ὑποστάσει θεολογοῖτο τειχῆ διαιρούμενον. Which his Learned Translator Langus has thus rendred: Sed tribus usurpatis nominibus, res quæque in Trinitate tripliciter distincta peculiari subsistentiâ suâ intelligatur. But I cannot approve of this Rendition, in regard it recedes too far from the Authors words. Langus was puzled with these Words [τῶν ὀνομάτων, of the names,] and not without reason. For the bare name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, is neither believed, nor asserted to be God; but the things [or persons] signified by those names. Wherefore, the reading in the Florentine M. S. is, in my judgment, to be preferred before the vulgar reading; and we have rendred it accordingly. Vales.

(e) Irenæus Grammaticus was an Alexandrian, the Scholar of Heliodorus Metricus, who by a Latin name was called Minucius Pacatus. He wrote many Books concerning the propriety of the Attick Language. For he compiled three Books of Attick names, and as many more de Atticâ consuetudine in dictione & in prosodia, which were alphabetically digested: he composed one Book also de Atticismo, as Suidas relates in his Lexicon. Vales.

(f) Nicephorus (Book 10. Chap. 15.) reads this passage otherwise. For, instead of [ὅτι εἴ τις λέγοι, as if any one should term] he words it thus [ᾗ ἄλλος τῶν ἐν πίθῳ τρύγα φησίν· And another stiles it the Lees in an Hogshead.] Epiphanius Scholasticus translates this place thus: Apud Menandrum vero veluti fæces quæ ex vino colliguntur in dolio, ὑπόστασιν, id est, substantiam designare dicit. But, I think that there is another sense of these words; to wit, that Menander should term Sauce Hypostasis, because it settles in the bottom of the dish, like Lees, or Sediment, in an Hogshead. Vales.

But if they calumniate thoſe* [Holy] Perſons, as having done thus contrary to the will of God, they [demonſtrate themſelves] to be altogether unskill'd in the Scriptures. Upon this account, the Word himſelf alſo, (made Man for our ſakes,) when he was ſought for, vouchſafed to conceal himſelf, as we do; and being perſecuted again, he [was pleaſed] to fly, and avoid the Conſpiracy. For, it became Him, that as by hungring, thirſting, and undergoing theſe afflictions, ſo by this means alſo he ſhould demonſtrate himſelf to be made Man. At the very beginning, as ſoon as he was made Man, he himſelf, being as yet but a Child, gave this command to Joſeph by an Angel, * Ariſe, and take the young child and his mother, and flee into Egypt: for Herod will ſeek the youg childs life. And after the death of Herod, it appears, that (for fear of his Son Archelaus,) he retired to Nazareth. Afterwards, when he had demonſtrated himſelf to be God, and had healed the withered Hand, the Phariſees went out and entred into a conſult againſt him, * how they might deſtroy him. But when Jeſus knew it, he withdrew himſelf from thence. Moreover, when he had raiſed Lazarus from the dead, † From that day forth (ſays the Evangeliſt) they took counſel for to put him to death. Jeſus therefore walked no more openly among the Jews: but went thence unto a country near to the wilderneſs. Further, when our Saviour had ſaid, || Before Abraham was, I am; the Jews took up ſtones to caſt at him: but Jeſus hid himſelf, and went out of the temple. And going thorow the midſt of them, went away, and ſo eſcaped. When therefore they ſee theſe things, (b) or rather hear them, (for they ſee them not,) ought they not, according as 'tis written, to be burnt with fire, in regard they deſign and ſpeak the contrary to what our Saviour did and taught. In fine, when John had ſuffered Martyrdom, and his Diſciples had buried his Body; * When Jeſus heard of it, he departed thence by Ship into a deſart place apart. Theſe things our Lord did, and thus he taught. But I wiſh theſe perſons could be perſwaded to] be even in ſuch a manner aſhamed, that they would confine their raſhneſs to men only, and not proceed to ſuch an heighth of madneſs, as to charge our Saviour with fearfulneſs, (c) againſt whom they have once already deſignedly invented Blaſphemies. But no Man will ever tolerate this their madneſs: but rather by their ignorance in the Goſpels they will be confuted by all Men. For, there is a rational and true cauſe for ſuch a retreat and flight as this is: which, as the Evangeliſts have recorded, * was made uſe of by our Saviour. And from hence we ought to ſuppoſe, that the very ſame [cauſe of flight] † was made uſe of by all the Saints. For what ever is recorded concerning our Saviour as Man, the ſame ought to be referred to Mankind in general. For he aſſumed our Nature, and demonſtrated in himſelf † ſuch affections and diſpoſitions of Mind as are agreeable to our infirmity. Which John has ſet forth in theſe words: * Then they ſought to take him: but no man laid hands on him, becauſe his hour was not yet come. Yea, before that hour came, he himſelf ſaid to his Mother, † Mine hour is not yet come. And to thoſe who were called his Brethren [he ſaid] * My time is not yet come. Again, when the time was come, he ſaid to his Diſciples, || Sleep on now, and take your reſt: for behold, the hour is at hand, and the Son of man ſhall be betrayed into the hands of ſinners. Neither therefore permitted he himſelf

(b) Inſtead of [μᾶλλον δὲ καταγινώσκοντες, or rather conſider them] we follow the reading in the Edition of Athanaſius, which is thus [μᾶλλον δὲ καὶ ἀκούοντες ἐπεὶ μὴ βλέπουσι, πῶς κατὰ τὸ γεγραμμένον ὃ θελήσουσι φλέγεσθαι πυρὶ κακοῦσοι, &c. or rather hear them, (for they ſee them not,) ought they not, according as 'tis written, to be burnt with fire, &c. But Muſculus and Chriſtophorſon join theſe words [according as 'tis written] with theſe [for they ſee not;] as if Athanaſius had alluded to that ſaying of the Goſpel, Matt. 13. 13; they ſeeing, ſee not: Which Repetition I like not. For the Arians could not then ſee thoſe things, which had been done long before their age. I am alſo of the ſame opinion with Langus, that the term [πυρὶ κακοῦσοι, burnt with fire] is to be underſtood of eternal fire, or of fire ſent from heaven. After the same manner also did the blessed Martyrs consult their own preservation in the Persecutions which now and then hapned. When they were persecuted they fled, and continued in places of concealment: But when found out, they suffer'd Martyrdom.* Thus has Athanasius discoursed in his Apologetick concerning his own Flight.

CHAP. IX.

How (after the Synod at Alexandria [made up] of those who asserted the Homoöusian Faith,) Eusebius, returning to Antioch, found the Catholicks disagreeing there upon account of Paulinus's Ordination; and being unable to bring them to an agreement, he departed from thence.

BUT Eusebius Bishop of Vercellæ, immediately after the Synod, went from Alexandria to Antioch: Where finding Paulinus ordained by Lucifer, and the Populace disagreeing amongst themselves, (for the followers of Meletius had their assemblies apart by themselves:) he was troubled, because all people did not unanimously agree to the Ordination that had been made, and in his own thoughts disapprov'd of what was done. But, by reason of the reverence and respect he bore to Lucifer, he held his peace, and went away, having promised, that he would rectifie what had been done, in a Synod of Bishops. Afterwards, he used his utmost diligence to unite the Dissenters, but could not effect it. In the interim, Meletius returned from his Exile. And finding his followers celebrating their assemblies apart by themselves, he headed them. But Euzoïus, a Prelate who embraced the Arian Tenets, was possess'd of the Churches. Paulinus had only one of the lesser Churches within the City, out of which Euzoïus had not ejected him, by reason of the reverential respect he had for him. But Meletius had his meetings without the gates of the City. After this manner therefore did Eusebius depart from Antioch at that time. But when Lucifer understood that his Ordination was not approved by Eusebius, he lookt upon it as an injury, and was highly incensed. Wherefore he separated himself from Eusebius's Communion, and out of a pertinacious Contentiousness, presumed to reprove what had been determined by the Synod. These things being transacted in a time of sadness and discord, caused many persons to separate from the Church. For there sprung up another new Heresie, [the followers whereof were termed] Luciferians. But Lucifer was not in a capacity of satisfying his anger. For he was bound by his own (a) promises, by which (a) The term here in the original is [ἀπολογίαις, defences,] which is in no wise agreeable here. Therefore, instead thereof, Nicephorus substituted these words [ταῖς ἰδίαις πάλαις, by his own Nets.] In my judgment, it should be [ταῖς ὁμολογίαις, by his own promises;] and so Epiphanius read it, as appears by his Version. But Rufinus (Book 1. Chap. 30. Eccles. Hist.) has this passage only; sed constringebatur, &c. But he was bound by the bond of his Legate, who by his authority had subscribed in the Council. Afterwards, Rufinus adds these Words concerning Lucifer, si vero recepisset Alexandrini decreta concilii, &c. But, had he admitted of the determinations of the Alexandrian Council, he saw that all his attempts must have been frustrated. But I see no reason why Lucifer should reject the Alexandrian Synods determinations. For that Synod had approved of Paulinus's Ordination, as I have remark'd before from Athanasius's Synodick Epistle. And whereas Eusebius subscribed that Epistle, he also may seem to have approved of Lucifer's Ordination of Paulinus. Yet, the same Eusebius coming to Antioch after the Alexandrian Council, and perceiving the disagreement between the Catholicks, would communicate with neither party, as Rufinus attests in the fore-quoted Book and Chapter: that is, he abstained as well from Paulinus's as Meletius's Communion. Vales.

(being sent by his Deacon) he had engaged that he would assent to the Synod's determinations. Wherefore, he retained the Ecclesiastick Faith, and departed into Sardinia to his own See. But such as at first were aggriev'd together with him, do hitherto continue Separatists from the Church. Further, Eusebius, like, a good Physician, travelled over the Eestern Provinces, where he perfectly recovered those that were weak in the Faith, teaching and instructing them in the Doctrines of the Church. Departing from thence, he arriv'd in Illyricum and afterwards went into Italy, where he took the same course. Julianus.

CHAP. X.

Concerning Hilarius Bishop of Poictiers.

BUT Hilarius Bishop of Poictiers (which is a City ~~of the second Aquitania~~) had prevented him, having before-hand laid the foundations of such points as were agreeable to the Catholick Faith [in the minds] of the Bishops in Italy and Gallia. For he, returning first from banishment, arrived in those Countries before him. Both of them therefore vigorously defended the Faith. But Hilarius, being a person endow'd with a great stock of eloquence, asserted the Homoöusian opinion in Books which he wrote in the Latin tongue: wherein he sufficiently confirmed * that Faith, and powerfully confuted the Arian Tenets. These things hapned a little after the recalling of those that had been banished. But you must know, that at the same time Macedonius, Eleusius, Eustathius, and Sophronius, (and [the rest of that Sect] who were all called by one general name Macedoniani) held frequent (a) Synods in various places. And having called together those who in Seleucia were followers of their opinion, they Anathematized the Prelates of the other party; I mean, the Acacians. They also rejected the Ariminum Creed, and confirmed that which had been recited at Seleucia. Which Creed was the same that had before been set forth at Antioch, according as we have remark'd in our foregoing * Book. And when by some persons they were asked this question: You who are termed Macedoniani; if you differ in your sentiments from the Acacians, how comes it to pass, that you have (b) communicated with them (c) until now, as

* That is, the Homoöusian Faith.

(a) Concerning these little Synods, or Conventicles, of the Macedoniani, this passage in Basilius's 72 Epistle, Ad Evæsenos is to be understood; πίστις παρ' ἡμῖν οὐκ ἄλλη μὲν ἐν σελευκείᾳ, &c. There is not amongst us one faith at Seleucia, another at Constantinople: a third at Zela, a fourth at Lampsacum, and a fifth at Rome. Vales.

* See Book 2. Chap. 39.

(b) This was with good reason objected against the Macedonians, that whereas they dissented from the Acacians in the Draught of the Creed, and were deposed by them in the Seleucian and Constantinopolitan Synod; yet notwithstanding this, they communicated with them. Basilius, 'tis certain, accuses them upon this account in his 73 Epistle ad suos Monachos. Basilius's words there are to be understood concerning Eustathius and the Macedonians, who blamed Basilius, because he had heretofore communicated with Eudoxius, as 'tis apparent from his 79th Epistle to Eustathius. Vales.

(c) Nicephorus understood this passage of Socrates otherwise; he words it thus: τίδη πολὺ τῶν τοῖς περὶ ἀκάκιον διαφέρονται, ὁμόφρονες αὐτοῖς τὸ πρότερον καὶ κοινωνοὶ καθεστῶτες, i.e. Why do you now dissent from the Acacians, with whom you have heretofore agreed and communicated? Nicephorus therefore seems to have taken these words [ἄχει νῦν until now] for [ἄχει τότε, hitherto.] But I like not this exposition, and am of opinion, that [ἐκοινωνεῖτε, did communicate] is by Socrates used instead of [κοινωνεῖτε, do communicate.

Which Basilius does mightily confirm in his fore-quoted Epistle, and Epiphanius (in Hæres. Semiarian.) Where he says, that although the Semiarians were divided into several Factions, yet they dissented in words only, but in reality agreed in the same opinion: in so much that it would be very difficult to assign the point wherein they disagreed amongst themselves. But upon a more mature consideration of the matter, I judge Nicephorus's sense of these words to be truer. For Socrates says, that Eleusius, Eustathius, and the rest of the Macedonians did at this time (that is, in the Reign of Julian) first make up a Body of their own Sect, and, having covened Synods, did confirm the Creed of the Antiochian Synod, and anathematize Acacius with his Followers: and that when they were questioned by some, why they had communicated with the Acacians (whose Creed they did reject) so long after the Seleucian Synod; they returned this answer by Sophronius; to wit, The Western Prelates erred, in regard they asserted the Homoöusian Faith: the Easterns, being followers of Aëtius's opinion, professed the Son to be dislike the Father: but we keeping the middle way, do affirm the Son to be like the Father according to his subsistence. This is Sophronius's answer. Which that it may satisfie the question proposed, this must necessarily be understood, to wit; Since therefore the Acacians entertained the same Sentiments, it need not be wondred at, that we have hitherto held communion with them. Acacius, 'tis certain, did profess the Son to be like the Father, in the same manner as the Macedonians did. See Sozomen, Book 5. Chap. 14. Vales.

Julianus. being of the same opinion with you? To this demand they return'd an answer by Sophronius Bishop of Popeiopolis a City of Paphlagonia, after this manner: The Western Bishops, says he, were infected (as it were with a disease) with the Homoöusian opinion. Aëtius in the East, having adulterated [the Doctrine of the Faith,] introduced [an opinion, whereby he maintained] a dissimilitude of substance [between the Son and the Father.] Both these opinions were impious. For, the Western Bishops did rashly knit together in one the distinct persons of the Father and Son, binding them together with that Cord of iniquity, the term Homoöusios. Aëtius wholly separated that affinity of nature which the Son hath to the Father, by [introducing] this expression, Unlike according to * Essence. Since therefore, [the Assertors of] both these opinions fall into the highest extreams of opposition, the middle way between these two assertions seem'd to us to be more agreeable to truth an piety, whereby 'tis affirmed, that the Son is like to the Father † according to Subsistence. (d) This is the answer which the Macedoniani return'd by Sophronius to that question, as Sabinus says in his Collection of the Acts of Synods. But, whereas they accuse Aëtius as being the Author of the † Anomoian opinion, and not Acacius, 'tis apparent, they do fallaciously corrupt the truth, thinking to avoid the Arians on the one side, and the Homoöusians on the other. For they are confuted by their own words, that through a desire of innovating they have made a separation from them both. But let thus much be said concerning these [persons.]

* Or, Substance.

† Καθ' ὑπόστασιν; See Chap. 7. of this Book.

(d) This place is very intricate. The answer of the Macedoniani (which Socrates has related above, out of Sabinus) is obscure enough. But the censure and reprehension of that answer (which Socrates now subjoins,) seems to be much more obscure. Nor does Nicephorus give us any assistance here; for he has transcribed this passage of Socrates's almost word for word. Notwithstanding, we will endeavour to produce something in order to the illustration of this place. This therefore is our Sentiment. The Macedoniani were asked, why they dissented from Acacius, with whom they had before held Communion. In their answer they blamed the Homoöusians and Aëtius. This is nothing to the purpose, says Socrates. For you were not questioned concerning Aëtius, but concerning Acacius; you do meerly sophisticate: For Acacius, as well as you, does condemn Aëtius's opinion. Now, whereas you condemn Aëtius's opinion, you are not for that reason any whit less Hereticks. For by your own words you are convinced of a Novelty or Heresie, whilst you assert the Son to be like the Father according to subsistence. Wherein you dissent as well from the Catholick followers of the Nicene Creed, (who profess him to be of the same substance with the Father,) as from the Arians, who asserted him to be a Creature, or dislike in respect of his Substance. 'Tis certain, Theodoret (Book 4. Hæret. Fabul.) does say, that Macedonius asserted the Son of God to be every way like to the Father, and that he was the first who invented the term Homoiöusios. He was therefore one of the Semiarians, as well as Acacius. Vales.

CHAP. XI.

How the Emperor Julianus exacted Money from the Christians.

BUT, the Emperor Julianus, having at the beginning of his Reign shown himself mild and gracious to all persons, in process of time did not demonstrate himself to be of such a like temper towards every one. For whenever there hapned any occasion of calumniating Constantius, he most readily granted the Christians requests. But when no such [reflections] were to be made, he made all men apparently sensible of that private hatred which he had conceiv'd against the Christians in general. Forthwith therefore he issues out an Order, that the Church of the Novatians in Cyzicum, which had been totally demolished by (a) Euzoius, should be rebuilt; imposing a most burthemsome penalty upon Eleusius Bishop of that City, if he did not perfect that building at his own charge within the space of two months. He also promoted Gentilism with his utmost endeavour: And (as we have said before) he opened the Pagan Temples. Yea, he himself did publickly offer sacrifice to the Genius of the City Constantinople in the (b) Basilica, where the Image of the Publick Genius was erected.

(a) It must be [ὑπὸ Ἐλδοσίου, by Eleusius] as 'tis apparent from the following words. So Christophorson found the reading to be, as is evident from his Version. See Sozomen. Vales.

(b) He means I suppose, that Basilica [or Cathedral] which was in the fourth Ward of the City Constantinople. For this was simply and absolutely called The Cathedral. The other was termed the Theodosian Cathedral, which stood in the seventh Ward of the City, as we are informed from the old description of that City. In the former Basilica therefore, the Image of the City Constantinople's publick Genius had heretofore been placed. For so these words of Socrates [τῆς Κωνσταντίου πόλεως τύχη δημοσία] must be rendrd. For the Greeks do usually call that τύχη, which the Latines term Genius; and τυχία are the Temples of the publick Genius; see Euseb. Book concerning the Martyrs of Palestine, Chap. 11. note (q.) Vales.

CHAP. XII.

Concerning Maris Bishop of Chalcedon.

MOreover, at this time, Maris Bishop of Chalcedon in Bithynia being led by the hand into the Emperor's presence, (for he was very aged, and had that distemper in his eyes termed the Pin and Web:) when he came before him, he reproved him sharply, terming him an Impious person, an Apostate, and an Atheist. The Emperor returned him opprobrious language for his reproaches, calling him blind fellow. And your Galilæan God (said he) will never cure you. (For Julianus did usually term Christ The Galilæan; and Christians Galilæans.) But Maris answer'd the Emperor with a greater confidence: I thank God (said he) for depriving me of mine eyes, that I might not behold your face, who have fal'n into such horrid impieties. The Emperor made no return hereto, (b) but was severely revenged on him [afterwards.] For when he perceived, that those who suffer'd Martyrdom in the Reign of Diocletian, were honour'd by the Christians; and having observ'd that many persons were very desirous of being made Martyrs, as if he resolved to be

(b) In the Florent. and Sfortian M.SS. the reading here is [ἀλλὰ τοῦτο μεθήρχετο, but revenged it afterwards:] which reading pleases me best. For Julianus was not afterwards in any instance revenged upon Maris in particular; but he persecuted all the Christians in general, with that sort of persecution which Socrates relates. Nicephorus met with the same reading in his Copy: For thus he has expresst this passage in Socrates: Δεινῶς δὲ λίαν τὸ ἐγκλημα μεθήρχετο, but he was in a very horrid manner revenged for that thing. Vales.

Julianus. revenged on the Christians, upon this very account he took another course. He declined indeed that extremity of cruelty [practised] in the Reign of Diocletian: Nevertheless, he did not wholly abstain from [raising] a Persecution. For I call that a Persecution, when those who live peaceably, are by any means whatever disquieted and molested. Now, he disturbed them after this manner: He made a Law, that the Christians should not be allow'd an education in Humane Literature; Lest (said he) when they have sharpned their Tongues, they should with a greater readiness answer the * Disputants amongst the Heathens.

* Or, Logicians.

CHAP. XIII.

Concerning the Tumult raised by the Heathens against the Christians.

HE also issued out an Order, that those who would not relinquish the Christian Religion, and come and offer sacrifice to Idols, should not hold any Military employ about Court. Nor would he permit the Christians to be Governours of Provinces, saying, that their Law forbad the use of the sword against such Delinquents as had deserv'd a capital punishment. Moreover, he induced many persons, partly by flatteries, and partly by gifts, to sacrifice. Immediately therefore both those who were true Christians, and also they who pretended [the profession of that Religion, being try'd] in a furnace as it were, were apparently manifested to all men. For such as sincerely and cordially professed Christianity, willingly left their Military Offices, being resolv'd to suffer any thing, rather than renounce Christ. Amongst whom were Jovianus, Valentinianus, and Valens, all which persons afterwards wore the Imperial Crown. But others, who were not found Christians, (a) who preferred riches and secular honours before the true felicity, without the least delay submitted and offer'd sacrifice. One of which number was Ecebolius, a Sophista of Constantinople. Who making himself conform to the dispositions and humours of the Emperors, was in Constantius's time pretendedly a very zealous Christian. In Julianus's Reign he seem'd a very fierce assertor of Gentilism. After Julianus's death, he would needs profess Christianity again: For having prostrated himself before the Door of the Oratory, he cried out, Trample upon me who am salt without savour. This is the true character of Ecebolius, a person, as at first, so afterwards, light and inconstant. At that time the Emperor, desirous to be revenged upon the Persians for the frequent incursions they had made into the Roman Territories in the Reign of Constantius, went in great haste through Asia into the East. But being sensible of the many mischiefs which accompany a War, and that a vast Treasure is required [to carry it on,] without which it cannot be commodiously managed; he craftily devised a way to extort money from the Christians. For he imposed a pecuniary mulct upon those that refused to sacrifice: and the exaction was very severe upon such as were sincere Christians. For every one was compelled to pay proportionably to his estate. And thus the Emperor, by an unjust collection of ill-gotten money, was in a short time mightily enrich'd. For that Law was put in execution, not only where the Emperor was present, but in those places also to which he came not. At the same time also the Pagans made incursions upon the professors of Christianity: and there was a great conflux of such as termed themselves Philosophers. Moreover, they constituted certain detestable Rites; in so much that they sacrificed young Children, as well males, as females, inspected their entrails, and tasted of their flesh. And these were their practices, both in other Cities, and also at Athens and Alexandria. At which City likewise they framed calumnious accusation against Athanasius the Bishop, acquainting the Emperor that he would destroy that City and all Egypt, and therefore that it was requisite he should be driven from that City. The (b) Prefect also of Alexandria, according to the Emperor's command, made an attempt against him.

Julianus.

(b) The name of this Prefect of Egypt [who in the Greek is called Prefect of Alexandria] was Hermogenes, as we are informed from Julian's 23d Epistle. Vales.

(a) Instead of [ὅσοι τὰ χρήματα, who preferred riches, &c.] I suppose it should be] ὡς τὰ χρήματα, in regard they preferred, &c.] Which emendation is confirmed by Epiphan. Scholasticus's Version; and by Nicephorus's expressing of this passage, in his tenth Book, Chap. 23. Vales.

CHAP. XIV.

Concerning Athanasius's Flight.

BUT *he fled again, saying these words to his intimate acquaintance; Friends, let us recede a little while; for 'tis a small cloud, which will soon vanish. Having spoken these words, with all possible celerity he went aboard of a ship, and passing over the Nile, fled into Egypt. They who endeavour'd to apprehend him, made a close pursuit after him. When he understood that his pursuers were not far behind, those that accompanied him, perswaded him to fly into the Wilderness again. But by making use of prudent advice, he escaped those that pursued him. For he perswaded his followers to turn back and meet the pursuers, which was done with all possible speed. When therefore they, who a little before fled, approach'd the pursuers (a) the persons who sought [for Athanasius,] ask'd his followers nothing [but this,] whether they had seen Athanasius. They gave them notice, that he was not far off, and said, that if they made haste, they would soon apprehend him. Being after this manner imposed upon, they pursued him very hotly, but in vain. Athanasius having made his escape, came privately to Alexandria, and absconded there till such time as the persecution ceased. Such were the miseries which befel the Bishop of Alexandria, after his frequent persecutions and troubles, occasion'd partly by the Christians, and partly by the Heathens. Moreover the Presidents of Provinces, supposing the Emperor's superstition to be a fair opportunity of [increasing] their private gain, treated the Christians very ill, beyond [what] the Imperial Order [commission'd them to do:] one while exacting greater sums of money from them than they ought to have done; at other times inflicting on them corporal punishments. These things the Emperor was sensible of, but conniv'd at them. And to the Christians, making their addresses to him upon this account, his answer was, 'Tis your duty, when you are afflicted, to bear it patiently: for this is the command of your God.

* Athanasius.

(a) In my judgment, this passage should be worded thus [εἰ ζητοῦντες παρὰ τῶν διωκόντων τὸν ἀθανάσιον, εἴ που ἀθανάσιον τεθέανται, Those who sought for him, ask'd his followers, whether they had seen Athanasius:] the term [οὐδέν, nothing] being expunged; which is superfluous. Nicephorus confirms our emendation; in whom this word [nothing] occurs not; either because he found it not in his Copy, or else in regard he disliked that expression. Further, this whole story is taken out of Rufinus. Vales.

CHAP. XV.

Concerning thoſe who in the Reign of Julianus ſuffer'd Martyrdom at Merus a City of Phrygia.

AT the City Merus, Amachius Preſident of the Province of Phrygia, gave order for the opening of the Temple there, and commanded it ſhould be cleanſed from the filth heapt up therein by length of time, and that the Images in it ſhould be poliſh'd and trim'd up. This fact did ſorely trouble the Chriſtians. One Macedonius, Theodulus, and Tatianus, out of their zeal to the Chriſtian Religion, were unable to bear that indignity. But, having acquired a warmth and fervency of affection towards Vertue, they ruſh'd into the Temple by night, and brake the Images in pieces. The Governour, highly incenſed at what was done, reſolv'd to deſtroy many in that City who were guiltleſs: whereupon the Authors of this fact rendred themſelves on their own accord; and choſe rather to die themſelves in defence of the Truth, than to ſee others put to death in their ſtead. The Governour having ſeized theſe perſons, order'd them to expiate the crime they had committed, by ſacrificing. Upon their refuſal to do that, he threatned them with puniſhment: But, being perſons endow'd with a great courage of mind, they diſregarded his menaces, and ſhew'd themſelves prepared to undergo any ſufferings whatever. And choſe to die, rather than be polluted by ſacrificing. When therefore he had made theſe Men undergo all manner of tortures, at laſt he gave order they ſhould be laid on Grid-irons, under which he commanded fire to be put, and ſo deſtroyed them. At which time they gave the higheſt and moſt heroick demonſtration of their fortitude, by theſe words of theirs to the Preſident: Amachius, if you deſire to eat broyled fleſh, turn us on the other ſide, leſt we ſhould ſeem half broyled to your taſte. After this manner theſe perſons ended their lives.

CHAP. XVI.

How (when the Emperor prohibited the Chriſtians from being educated in the Grecian Literature,) the two Apollinaris's betook themſelves to writing of Books.

BUT, that Imperial Law, which prohibited the Chriſtians from being educated in the Grecian Literature, made the two * above-mentioned Apollinaris's far more eminent than they had been before. For, whereas both of them were perſons well skill'd in Human Learning, the Father in Grammar, the Son in Rhetorick, they ſhew'd themſelves very uſeful to the Chriſtians at that juncture of time. For, the Father, being an exquiſite Grammarian, † compoſed a Grammar agreeable to the form of the Chriſtian Religion: He alſo turn'd the Books of Moſes into that term'd Heroick Verſe: and likewiſe paraphraſed upon all the Hiſtorical Books of the Old Teſtament; putting them partly into † Dactylick Verſe, and partly reducing them into the form of * Dramatick Tragedy. He [deſignedly] made uſe of all ſorts of Verſe, that no mode of expreſſion [peculiar to] the Grecian Language, might be unknown, or un-heard-of amongſt the Chriſtians. But the Younger Apollinaris, a perſon provided with a good ſtock of eloquence, explain'd the Goſpels and Apoſtolick Writings, by way of Dialogue, as Plato amongſt the Grecians [had done.] Having rendred themſelves uſeful after this manner to the Chriſtian Religion, by their own labours they vanquiſh'd the Emperor's ſubtlety. But Divine Providence was more prevalent and powerful, than either theſe perſons induſtry, or the Emperor's attempt. For that Law quickly became extinct, together with the Emperor [who made it,] as we will manifeſt in the procedure [of our Hiſtory.] And theſe Mens Works are reputed no otherwiſe, than if they had never been written. But ſome one will perhaps make this formidable objection againſt us; How can you affirm theſe things to have been effected by Divine Providence? For, it is indeed evident, that the Emperor's ſudden death proved very advantagious to the Chriſtian Religion. But certainly, the rejecting of the Chriſtian Writings compoſed by the two Apollinaris's, and the Chriſtians beginning again to be cultivated with an education in the Grecian Literature, can in no wiſe be of advantage to Chriſtianity. For, the Grecian Literature, in regard it aſſerts Polytheiſm*, is very pernicious. To this objection we will (according to our ability) make ſuch a return as at preſent comes into our mind. The Grecian Learning was not admitted of, either by Chriſt, or his Diſciples, as being divinely inſpired; nor was wholly rejected, as hurtful. And this, in my opinion, was not inconſiderately done by them. For, many of the Philoſophers amongſt the Grecians were not far from the knowledge of God. For, [being furniſh'd] with a diſcurſive knowledge, they ſtrenuouſly oppoſed thoſe that denied God's Providence, of which ſort were the Epicureans, and other contentious [Cavillers;] and confuted their ignorance. And by theſe Books they rendred themſelves very uſeful to the Lovers of piety: but they apprehended not the principal Head of Religion, becauſe they were ignorant of the Myſtery of Chriſt, †Which has been hid from generations and ages. And that this is ſo, the Apoſtle in his Epiſtle to the Romans does declare, in theſe words: For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven againſt all ungodlineſs, and unrighteouſneſs of men, who hold the truth in unrighteouſneſs. Becauſe that which may be known of God, is manifeſt in them. For God had ſhewed it unto them. For the inviſible things of him from the creation of the world, are clearly ſeen, being underſtood by the things that are made,* even his eternal Power and Godhead, that they may be without excuſe: becauſe, that when they knew God, they glorified him not as God. From theſe words 'tis apparent, that they had the knowledge of the Truth, which God manifeſted unto them. But they were obnoxious, in regard when they knew God, they glorified him not as God. Whereas, therefore [the Apoſtles] prohibited not an education in the Grecian Learning, they left it to the choice of ſuch as were deſirous of it. Let this be one argument, in anſwer to the objection made againſt us. Another is this, The divinely inſpired Scriptures do indeed deliver Doctrines that are admirable and truly divine: they do likewiſe infuſe into [the minds of] thoſe that hear them, both an eminent piety, and exact courſe of life; and alſo exhibit to perſons that are ſtudious a Faith acceptable to God. But they teach not an Art of reaſoning, whereby we may be enabled to anſwer thoſe that reſolutely oppoſe the truth.

Julianus. Besides, the adversaries are then most effectually baffled, when we make use of their own weapons against them. (But, the Christians could not be furnish'd herewith, from the Books written by the Apollinaris's.) Which when the Emperor Julianus had accurately considered, he by a law prohibited the Christians from being instructed in the Grecian Literature. For he very well knew, that the Fables [therein contain'd] would render the Opinion he had imbibed obnoxious to reproach. Which fabulous stories when Socrates (the eminentest of the Philosophers amongst them) contemn'd; as if he had been a person that attempted to violate their Deities, he was condemn'd. Further, both (a) Christ, and also his Apostle do give order, that we should be skilful Exchangers of * 1 Thes. 5. 21. money, that we should prove all things, holding fast that which is good; and † Colos. 2. 8. to beware, lest any man spoil you thro' Philosophy and vain deceit. But, we shall never obey this [Precept,] unless we can possess our selves of the Adversaries weapons; and whilst we are in possession of them, we are not to entertain the same sentiments with our Adversaries, but must abominate the evil, and retaining what is good and true, examine all things we embrace. For good, where-ever it is, is the property of truth. But if any one suppose, that by asserting these things we use violence [towards the Scriptures, by wresting of them,] let such a one consider, that the Apostle does not only not forbid our being instructed in the Grecian Learning; but he himself seems not to have neglected it, in regard he knew many sayings which were spoken by the Grecians. For, whence took he an occasion of using this saying; * The Cretians are always lyers, evil beasts, slow-bellies, except it were from his perusal of the (b) Oracles of Epimenides the Cretian, a person that was an Initiator? Or whence knew he this, * For we are also his off-spring, unless he had been acquainted with the Phænomena of Aratus the Astronomer. Moreover, this, † Evil communications corrupt good manners, is a sufficient evidence that he was not unacquainted with Euripides's Tragedies. But, what need is there of making a large discourse concerning these things? For, 'tis evident, that anciently, by an uninterrupted usage as it were, the Ecclesiastick Doctors studied the Grecian Arts and Sciences, until they arriv'd at a very great age: and this [they did,] partly upon account of [gaining] eloquence, and of * polishing the mind; and partly in order to a confutation of those things, concerning which [the Heathens] were mistaken. Let thus much be said by us, according to our capacity, upon account of the two Apollinaris's.

(a) At what place this precept of our Saviour's [that we should be skilful Mony-changers] does occur, is uncertain. For 'tis not to be met with in the Gospels. But, in as much as Origen and Jerome do agree, that this command was given by our Saviour, and was afterwards inculcated by the Apostle; I am of the same opinion with the Learned Usher, who supposes, that that saying of our Saviour was recorded in the Gospel according to the Hebrews. Further, this saying is frequently mentioned amongst the Antients. Amongst the rest, Palladius makes mention of it in the Life of John Chrysostome. See Euseb. Eccles. Hist. Book 7. Chap. 7. Note (a.) and the following remark. Vales.

* Titus 1. 12. (b) Epimenides did indeed predict many things, partly to the Athenians, partly to the Lacedæmonians, and partly to the Cretians, as may be seen in Diogenes Laërtius: (See Laërtius in Epimenid.) But I never read, that Oracles were written by him. Suidas affirms, that he wrote some mystical and expiatory Poems, and some other obscure things. These therefore must be stiled Oracles. Epimenides was a person incomparably well skilled in Lustrations and Consecrations. In his Lustrations or purgations, he made great use of the Sea Onyon: and therefore one kind of it was from him called the Epimenidian Sea-Onyon. So Theophrastus, Book 7. CHAP. XVII.

How the Emperor, making Preparations for an Expedition against the Persians, arrived at Antioch: and being derided by the Antiochians, he [published] an Oration [against them] entitled * Misopogon.

* That is, Beard-hater.

BUT, the Emperor, having extorted a vast treasure from the Christians, and hastning his Expedition against the Persians, goes to Antioch in Syria. When he was come thither, being desirous to demonstrate to the Antiochians how superabundantly he affected glory, he depressed the prizes of vendible commodities lower than was fitting: [for] he respected not the present time, nor considered with himself, that the presence of a numerous Army does necessarily endamage the Inhabitants of a Province, and cut off plenty [of provisions] from the Cities. Wherefore, the (a) petty Merchants and Provision-sellers, unable to endure the loss they sustain'd by the Imperial Edict, at that time left off trading. Whereupon, [the Markets] were unfurnish'd with Provisions. The Antiochians could not tolerate this violence [used towards them;] (for they are persons naturally prone to revile:) but presently brake forth [into invectives] against the Emperor, and cried out upon him. They also derided his Beard; (for he wore a very large one:) saying, it ought to be shaved, and Ropes made of it. [They said] likewise, that he had the stamp of a Bull on his Coyn; [which was an Emblem] that he had turned the World upside down. For the Emperor, extreamly addicted to superstition, and continually * sacrificing Bulls upon the Altars of his Idols, had commanded, that an Altar and a Bull should be stampt upon his Coyn. The Emperor, enraged at these scoffs, threatned that he would most severely punish the City of Antioch; (b) and that he would return to Tarsus in Cilicia [and reside there.] And having given order for a provision of necessaries to be made there, he prepared for his departure thence. Upon which account, Libanius the Sophista took an occasion of writing two Orations; the one he composed by way of address to the Emperor, in behalf of the Antiochians; the (c) other he wrote to the Antiochians giving a Character of him, says thus: Præsagiorum scisitationi nimiæ deditus, ut æquiparare videretur in hac parte principem Hadrianum: superstitiosus magis, quàm sacrorum legitimus observator innumeras sine parsimonia pecudes Mactans: ut æstimaretur si revertisset de Parthis boves jam defuturos: Marci illius similis Cæsaris, in quem id accepimus dictum, ὁι λευκοὶ βόες Μαρκῷ πῶ καίσαει· Ἂν σὺ νικήσῃς, ἡμεῖς ἀπολόμεθα.

(a) Οἱ μεταβολεῖς. So the Greeks do in general term all small and minute-Merchants, because they barter'd their Wares for a mean value. For μεταβάλλειν signifies to buy and sell for gain; and μεταβολὴ imports a Merchandizeing Trade, as Julius Pollux informs us, Book 3. Chap. 25. Hence, he was termed παλιμβολ- ὁ πολλάκις ἐμπολῇ μεταβεβλημένος, (says Harpocration) who had been frequently sold. These Traders are in Latin termed Cociones, Arilatores, and Dardanarii. But Nicephorus calls them παλινκαπήλους, whom Socrates here terms μεταβολεῖς; παλινκάπηλοι may in English be termed Retailers, such as the Dardanarii heretofore were. Vales.

* Hence 'tis that Gregor. Nazianzen (in his first Invective against Julian,) stiles him ταυροκαυσίτην, Bull-burner. And Amm. Marcellinus (Book 25. p. 294. Ed. Paris, 1636;)

(b) In the original, the reading here is [καὶ ἐπὶ ταρσὸν τῆς κιλικίας ἐξυποστρέφει; And returns to Tarsus in Cilicia:] which reading Nicephorus has followed. But in my opinion it should be thus [καὶ ὅπως ταρσὸν τῆς κιλικίας ἐξυποστρέψειεν, and that he would return to Tarsus in Cilicia [and reside there.] For Julian threatned, that when he returned from Persia, he would go to Tarsus in Cilicia, and would not Winter any more at Antioch. See Amm. Marcellinus, Book 23. pag. 239. of our Edition. Vales.

(c) This Oration of Libanius's is in my hands; 'tis transcribed from two M.SS. Copies, the one belonging to Johannes Altinus, the other to the most eminent Cardinal Francis Barberini. We will (God willing) translate this, and more than twenty other Orations of the same Sophista's into Latin, and publish them within a little while. Vales.

Julianus. concerning the Emperor's diſpleaſure. But, 'tis ſaid, this Sophiſta wrote theſe Orations only, and did not recite them in publick. Moreover, the Emperor, relinquiſhing his reſolution of revenging himſelf upon thoſe Revilers by deeds, diſcharged his rage by reciprocal Taunts and Scoffs: For he compiled a Book [againſt them,] which he entitled Antiochicus, or Miſopogon, wherein he has left a perpetual brand upon the City of Antioch. Thus much concerning theſe things. We muſt now relate what [miſchiefs] the Emperor then did to the Chriſtians in Antioch.

CHAP. XVIII.

How, when the Emperor was deſirous to conſult the Oracle, the Dæmon gave no anſwer, being afraid of Babylas the Martyr.

FOR, having given order, that the Heathen Temples in Antioch ſhould be opened, he was very deſirous of receiving an Oracle from Apollo * Daphnæus. But, in regard the Dæmon inhabiting that Temple, feared his Neighbour (I mean (a) Babylas the Martyr,) he gave no anſwer: For the Coffin lay hard by, wherein was incloſed the Body of that Martyr. When the Emperor underſtood the reaſon thereof, he forthwith iſſued out an order for the immediate tranſlation of the Coffin. The Chriſtians of Antioch underſtanding this, [flock'd together all of them,] as well Women, as young Children, and carried the Coffin from Daphne into the City with great rejoycings and ſinging of Pſalms. [The contents of] thoſe Pſalms were reproachful reflections upon the Heatheniſh Gods, and upon thoſe who confided in them, and in their Images.

* There was a Grove in the ſuburbs of Antioch, called Daphne, which was conſecrated to Apollo; whence he was termed Apollo Daphnæus. Sozomen ſpends a great many words in deſcribing this Grove, at Chap. 19. Book 5. of his Eccleſ. Hiſtor. (a) He ſucceeded Zabinus in the Biſhoprick of Antioch, ſays Euſebius, Book 6. Chap. 2. Eccleſ. Hiſtor. The ſame Author (Chap. 39. Book 6.) ſays that he died in priſon (but Chryſoſtome, Lib. de S. Babyl. Tom. 9. pag. 659. tells us he was beheaded,) in Decius's Reign. Where his body was firſt buried, is not known: but wherever it was, there it reſted, till Gallus, Julian's brother, built a Church over againſt the Temple of Apollo Daphnæus, (ſee Sozom. Book 5. Chap. 19.) into which he cauſed S. Babylas's body to be tranſlated. After this removal of it, mentioned in this Chapter, 'twas intombed within the City Antioch, in a Church dedicated to his name and memory.

CHAP. XIX.

MOreover, the Emperor's Genius and Diſpoſition, which he had [hitherto] kept concealed, was at that time clearly diſcover'd and manifeſted. For he who before profeſt himſelf to be a Philoſopher, could not moderate himſelf any longer. But being very eaſily provok'd to anger by thoſe reproachful Hymns, was ready to inflict the ſame puniſhments upon the Chriſtians, which Diocletian heretofore laid on them. But in regard his ſollicitude about the Perſian Expedition afforded him not a convenient opportunity of proſecuting this deſign, he order'd Saluſtius Prefect of the Pretorium, to apprehend thoſe perſons that had been moſt zealous and buſie in ſinging Pſalms, in order to their being puniſhed. The Prefect (altho' as to his Religion he was an Heathen, yet) did not willingly receive that order. But, in regard he could not contradict it, he commands many of the Chriſtians to be apprehended, and confines ſome of them to priſon. Upon one young man (whoſe name was Theodorus, whom the Heathens brought before him,) he inflicted Tortures, and various ſorts of puniſhment, ordering that his body ſhould be lacerated all over; and then, when 'twas ſuppoſed he could live no longer, he releaſed him from his tortures. But God preſerved this perſon: for he ſurvived that confeſſion a long time. Rufinus, who wrote an Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory in Latin, * ſays, that he converſed with this Theodorus a long while after this, and enquired of him, whether, during his being ſcourged and racked, he felt an acuteneſs of pain: And that his anſwer was, that the pain [proceeding] from his tortures was very little: and that there ſtood by him a certain young man, who both wiped off the ſweat cauſed by his agony, and alſo corroborated his mind, and that he cauſed that ſpace of time wherein he was tortured, to be a delight to him, rather than a conflict. Let thus much be ſaid concerning the admirable Theodorus. At the ſame time arrived Embaſſadors from the Perſians, requeſting [the Emperor] to put an end to the War (a) upon certain expreſs Articles and Conditions. But he diſmiſt them, with theſe words, You ſhall ere long ſee Us in perſon, and ſo there will be no need of an Embaſſy.

CHAP. XX.

How the Emperor perſwaded the Jews to ſacrifice, and concerning the utter Deſtruction of Jeruſalem.

WHilſt the Emperor was very deſirous to endamage the Chriſtians ſome other way beſides this, he betrayed his own Superſtition. For, being much addicted to ſacrificing, he not only delighted in the Blood [of Sacrifices] himſelf, but thought himſelf wrong'd unleſs others would do ſo too. But, in regard he found but few ſuch men as thoſe, he ſent for the Jews, and enquired of them, upon what account they abſtained from ſacrificing, when as the Law of Moſes enjoyned it. Upon their anſwering him, that they could not ſacrifice in any other place, but only at Jeruſalem, he gave order, that Solomon's Temple ſhould be forthwith re-edified. [In the interim] he himſelf proceeds in his Expedition againſt the Perſians. But the Jews (who for a long time had been deſirous of getting an opportune time, wherein their Temple might be rebuilt, in order to their offering ſacrifice,) were then very induſtrious about that work. They alſo ſhew'd themſelves very formidable to the Chriſtians, and their behaviour towards them was proud and inſolent, threatning they would do them as much miſchief, as they themſelves had formerly ſuffered from the Romans. In regard therefore the Emperor had given order, that the charge [of that Structure] ſhould be paid out of his Exchequer, all things were ſoon provided; [to wit,] Timber, Stone, burnt Brick, Clay, Lime, and all other materials neceſſary for building. At which time, Cyrillus Biſhop of Jeruſalem called to mind the Prophecy of Daniel, (which Chriſt alſo has confirmed in the holy Goſpels,) Julianus. Gospels,) and (a) predicted in the presence of many persons, that that time would come very shortly, wherein one stone should not be left upon another in that Temple, but that our Saviour's prophecy should be fulfilled. These were the Bishop's words: And in the night there hapned a great earthquake, * which tore up the stones of the old foundation of the Temple, and dispersed them all, together with the adjacent edifices. By reason of this accident, the Jews were extreamly terrified. And the fame of it brought many persons, who lived at a great distance, to that place. When therefore a numerous multitude were gathered together, there hapned another prodigy. For there came down a fire from Heaven, which consumed all the Builders Tools. You might have seen Mallets, Irons to smooth and polish stones with, Saws, Hatchets, Axes; in short, all things the Workmen had, which were to be used about that work, destroy'd by the flames. The fire prey'd upon these things for a whole day together. The Jews, being in the greatest fear imaginable, acknowledged (tho' unwillingly) that Christ was God. But they obey'd not his will, but were prepossess'd with an opinion of their own Religion, and continued firm thereto. For neither did a third Miracle, which hapned afterwards, induce them to a belief of the truth. For, the night following, the impressions of a Cross, which cast forth beams of brightness, appeared printed upon their garments. Which impressions when they saw the next day, they endeavour'd to wash and rub them out, but could not. They were blinded therefore, as the Apostle says, and cast away that good they had in their hands. Thus was the Temple, instead of being rebuilt, at that time totally demolish'd.

(a) That is, Cyrillus predicted in the presence, &c. For the term [περιλειφθῇ] must not be referred to Christ; tho' Musculus and Christophorson both tender it so. Nicephorus does evidently confirm our Version, at Book 10. Chap. 33. Eccles. Histor. Vales.

* Ἀνέβρασε τὰς λίθους τῷ πάλαι θεμελίων τῷ ναῷ, which made the stones of the old foundation of the Temple seeth, or boyle.

CHAP. XXI.

Concerning the Emperor's Inroad into Persia, and concerning his Death.

MOreover, the Emperor made an irruption into Persia, a little before the Spring, being informed that the Persians were a people that were weakest, and of the least courage in the Winter. For, being unable to endure the cold, they abstain from undertaking any military action at that time. But, according to the Proverb, A Mede will not pull so much as his hands from under his Cloak at that time. [On the contrary,] in regard he very well knew, that the Romans were able to endure a Winter Campaign, he pour'd his Army into the Persian Territories. When therefore they had depopulated a large tract of Ground, [laid waste] many Villages, and Garrisons, they then [began] to take Cities. And, having invested the great City Ctesiphon, he reduced the Persian King to such straights, that he dispatcht frequent Embassies to Julian, entreating him that he might be punish'd with the loss of some part of his Country only, provided he would depart out of his Territories, and put an end to the War. But Julianus was not in the least affected in his mind, nor shew'd any compassion towards these suppliants. Neither did he take into his consideration this common saying, to wit, *To conquer is famous, but to * be more than Conqueror, is odious.* But, giving credit to certain Divinations, which Maximus the Philosopher (with whom he conversed continually) suggested to him; and imagining, that he should not only equal, but exceed the glory of Alexander the Macedonian; [for these reasons, I say,] he rejected the humble addresses of the Persians. And he supposed, agreeable to the opinion of Pythagoras and Plato, that by a Transmigration of Souls he was possest of Alexander's Soul; or rather, that he himself was Alexander in another Body. This opinion deceived him, and was the cause of his not admitting of the Persian King's humble address at that time. The King of Persia therefore, perceiving his Embassy to be ineffectual, was reduc'd to a necessity [of fighting.] Whereupon, the next day after he had sent his Embassy, he draws out all the Forces he had against the Roman Army, in order to his giving them battel. The Romans did indeed blame the Emperor, in regard he would not avoid an engagement, when as he might have done it with advantage. Nevertheless, they gave the Enemy battel, and routed them again. The Emperor was in the engagement in person, on Horseback, and encourag'd his men: but he had no Armour on, in regard he solely confided in his hope of success. But [on a sudden] a Dart is cast at him from an unknown place, which pierced through his Arm, and entred his Side: (a) of which wound he died, the person that killed him being unknown. For some say, [the Dart] was thrown by a certain Persian who fled: others, [that it was cast] by one of his own men, which is the strongest and most common report. But Callistus (who had a military imploy in this (b) Emperor's Guards, and recorded his Acts in Heroick Verse,) in his Narrative of this War, says, that Julian was wounded by a Dæmon, of which he died. This was perhaps a poetical fiction of his; peradventure 'twas really true: For revengeful Furies have destroy'd many persons. But, however that matter was, this is not unknown, that [this Emperor] was a person, by reason of his too great heat and ardency of mind, unwary; because of his learning, vain-glorious; upon account of his counterfeit mildness, obnoxious to contempt. Julianus therefore ended his life in Persia (as we have said in his fourth Consulate, which he bore with Salustius [his Colleague,] about the twenty sixth of June. This was the third year of his Empire, the seventh from his having been created Cæsar by Constantius; and the thirty first year of his Age.

* Ὑπερνικᾶν; the term occurs, Rom. 8. 37; where our English Version renders it more than Conqueror.

(a) Theodoret (Eccles. Hist. Book 3. Chap. 25.) has recorded this passage of Julian: Ἐκεῖνον δὲ γε φασὶ δεξάμενον τὴν πληγὴν, ἐυθὺς πλῆσαι τὴν χεῖρα τοῦ αἵματος, καὶ τοῦτο ῥῖψαι εἰς τὸν ἀέρα, καὶ φάναι, Νενίκηκας, Γαλιλαῖε, &c. 'Tis reported, that upon the receipt of his wound, he filled his hand with blood, and threw it up into the air, and said, O Galilean: [so he termed our Saviour, and the Christians he called Galileans] Thou hast overcome, &c.

(b) The Greek term ὀυηέτοι, signifies in this place Protectores Domesticos, The Emperors Guards; concerning whom we have spoken at large, in our Notes on Book 14. of Amm. Marcellinus, pag. 33. In this sense Socrates uses this term, Book 4. Chap. 1. This is that Callistus (if I mistake not) whom Libanius (Epist. 120. Book 4.) calls Callistio, friend to Sallustius Præfect of the Prætorium. For Libanius attests there (as well as Socrates does here) that he was a Poet. Vales.

CHAP. XXII.

Concerning Jovianus's being proclaim'd Emperor.

Jovianus. THE Roman Army, reduced to the greatest streight imaginable, without delay, on the day after, proclaim Jovianus Emperor, a person

Jovianus. ſon courageous and nobly deſcended. He being Tribune of the Soldiers, * when Julianus by publiſhing of an Edict, gave the Soldiers their choice, whether they would ſacrifice, or leave their Military Employments; choſe rather to lay down his Commiſſion, than obey the command of the impious Emperor. But Julianus, neceſſitated thereto by the imminent War, had continued him in Commiſſion, amongſt his chief Commanders. Being at that time elected to the Empire, he refuſed it. And when he was forcibly drawn forth by the Soldiers, he cried out, ſaying, that being himſelf a Chriſtian, he would not reign over men firmly addicted to Gentiliſm. But, after all of them with one voice anſwer'd, profeſſing that they alſo were Chriſtians, he accepted of the Empire. Moreover, in regard he was on a ſudden left in very great ſtreights † in an Enemy's Country, and his men being deſtroy'd by a famine, upon terms he put an end to the War. The Conditions were indeed miſbecoming the Roman glory; but they were neceſſary in that conjuncture. For, being puniſh'd with the loſs of the (a) Borders of the Empire, and having ſurrendred Nicibis (a City in Meſopotamia,) to the Perſians, he departed out of Perſia. At the relation of theſe things the Chriſtians were encouraged (b): But the Pagans bewailed Julianus's death. Further, the whole Army blamed his imprudent heat and raſhneſs, and aſcribed the diſgrace of the loſs of their Borders to him; becauſe, being impoſed upon by a Perſian Deſerter, he had burnt the Ships, which ſupplied them with proviſion by water, whereupon the Army was reduced to a great extremity by a Famine. Further, at that time Libanius the Sophiſta compoſed a Funeral Oration upon Julian, which he entitled Julianum, or The Epitaph. In which Oration he does at large recite and extol almoſt all his actions: he has alſo mention'd the Books which Julian wrote againſt the Chriſtians, wherein he ſays, the Emperor has demonſtrated the Books of the Chriſtians to be ridiculous, and ſtuft with trifles. Had it ſufficed this Sophiſta, to have commended the Emperor's other actions only, I ſhould quietly have proceeded to the following part of my Hiſtory. But whenas, being a ſharp Orator, by mentioning Julian's Books he does inveigh againſt the Chriſtian Religion; for this reaſon we are reſolv'd to ſpeak ſomething concerning this matter: and in the firſt place we will produce his own words.

* See Chap. 13.

† Or, in the Country of the Perſians.

(a) In the original, the reading is [Ζημιωθεὶς δὲ τὰς σύρας τῆς ἀρχῆς, Fo-, being puniſhed with the loſs of the dominion over the Syrians:] which reading is retained in all our copies. Agreeable to which is Epiphanius Scholaſticus's Verſion; who renders it thus: Amiſſâ namque Syriâ, & traditâ Perſis Niſibi, For having loſt Syria, and ſurrendred Niſibis to the Perſians: And Nicephorus words this paſſage thus: Καὶ δή τινα τῆς ὑποδελῶν ῥωμαίοις παρεδὸς Πέρσαις, τὴν σύρων ἀρχὴν λέγω καὶ τὴν ἐν Μεσοποταμίᾳ νίσιβιν, &c. Moreover, ſurrendring ſome places to the Perſians, that were tributary to the Romans, I mean the Government of the Syrians, and, Niſibis in Meſopotamia. But, Jovianus ſurrendred not Syria to the Perſians. He gave them Niſibis only, and the Countries beyond the Tigris. Wherefore, I doubt not, but inſtead of [τὰς σύρας, the Syrians] it ſhould be [τὰς ὅρους τῆς ἀρχῆς, the Borders of the Empire; and accordingly we have rendred it. Than which Emendation, there is nothing more certain. Socrates himſelf confirms it, who ſpeaking concerning this matter a little after, in this Chapter, ſays thus, καὶ τὴν αἰτίαν τῆς ζημίας τῷ ὁραν εἰς αὐτὸν ἀνέφερον, and aſcribed the diſgrace of the loſs of the Borders to him. Valeſ.

(b) Between theſe two words [encouraged] and [death,] there was wanting in the printed Copies of Socrates this whole line [οἱ δὲ τὴν θρησκείαν ἕλληνες, πένθος ἐποιοῦντο τὴν ἰουλιανοῦ, But the Pagans bewailed Julianus's;] which we have inſerted from the Florent. and Sfortian M SS. Further, from this very one place 'tis evident, that Chriſtophorſon made uſe of no M. S. Copies, in his tranſlation of Socrates. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXIII.

A Confutation of what Libanius the Sophiſta has ſaid concerning Julianus.

THE Winter (ſays he) having lengthened the Nights, the Emperor undertook thoſe Books, which make the Man of Paleſtine God, and the Son of God; and by a long diſpute and validity of Arguments he evinced, that thoſe [Records] revered and honoured [by the Chriſtians] are ridiculous and meer trifles: having in this matter demonſtrated himſelf to be more ſkilful and wiſer, than the * Tyrian Old Man. But, may that Tyrian be propitious to me, and not be diſguſted at what is ſaid, (a) in regard he was out-done by his Son! Jovianus.

* Porphy.

(a) In the Florent. and Sfortian M. SS. the reading is [ὡς ἂν ὑφ' υἱοῦ ἡττώμενος, in regard he was out-done by his Son.] But in Libanius's Oration, which I have read in Manuſcript, it is thus worded [ὡς ἂν ὑπὸ υἱοῦ ἡττώμενος,] which reading pleaſes me beſt. This Funeral Oration of Libanius's concerning the praiſes of Julian the Emperor, is publiſhed indeed by Morellus, in the Second Tome of the ſaid Libanius's works; but very corruptly. For, two parts in four of it are tranſpoſed; and beſides, there are ſome pages of it wanting. We have ſome time ſince found out the tranſpoſition of this Oration; and made up its defects from Johannes Altinus's Manuſcript; in which Copy this paſſage is extant, which Socrates does here quote. Valeſ.

Theſe are Libanius the Sophiſta's words. I am indeed of opinion, that he was a moſt incomparable Sophiſta: but, I am confident, had he not entertained the ſame ſentiments with the Emperor, as to Religion, he would have ſpoken againſt him all that hath been ſaid by Chriſtians, and (as 'tis very likely,) being a Sophiſta, would have enlarged upon that ſubject. For, whilſt Conſtantius was living, he wrote * Encomiums upon him; but after his death, he loaded him with reproaches and abuſive accuſations. Wherefore, had Porphyrius been an Emperor, he had undoubtedly prefer'd his Books before Julian's: and, had Julianus been a Sophiſta, he would have termed him an ill Sophiſta, as he does Ecebolius, in his Epitaph upon Julian. Since therefore he, as being of the ſame Religion with the Emperor, as a Sophiſta, and as the Emperor's Friend, has related what he thought good; we, according to our ability, will anſwer what he has written. In the firſt place therefore, he ſays, that the Emperor undertook thoſe Books, when Winter had lengthen'd the Nights. This term, to undertake, or attempt, imports, that he made it wholly his buſineſs to write a diſcommendation, as the Sophiſtæ uſually do, when they inſtruct young Men in the rudiments of their Art. For he had been acquainted with thoſe Books long before, but then he made his attempts againſt them. And, having ſpent a great deal of time in a tedious conteſt, he did not [oppoſe them] (as Libanius ſays) with ſolid arguments; but for want of truth betook himſelf to Jeſts and Drollery, (whereof he was a great admirer,) by which means he derided what is firmly eſtabliſhed in thoſe Books. For, whoſoever undertakes a conteſt againſt another, does uſually belie him againſt him whom he manages the diſpute; one while by perverting the truth, at another by concealing it. And he that has a Pique againſt another, as an adverſary endeavours, not only to act, but to ſpeak againſt him in all things: and delights to turn the * faults that are in himſelf, upon him with whom he is at variance. That Julianus and Porphyrius (whom Libanius calls The Tyrian Old Man) did both of them take great delight in ſcoffing, is evident from their own Books. For Porphyrius, in the Books he wrote concerning Philoſophick Hiſtory, has made the Life of Socrates a ridicule, who was the eminenteſt of the Philoſophers: and has left ſuch paſſages upon record concerning him, as neither Melitus, nor Anytus, Socrates's Accuſers, would have attempted to ſay. Concerning Socrates, crates, I say a person admired amongst the Grecians, for his Modesty, Justice, and other Virtues. Whom Plato the most admirable Philosopher among them, Xenophon, and the whole † company of Philosophers, not only honour as a person beloved by God, but also repute him to have been endow'd with a wisdom more than human. And Julianus, imitating his * Father, has discover'd the distemper of his own mind in [the Book he entitled] The Cæsars, wherein he has discommended all the Emperors his Predecessors, not sparing even Marcus the Philosopher. That both of them therefore took great delight in scoffs and taunts, their own writings do sufficiently declare. Nor need I many or solid arguments, but this is sufficient to represent the humour and disposition of them both (b): This Character I give of them, grounding my conjecture concerning their disposition, upon the works of each of them. But, what Gregorius Nazianzenus has said concerning Julianus, you may hear [delivered] in his own words. For, in * his second Oration against the Gentiles, he says thus: Experience, and his assuming the Imperial Dignity and Authority, evidenced these things to others. But to me they were in a manner apparently manifest long before, at such time as I was conversant with him at Athens. For he came thither immediately after the Innovations attempted by his † Brother, having requested this of the Emperor. The design of this his journey was two-fold; and the one was more honourable, [namely,] to see Greece, *and the Schools there: The other was kept secret, known but to a very few, [to wit,] that he might consult the Sacrificers and Impostors there concerning his own affairs: For his Impiety was not yet in possession of confidence and liberty. At that time therefore, I well remember, I was no bad Diviner concerning this person, although I pretend not to be one of their number who are well versed in the knowledge and use of these Predictions. But, the unevenness and inconstancy of his Disposition, and the incredible Extravagancy of his Mind, made me a Prophet, if he be the best Prophet, who gives the truest conjecture. For, 'twas my opinion, that no good could be portended by an instable Neck; by Shoulders which sometimes he brandished, at others (c) repress; by wandring and rowling Eyes; a furious Countenance; Feet unsteady and stumbling; a Nose breathing forth reproach and contempt; ridiculous cuttings of faces signifying the same thing; immoderate and excessively loud laughter; noddings, and then denials by his countenance, without any reason; a voice repress and cut off by his Breath; immethodical and indiscreet Questions; Answers no whit better than these, crowding one after another, inconsistent to themselves, nor yet proceeding in a learned Order. What need I give a particular description of every thing? Before his Actions I saw he would be the same that I have since found him to be by his Actions. And, were some of those persons here, who were then present and heard me, they would be easily induced to attest this. To whom, when I saw these things, I forthwith spake these words, How great a mischief to it self does the Roman Empire breed up! When I had utter'd these words, I pray'd to God, that I might be a false Prophet: For that was better, than that the World should be filled with such horrid mischiefs, and that such a Monster should appear, the like to which had never been seen before; although many Deluges are recorded; many Devastatsons by Fire; many Earthquakes and * Chasms; (d) and moreover- many monstrous and inhuman Men, and Beasts that were prodigious and compounded of several kinds, of which Nature produced new forms. Upon this account he ended his life in a manner answerable to his madness.*

* Commendations.

Jovianus.

Jovianus.

(b) After these words this line [ἐγὼ μὲν οὖν ταῦτα ἐν τῷ ἑαυτοῦ λόγῳ περὶ ἐκείνου] was wanting in the Printed Copies; which I inserted from the Sfortian M.S. Vales.

* This passage occurs in Nazianzen's second Invective against Julian, pag. 97. Edit. Eton. 1610.

† He means Gallus Cæsar, See Chap. 34. Book 2. and Chap. 1. Book 3.

(c) In Gregory Nazianzen's second Invective against Julian (out of which this passage is quoted) the term here is ἀνασπώμενα which word Billius renders, attollebat, he lifted up. But I had rather it should be rendred Librabat, poyzed. Nicephorus retains the vulgar reading, to wit, ἀνασχοπτόμενος, repress; whose Translator gives this Rendition of these words: Humeri, quos sub inde jactaret ac reduceret mobiles, i. e. Movable shoulders which he would sometimes thrust out, at others pluck back. Vales. See Mr. Montagu's account of this term, in his Notes on pag. 98. of Nazianzen's second Invective, Edit. Eton. 1610.

* Or, openings of the earth.

(d) This passage is to be made good from Gregorius Nazianzenus, thus: Ἔτι δὲ καὶ ἀνδρῶν ἀπανθρώπων καὶ θηρίων ἀλλοκότων τε καὶ συνθέτων, ὧν ἡ φύσις ἐκύησε· and we have rendred it accordingly. Vales.

This Character Gregorius has given us concerning Julianus. Moreover, that in those many Books (in the compiling whereof they imploy'd themselves,) they have attempted to violate the truth, by perverting some passages of the sacred Scriptures, by making insertions in other some, and by explaining all things agreeable to their own design; (e) many persons have demonstrated in their answers to them, who have also overturned and confuted their Fallacies. But above all other [Ecclesiastick Writers,] (f) Origen, (who lived long before Julianus's times,) by raising objections against himself from such passages in the sacred Scriptures as seem'd to disturb the Readers, and after that by clearing of them, has put a stop to the fallacious cavils and verbose niceties of ill-affected persons. Which Works of his, had Julianus and Porphyrius perused carefully, and given them a candid reception, undoubtedly they would have turn'd their discourses to some other subject, and would not have applied their minds to the writing of fallacies stuft with impiety and blasphemy. That the Emperor made it his business to cavil in his discourses before ignorant and the simpler sort of men, not in their presence who retain a representation of the truth taken from the sacred Scriptures; is evident from hence: For, having pick'd out as many expressions as upon account of necessity are by way of dispensation used concerning God in a more human manner, and put them and many such like phrases altogether; at length he subjoyns these very words; Every one of these expressions therefore (unless the phrase contains in it some secret and occult sense and meaning, which I suppose,) is stuft with a deal of blasphemy against God. Thus much he has said in express words, in his third Book against the Christians. And in that Book of his, to which he gave this title (g) Concerning the Cynick Philosophy, declaring after what manner sacred Fables ought

(e) Many of the Antients have undertaken to refute Porphyrius and Julianus's Books against the Christians. Methodius, Eusebius, and Apollinaris wrote Books against Porphyrius. Cyrillus wrote against Julian; which Books of Cyrillus's are still extant, but are not extraordinarily acute. Vales.

(f) In what Books Origen has explained such passages in sacred Writ as might trouble the Readers, and has confuted the fallacious arguments brought against the Christian Religion; 'tis hard to assert. For, in his Books against Celsus, he has in no wise done this. Nor, was it his design in that work, to explain those passages in the sacred Scripture, which had any difficulty in them, but only to answer Celsus's objections. Perhaps, Socrates does mean Origen's σφωνατέας. For in those Books Origen shew'd the congruity of the Opinions of our Religion with those of the Philosophers as Jerom informs us in his Epistle to Magnus the Orator. In order to his effecting of this, 'twas requisite for Origen to expound those places of Scripture, which seemed to contradict the sentiments of the Philosophers. Vales.

(g) He means his Book against Heraclius the Cynick; the title whereof is, πῶς κυνιστέον, the way of living like a Cynick. For, in the 403 pag. of that Book, this passage here quoted occurs. Vales.

Jovianus. ought to be feigned, he ſays, that in ſuch things as theſe Truth muſt be concealed: theſe are his very words: For Nature loves concealment: and the hidden ſubſtance of the Gods cannot endure to be thrown into polluted ears in bare and naked words. From theſe words 'tis apparent, that the Emperor had this ſentiment concerning the Divine Scriptures, [to wit,] that they were myſtical Diſcourſes, containing in them an abſtruſe ſenſe and meaning. Moreover, he is very angry, becauſe all men don't entertain the ſame opinion concerning them; and inveighs againſt thoſe perſons amongſt the Chriſtians, who take the ſacred Oracles in their plain and obvious ſenſe. But, it was not decent to rail in ſuch manner againſt the Simplicity of the Vulgar, nor upon their account to uſe ſuch inſolence towards the ſacred Scriptures: nor yet, to hate and have an averſion for (h) thoſe things which are rightly underſtood by others, becauſe all perſons underſtood them not, as he had a mind they ſhould. But now, the ſame accident ſeems to have befal'n him, which hapned to Porphyrius. For he, having been beaten by ſome Chriſtians at Cæſarea in Paleſtine; and being unable to maſter his paſſion, in a great fury (i) relinquiſh'd the Chriſtian Religion: and out of his hatred towards thoſe that had beaten him, he fell to writing blaſphemous Books againſt the Chriſtians; as Euſebius Pamphilus has manifeſtly made it out againſt him, who has clearly confuted his Books. But the Emperor, having uttered diſdainful expreſſions againſt the Chriſtians in the preſence of unthinking perſons, through the ſame diſtemper of mind fell into Porphyrius's Blaſphemy. Since therefore both theſe Perſons voluntarily [deſerted the truth and] brake out into impiety, they are puniſh'd by the very knowledge and conſciouſneſs of their own Crime. Further, whereas Libanius the Sophiſta in deriſion to the Chriſtians does ſay, that they make a Man of Paleſtine, God and the Son of God; in my opinion he ſeems to have forgot, that he himſelf has deified Julianus at the cloſe of his Oration. For they almoſt ſtoned to death (ſays he) the firſt meſſenger of his death, as if he had belyed the God. Then, a little afterwards he adds theſe words; O thou Darling (ſays he) of the Dæmons, Thou Diſciple of the Dæmons, Thou Aſſeſſor with the Dæmons! Altho' Libanius himſelf underſtood this otherwiſe; yet, in regard he avoided not the ambiguity of the term [Dæmons,] which is [ſometimes] taken in an ill ſenſe, he ſeems to have ſaid the ſame which the Chriſtians uſually do in their reproaches. Wherefore, had it been his deſign to have commended the Emperor, he ought to have ſhun'd an ambiguous term; as he did avoid another word; for which being reproacht, he afterwards raz'd it out of his Orations. Moreover, how Man in Chriſt may be ſaid to be God, and how he was apparently Man but inviſibly God; and after what manner both theſe aſſertions are infallibly true, the Divine Books of the Chriſtians do evidently ſhew. But the Heathens, before they believe, cannot underſtand. For 'tis the Oracle of God which ſaith, that

(h) In the Sforzian M. S. the reading here is τὰ καλῶς αὐτῷ γο ωμενα. But I am better pleaſed with my former conjecture, which was to read it thus, τὰ καλῶς ἄνοις ὀ ωμενα, thoſe things which are rightly underſtood by others. Although, the reading may be barely thus τὰ καλῶς νοούμενα, thoſe things which are rightly underſtood. For the word [αὐτὰ] crept in hither, from the following line. Valeſ.

(i) Ἀπέλειπε· in the Florentine M. S. the reading is καλέλειπε, he deſerted. Nicephorus (Book 10. Chap. 36. Eccleſ. Hiſt.) words it thus, ἐξόμνυται, abjured. Valeſ.

* If you will not believe, ſurely you ſhall not underſtand. Jovianus. See Eſai. 7. 9. Wherefore, they are not aſhamed to deify many men; and I wiſh at leaſt they had been men good as to their morals, juſt, and ſober; and not rather impure, unjuſt, and perſons addicted to drunkenneſs: I mean, the Hercules's, Bacchus's and Æſculapius's, by whom Libanius bluſhes not to ſwear frequently in his Orations. Whoſe Sodomies and Adulteries ſhould I give a particular account of, my diſcourſe thereof would be long and a tedious digreſſion. Thoſe that are deſirous of information about theſe things, will find a ſatisfactory account thereof in (k) Ariſtotle's Peplum, (l) Dionyſus's Corona, (m) Rheginus's Polymnemon, and in the crowd of the Poets; who by writing concerning theſe things, do demonſtrate to all men, that the Heathen Theology is trifling and ridiculous. Further, that 'tis the peculiar practice of the Heathens, and a thing uſual amongſt them, with great readineſs to deify men, 'twill be ſufficient to advertiſe you by a few inſtances. To the Rhodians (who conſulted the Oracle upon their being faln into a calamitous diſtreſs,) an anſwer was given, that they ſhould worſhip Attis the Phrygian, an Heathen Prieſt who inſtituted mad Ceremonies in Phrygia. The Contents of the Oracle are theſe.

(l) It ſhould be Dionyſius, not Dionyſus. 'Tis hard to ſay, who this Dionyſius was, who wrote a Book with this Title. I am of opinion, it was Dionyſius Miletius; who (as Suidas atteſts) wrote κύκλον ἱστορικὸν, an Hiſtorical Circle; For κύκλος and σφαῖρα are the ſame. Valeſ.

(m) Suidas relates, that Rheginus Grammaticus wrote a Boook with this title, Polymnemων. Valeſ.

Appeaſe (n) Attis, the Great God, chaſte Adonis,
The Donor of a proſperous Life, and Happineſs,
The beautifully-hair'd Bacchus.

(n) That Attis is the ſame Perſon with Bacchus, Clemens Alexandrinus alſo does inform us (in his Protreptticon) in theſe words: Διὰ ἣν αἰτίαν ὑπ ἀπαιδότος τὸν Διόνυσόν τινες ἄττιν προσαγορεύεσθαι θέλουσιν ἀιδοίων ἐστερημένον, upon which account ſome will have Attis, deprived of his Genitals, not unfitly termed Bacchus. Demoſthenes, in his Oration pro Coronâ: καὶ βοᾶν ἐνοῖ σαβοῖ, καὶ ἐπαοιχόμενον ὑῆν ἄττην, i. e. and ſhouting Euoi Saboi [theſe were the uſual Acclamations of thoſe celebrating Bacchus's Feaſts] and triumphing in words, Hues Attis. Which words of Demoſthenes's Harpocration ſuppoſed were meant of Attis the Phrygian. But ſome of the Antients, read not in that place of Demoſthenes, Attis, but Ates, which is an additional name to Bacchus, as is alſo ὗης. See the Author of the Etymologicon in the term ὗης and ἄτης. Valeſ.

The Oracle calls Attis (who by reaſon of his Love-madneſs caſtrated himſelf,) Adonis, and Bacchus. And when Alexander King of the Macedonians paſſed over into Aſia, the Amphictyones made him preſents, and Pythia uttered this Oracle.

Adore the Supreme God Jove,
And Minerva Tritogenia,
The King concealed in a mortal Body,
Whom Jove has begotten (o) of a race ineffable, Mortals Defender of Equity, King Alexander.

(o) Inſtead of [ἀειτάτοις γενεῆς, of a race moſt incomparably the beſt] the reading (as the rule of Verſe requires) ſhould be [ἀῤῥήτοισι γενεῆς, of a Race ineffable.] Valeſ.

Theſe are the words of the Oracle which the Dæmon utter'd at Delphos: He himſelf, when he would flatter Potentates, deified them. And this was perhaps done meerly out of flattery. But, what ſhall we ſay concerning Cleomedes the Champion, whom they have made a God, and utter'd this Oracle concerning him.

The laſt of the Heroes, Cleomedes Aſtipalæus.
Him worſhip with Sacrifices, as being no longer a Mortal.

Jovianus.

Upon account of this Oracle, Diogenes the Cynick, and (p) Oenomaus the Philosopher condemned Apollo Pythius. The Inhabitants of Cyzicum have declared Adrianus to be the thirteenth God. And Adrianus himself has deified Antinous his own * Catamite. These things Libanus does not term ridiculous, and meer trifles; although he very well knew these Oracles, and that single Book, which (q) Adrias wrote concerning the Life of Alexander. (r) Nor is he himself ashamed to deifie Porphyrius: For his words are these, May the Tyrian be propitious to me, whose Books he preferred before the Emperor's. Let thus much suffice to have been said by us by way of Digression, upon account of the Sophista's scoffing and reproaches. I thought fit to omit the rest, which requires a particular Treatise. We must now subjoyn the remaining part of our History.

(p) Oenomaus a Cynick Philosopher, having been deluded by Apollo's Oracle, resolved to revenge himself; and wrote a Book concerning the falseness of Oracles, to which he gave this title, Φωραπίται, i. e. A discovery of Cozeners: this Eusebius tells us from Porphyrius, in his fifth Book de Præparat. Valesius.

* That is, his favourite, whom he kept to abuse contrary to nature.

(q) Musculus and Christophorson took [Ἀδείας] to be a proper name. Langus (in his Notes on Niceph. book 10. chap. 36.) was of opinion, toat instead of Adrias, it should be Adrianus. Indeed the word Adrias is not to be endured: for no body was ever called by that name. Therefore Nicephorus, instead of [Ἀδείας] substituted this word [Ἀλεξανδρεῖς;] very erroneously. In this place Socrates means that Book of Lucian's, which has this title, Ἀλέξανδρος, ἢ ψευδόμαντις, Alexander, or The False Prophet. In which Book Lucian describes the frauds and impostures of one Alexander a Paphlagonian, who had craftily forged an Oracle. Wherefore instead of Ἀδείας (or Ἀνδείας, as 'tis in the Florentine M.S.) it must be Lucianus. Unless we should say, that Socrates mistook, and ascribed this Book to one Adrianus, or Arrianus. Valesius.

(r) Before these words I placed a full-point, following herein Nicephorus's authority. Moreover, the reading should be [οὐδὲ αἰσχαλύνθεται, nor is he himself ashamed.] Valesius.

CHAP. XXIV.

That the Bishops flock'd from all places to Jovianus, every one of them hoping they should induce him to embrace their own Creed.

After Jovianus's return out of Persia, the Ecclesiastick Commotions were again renew'd. For the Prelates of the Churches made it their business to prevent one another, each of them expecting, that the Emperor would give his assent to their Creed. But he had from the beginning adhered to the Homoöusian Faith; and openly declared, that he preferr'd that Creed before all others. And by his Letters he encourages Athanasius Bishop of Alexandria, who immediately after Julianus's death, had recover'd the Alexandrian Church. But, being then made more confident and couragious by the Emperor's Letters, he was freed from fear on all hands. The Emperor likewise recalled those Bishops, who had been banished by Constantius, and had not procured their own revocation by Julianus. Moreover, all the Heathen Temples were then shut up. And [the Dæmon Priests] themselves absconded, some in one place, some in another. The * Philosophers also laid aside their Palliums, and cloathed themselves in the common and ordinary habit. Likewise, that (a) publick pollution caused by the blood [of sacrifices,] which they had celebrated in Julianus's Reign, even to loathsomeness, was then taken away.

* Οἱ τελεσιουργοί, The Pallium-wearers.

(a) He seems to mean the Taurobolia and Criobolia, after the undertaking whereof, the Pagans believed they were eternally regenerated; as the old inscriptions inform us. This whole Ceremony is incomparably well described at large by Prudentius, in the passion of Romanus the Martyr; pag. 255, &c. Edit. Basil. It was in short thus: The Priest to be Consecrated, being habited in his sacerdotal Vestments, (adorned with a Crown of Gold, and wrapt about with a silken Gown,) was put into a deep Pit dug into the earth. Over this Pit an Altar made of Planks was erected, through which many holes were boared. Upon this Altar a great Bull was laid, adorned with Garlands; and his horns were gilded: his breast they divided with a consecrated Weapon. A stream of reeking bloud gushing immediately out of the large wound, flowed upon the boarded Altar, and running through the holes made therein, rained down upon the Priest inclosed under the boards; who catcht the shower of gore by putting his head under the falling drops; wherewith he besmeared his garments, and his whole body. See Prudentius, ut supra.

CHAP. XXV.

That the Macedonians and Acacians, meeting together at Antioch, confirm'd the Nicene Creed.

But the affairs of the Christians were in no wise in a sedate posture. For the principal Heads of every Party made their (a) addresses to the Emperor, supposing they should obtain from him power and authority against those by them reputed to be their adversaries. And in the first place, those termed Macedoniani present a Libel to him, requesting, that they who asserted the Son to be unlike the Father, might be ejected out of the Churches, and themselves put into their places. The persons who presented this Supplicatory Libel, were Basilius [Bishop of Ancyra, Silvanus of Tarsus, Sophronius of Pompeiopolis, Pasinicus of (b) Zelæ, Leontius of Comani, Callicrates of Claudiopolis, and Theophilus of Castabali. The Emperor having receivedtheirLibel, sent them away without an answer. He expresst himself only thus to them: I abominate (said he) Contentiousness: But I love and honour those that are * desirous of Unity and Concord. When these expressions were divulged in the hearing of the other parties, they mollified the stiffness of those who were desirous of contention. And this fell out agreeable to the Emperor's intent and design. Moreover, the contentious disposition of the Acacians was then also clearly manifested, and they evidently demonstrated their continual usage of complying with their sentiments who were vested with the supream power. For, meeting together at Antioch in Syria, they entred into discourse with Melitius; who having separated from them a little before, had embraced the Homoöusian Opinion. And this they did, in regard they saw Melitius was highly esteem'd by the Emperor, who then resided at Antioch. Having therefore made a profession of the Homoöusian Opinion, and confirmed the Nicene Creed, by a general consent they drew up a Libel, which they presented to the Emperor. The Contents whereof are these.

(a) It must be προσευλεύσεις, which has the same import with προσόδους, approaches, or addresses. Προσευλεύσεις signifies another thing, to wit, Progressus, proceedings. Valesius.

(b) Instead of [Ζήνων, Zeni] it should be [Ζήλων, Zele] according as Epiphan. Scholasticus read it. Zelæ or Zela is a Town of Cappadocia, as Pliny and others do affirm. Basilius mentions this place in the 72 Epist. ad Evæsenos; and in Epist. 73, ad Monachos suos. Valesius.

* Περιστάντας, those that hasten towards, &c.

To the most Pious and most Dear to God, our Lord JOVIANUS VICTOR AUGUSTUS, The SYNOD of Bishops present at ANTIOCH, assembled out of divers Provinces.

Even we our selves are fully satisfied, most Pious Emperor, that your Piety has in the first place studied to assert and constitute the Peace and Unity of the Church. Nor are we insensible, that You have rightly judged a Draught of the true and Orthodox Faith to be the Head and Fountain of this Unity. Wherefore, that we may not be reputed of their number who adulterate the Doctrine of truth, we declare to Your Piety, that we do embrace and firmly adhere to the Creed of the Holy Synod heretofore convened at Nicæa. Eſpecially, ſince that term therein, which to ſome ſeems (c) new and unuſual, (we mean the term Homoöuſios,) has with caution been explained by the Fathers; ſo, as to denote, that the Son was begotten of the Father's ſubſtance, and that he is like the Father as to his Subſtance. Not, as if any Paſſion were to be underſtood in relation to that inexplicable Generation: Nor, as the term Ouſia taken by the Fathers according to any uſual ſignification of it amongſt the Grecians; but, ['tis made uſe of] in order to the ſubverſion of what has been impiouſly and audaciouſly aſſerted by Arius concerning Chriſt, [to wit,] that he exiſted of things which are not. Which [Tenet] the Anomæans, who are newly ſprung up, do with a far greater boldneſs and audaciouſneſs impudently aſſert, to the utter ruin of Eccleſiaſtick Unity. Wherefore, we have annexed to this our Declaration a Copy of that Creed ſet forth by the Biſhops convened at Nicæa, which we alſo embrace. It is this, We believe in one God the Father Almighty, and (d) all the reſt of the Creed.

(c) The term [ξένον, new or unuſual] was added by Chriſtophorſon out of Nicephorus. For, in the Kings M. S. (which Robert Stephens followed,) and in the Florent. and Sfortian M.SS. this word is wanting. Nor did Epiphanius Scholaſticus meet with it in his Copy, as 'tis apparent from his Verſion. For thus he renders it: Quando etiam Conſubſtantialitatis nomen, quod aliter ſe quibuſdam habere videtur, dicimus cautam interpretationem à patribus excepiſſe. Valeſ.

(d) We remarked before (Socrat. Book 1. Chap. 8. Note (a.) that the term μάθημα, is by the Greeks uſed to ſignifie the Creed, becauſe 'twas commonly learnt by heart. But, the word πλήρης is uſeleſs here. In my judgment, it would be placed better after theſe words [ὅτις δεῖν,] thus ὅτις ἐστὶν πλήρης. It is this in full. Valeſ.

* Here follow the names of thoſe Biſhops who preſented and conſented to this Libel.

* I Meletius Biſhop of Antioch have preſented [this Libel,] and do give my conſent to what is above-written. [And ſo do I] Euſebius of Samoſata, Evagrius of (e) Siculi, Uranius of Apamæa, Zoilus of Lariſſa, Acacius of Cæſarea, Antipater of Rhoſus, Abramius of Urimi, Ariſtonicus of Seleucia upon Belus, (f) Barlamenus of Pergamus, Uranius of Melitina, Magnus of Chalcedon, Eutychius of Eleutheropolis, (g) Iſacoces of Armenia the Great, Titus of Boſtra, Petrus of (h) Sippi, Pelagius of Laodicæa, (i) Arabianus of Antros, Piſo of Adani, by (k) Lamydrion the Presbyter, Sabinianus of Zeugma, Athanaſius of Ancyra, by Orphitus and Aëtius Presbyters, (l) Irenius of Gaza, Piſo of Auguſta, Patricius of Paltus, by Lamyrion the Presbyter, Anatolius of Berœa, Theotimus of Arabi, Lucianus Arcenus. We found this Libel recorded in tha work of Sabinus's, entitled A Collection of Synodick Acts. Moreover, the Emperor had taken this reſolution with himſelf, that by kind words and perſwaſives he would extirpate the Contentiouſneſs of the diſagreeing Parties; and he declared that he would not create trouble to any perſon of what belief ſoever he were of: but that he would love and highly value ſuch as ſhould be the principal promoters of the Churches unity. That theſe things were after this manner done by him, Themiſtius the Philoſopher does alſo atteſt. For in the Oration he compoſed upon his Conſulate, he admires the Emperor, (m) for his allowing every perſon a free liberty of worſhipping the Deity in ſuch a manner as he deſired; whereby he repreſs'd the humours of Flatterers. Upon whom he made very facetious reflections, ſaying, 'tis experimently known, that they worſhip the Purple, not God; and that ſuch perſons differ not from the Euripus, which ſometimes throws its waves this way, at others the quite contrary.

Jovianus.

(e) In the Sfortian M. S. it is it is [σικελῶν Siculi,] which reading is truer than [σικελὸς, Sicelus.] It is the name of a City Situate in the Eaſt, concerning which I have yet met with nothing. Amongſt the Biſhops of the Acacian party who ſubſcribed the Seleucian Synod, Evagrius of Mitilene, of the Province of the Iſlands, is recounted. Valeſ.

(f) This is neither a Greek, nor a Latine name. In the Tripartite-Hiſtory it is Barbabentus. Valeſ.

(g) Epiphanius Scholaſticus terms him Iſacius. He ſeems to be the ſame perſon with him that is called Iöſaces in Baſilius's 69 Epiſtle, which is the Synodick Epiſtle of the Antiochian Council under Meletius. He is recounted between Coſroës and Narſes. Valeſ.

(h) Upon my warrant, make it Hippi. This Petrus was Biſhop of Hippi, a Province of Paleſtine. He ſubſcribed the Seleucian Synod, together with the others of the Acacian party here recounted, to wit, Zoïlus of Lariſſa, Eutychianus of Eleutheropolis; as you may read in Epiphanius, in Hæreſ. Semiarian. Hippos was a Town in Paleſtine, thirty Stadium's diſtant from Tiberias; Joſephus mentions it in his own Life. Valeſ.

(i) In Epiphanius Scholaſticus's Verſion he is called Arabianus Adrenſis, very right. For this is the Arabianus, or Arabion, Biſhop of the Adraï, who ſubſcribed the Seleucian Synod, amongſt the Biſhops of the Acacian party, as Epiphanius relates in Hereſ. Semiarian. Where he is placed after Exereſius Biſhop of Geraſi, and next before Chariſius Biſhop of Azotus. Adra or Adraön, is a City of Arabia, under the Biſhoprick of Boſtra, as Guillelmus Tyrius informus us. 'Tis certain, Uranius Biſhop of Adra is reckoned amongſt the Biſhops of the Province of Arabia in the firſt Conſtantinopolitan-Synod. But, in the fifth Conſtantinopolitan-Synod, one Dorymenius is counted Biſhop of Adra. Valeſ.

(k) I ſhould rather write it Lamurio, agreeable to Epiphanius Scholaſticus; for 'tis a name formed ἀπὸ τῦ λαμύρω, which ſignifies Talkative. A little after this, inſtead of Atetius, the ſaid Epiphanius reads Aëtius; and ſo I found it written in the Florentine M. S. Valeſ.

(l) This Perſon is mentiod by Marcus the Deacon, in his Life of Porphyrius Biſhop of Gaza, which you have in Surius. Valeſ.

(m) Inſtead of [ὡς τὸ ἐφεναι θρησκεύειν] it ſhould be [διὰ τὸ ἐᾶναι θρησκεύειν,] and we have rendred it accordingly. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXVI.

Concerning the Death of the Emperor Jovianus.

After this manner did the Emperor at that time repreſs their fury, who made it their buſineſs to cavil and contend. Departing immediately from Antioch, he went to Tarſus in Cilicia, where he buried Julianus's Body. Having perform'd all the Solemnities of his Funeral, he is declared Conſul. Deſigning to go directly from thence to Conſtantinople, he arriv'd at a place, the name whereof is Dadaſtana; it is ſituate in the Frontiers of Galatia and Bithynia. There Themiſtius the Philoſopher (with others of the Senatorian Order,) met him, and recited his Conſular Oration before him, which he afterwards ſpoke in the preſence of the people at Conſtantinople. Indeed, as well the Civil, as Eccleſiaſtick affairs of the Roman Empire, being bleſt with ſo good an Emperor, would have been managed fortunately and ſucceſsfully; had not a ſudden death raviſh'd ſo eminent a Perſonage from the Publick. For, being ſeiz'd with a Diſtemper, [term'd] an Obſtruction, in Winter time he ended his life at the fore-mention'd place, in his own and his Son Varronianus's Conſulate, upon the ſeventeenth of February. Having reign'd ſeven months, and lived thirty three years. This Book contains the [Tranſactions of affairs during the] ſpace of two years and five months.

CHAP. I.

That, after Jovianus's death, Valentinianus is proclaimed Emperor; who made his Brother Valens his Colleague in the Empire. And, that Valentinianus was a Catholick, but Valens an Arian.

Valentinianus and Valens.

THE Emperor Jovianus having ended his life (as we have declared) at Dadaſtana, in his own and his Son Varronianus's Conſulate, on the ſeventeenth of February; the Soldiers departing from Galatia, on the ſeventh day after came to Nicæa in Bythinia, where by a general Suffrage they proclaim Valentinianus Emperor, on the five and twentieth of February, (a) in the ſame Conſulate. By original extract he was a Pannonian, born at the City Cibalis. Having been entruſted with the leading of an Army, he had given a demonſtration of his great skill in * Tacticks. He was a perſonage of a large ſoul, and always appear'd † ſuperior † to that degree of honour he had arriv'd at. When therefore they had created him Emperor, he went immediately to Conſtantinople, and thirty days after his being proclaim'd, he makes his Brother Valens his Colleague in the Empire. They were both Chriſtians, but they diſagreed about the Faith of the Chriſtian Religion. For Valentinianus had a veneration for the Creed of the Nicene Synod: but Valens, by reaſon of a prepoſſeſſion, adhered rather to the Arian Opinion. The reaſon of this his prepoſſeſſion was, becauſe he had been baptized by Eudoxius [Biſhop] of Conſtantinople, a Prelate of the Arian Religion. Both of them entertain'd a warmth and ardency for that Religion which each adhered to: and yet after they came to the Empire, they differ'd one from the other very much, in their diſpoſitions. For formerly, in the Reign of Julianus, (when Valentinianus was Tribune of the Soldiers, and Valens had a Military employ in the Emperor's Guards) each of them gave a demonſtration of the zeal they had for their Religon. For being compelled to ſacrifice, they choſe to leave their Military employments, rather than relinquiſh Chriſtianity. But, at that time the Emperor Julianus, knowing them to be perſons uſeful to the Publick, removed neither of them from their Military preferment; nor yet Jovianus, who was his Succeſſor in the Empire. But, being afterwards promoted to the Empire, * they were at firſt like to one another, as to their care about the management of the publick affairs; but they differed (as I have ſaid) about the Chriſtian Religion, and behaved themſelves after a diſagreeable manner towards the Chriſtians. For Valentinianus did indeed favour ſuch perſons as embraced his own ſentiments; but he was not in the leaſt troubleſome to the Arians. But Valens, deſirous to promote the Arians, did moſt grievouſly diſquiet and diſturb thoſe who differ'd in Opinion from them; as the procedure of our Hiſtory will evidence. At that very time Liberius preſided over the Roman Church: at Alexandria Athanaſius [was Biſhop] of the Homoöuſians; and Lucius of the Arians, whom the Arians had conſtituted Georgius's Succeſſor. Euzoïus preſided over the Arians at Antioch. Thoſe of the Homoöuſian Opinion in that City, were divided into two parties; Paulinus headed the one party, and Melitius the other. Cyrillus was again put into poſſeſſion of the Church at Jeruſalem. The Government of the Churches at Conſtantinople was in the hands of Eudoxius, an aſſertor of the Arian Opinion. The Homoöuſians kept their Aſſemblies in a little Oratory within that City. Thoſe of the Macedonian Hereſie, who had (b) diſſented from the Acacians at Seleucia, at that time retain'd their Churches in every City. In this poſture were the affairs of the Church at that time.

* That is, valentinianus and valens.

(a) I doubt not, but inſtead of [ἐν τῇ αὐτῇ ὑπατείᾳ, in his Conſulate.] Socrates wrote [ἐν τῇ αὐτῇ ὑπατείᾳ, in the ſame Conſulate;] that is, in the Conſulate of Jovianus Auguſtus and Varronianus that noble young Prince his Son.

* That is, in Marſhalling of an Army.

(b) I am of the ſame mind with Chriſtophorſon, who inſtead of [διδαχθέντες τὰς περὶ Ἀκάσιον, had declared for the Acacians,] read [διενεχθέντες, πρὸς τὰς περὶ Ἀκάσιον, had diſſented from the Acacians.] Which reading I have followed in my Verſion. The reading may be [διαχεθέντες, ſeparated from] which is perhaps trueſt. Nicephorus has altered this paſſage of Socrates thus, διδαχθέντες ἃ ὅι περὶ Ἀκάσιον, aſſerting the ſame things with the Acacians,] which is worſt of all. Valeſ.

CHAP. II.

Valentinianus and Valens.

That Valentinianus went into the Weſtern parts [of the Empire,] and Valens reſided at Conſtantinople, who, upon the Macedonians addreſs to him, that a Synod might be convened, granted their requeſt. And that he perſecuted the Homoöuſians.

BUT, the one of the Emperors, to wit, Valentinianus, went forthwith into the Weſtern parts [of the Empire.] For the care of the publick affairs * neceſſarily required his preſence there. But Valens, after he had reſided a little while at Conſtantinople, had an addreſs made to him by moſt of the Biſhops of the Macedonian Hereſie, who requeſted another Synod might be convened, in order to the amendment of the † Creed. The Emperor, ſuppoſing they embraced the ſame ſentiments with Acacius and Eudoxius, permitted it to be done. And ſo theſe perſons made it their buſineſs to aſſemble a Synod in the City Lampſacus. But Valens went with all ſpeed poſſible towards Antioch in Syria, fearing leſt the Perſians ſhould break the League they had entred into for thirty years in the Reign of Jovianus, and invade the Roman Territories. But the Perſians were quiet. Which calm Valens made an ill uſe of, and raiſed an irreconcilable War againſt thoſe who embraced the Homoöuſian opinion. He did indeed no harm to Paulinus the Biſhop, by reaſon of that perſon's exemplary and eminent piety. But he puniſhed Melitius with Exile. He drove all others, who refuſed to communicate with Euzoïus, from the Churches in Antioch, and ſubjected them to loſſes and various puniſhments. 'Tis ſaid, that he drowned many perſons in the River Orontes which runs by that City.

† Or, Faith.

CHAP. III.

That, whilſt Valens perſecuted thoſe who embraced the Homoöuſian Opinion in the Eaſt, there aroſe a Tyrant at Conſtantinople, [by name] Procopius. And that at the ſame time an Earthquake hapned, and an inundation of the Sea, which ruin'd many Cities.

WHilſt Valens did theſe things in Syria, there aroſe a Tyrant at Conſtantinople, by name Procopius. He got together a great force in a ſhort time, and made preparations for an Expedition againſt the Emperor. This being told to the Emperor, put him into a very great agony, which for a little while repreſt the fury of his Perſecution againſt the Catholicks. In the interim that the diſquietude of a Civil War was with pangs expected, an Earthquake hapning ruined many Cities. The Sea alſo alter'd its own Boundaries; for in ſome places it overflowed it ſo much, that Veſſels might ſail, where there was a foot-paſſage before. And it departed from other places in ſuch a manner, that they were found to be dry ground. And this hapned in the firſt Conſulate of the two Emperors.

CHAP. IV.

That, there being a Diſturbance in the Secular as well as the Eccleſiaſtick State of affairs, the Macedonians, having convened a Synod at Lampſacus, did again confirm the Antiochian Creed, and Anathemized that [publiſhed] at Ariminum, and did again ratifie the Depoſition of Acacius and Eudoxius. Valentinianus and Valens.

THeſe things hapning to be thus, neither the Civil, nor the Eccleſiaſtical State of affairs was in a ſedate poſture. Thoſe therefore who had requeſted of the Emperor a power of convening a Synod, met at Lampſacus in the ſame Conſulate [which I have even now mention'd.] This was the ſeventh year from the Synod which had been aſſembled at Seleucia. Having again confirmed the * Antiochian Creed there, to which they had ſubſcribed at Seleucia, they Anathematize that Creed publiſhed at Ariminum by thoſe [Biſhops] with whom they had heretofore agreed in opinion: and again condemned Acacius's and Eudoxius's party, as having been juſtly depoſed. Eudoxius Biſhop of Conſtantinople could in no wiſe contradict theſe determinations; for the Civil War, which was imminent, permitted him not to revenge himſelf of them. Wherefore Eleuſius Biſhop of Cyzicum and his Adherents, were at that time for ſome little while the ſtronger party, in regard they aſſerted that termed Macedonius's Opinion, (a) which before had a very mean repute, but was then rendred more conſpicuous and better known in the Synod at Lampſacus. I ſuppoſe this Synod to have been the reaſon, why thoſe termed the Macedoniani are ſo numerous in the Helleſpont: For Lampſacus is ſituate in a narrow Bay of the Helleſpont. This was the concluſion of the Synod of Lampſacus.

* This Creed occurs in Socrates's Eccleſ. Hiſtor. Book 2. chap. 10.

(a) Muſculus and Chriſtophorſon have rendred theſe Words [μικρὸν τι ἔμπροσθεν] Paulo antea, a little before; as if it had been [μικρῷ πρότερον.] I am of opinion that this place is faulty, and by a ſmall change is thus to be reſtored: μικρὸν τὸ ἔμπροσθεν, καὶ τότε ἐν τῇ ΧΓ λάμψακον συνόδῳ γενόμενον φανερώτερον, which before had a very mean repute, but was then rendred more conſpicuous, and better known in the Synod at Lampſacus. He ſpeaks concerning Macedonius's Hereſie, which hitherto (ſays he) had been obſcure and unknown: but then, in the Synod of Lampſacus, it became moſt apparently known. I doubt not but Socrates wrote agreeable to my emendation. Concerning this Synod of Lampſacus, ſee Baronius, at the year of Chriſt 365. Valeſ.

CHAP. V.

That, an Engagement hapning about a City of Phrygia between the Emperor [Valens] and the Tyrant Procopius, the Emperor took the Tyrant by the treachery of his Commanders, and put him and them to death, by inflicting new and unuſual puniſhments upon them.

ON the year following, wherein Gratianus and * Dagalaïfus were Conſuls, (a) the War was in good earneſt begun. For when the Tyrant Procopius, having removed from Conſtantinople, was upon the march with his Army towards the Emperor: Valens, informed thereof, haſtens from Antioch, and engages Procopius near a City of Phrygia, the name whereof is Nacolia. In the firſt encounter he was worſted. But, not long after, he took Procopius alive, Agilo and Gomoärius his Commanders having betray'd him: upon [all] whom Valens inflicted new and unuſual puniſhments. For, diſregarding the Oaths

* Or, Dagalaiphus.

(a) Τὰ περὶ τὸν πόλεμον ἐπεδίδου. Epiphanius renders it; bella parabantur, the War was prepared. Chriſtophorſon, following the ſenſe, rather than the words, tranſlates it, Bellum geri cœptum eſt, the War was begun to be waged. But, in order to the expreſſing the ſignificativeneſs and propriety of the Greek phraſe, it muſt be rendred, Bella incubuerunt, or, Belli vis graſſata eſt; the War was with all diligence taken in hand, or, the force of the War raged. Valeſ.

he

he had bound himself in to the Traitors, (b) he put them to death, by cutting them in sunder with Saws. And, having bound each of the Tyrant's Legs to two Trees standing near one another, which were bowed down, (c) he afterwards permitted the bended Trees to erect themselves: By the rise whereof Procopius was torn in sunder. And thus the Tyrant, rent in to two pieces, ended his life.

(b) Ammianus Marcellinus relates no such thing concerning Agilo and Gomoärius Procopius's Captains. He does indeed affirm, that they revolted to Valens's side, but says not, that they were cut in sunder with Saws. Marcellinus gives us this narrative only, (see Amm. Marcellinus, Book 26. pag. 328, 329. Edit. Paris. 1636.) that the Tribunes Florentius and Barchalba, after the fight at Nacolia, delivered Procopius bound to Valens. And, that Procopius was immediately beheaded; and Florentius and Barchalba soon after underwent the same punishment. Therefore, what Socrates relates here concerning Agilo and Gomoärius, and concerning Procopius's being torn in sunder, is false. Philostorgius also, in his ninth Book, relates that Procopius was beheaded, and that Florentius, who delivered him to Valens, was burnt. Vales.

(c) This place is corrupted, as 'tis evident. In my judgment, 'tis thus to be restored: ἔπειτα τὰ δένδρα ἐπικαμφθέντα ἀφῆκεν ὀρθωθῆναι; and we have rendred it accordingly.

CHAP. VI.

That, after the death of the Tyrant, the Emperor, forced those who had been present at the Synod, and all the Christians, to embrace Arius's Opinion.

THE Emperor, having at that time been fortunate and successful in that action, began immediately to disquiet the Christians, being desirous to bring over all persons to Arianism. But he was in a more especial manner incensed against the Synod which had been convened at Lampsacus, not only because it had deposed the Arian Bishops, but in regard that Draught of the Creed publish'd at Arminum, had been Anathematized there. Being therefore come to Nicomedia in Bithynia, he sent for Eleusius Bishop of Cyzicum to him. This Prelate had more closely adhered to Macedonius's opinion, as I have said before. Wherefore the Emperor, having convened a Synod of Arian Bishops, compelled Eleusius to give his assent to their Faith. At first he denied to do it: but when he was threathed with Banishment and Proscription of his Goods, being terrified, he gave his assent to the Arian Opinion. He repented immediately that he had consented. And returning to Cyzicum, in the presence of all the people he complained of his being forc'd, saying, that he had given his assent by compulsion, not voluntarily: he also advised them to seek out for another Bishop, because he had been compelled to renounce his own Opinion. But the Inhabitants of Cyzicum, by reason of that great love and affection they had for him, refused to be subject to another Bishop, nor would they permit any other [to govern] their Church. They continued therefore under his Presidency, and would in no wise recede from their own Heresie.

CHAP. VII.

That Eunomius, having ejected Eleusius the Macedonian, was made Bishop of Cyzicum. And concerning Eunomius's Original, and that having been * Amanuensis to Aëtius [surnamed] Atheus, he imitated him.

* Or, Notary.

WHen the Bishop of Constantinople heard this, he prefers Eunomius to the Bishoprick of Cyzicum, in regard he was a person able by his eloquence to draw [the minds of] the multitude to his own Lure. Upon his arrival at Cyzicum, an Imperial Edict was published, by which order was given, that Eleusius should be ejected, and Eunomius installed. This being done, those of Eleusius's party, having erected an Oratory without the City, celebrated their Assemblies therein. Let thus much be said concerning Eleusius. We must now give an account of Eunomius. Eunomius had been Amanuensis to Aëtius, surnamed Atheus, of whom we have made mention *before. Conversing with him, he imitated his Sophistick way of discoursing: addicting himself [to the use of] certain insignificant and impertinent terms, and was insensible of his framing fallacious arguments in order to the deceiving of himself. Upon this account he was puft up with pride, and fell into (a) blasphemy, being indeed a follower of Arius's Opinion, but was various ways an adversary to the Doctrines of truth. He had but a very mean skill in the sacred Scriptures, and was unable to understand their meaning. But he was very full of words, always making a repetition of the same things over and over, but could not arrive at the design he had proposed to himself. His seven Books which with a great deal of labour he wrote upon the Apostle's Epistle to the Romans, are a demonstration hereof. For, altho' he has spent a great many words in the explanation thereof, yet he could in no wise (b) apprehend the scope and design of that Epistle. Of the same sort are those other Books of his that be extant. Of which he that should be desirous to make tryal, would find a great scarcity of sense amidst a multitude of words. This Eunomius therefore was by Eudoxius (c) preferr'd to the Bishoprick of Cyzicum. (d) When he was come thither, by making use of his usual Dialectical Art, he amazed his Auditors by his unusual expressions; whereupon there arose a disturbance at Cyzicum. [At length] the inhabitants of Cyzicum, not able to endure his arrogant and haughty manner of expressing himself, drove him from their City. He went to Constantinople, where he made his abode with Eudoxius, and was [reputed a (e) Vacant Bishop. But, that

* See Socrates, Book 2. chap. 35.

(a) In the Florentine MS. the reading is [εἰς βλασφημίαν, into Blasphemies.] which i confirmed by Epiphanius Scholasticus's Version. Vales.

(b) The common reading is [τὸ σκοπὸν λαβεῖν, apprehend the scope, or design;] in the Florent. MS. it is [τὸ σκοπὸν ἐλεῖν, comprehend the design.] Vales.

(c) Socrates has done ill, to place Eunomius's promotion to the Episcopate of Cyzicum, in the Reign of Valens Augustus. For Eunomius was made Bishop of Cyzicum under the Emperor Constantius, in that Synod of Constantinople, which was held immediately after the Synod of Seleucia, as Philostorgius does in expres words affirm, Book 5. chap. 3. and Theodoret, Book 2. Chap. 27. & 29. Eccles. Histor. which two Authors have recorded Eunomius's affairs with a far greater accuracy, than Socrates has related them. 'Tis certain, that in Valens's Reign, Eunomius was banished by Valens, because he was reported to be a favourer of the Tyrant Procopius, as Philostorgius affirms. So unlikely is it, that he should have had the Bishoprick of Cyzicum then bestowed upon him. Sozomen has followed Socrates's mistake, in Book 6. chap. 8. Eccles. Histor. Vales.

(d) Instead of [ὡς οὖν ἐγένετο κατ' ἐκεῖνον] it should undoubtedly be [ὡς δὲ ἐγένετο κατ' ἐκεῖνον, when he was come thither.] I wonder this was not perceived by Christophorson. For Epiphanius might have shown him the true reading, who renders it thus, cum illuc venisset, when he was arrived there. Vales.

(e) In Civil and Military Offices, some Persons were actually employed in bearing of them; others were Vacantes, [that is, Persons that had the title of such an Office, but were not actually concerned in the management of it; we may term them titular Officers:] who in the Code are said to be præcincti honore otiosi cinguli. So some Tribunes are termed Vacantes in Amm. Marcellinus, as I have remarkt in my Notes on that Historian. After the same manner those Bishops are termed Vacantes by our Socrates, who had the bare name of a Bishop, without a Church, without a Clergy and People, over whom they might preside. Of the same nature almost are those, who now a-days are stiled Bishops in Infidel Countries; such a one therefore was Eunomius, when, we may not ſeem to have ſaid theſe things upon account of calumny and reproach, hear Eunomius's own words, after what manner he takes the boldneſs of expreſs himſelf in his Sophiſtick and fallacious aſſertions concerning God. For he ſays word for word thus. God knows no more than we do concerning his own Subſtance. Nor is that more known to him, and leſs to us. But whatever we know concerning the Divine Subſtance, that is wholly known to God. And on the contrary, whatever he [knows,] the ſame you will without any difference find in us. Theſe, and many other ſuch-like fallacies, Eunomius framed, being inſenſible [of his own error.] But how he afterwards became a Separatiſt from the Arians, we will in due place relate.

CHAP. VIII.

Concerning the Oracle, which was found cut upon a Stone, when the Wall of Chalcedon was demoliſhed by reaſon of the Emperor Valens*'s anger.*

BUT, the Emperor gave order, that the Walls of Chalcedon (a City ſituate over-againſt Byzantium) ſhould be demoliſh'd. For he had obliged himſelf by Oath to do this (after he ſhould have vanquiſhed the Tyrant Procopius) becauſe the Chalcedonians, ſiding with the Tyrant, had ſhamefully (a) railed at and abuſed him, and had ſhut their gates upon him as he (b) paſſed by their City. The Wall therefore was by the Emperor's order pulled down: and the Stones were convey'd to the publick Baths of Conſtantinople, which are called (c) Conſtantianæ. There was a Prophecy found, cut on one of the Stones, which had for a long time lain concealed, but was then diſcover'd; ſignifying, that when the City ſhould be furniſhed with plenty of water, then the Wall ſhould ſerve for a Bath: and that numerous tribes of Barbarous Nations having over-run the Provinces of the Roman Empire, and done a great deal of miſchief, at length ſhould themſelves alſo be deſtroyed. Nothing hinders, but we may here inſert the Prophecy it ſelf, in favour to ſuch as are ſtudious.

(a) Amm. Marcellinus relates, that Valens laid ſiege to Chalcedon, during his War with Procopius. At which ſiege the Inhabitants of that City reviled him from the Walls, and contemptuouſly ſtiled him Sabaiarius, Small-beer-drinker. Sabaia (as Marcellinus deſcribes it) was a ſmall ſort of Liquor made of Barly, very uſually drank in Pannonia. In which Country Valens was born, (ſee Socrates Book 4. Chap. 1.) and therefore was, by way of reproach, called Sabaiarius, or Sabiarius. That this was the Pannonians uſual drink, Dio atteſts, Lib. 49. where he ſays, that the Pannonians fed upon a very mean diet; that they had very little Wine, or Oil; and that Barly and Millet was their food and drink. See Amm. Marcellinus, Book 26. pag. 325. Edit. Paris. 1636; and Valeſius's Notes thereon, pag. 324.

(b) Inſtead of [περιόντος,] it ſhould in my mind be [παριόντος,] as I have expreſt it in my Verſion. But the Chalcedonians, becauſe of that Revolt of theirs, were not only puniſhed with the demoliſhment of their Walls; but had this infamous brand alſo ſet upon them, viz. that no Chalcedonian ſhould ever be preferred to any Office. Iſidorus Peluſiota (Book 1. Epiſt. 485.) does atteſt this, in theſe words: Καρχηδονίοις νόμος κωλύει διέπειν ἀρχήν, the Law prohibits the Carthaginians from bearing any Office. On my peril make it καλχηδονίοις, Chalcedonians. For the Carthaginians have no concern with this place, in regard they were not ſubjects of the Eaſtern Empire, concerning which Iſidorus here ſpeaks. Valeſ.

(c) Sozomen mentions theſe Baths, termed Conſtantianæ, in his Eccleſ. Hiſtor. Book 8. Chap. 21. They were in the Tenth Ward of the City Conſtantinople, as we are informed from the old deſcription of that City. Alſo, Ammianus Marcellinus (Book 3.) relates, that Valens built a Bath at Conſtantinople, of the ſtones of the walls of Chalcedon. But Cedrenus and Zonaras do affirm, that an Aquæduct or Conduit, not a Bath, was built of thoſe Stones. Which relations do not contradict one another. For an Aquæduct is neceſſary for a Bath. It was doubtleſs a very famous work; whereof mention is made by Themiſtius, (in Oratione decennali ad Valentem,) and by Gregorius Nazianzenus in his 25th Oration; who very elegantly terms this Aquæduct of Valens's, a Subterraneous and Aërial River. So alſo Themiſtius, in his Oration entitled Amatorium, or de Regiâ pulchritudine ad Gratianum; the paſſage wherein I will ſo much the more willingly annex here, becauſe the Oration is not yet Printed: Αἱ δὲ ὑποδεχόμεναι ἠλιβάτου, πεῶνας ἔχουσι καὶ ἐναέριοι, ϛαφυλῆ τὰ νῶτα ἀπειναμένοι, πλέον ἢ ϛαδίους χιλίους ἅπαντα καὶ κάταντα, ὅτε ἄντλῳ ὅτε καταντλῶ διάδεγμένοι, καὶ ὅτε ὑποσχεθεῖσαι, ὅτε ἐνεχθεῖσαι, σωτηρίτησαν ὑπερόφιοι, καὶ ἤνυσαν ἤδη περὶ τὴν πυλῶν, &c. Moreover, in Socrates here, I had rather read Caroſianæ, than Conſtantianæ. For the Baths called Conſtantianæ were built by the Emperor Conſtantius, as their name does declare. But the Caroſianæ Baths were finiſhed by Valens, and dedicated after Gratianus's third and Æquitius's Conſulate, Vindalonius Magnus being then Præfect of Conſtantinople, as 'tis recorded in Idatius's Faſti, and by the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle. They were named Caroſianæ from Caroſia Valens's daughter, as Sozomen atteſts, Book 6. And they were in the Seventh Ward of the City, as the deſcription of Conſtantinople declares. Valeſ.

When Nymphs their myſtick daunce with watry-feet
Shall tread through proud Byzantium*'s ſtately Street;*
When Rage the City-wall ſhall overthrow,
Whoſe Stones to fence a Bathing-place ſhall go:
Then Savage Lands ſhall ſend forth numerous ſwarms,
(Shining with golden Locks and burniſh'd Arms,)
Which having Iſter*'s ſilver Streams o're-paſt,*
Shall Scythian Fields, and Mœſia*'s Meadows waſte:*
But when, proud with ſucceſs, they enter Thrace, They'll meet their Fate, and find a Burial-place.

This was the Prophecy. But it afterwards hapned, that the Aquæduct built by Valens, furniſhed the City with plenty of water: and then the Barbarous Nations made an Inſurrection, as we ſhall hereafter declare. This Prediction, as it fell out, was by ſome perſons taken in another ſenſe. For, when that Aquæduct was brought into the City, (d) Clearchus, being Præfect of the City, built a ſtately (e) Bath, in that now called Theodoſius's Forum: which Bath was named The plentiful water. Upon which account the City celebrated a Feſtival with great ſolemnity.

(d) This is the Clearchus, who was afterwards Conſul with Richomeres, in the Empire of Theodoſius. Concerning whom Eunapius makes mention, in the Life of Maximus the Philoſopher: and ſays that he had firſt been Vicarius of Aſia in the Procopian War; and was afterwards made Proconſul of all Aſia by Valens, for the eminent ſervice he had done in the War with Procopius. Libanius has very many Epiſtles written to this Clearchus in his fourth and fifth Book; wherein he commends him highly, and intimates that he had a Royal Command over Aſia. He was Præfect of Conſtantinople in the Conſulate of Modeſtus and Arinthæus, as we are informed from the Theodoſian Code. Valeſ.

(e) Cedrenus and Zonaras call it a Nymphæum. But the Nymphæa are not the ſame with Baths, as 'tis apparent from the deſcription of Conſtantinople. For the Nymphæa are the Nymphs Temples, watered with pleaſant Fountains; as I have long ſince remark'd in my Notes on Amm. Marcellinus, pag. 46. Valeſ.

And this is that, ſay they, which is ſpoken of in the Prophecy, in theſe words:

——— Their myſtick daunce with watry feet
Shall tread through proud Byzantium*'s ſtately ſtreet.*

But, what belong'd to the completion of this Prophecy hapned ſometime afterwards. At that time, when the Walls ſhould have been pulled down, the Conſtantinopolitans entreated the Emperor to deſiſt from demoliſhing of them. Alſo, [ſome of] the Inhabitants of Nicomedia and Nicæa came from Bithynia to Conſtantinople, and made the ſame requeſt. The Emperor, being highly incenſed, was with great difficulty induced to admit of the Suppliants Petition. But, that he might perform his Oath [wherein he had bound himſelf,] he gave order, both that the Walls ſhould be pulled down, and alſo that the breaches made by that demoliſhment ſhould at the ſame time time be repaired with other small Stones. At this present therefore there is to be seen in some parts of the Wall, patches basely wrought up with very mean materials, laid upon vast and prodigious Stones, which [patches] were at that time made. Let thus much be said concerning the Wall of Chalcedon.

CHAP. IX.

That the Emperor Valens persecuted the Novatians also, who (in like manner as did the Catholicks*) embraced the* Homoöusian Faith.

BUT the Emperor desisted not from persecuting those that embraced the Homoöusian Opinion; but drove them from Constantinople; and together with them the Novatians also, in regard they owned the same sentiments with them: whose Churches he order'd to be shut up: and gave order that their Bishop also, by name Agelius, should be punished with Banishment. He was a person that had presided over their Churches from the times of Constantine, and had led an Apostolick life. For he always went bare-foot, and made use of but on Coat, observing the command of the Gospel. But the Emperor's rage against the Novatians was stopt by a pious and also an eloquent person, by name Marcianus. He had before born a Military employ in the Imperial Pallace, but was at that time a Presbyter of the Novatian Church, and taught Anastasia and Carosa, Valens's Daughters, the Grammar; (a) by whose names the publick Baths which Valens erected at Constantinople, yet standing, [were called.] Out of veneration therefore to this person, the Novatian Churches which for some small time had been shut up, were open'd again. But the Novatians were not perfectly free from disturbances caused by the Arians: For they were hated by the Arians, because the Novatians loved, and had an extraordinary kindness for the Homoöusians, with whom they agreed in opinion. This was the posture of affairs at that time. Further, you are to know, that the War against the Tyrant Procopius was finished in the Consulate of Gratianus and Dagalaïfus, about the latter end of May.

(a) 'Tis false, what Socrates here says, that the Anastasian Baths at Constantinople had their name from Anastasia, Valens's daughter, and were erected by Valens. They were built by Constantine The Great, and from his Sisters name were called the Anastasian Baths, Amm. Marcellinus tells us thus much, (Book 26. pag. 320. Edit. Paris 1636.) Where he describes Procopius's Tyrannick design: his Words are these; Idem Procopius diductus in cogitationes varias, Anastasianas Balneas Petit, a Sorore Constantini Cognominatas, the same Procopius, divided into various thoughts, went to the Anastasian Baths, which had their name from Constantine's Sister. At which place in Amm. Marcellinus I have long since remark'd in my notes thereon, that Anastasia, Constantine's Sister, was married to Bassianus Cæsar. After my publishing of those my Notes on Amm. Marcellinus, there was a noble and learned Person in England, who found fault with this Annotation of mine, and has stifly deny'd, that Bassianus was ever created Cæsar. Upon what account therefore I was induced to affirm this, I will in short here declare. When the Emperor Constantine (after his conquest of Maxentius) had given his Sister Constantia in marriage to Licinius; quickly after that he returned into the Gallia's, and sent his Brother Constantius to Licinius, entreating him that Bassianus might be created Cæsar; to which Bassianus, Anastasia, Constantine's other Sister, was married. Sed Licinio talia frustrante, &c. that is, But when Licinius disappointed him as to those things, Bassianus (by the instigation of Senicio his Brother, who was his bosom-friend) takes up Arms against Constantine. Who being apprehended in the very attempt, was by Constantine*'s order convicted and put to death. When* Sinicius the Author of this treachery, was demanded in order to his being punished; Licinius denying that, the agreement betwixt them was broken. This passage occurs in the excerptions de Vita Constantini, which I heretofore published at the end of Amm. Marcellinus. From which Words I draw these Conclusions: (1) That Constantine treated with Licinius, in order to Bassianus's being created Cæsar. (2) That Bassianus being sollicited by Licinius, did not only conspire against Constantine, but made War also against him. Bassianus therefore must of necessity [be allowed] to have played the Tyrant, and therefore to have by force assumed the Title of Cæsar, which Constantine had thoughts of giving him, had Licinius consented. Being moved by these reasons, I have termed Bassianus, Cæsar, whom notwithstanding I do acknowledge to have been a Tyrant, and do grant that he never was duly and lawfully made Cæsar. Moreover, in regard the Anastasian Baths were at Constantinople before Procopius's insurrection, (as we have shown from Amm. Marcellinus,) it may be evidently concluded from thence, that they were not built by Valens, in regard at that time he was but newly made Emperor. Further, the reading here in Socrates should be thus [Δημόσια λουτρά, the publick Baths.] Vales.

Valentinianus and Valens.

CHAP. X.

That the Emperor Valentinianus begat a Son, who bore his Fathers name [to wit, Valentinianus;] he having begat [his Son] Gratianus before his being created Emperor.

NOT long after this War, (a) during the same Consulate, a Son was born to Valentinianus the Emperor in the Western parts, who had his Father's name given him. For he had begotten Gratianus long before his [undertaking the Government of the] Empire.

(1) Socrates is grievously mistaken here. For Valentinianus the Younger, who was born in the Consulate of Gratianus and Dagalaïphus, was not Valentinianus's, but Valens Augustus's Son. Idatius does expressly affirm this in his Fasti, in these words: Gratiano Nob. & Dagalaïfo Consulibus, &c. In the Consulate of the most noble Gratianus, and Dagalaïfus, Valentinianus the Younger, Son to Valens Augustus, was born, on the fifteenth of the Calends of February. I know indeed, that in Jacobus Sirmondus's Edition of these Fasti, the common reading is, Filius Augusti Valentiniani, the Son of Valentinianus Augustus. But, in that most ancient Manuscript belonging to the College of Clermont, from which Sirmondus published these Fasti, I found it in expres words written thus, Filius Augusti Valentis, the Son of Valens Augustus. Besides the testimony of these Fasti, it may be made evident by many other arguments, that this Valentinianus the Younger, (who was born in the Consulate of Gratianus and Dagalaïphus, in the year of Our Lord, 366,) was the Son of Valens Augustus. For, this is the very same Valentinianus, as 'tis on all hands agreed, who was afterwards Consul with Victor, in the year of Christ 369. and to whom Themistius spake his Consular Oration, which is at this day extant under this Title: προσφωνητικὸς Οὐαλεντινιανῷ υἱῷ. Now, in this Oration, Themistius frequently calls Valens the Father of this Valentinian, and stiles Gratianus ἀνεψιὸν, that is, his Cousin German by the Fathers side. See pag. 253. in that Oration. Besides, Themistius does affirm (pag. 254.) that the slaughter and overthrow of the Tyrant Procopius was foresignified by God, by the birth of this Valentinian. 'Tis certain, Valentinianus Junior was born when Gratianus and Dagalaïphus were Consuls, on the 15th of the Calends of February; as 'tis recorded in Idatius's Fasti, and in the Alexandrian Chronicle. In which year the Tyrant Procopius was vanquished by Valens, on the sixth of the Calends of June, as 'tis affirmed in the same Fasti. But, if Valentinianus Junior had been Son to Valentinianus Senior, his birth had signified nothing to Valens. Further, if this Valentinianus had in reality been Son to Valentinianus Senior, why did he make his residence in the East? How could he have been sent so long a journey from his Father, being as yet but an Infant? For he accompanied Valens in the Gothick Expedition, as Themistius attests not far from the beginning of this Oration. Lastly, 'tis evident from Themistius's Quinquennalian Oration [i. e. His Oration upon Valens's having arrived at the fifth year of his Empire,] near the close thereof, that Valens had an only Son then when he celebrated his Quinquennalia, that is, in the year of our Lord 368. In regard therefore, the most noble Valentinianus was made Consul in the East on the year following, he can be no other Person than Valens's Son. And Themistius, in the close of his Quinquennalian Oration (after he had spoken concerning Valens's only Son,) adds these words: ὃν ἐγὼ Ἀλέξανδρον ποιησαίμην, κἀ θρέμμα αὐτὸς τοιοῦτον ἀυχήσεις φιλοσοφία, whom I would make an Alexander, and Philosophy shall again boast of such an Issue. And in his Exhortary Oration, which he spake the year after to Valentinianus Junior, he makes an address to the Child almost in the same Words: δεῦρ' ἴθι παῖ, ἐπὶ σὸν ἐμῶν καθίζου γονάτων, come [Royal] Babe, sit upon my knees! And a little after: συμπαιδαγωγήσουσί σε ἐμοὶ Πλάτων κἀ Ἀριστοτέλης, οἳ κἀ τὸν μέγαν Ἀλέξανδρον ἐπαιδαγώγησαν, Plato and Aristotle shall together with my self instruct Thee, by whom the Great Alexander was tutored. From whence 'tis apparent, that it is one and the same person concerning whom Themistius speaks in both places; and therefore that Valentinianus Junior, whom Themistius speaks to in his Exhortatory Oration, was the same only Son of Valens. But, this Valentinianus Junior was, by another name, called Galates. For Socrates and Sozomen give him this name. Sozomen (Book 6. Chap. 16.) does expreſly affirm, that Valens had one only Son by [Dominica] his Wife, whoſe name was Galates. Since therefore, 'tis manifeſt from what I have juſt now ſaid, that the moſt noble Valentinianus was Valens's Son, Valentinianus and Galates muſt neceſſarily be one and the ſame Perſon. I ſhould think, that the Child might have the ſurname of Galates given him, becauſe he was born in Galatia, at ſuch time as Valens was at War with Procopius. Moreover, Socrates's miſtake (in which error he is followed by Sozomen, Book 6. Chap. 10.) did, in my judgment, proceed from hence; viz. becauſe he confounded the two Junior Valentinians, (one whereof was Son to Valens, the other to Valentinianus Senior,) and made but one perſon of two. For he thought, that the moſt noble alentinianus (who was Conſul with Victor) was the ſame perſon with that Valentinianus Junior, who, after the death of his Father Valentinianus Senior, governed the Empire with Gratianus. But we have long ſince refuted this Error, in our Notes on Book 30. of Amm. Marcellinus, pag. 413. Valeſ. Valeſius, at the now quoted pag. of his Notes on Amm. Marcellinus, does indeed evidently prove that there were two Junior Valentinians; but (contrary to what he affirms here,) he aſſerts they were both Sons to Valentinianus Senior, whom he there ſtiles Magnus. See his note.

CHAP. XI.

Concerning a Hail of an unuſual bigneſs which fell from Heaven, and concerning the Earthquakes in Bithynia, and the Helleſpont.

ON the following Conſulate, which was Lupicinus's and * Jovianus's, there fell a Hail at Conſtantinople † of a vaſt bigneſs, on the ſecond of July, which was like Stones. Many perſons ſaid, that this Hail was ſent by reaſon of God's anger, becauſe the Emperor had baniſhed ſeveral of the Sacerdotal Order, in regard they refuſed to communicate with Eudoxius. A little after this time, during the ſame Conſulate, the Emperor Valentinianus proclaim'd his || Son Gratianus || Auguſtus, on the twenty fourth of Auguſt. On the year after, wherein Valentinianus and Valens were the ſecond time Conſuls, there hapned an Earthquake in Bithynia, which ruined the City Nicæa, on the eleventh of October. This was the twelfth year after the ruin of * Nicomedia. Soon after this Earthquake moſt part of Germa, a City in the Helleſpont, was deſtroyed by another Earthquake. Notwithſtanding theſe accidents hapned, yet neither was Eudoxius Biſhop of the Arians, nor the Emperor Valens, put into any fear: For they deſiſted not from perſecuting thoſe who diſſented in opinion from them. [Moreover,] theſe Earthquakes ſeem'd to denote the diſturbance of the Churches. Wherefore, many of the Sacerdotal Order (as I have ſaid) were baniſh'd. Only Baſilius and Gregorius, by a certain diſpenſation of Divine Providence, ſuffered not Baniſhment, by reaſon of their eminent piety. (a) The firſt of theſe perſons was Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia; and the ſecond [preſided over] Nazianzum, a ſmall City near Cæſarea. But we ſhall mention Baſilius and Gregorius in the procedure [of our Hiſtory.]

* Nicomedia was deſtroyed by an Earthquake, in the Conſulate of Dacianus and Cerealis, about the 28th of Auguſt. See Socrates, Book 2. chap. 39.

(a) Baſilius was made Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia, in the year of Chriſt 369, as Baronius has rightly obſerved. But Socrates ſeems to make Baſilius's promotion to that Biſhoprick ſomewhat ancienter. For, in his account at this place of thoſe affairs that were tranſacted in Valentinianus's and Valens's ſecond Conſulate, which was the year of Chriſt 368, he does acknowledge that Baſilius was then Biſhop of Cæſarea, and Gregorius of Nazianzum. But, as to Gregorius, Socrates is manifeſtly miſtaken. For he was not at that time made Biſhop of Nazianzum by Baſilius, but of Saſima, which Biſhoprick he notwithſtanding never entred upon, as he himſelf atteſts in his Epiſtles. But in his Verſes concerning his own Life, he evidently complains of Baſilius, who (when as he had ſixty Biſhopricks under him,) had preferred him to the Church of a pittiful little Town, although he himſelf was nothing inferior to Baſilius. CHAP. XII.

That thoſe who imbraced Macedonius's Opinion, being reduced into ſtreights by reaſon of the Emperor's violence towards them, ſent an Embaſſage to Liberius [Biſhop] of Rome, and ſubſcribed to the Homoöuſian Creed.

WHen thoſe who embraced the Homoöuſian opinion had at that time been ſorely diſquieted and put to flight, the Perſecutors renewed their rage againſt the Macedonians: Who, being reduced to great ſtreights by fear rather than force, ſent Embaſſies to one another throughout every City; ſignifying, that they muſt of neceſſity fly, both to the Emperor's Brother [Valentinianus,] and alſo to Liberius Biſhop of Rome; and that ['twas more eligible for them] to embrace their Faith, than to communicate with Eudoxius's party. (a) They ſent therefore Euſtathius [Biſhop] of Sebaſtia, (who had been many times depoſed) Silvanus of Tarſus in Cilicia, and Theophilus of Caſtabali, which is alſo a City of Cilicia: and gave them order, that they ſhould not diſſent from Liberius concerning the Faith, but ſhould enter into communion with the Roman Church, and confirm the Homoöuſian Creed. Theſe perſons, carrying along with them their Letters who had diſſented [from Acacius] at Seleucia, arriv'd at Old Rome. They could not go to the Emperor [Valentinian] himſelf; for he was engaged in a War with the (b) Sarmatæ in the Gallia's. But they deliver'd their Letters to Liberius. He [at firſt] wholly refuſed to admit them: for he ſaid, that they were of the Arian Faction, and could in (a) Baronius at the year of Chriſt 365, reproves Socrates, becauſe he places this Embaſſy of the Macedoniani to Liberius Biſhop of Rome (the chief of which was Euſtathius Biſhop of Sebaſtia,) on the year of Chriſt 368, in which year Valentinianus and Valens were the ſecond time Conſuls. Baronius thinks 'twas ſent in the year of Chriſt 365, and grounds his opinion on theſe two arguments eſpecially. Firſt, Euſtathius, with his companions, was ſent Embaſſador by the Synod of Lampſacus. Now, that Synod was convened in the year of Chriſt 365, ſeven years after the Seleucian Synod, as Socrates atteſts. 'Tis certain, the Embaſſadors (in their Libel of Faith which they preſented to Liberius,) do expreſly profeſs that they were Legates from the Synod of Lampſacus, and that they brought the Letters of that Synod to Liberius. Secondly, if this Embaſſy of the Macedoniani were ſent on the year of Chriſt 368, it would not have been ſent to Liberius, but to Damaſus. For Liberius died on the year of Chriſt 367, in the Conſulate of Lupicinus and Jovinus; and on the ſame year Damaſus entred upon that See. But, the Macedonian Embaſſadors preſented a Libel of their Faith to Liberius, and from the ſame Liberius received Letters to the Prelates of their own party, as Socrates relates in this Chapter. This Embaſſy therefore was not ſent in the year 368. Theſe are Baronius's arguments. But I would rather place this Embaſſy on the year of Chriſt 367, and will determine hereof againſt Baronius, upon this account. Baronius confeſſes, that Elpidius Presbyter of Rome was ſent, together with Euſtathius and his Companions, to the Illyricum Synod; the Synodick Letter whereof Theodoret has recorded, Book 4. Chap. 9. Eccleſ. Hiſtor. But the Illyricum Synod, at which Elpidius and Euſtathius of Sebaſtia were preſent, was covnened in the year of Chriſt 367, or 368; as appears from the inſcription of that Letter which the Emperor Valentinianus wrote to the Biſhops of Aſia, that he might confirm that Synod. For that Imperial Letter has this Title: Valentinianus, Valens and Gratianus, Auguſti, to the Biſhops, &c. as you may read in Theodoret, Book 4. Chap. 8. Now Gratianus was proclaimed Auguſtus by his Father, in the Conſulate of Lupicinus and Jovinus, on the ninth of the Calends of September, as (beſides Socrates) Idatius in his Faſti, and the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle, do declare. Therefore, if the Illyricum Synod hapned on the ſame year whereon the Macedonians Embaſſy was ſent; the Macedonians Embaſſy muſt neceſſarily be placed on the year of Chriſt 367, in which year Liberius died in the beginning of September. Euſtathius therefore might go to Liberius in June, and receive Letters from him in Auguſt. Now I am of opinion, that the Illyricum Synod was held on the ſame year, in the month of September, which Synod Valentinianus the Emperor confirm'd, after Gratianus was created Auguſtus. Valeſ.

(b) Socrates ſhould have ſaid The Alamanni, rather than the Sarmatæ. For at this time Valentinian was detained in the Gallia's, by reaſon of his War againſt the Alamanni. Towards the end of his Reign, he went into Illyricum, in order to his engaging in a War againſt the Sarmatæ. Valeſ.

no wise be received [into Communion] by the Church, in regard they had rejected the Nicene Creed. They made answer, that by a * Retractation they had acknowledged the Truth, that they had long since renounced the Anomoïan Creed, and had professed that the Son was every way like to the Father; and that the term Homoios differed not in its import from Homoüsios. Having said thus much, Liberius required of them a profession of their Opinion in writing. They presented him a Libel, wherein were inserted the Contents of the Nicene Creed. I have not here inserted the Letters written from Smyrna in Asia, and from Pisidia, Isauria, Pamphylia, and Lycia, (in which places they had held Synods,) because of their length. But the Libel, which the Embassadors, sent with Eustathius, deliver'd to Liberius, runs thus:

* Or, Repentance.

TO OUR LORD, BROTHER, AND FELLOW-MINISTER, LIBERIUS; EUSTATHIUS, THEOPHILUS, AND SILVANUS, GREETING IN THE LORD.

By reason of the mad Opinions of Hereticks, who desist not from giving cause of offence to the Catholick Churches; upon this account [we say] we, [desirous] to deprive them of all opportunity [of giving offence] do approve of and assent to the Synod of Orthodox Bishops which has been convened at Lampsacus, Smyrna, and at several other places: (c) from which Synod we being employed as Legates, do bring a Letter to your Benignity, and to all the Italian and Western Bishops, to hold and keep the Catholick Faith, which having been establish'd in the Holy Nicene Synod in the Reign of Constantine of Blessed Memory, by three hundred and eighteen Bishops, hath hitherto always continued intire and unshaken: in which [Creed] the term Homoüsios is holily and piously made use of, in opposition to Arius's perverse Doctrine: in like manner we also, (d) together with the foresaid persons, do under our own hands profess, that we have held the same Faith, and do hold, and will keep it to our last breath: and we do condemn Arius, and his impious Doctrine, together with his Disciples, and those that embrace his Sentiments; as also, all the Heresie of Sabellius, the * Patripassians, Marcionistæ, Photinians, Marcelliani, and that of Paul of Samosata, and the Doctrine of these Hereticks, and all those who maintain the same Tenets with them; in fine, all the Heresies that are opposite to the foresaid Holy Creed, which was Piously and Catholickly set forth by the Holy Fathers at Nicæa. But in a more especial manner we Anathematize that Draught of the Creed recited at the Ariminum Synod, as being contrary to the foresaid Creed of the Holy Synod [convened] at Nicæa. (c) To which (it being brought from Nice [a Town] of Thracia) [the Bishops] subscribed at Constantinople, being over perswaded by Fraud and Perjury. But, our Creed, and the foresaid Persons [confession of Faith] also, from whom we are employed as Legates, is this.

ὑποτεθεῖσης ἐν κωνσταντινουπόλει κομιδεῖσιν ἀπὸ νίκης, &c.] which we have expressed in our Rendition. For they Anathematize not only that Form of the Creed which had been recited in the in the Ariminum Council, but the Acts also at Nice in Thracia, (See Socrates, Book 2. Chap. 37. near the close of that Chapter,) to which, being brought to Constantinople, the Bishops, induced thereto by fraud, had subscribed, as if they had been the Acts of the Nycene Synod.

(e) In my judgment, it should be thus worded [τῆς τε ὅλῳ καὶ ἐπιτροπείᾳ] vales.

We believe in one God, the Father Almighty, the Framer of all things visible and invisible: and in one only begotten God, the Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God; begotten of the Father, that is, of the Substance of the Father, God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God; begotten, not made, of the same substance with the Father, by whom all things were made which are in Heaven, and which are on the Earth: who, for us men and for our salvation, descended [from Heaven,] became incarnate, and was made Man; and suffered, and rose again the third day; and ascended into the Heavens; and shall come to judge the Quick and Dead. And [we believe] in the Holy Spirit. But, those that affirm there was a time when he was not, and that he was not before he was born, and that he was made of things which are not; or those that assert the Son of God existed of another Hypostasis or Substance, or that he is changeable or mutable; these persons the Catholick and Apostolick Church of God does Anathematize.

I Eustathius Bishop of the City Sebastia, I Theophilus, and I Silvanus, Legates of the Synod of Lampsacus of Smyrna, and of other [Synods,] have voluntarily and willingly written this confession [of Faith] with our own hands. And, if any person, after the publication of this Creed by Us, shall be desirous of bringing any accusation, either against Us, or those that have sent Us, let him come with Your Holiness's Letters before such Orthodox Bishops as Your Sanctity shall approve of, and go to Tryal with Us in their presence. And if any Crimination shall be made out, let the Author thereof be punish'd. Liberius having bound up and secured the Legates by this Libel, admitted them to Communion, and afterwards dismist them with this Letter.

THE LETTER OF LIBERIUS BISHOP OF ROME, TO THE BISHOPS OF THE MACEDONIANI.

To Our dearly beloved Brethren and Fellow-Ministers, Evethius, Cyrillus, Hyperechius, Uranius, Heron, Elpidius, Maximus, Eusebius, Eucarpius, Heortasius, Neon, Eumathius, Faustinus, Proclinus, Pasinicus, Arsenius, Severus, Didymion, Brittannius, Callicrates, Dalmatius, Ædesius, Eustochius, Ambrosius, Gelonius, Pardalius, Macedonius, Paulus, Marcellus, Heraclius, Alexander, Adolius, Marcianus, Sthenelus, Johannes, Macer, Charisius, Silvanus, Photinus, Antonius, (f) Anytho,

(f) In the Florent. and Sfortian M. SS. this person's name is constantly written thus, Antho. So he is also called in Epiphanius Scholasticus. In Christophorson's Version 'tis Aytho, with three Syllables. I never met with this name in all my reading. Perhaps it should be Antho. Vales.

Celsus,

(c) The studious Reader may observe from this place, that Eustathius, Silvanus, and Theophilus (after they had spoken concerning many Synods, to wit, of that at Lampsacus, of that at Smyrna, and of others held in Lycia, Pamphylia, Pisidia, and Isauria,) do now say, that they came as Legates from one Synod, and that they brought the Letters of one Synod. For these are their words: ἧς συνόδου πρεσβείαν ποιούμενοι —γράμματα κομίζομεν, From which Synod we being employed as Legates, do bring a Letter. The reason why they expresst themselves thus, is, because the Smyrna Synod, and those other Synods which were held by the Macedonians in Pisidia, Isauria, Pamphylia, and Lycia, had been composed according to the pattern and likeness of the Synod at Lampsacus, and had expresst their Faith and Doctrine, as being the original Draught. Upon which account all these Synods are by the Macedonian Legates taken for one Synod: and the Letters of each of those Synods, which Socrates has a little before told us were brought by those Legates, are taken for one and the same Letter, because they contained one and the same Doctrine of Faith. I made this remark, because in Christophorson's Version all things are here confused and altered: Epiphanius Scholasticus has rendred this place much better. Vales.

(d) Instead of [καὶ τῷ περιπωλίων] the reading should be [μετὰ τῶν περιπωλίων.] So Epiphanius Scholasticus reads; and accordingly we have rendred it. Vales.

(g) The words [of Italy] muſt be expunged; Epiphan. Scholaſticus acknowledges them not: or elſe it muſt be thus worded: Liberius Biſhop and the Biſhops of Italy, and thoſe in the Weſt, &c. For thus Liberius diſtinguiſhes the Biſhops of Italy from the reſt of the Weſtern Prelates, in the beginning of this his Letter, in theſe words; both to our ſlenderneſs and alſo to all [the Biſhops] in Italy and in the Weſtern parts. Nor is it otherwiſe expreſt in the Libel of Faith which the Legates preſented to Liberius. Your Letters (Dearly beloved Brethren,) (h) Reſplendent with the Light of Faith, delivered to Us by Our highly eſteemed Brethren, the Biſhops, Euſtathius, Silvanus, and Theophilus, brought the moſt wiſh'd-for Joy of Peace and Unity to Us: and that moſt eſpecially upon this account, becauſe they have affirmed and demonſtrated, that your Opinion and your Sentiments are conſonant and agreeable, both to our Slenderneſs, and alſo to all [the Biſhops] in Italy and in the Weſtern parts. And this we acknowledge to be the Catholick and Apoſtolick Faith, (which (i) from the Nicene Synod hitherto has continued entire and unſhaken. This Creed (k) your Legates themſelves have profeſſed that they do hold and embrace, and being filled with great joy, have wiped out all impreſſions, and [quenched] the remaining ſparks of an abſurd Opinion; and have made a publication of this Creed, not only in words, but under their own handwriting. The Copy whereof we have judged neceſſary to annexed to theſe Letters, that we might not leave the Hereticks any pretext of framing another Conſpiracy, whereby they ſhould again excite the Incentives of their own Malice, and according to their uſage, re-kindle the flames of Diſcord. Moreover, our deareſt Brethren, Euſtathius, Silvanus, and Theophilus, have profeſſed and acknowledg'd this alſo, that both they themſelves, and alſo your Love, have always had this Creed, and will retain it to the laſt; to wit, the Creed approved of at Nicæa by three hundred eighteen Orthodox Biſhops: which does contain the perfect Truth, and ſtops the Mouths, and vanquiſhes all the Shoals of Hereticks. For, not of their own accord, but by Divine appointment ſo great a company of Biſhops was convened a-

(h) It muſt undoubtedly be [περιλαμπόμενα, that it may be referred to the foregoing word [γεγράμμαλα, Letters.] And thus Epiphanius Scholaſticus, and Langus, Nicephorus's Tranſlator, read it. It would doubtleſs have been fooliſh to term antient Biſhops τῷ τῆς πίστεως φωτὶ περιλαμπόμενοι, perſons illuminated with the light of Faith; as if they had been ſome Neophytes, or late Converts to the Faith. Valeſ.

(i) Inſtead of [μέχει τῆς χθὲς νίκαιαν συνόδου] it would be better thus [μέχει νῦν ἀπὸ τῆς χθὲς νίκαιαν συνόδου, from the Nicene Synod hitherto.] So in the Libel of Faith preſented to Liberius by the Legates: ἥτις ἐν τῇ ἁγίᾳ, &c. Which having been eſtabliſhed in the holy Nicene Synod—hath hitherto always continued intire and unſhaken. So Muſculus and Chriſtophorſon read this place. Valeſ.

(k) It ſhould not be [ἀυτοῖς] but [ἀυτοὶ,] that is, your Legates themſelves. For Liberius means the Libel of Faith, which the Macedonian Legates had preſented to him. In which Libel the Legates profeſs, that as well thoſe Perſons by whom they had been ſent, did conſtantly retain that Creed which had heretofore been ſet forth at Nicæa; as alſo that they themſelves did and always would obſerve and keep to the ſame Creed. Muſculus and Chriſtophorſon ſuppoſed that by theſe words the Nicene Fathers were meant; than which nothing is more abſurd. Largus led them into this miſtake, who in his Verſion of Nicephorus has rendred this paſſage in relation to the Nicene Fathers. Epiphanius Scholaſticus (more truly) ſuppoſed, that hereby the Macedonian Legates were meant; which is apparent from his Verſion. Valeſ.

gainſt the Madneſs of Arius; as were * equal in number to thoſe, by whoſe aſſiſtance bleſſed Abraham through faith deſtroyed ſo many thouſands [of his Enemies.] Which Faith being comprehended in the Hypoſtaſis, and in the term Homoöuſios does (like a ſtrong and impregnable Fortreſs) beat back and repell all the Aſſaults and miſchievous Machinations of Arius's perverſe Opinion. Wherefore, when all the Weſtern Biſhops had met at Ariminum, whither the Improbity of the Arians had called them together, that either by ſome kind Perſwaſives, or (which is trueſt) [by Compulſion] of the Secular Power, they might deſtroy, or perverſely deny what had with all imaginable caution been inſerted into the Creed; their Subtilty advantaged them not in the leaſt. For, almoſt all thoſe perſons then convened at Ariminum, who had at that time been either enticed into error, or impoſed upon, are now returned to a right mind, have Anathematized that Draught [of the Creed] publiſhed by them convened at Ariminum, and have ſubſcribd to that Catholick and Apoſtolick Creed ratified and eſtabliſhed at Nicæa. And having entred into a Communion with us, they are with a greater warmth incenſed againſt Arius's Opinion, and againſt his Diſciples. Of which buſineſs when the Legates of your Love perceived an evident proof, they annexed You your ſelves to their own Subſcription; and do Anathematize Arius, and what was tranſacted at Ariminum againſt the Creed ratified at Nicæa: (l) to which [Tranſactions] You your ſelves, beguiled by Perjury, have ſubſcribed. Wherefore, it ſeemed agreeable to us, to write to your Love, and to give aſſiſtance to thoſe, whoſe requeſts are juſt and equitable. More eſpecially, becauſe we are aſcertained by the Profeſſion of your Legates, that the Eaſtern [Biſhops] are come to themſelves, and do embrace the ſame Sentiments with the Orthodox Weſtern Prelates.] We make known this to you alſo, (leſt you ſhould be ignorant of it,) that the Blaſphemies of the Ariminum Synod are now Anathematized, by thoſe who ſeem to have been damnified at that time by fraud, and that all perſons have unanimouſly conſpired in an agreement to the Nicene Creed. And this ought to be made known to all men by you, that ſuch as have been damnified [in their Faith] * by force and fraud, may now at length return from Heretical darkneſs to the Divine light of Catholick liberty. Who (if after this Synod they will not vomit up the poiſon of perverſe Doctrine, † renounce all Arius's Blaſphemies, and Anathematize them,) may know that they themſelves, together with Arius and his Diſciples, and the reſt of the Serpents, whether Sabellians, or Patropaſſians, or whatever other Hereſie they are [Followers] of, are excluded from, and are no Members of the Church's Aſſemblies, which admits not illegitimate Sons. God preſerve you in ſafety, Dearly beloved Brethren.

(l) The erroneous punctation in Robert Stephens's Edition deceived Chriſtophorſon. For, he renders it thus: Cum jurejurando abhibito ſubſcripſiſtis, to which [Tranſactions] You Your Selves by taking an Oath have ſubſcribed. Langus, and (before him) Epiphanius Scholaſticus have rendred it truer, thus, Quibus vos perjurio capti ſubſcripſiſtis, to which you, beguiled by perjury, have ſubſcribed. In the Macedonians Libel of Faith, 'tis ſaid in expreſs words, that the Biſhops, being impoſed upon by Fraud and Perjury, had ſubſcribed the Creed ſet forth at Nice in Thracia. For the Arians, (ſee note (e.) in this chapter,) after they had drawn up a Form of the Creed in a Synod held at Nice in Thracia, ſwore that that was the Creed of the Synod of Nicæa. Valeſ.

Euſtathius and thoſe that accompanied him, having received theſe Letters, went over into Sicilia: where after they had cauſed a Synod of Sicilian Biſhops to be convened, they made a profeſſion of the Homoöuſian Faith in their preſence, and confirmed the Nicene Creed; and having received from them Letters written to the ſame same effect, they returned to the persons by whom they had been sent. Who, upon receipt of Liberius's Letter, sent Legates from City to City, to the principal Assertors of the Homoüsian Faith, exhorting them to meet together unanimously at Tarsus [a City] of Cilicia, in order to the confirming of the Nicene Creed, and that they might put an end to all manner of contentious disputes, which had since that been raised. And this had perhaps been effected, had not Eudoxius (a Prelate of the Arian Religion, one who at that time was in great favour with the Emperor) hindred it. Who being more exasperated because of the Synod summoned to meet [at Tarsus,] framed greater mischiefs against them. Moreover, that the Macedonians, by sending Legates to Liberius, entred into a Communion with him, and confirm'd the Nicene Creed; Sabinus himself has confessed in his Collection of Synodick Actions.

CHAP. XIII.

How Eunomius separated himself from Eudoxius, because he adhered to [his Master] Aërius. And that (a disturbance being raised at Alexandria by Eudoxius's means,) Athanasius fled again. And that (when the Populace were tumultuous hereupon,) the Emperor being afraid, by his Letters pacified the* Alexandrians, and ordered that Athanasius should be put into quiet possession of his Church again.

* Or, interceeded with.

ABout the same time Eunomius, being separated from Eudoxius, held his Assemblies apart by himself, because, after he had several times entreated him to embrace his Master Aëtius's [opinion,] Eudoxius refused to do that. And yet Eudoxius did not this willingly: (For he rejected not Aëtius's Opinion; in regard it was the same with his own:) but because all those who embraced the same Sentiments with Eudoxius, (a) declined [Aëtius] as being Heterodox. This was the reason why Eunomius made a separation from Eudoxius. After this manner were these matters transacted at Constantinople. But an (b) Edict of the Præfects of the Prætorium sent thither by Eudoxius's care, disturb'd the Church at Alexandria. Wherefore Athanasius, afraid of the irrational and mad violence of the multitude, and fearing lest he should * be look'd upon as the Occasioner of those mad absurdities which might be committed, hid himself four whole months in his Father's Monument. But, when the Populace, [vexed] because of his absence, were tumultuous by reason of their love and affection towards him; the Emperor, understanding that upon this account Alexandria was sorrowful and sad, signified by his Letters, that Athanasius should securely and without fear continue possest of the Churches. And this was the reason why the Alexandrian Church continued undisturbed until the death of Athanasius. But how, when he was dead, those of the Arian Faction got possession of the Churches again, we will relate a little after this.

(a) Πεείσασθαι (the term here used) signifies in this place to decline, or have an aversion for: in which signification Lucianus uses it in Hermotimo. Langus and Christophorson render it abhorrere, to abhorr. But Epiphanius, unacquainted with this signification of the word, has rendred it thus: Sed quoniam omnes unanimes, illius, eum Sectæ alterius fatebantur. But because all those of Eudoxius's Opinion confessed him to be of another Sect. Vales. This term [πεείσασθαι,] occurs 2 Tim. 2. 16. where in our English Version 'tis rendred [to shun.]

* Or, bear the blame of, &c.

(b) He means an order of the Præfects of the Prætorium. For 'twas usual, that the Præfect of the Prætorium, as often as he issued out any Edict, should annex the names of the other Præfects of the Prætorium. An instance whereof occurs both in the Gesta purgationis Ceciliani, which are published after the Carthaginian Collation, and also in Theodosius and Valentinianus's Novells. There is a famous evidence of this thing in the ancient Writer De Quæstionibus veteris ac Novi Testament. Cap. 97. Vales.

CHAP. XIV.

That after the death of Eudoxius at Constantinople, the Arians ordain'd Demophilus; but the Orthodox, by [the assistance of] Eustathius of Antioch [made] Evagrius [Bishop of Constantinople.]

FUrther, the Emperor Valens departed from Constantinople, and (a) hastned towards Antioch again. And being arrived at Nicomedia a City of Bithynia, he made a stop there upon this account. Eudoxius the chief Prelate of the Arian Faction ended his life soon after the Emperor's departure [from Constantinople,] in Valentinianus's and Valens's third Consulate, having been in possession of the Chair of the Constantinopolitane Church (b) nineteen years. Wherefore, the Arians constituted Demophilus [Bishop] in his room. But the Homoüsians, supposing that a fair opportunity was offer'd to them, elected one Evagrius, a person that own'd the same Creed with them. And (c) Eustathius (who had sometime before been Bishop of Antioch, and had formerly been recalled from Exile in Jovianus's Reign,) ordained him. This Eustathius was at that time present at Constantinople, [to which City he came] with a design of settling and strengthning those of the Homoüsian Faith; where he continued, absconding himself.

(a) The Emperor Valens had gone towards Antioch before. But, hearing of Procopius's defection — whilst he was in his journey, he was forc'd to come back; as Am. Marcellinus attests, Book 26. Baronius therefore finds fault with Socrates without cause. For Socrates says not, that Valens came to Antioch before, but that he went towards that City; which is certainly most true. But Christophorson's Version seems to have been the cause of Baronius's mistake; for he renders it thus: Imperator Valens denuo Antiochiam ire maturans, the Emperor Valens hastning to go to Antioch again. Vales.

(b) Sozomen's account is truer, who makes Eudoxius to have been Bishop but eleven years. 'Tis certain, Eudoxius thrust himself into the Bishoprick of Constantinople when Eusebius and Hypatius were Consuls, which was the year of Christ 359. He died in the third Consulate of Valentinianus and Valens, in the year of our Lord 370. Wherefore, at this place of Socrates (instead of [δεκαεννέα, nineteen]) it ought to be δεκάεν, eleven;] which is confirmed by Epiphanius Scholasticus. Wherefore, Baronius does here also undeservedly reprove Socrates; in regard, not Socrates himself, but the Copies of Socrates's History are here false. Concerning Eudoxius's death, consult Philostorgius, Book 9. Vales.

(c) Sozomen tells us the same story, in his Eccles. Histor. Book 6. Chap. 13. But Baronius, at the year of Christ 370, reproves both these Historians. For he maintains, that Eustathius Bishop of Antioch was dead long before, in Constantius's Reign. Indeed, Jerome (in his Book de Scriptor. Eccleiast.) does relate, that Eustathius died in exile, and was buried at Trajanople in Thracia, to which place he had been banished. If this be true, Eustathius must necessarily have died in Constantius's Reign. For Julianus, and after him Jovianus, recalled all the Bishops from exile. It is indeed scarce credible, that Eustathius Bishop of Antioch could live to these times. For, in regard he was at the Nicene Council, which was help in the year of Christ 325; we may suppose him to have been then in the forty fifth year of his age. From this year to the third Consulate of Valentinianus and Valens (wherein Eustathius is said to have ordained Evagrius at Constantinople) there are five and forty years. So that Eustathius must necessarily have been ninety years old, if he ordained Evagrius Bishop in this year. Further, I must not omit, what I have been informed of, from Victor Tununensis's Chronicon; to wit, that Eustathius was not interred at Irajanople, as Jerome relates, but at Philippi. For these are his Words: Post Consulatum tertium Longini, &c. After Longinus's third Consulate, Calendio Bishop of Antioch got together the reliques of his predecessor Eustathius, Bishop and Confessor, from Philippi in Macedonia, and with great honour conveyed them to Antioch. Theodorus Lector says the same, in his 2*d Book Excerpt. Hist. Eccles. Baronius* does ill, to place this translation of Eustathius's reliques on the year of Christ 482, in regard, as 'tis evident from Victor Tununensis's Chronicon, 'twas performed in the year of our Lord 490, when Longinus II. and Faustus were Coss. But what Theodorus Lector adds at that place, to wit, that the Eustathians, who before had meetings by themselves, were then at length united to the Catholicks, an hundred years after Eustathius's death; is in my judgment false. For, this being supposed, Eustathius would have lived to the year of Christ 390. Vales.

That when the Emperor had baniſhed Evagrius and Euſtathius, the Arians ſorely oppreſſed and afflicted the Homoöuſians.

UPon the doing hereof, the Arians renewed their perſecution againſt the Homoöuſians afreſh. What had hapned, ſoon came to the Emperor's knowledge, who fearing leſt a ſedition, cauſed by a contention of the multitude, ſhould ruin the City, ſent ſome Forces from Nicomedia to Conſtantinople: and gave order, that both perſons, as well he that was ordained, as he that had ordained him, ſhould be apprehended and baniſhed, the one to one place, the other to another. Euſtathius therefore was exiled to (a) Bizua a City of Thracia; and Evagrius was conveyed away to another place. Theſe things having been performed after this manner, the Arians growing more inſolent and bold, ſorely afflicted the Catholicks: [ſometimes] they beat them, [at others] they gave them contumelious language; [ſome] they ſhut up in priſon, [others] they puniſhed with Pecuniary Mulcts; in fine, they practiſed all ſorts of afflictive and moſt unſufferable miſchiefs againſt them. Which when they were unable to endure, they went to the Emperor, [with a deſign] to beſeech him, that they might, in ſome meaſure at leaſt, be freed from the violence [of the Arians.] But, [altho'] they had propoſed this deſign to themſelves, [yet] they were wholly fruſtrated of their hope, becauſe they expected to obtain it from him, who had been the Author of their injurious uſage.

(a) This account diſagrees both from what we have related before (Chap. 14. note c.) out of Jerome, and alſo from the relation of Theodorus Lector, and Theophanes in his Chronicon. For Jerome ſays, that even in his age Euſtathius lay buried at Trajanople, whither he had been baniſhed. But Theodorus Lector and Theophanes relate, that he was baniſhed to Philippi, and there buried. That Euſtathius therefore, who was baniſhed by Valens to Bizua, muſt neceſſarily be a different Perſon from Euſtathius Biſhop of Antioch. Bizua is a City of Thracia, heretofore the pallace of the Thracian Aſtores, as Stephanus atteſts. Eutropius mentions it in his ſixth Book, where he ſpeaks of Lucius Lucullus, who ſubdued the Thracian Beſſi. Valeſ.

CHAP. XV.

Concerning the Holy Presbyters who were burnt in a Ship, and concerning the Famine, which by the wrath of God hapned in Phrygia upon that account.

FOR, when ſome choice pious perſons, who were Eccleſiaſticks, being eighty in number, (the principal men amongſt whom were Urbanus, Theodorus, and Mencdemus,) were arrived at Nicomedia, and had preſented a Supplicatory Libel to the Emperor, informing him of the violence and calamitous ſufferings which were inflicted on them [by the Arians:] the Emperor, highly incenſed, concealed his anger, till ſuch time as he had given a ſecret order to Modeſtus the Præfect, for the apprehending of theſe perſons, and putting of them to death. The manner of their death was new and unuſual; therefore it ſhall be recorded. The Præfect being afraid, leſt if he ſhould murder theſe men in publick, * he might raiſe a tumult of the unthinking Crowd againſt himſelf, pretends to ſend them away into baniſhment. [This news] being received by theſe perſons with a couragiouſneſs of mind, the Præfect orders them to be put on board a Ship, as [if he deſign'd] they ſhould be carried away and baniſhed: but he commanded the Sea-men, that when they came to the middle of the Sea, they ſhould ſet the Veſſel on fire: that ſo, being deſtroy'd after this manner, they might be deprived of a Burial. Thus therefore it was performed. The Mariners ſailed out of the Haven, and being arrived at the middle of the Aſtacum-Bay, do what they were ordered: and having ſet the Ship on fire, went aboard another ſmall Veſſel which followed them, and ſo came off. But, a very boiſterous Eaſterly wind hapned to blow, whereby the burning Ship was fiercely driven: in ſo much that it ſailed with a great deal of ſwiftneſs; and laſted till it came to a Sea-port, the name whereof is (a) Dacidizus, where it was wholly conſumed together with the men in it. Many have reported, that this [horrid villany] continued not unpuniſhed. For there hapned ſo ſore a (b) Famine all over Phrygia immediately after, that many of the Inhabitants were forced to remove out of that Country for ſome time, and betake themſelves, partly to Conſtantinople, and partly to other Provinces. For Conſtantinople, altho' it nouriſhes a vaſt multitude of people, yet always abounds with plenty, both becauſe it has all manner of neceſſaries for proviſion imported into it from all places by Sea, and alſo in regard the Euxine-Sea, lying near it, furniſhes it with plenty of Bread-corn, as often as it wants.

Valentinianus and Valens.

(a) Sozomen (Book 6. Chap. 14.) tells the ſame ſtory; where he calls this place Dacibyza, and ſays 'tis a Maritime-City of Bithynia. Cedrenus alſo terms it Dacibyza. But Theophanes gives it the name of Dacidiza. Valeſ.

(b) Concerning this Famine there is this Record, in the Old Faſti, which Sirmondus has publiſhed under the name of Idatius: Valentiniano III. and Valente III, &c. i. e. in the third Conſulate of Valentinianus and Valens there was a great Famine in the parts of Phrygia. Valeſ.

* Or, he might raiſe an irrational tumult of the multitude, &c.

CHAP. XVII.

That the Emperor, arriving at Antioch, did again perſecute thoſe that embraced the Homoöuſian Opinion.

BUT the Emperor Valens, little regarding the Calamities cauſed by the Famine, went to Antioch in Syria. During his reſidence there, he deſtroyed ſuch as would not profeſs Arianiſm. For although he had perfectly ejected the Embracers of the Homoöuſian Opinion out of the Churches of almoſt all the Eaſtern Cities; yet he was not ſatisfied therewith, but did beſides inflict various puniſhments upon them. And he deſtroy'd many more than formerly [had been murder'd by him,] by expoſing them to different ſorts of death; but more eſpecially by drowning them in a River.

CHAP. XVIII.

Concerning what was done at Edeſſa, and the reproachful affront put upon the Præfect, and concerning the Faith, Couragiouſneſs, und Conſtancy of thoſe Citizens; and concerning a pious Woman.

BUT, we muſt relate what was done at Edeſſa [a City] of Meſopotamia. In that City there is a ſtately and ſplendid * Church [which bears the name] of Thomas the Apoſtle, wherein Aſſemblies in order to the performance of the publick duties of Religion are without intermiſſion convened, by reaſon of that places ſanctity. The Emperor Valens, deſirous to view this Church, and being informed that the whole Congregation met therein were [followers] of that Hereſie which he deteſted, ſtruck the Præfect with his own hand, (as 'tis ſaid,) becauſe he had not taken

* Martyrion; it ſometimes ſignifies a place where the Reliques of ſome Martyr are depoſited: 'tis plain from what follows, that by it our Author here means a Church.

Valentinianus and Valens.

taken care to have them driven from that place. When the Præfect, after this manner abused, made preparations (though unwillingly) to obey the Emperor's rage; (for he was not willing to be the instrument of the murder of so many persons;) he gave them notice secretly, to the intent that no person might be found within that Church. But no body heeded either his advice, or his menaces. For on the day following all persons flock'd to the Church: And when the Præfect with a great company of Souldiers hastned to the Oratory, in order to his fulfilling the Emperor's rage; a poor Woman, leading her own little Son by the hand, went with great speed towards the Church, and broke through the (a) ranks of Souldiers which guarded the Præfect. At which the Præfect being highly displeased, orders the Woman to be brought to him; and speaks to her after this manner: Miserable Woman! whither runnest thou in this * undecent manner? She replied, To the same place that others run to. Have you not heard, said he, That the Præfect is going to put to death all persons that shall be found there? I have heard so, answer'd she, and do therefore make haste, that I may be found there (b): And whither draggest thou that little Child, said the Præfect; the Woman replied, that he also may be vouchsafed the honour of Martyrdom. Upon hearing hereof, the Præfect made a conjecture of the constancy and resolution of the persons assembled [in the Church.] And he went back immediately to the Emperor, and informed him, that all of them were ready to die for their own Faith. And declaring withal, that it would be absurd to destroy so many persons in so short a time, he thereby perswaded the Emperor to desist from being enraged. After this manner the Edessens escaped their being destroy'd by their own Emperor.

(a) Rufinus (from whom Socrates borrow'd this story) Book 2. chap. 5. Eccles. Hist. words this passage thus: Infantem quoque parvulum secum trahentem, cursuque rapido, irrupto etiam officii agmine, festinantem; Leading her little Child with her, and making such great haste, that she broke through the Præfect's Guards. This memorable fact of the woman of Edessa hapned on the year of Christ 371 or 372; as we shall see by and by. Baronius has done ill to place it on the year of our Lord 370. Vales.

* Ἀκόσμως. Rufinus (in the Book and Chapter just now quoted) says, She made such haste, that she would not stay to shut her door, nor dress herself in the usual garb that women appeared in in publick.

(b) After these words, there were wanting in Rob. Stephens's Edition these two whole lines [Καὶ πῦ τοῦτο τὸ μικρὸν ἕλκεις τυ διοτρόσαντ τῇ τῆς πάρεδρε, ἢ γύνη ἔφη, ὥστε κἀὐτὸ μαρτυρεῖν καλαξιωθῆναι, And whither draggest thou that little Child, said the Præfect, the woman replied, that he also may be vouchsafed the honour of Martyrdom] which I have inserted from the Florentine and Sfortian M. SS. Epiphanius Scholasticus acknowledges them; and so does Rufinus, from whom Socrates borrow'd this story. Moreover, from this place also 'tis evident, that Christophorson had perused no M. S. Copies of Socrates. Vales.

CHAP. XIX.

That the Emperor Valens slew many persons, the first Letter of whose Name was * Theta, upon account of a certain Necromantick-Divination, whereby that was foretold.

* Or, Th.

(a) This whole scene of that unhappy Oracle, which some Heathens had consulted that they might know who should succeed Valens in the Empire, is at large set forth by Ammianus Marcellinus, in his 29th Book. But, 'tis difficult to assign the year whereon it hapned. Baronius, in his Annals places it on the year of Christ 370. I am of opinion, that it was acted in the year of our Lord 371. or at the beginning of the year 372. For Valens, in the year of Christ 371, made his entry into Antioch, at the end of Summer. Gratianus II. and Probus being Consuls, as I have demonstrated in my Notes on the foresaid Book of Marcellinus. partly from the Laws of the Theodosian Code, and partly from Libanius's Book concerning his own Life. Now, that Tragedy and Conspiracy of those wicked wretches against Valens, hapned after his entry into the City of Antioch, as 'tis manifest from Marcellinus. Therefore, it must necessarily happen at the close of the year 371, or at least at the beginning of 372. 'Tis certain, Theophanes and Cedrenus do place Valens's entry into Antioch on his eighth year. But, the same Theophanes does ascribe that Conspiracy of those impious Wretches, who had consulted the Oracle concerning the future Emperor, to Valens's ninth year. Which agrees exactly with our opinion, if we may compute Valens's first year from the Consulate of Jovianus and Varronianus. Vales.

Valentianus and Valens.

To which persons, having made use of a certain magical inchantment, the Dæmon gave responses, not plain and manifest, but (as he usually does) oblique and ambiguous; by shewing only four Letters, * Theta, and Epsilon, and Omicron, and Delta; saying, that his name, who should reign after Valens, did begin with these Letters, and that his name was compounded. The report of what had been done came to the Emperor's Ears. But he permitted not God (who manages all things in due and orderly manner) to have the knowledge of things future, and to do what seemed good to him; but, slighting the Sanctions of Christianity, for which he supposed himself to have a zeal and ardency, he put many to death, of whom he had a suspicion that they would seize upon the Empire. Therefore, the Theodorus's, the Theodotus's, the Theodosius's, and the Theodulus's, and as many as had such-like names as these, were deprived of their lives. Amongst whom (b) one Theodosiolus, a person of great valour and courage, a Descendant of a noble Family in Spain, was also put to death. And out of a fear of the imminent danger, many persons [at that time] changed their names, denying those names their Parents had given them when they were young, in regard they were liable to danger. But, let thus much be said concerning this.

* Or, Th, E, O, D.

(b) In the Sfortian M. S. the reading here is [Θεοδόσιός τις ἄλλος τὶς, another Theodosius.] Epiphanius Scholasticus also calls him Theodosius. Who this Theodosius [or, Theodosiolus] should be, 'tis uncertain. For I cannot think, it was that Theodosius, (father to Theodosius the Emperor,) of whom Ammianus makes frequent mention in his History. For he lived in the West, and was not slain by the fraud and treachery of malevolent persons, till after Valentinianus's death. And yet this Character added by Socrates [a personage of great Valour and Courage, a descendant of a Noble Family in Spain] does exactly fit him. Vales.

CHAP. XX.

Concerning Athanasius's death, and the Promotion of Peter [to his See.]

FUrther, you are to know, that as long as Athanasius Bishop of Alexandria lived, the Emperor (upon account of some [over-ruling dispensation] of God's providence) forbore disquieting Alexandria and Egypt, knowing for certain, that there was a numerous multitude of persons there, who favoured Athanasius; and for this reason he was afraid, lest a Sedition being raised at Alexandria, the Populace, who are naturally hot and violent, should endamage the publick State of Affairs. [Moreover,] Athanasius, after those many conflicts [he had undergone] upon the Church's account, departed this life in the second Consulate of Gratianus which he bore with Probus; he governed that Bishoprick amidst many dangers forty and six years, and left Peter, a pious and eloquent person, to succeed him in his See.

Athanasius's death.

CHAP. XXI.

That after Athanasius's death, the Arians by the Emperor Valens's Order, deliver'd up the Churches in Alexandria to Lucius, who had been Ordained by them before, and committed Peter to Prison.

THe Arians therefore took courage immediately, being rendred insolent by the Emperor's Religion; and without delay they give an account hereof to the Emperor, who then resided at Antioch. At the same time also Euzoius (who presided over the Professors of Arianism at Antioch,) with greediness catches that opportunity so seasonably offer'd; and makes it his design to procure himself to be sent to Alexandria, to the intent that he might deliver possession of the Churches there to Lucius the Arian. Which was also approved of by the Emperor. And forthwith he went to Alexandria, [accompanied] with the Imperial Forces. For (a) Magnus, Lord-Treasurer to the Emperor, went along with him. The Imperial Order was directed to Palladius * Præfect of Egypt, and a command was issued forth, that the military Forces there should give their assistance. Wherefore, they apprehended Peter, and confined him to Prison. After they had dispersed the other Ecclesiasticks some into one place, some into another, they seated Lucius in the Episcopal Chair.

(a) This Magnus is term'd κομμεντησίων λαργιτόρων κόμης, Comes of the Court-Largesses, in the Letter of Petrus Alexandrinus, (the Person spoken of in this Chapter) part of which Letter Theodoret has recorded, Book 4. Chap. 22. Eccles. Hist.

* In the Original he is termed Præfect of Alexandria; which Title was sometimes given to the Præfects of Egypt; as it has been observed before.

CHAP. XXII.

That Sabinus the Macedonian Heretick has made no mention of those many Mischiefs which happned at Lucius's Instalment. But they are recorded in a Letter written by Peter; who made his escape, and fled to Damasus [Bishop] of Rome. But the Arians and Lucius were the Authors of many mischievous Practices and Cruelties, against those Holy Persons who led a Monastick life in the Solitudes.

MOreover, what mischiefs hapned at Lucius's Induction [into the See of Alexandria,] or what was done against those persons that were ejected, as well in, as without the Courts of Judicature; and how some were subjected to various Tortures, and others were banish'd, even after they had been tortured; [of any of these particulars] there is not the least mention made by Sabinus. For, in regard he was a Semi-Arian, he concealed the enormous Villanies of his Friends. But Peter has manifestly display'd them to the view of all men, in his own Letters, which he sent about to the Churches every-where, after his escape * out of prison. This † person, as soon as he could make an escape out of his imprisonment, fled to Damasus Bishop of Rome. But the Arians, altho' few in number, notwithstanding were re-possess'd of the Alexandrian Churches. Not long after, an Imperial Edict [came forth, wherein] it was ordered, that [all] the Embracers of the Homoüsian Opinion should be ejected out of Alexandria, and [driven] from all parts of Egypt. And the Governor of Egypt was commanded, with a numerous Army of Souldiers every-where to put to flight and chase away those, whom Lucius should order [to be ejected.] At the same time they molested, disturbed, and in a most cruel and hostile manner assaulted, the Monasteries in the Desart. For armed Men rush'd in upon Persons unarm'd, who would not stretch forth so much as their Hand to strike a stroke; and destroyed them with such cruelty and barbarity, that what they perpetrated against them is inexpressible.

*Or, out of his bonds.

CHAP. XXIII.

A Catalogue of the Holy Monks [who lived] in the Desart.

BUt, in regard we have made mention of the Monasteries in Egypt, nothing hinders but we may give an account in short concerning them. The Monasteries in Egypt had their Original ('tis probable) from very great antiquity; but they were enlarged and much increased by a pious Man, whose name was Ammon. This person, when young, had an aversion for Marriage. But when some of his nearest Relatives entreated him not to speak reproachfully of Matrimony, but that he would marry a Wife; he was prevailed upon, and entred into a matrimonial state of life: And immediately after he had taken the Virgin out of the * Bride-chamber, and with the usual solemnity led her into his Lodging-room; at length when his Friends and Acquaintance were gone away, he took the Apostolick Book, read St. Paul's Epistle to the Corinthians, and expounded to his Wife the Apostle's admonitions to married Persons. And making an addition of several particulars from elsewhere, he inform'd her, how many burdensome inconveniences do accompany marriage; how full of grief and disquietude the cohabitation of man and woman is, and what pangs attend a woman great with child; adding withal, the grief and troubles [which arise] from the breeding up of children. [On the other hand] he added the conveniency of chastity, how great a freedom attends a pure life, how unpolluted it is, and void of all uncleanness; and that Virginity places persons in the neareſt alliance to God. Having discourst of these and many other such-like particulars to his Virgin-wife, he perswades her, that before they should have any carnal knowledge of each other, she would together with him renounce a secular life. When they had made this agreement between themselves, they retired to the mountain called Nitria. There they lived in a Cottage, and for some short time made use of one Ascetick apartment in common, without the knowledge of any difference between the Masculine and Feminine Sex, but being (according to the Apostle) one in Christ. Not long after, the new and unpolluted Bride spake these words to Ammon: It is not decent for you (said she,) who with the greatest strictness imaginable do profess Chastity, to look upon upon a woman (a) in so narrow an habitation. Wherefore if you please, we will perform our Ascetick exercises apart. With this compact also both parties were well pleased. And being separated one from the other, they thus spent the remainder of their lives; abstaining from Wine and Oyl, and feeding upon dry bread only, which they eat sometimes after one days [fasting,] at others after two, at other times after more. Antonius, who was this Ammon's Cotemporary, saw his soul after his death taken up [into Heaven] by Angels, as Athanasius Bishop of Alexandria does declare in * his Life of Antonius. Moreover, very many persons imitated this Ammon's life: And by degrees the Mountains of Nitria and Scetis were filled with multitudes of Monks. To write whose lives, would be the subject of a particular work. But in regard there were amongst them persons of great piety, who were eminent for their Ascetick discipline, lived Apostolick lives, and did, and said some things that were useful and worthy to be recorded, I thought it expedient [to select] some few passages out of many, and intermix them with my History, in order to the Reader's advantage. 'Tis reported therefore, that this Ammon never saw himself naked, saying, that it was misbecoming a Monk to behold his own naked Body. And being one time desirous to pass a River, he was † loath to uncloath himself; but pray'd to God, that he might have a passage over without impeding the resolution he had taken: and an Angel convey'd him to the other side of the River. Didymus, another Monk, altho' he lived ninety years, yet kept company with no Man during his whole life. Another, by name Arsenius, would not separate the younger Monks, who had committed an offence, from Communion, but those only that were elderly: for he said, that a young Monk being excommunicated, becomes || contumacious: but an elderly Monk does quickly become sensible of the grief of Excommunication. Pior eat his meat walking. When one asked him why he fed after that manner; I will not (said he) go to meat, as to a serious and set work, but as to an incident and by-business. To another, questioning him concerning the same thing, he answered; lest (says he) whilst I am eating, my mind should be affected with any bodily pleasure. Isidorus said, that it was forty years since he was sensible of Sin in his Mind; and that he never consented, either to Lust or Anger. Pambos, a Man illiterate, went to a person, that by him he might be taught a Psalm. And having heard the first verse of the thirty eighth Psalm, which runs thus, * I said I will take heed to my ways, that I offend not with my tongue; he refused to hear the second verse, and went away, saying, that this one verse was enough for him, in case he could learn it perfectly, and in reality practise and perform it. And when he who had given him the verse to learn, reproved him, because he had not seen him in a whole six months space, he answered; I have not yet truly and indeed learnt the verse of the Psalm. Many years after this, to one of his Acquaintance, enquiring of him, whether he had learnt the verse, his answer was, during the space of these nineteen years I have scarce learned to * fulfill it effectually. The same person (when one gave him Gold [to be bestowed for the maintenance of the poor, and said to him, tell the sum which I have given) reply'd, there is no need of telling the money, but of a right and sound disposition of Mind. The same Pambos, upon the entreaty of Athanasius the Bishop, came out of the Desart to Alexandria: And seeing a Woman-player there, he brake forth into tears. When the Persons in presence ask'd him, why he wept; Two things (said he) trouble me; the one is, this Womans destruction: the other, because I do not use so much diligence and industry to please God, as she does to delight obscene Men. Another of them said, that a Monk, unless he will work, is to be involved in the same condemnation with the covetous and rapacious Person. Petirus was well furnished with a knowledge in Natural Speculations, and frequently expounded sometimes one thing, at other times another, to such as address'd themselves to him. At every one of his † Lectures he made a Prayer to God. But, amongst the Monks [who lived] at that time, there were two pious persons who bore the same name. For each of them had the appellation of Macarius. The one was born in the Upper Egypt; the other came from the City Alexandria. Both of them were famous upon several accounts, [to wit,] for their Ascetick Exercises, for their Morals, for their Converse, and for the Miracles wrought by their hands. The Egyptian Macarius wrought so many Cures, and drove so numerous a company of Devils out of persons possest, that [to relate] what he performed by the Grace of God, would require a particular and separate work. Towards those who came to him, he behaved himself with an austere gravity, temper'd with caution and circumspection. But the Alexandrian Macarius, altho' he was every way like the Egyptian Macarius, yet he differ'd from him in this, that he shew'd himself cheerful and pleasant towards those who came into his company, and by his courteous behaviour and complaisance induced young men to embrace an Ascetick course of life. Evagrius, Scholar to these Macarius's, having before been a Philosopher in words only, learned [from them] that Philosophy [which consists] in deeds and actions. * He having been ordained Deacon by Gregorius Nazianzenus at Constantinople, went afterwards with him into Egypt, where he conversed with those fore-mention'd persons, and imitated their course of life. Nor were the Miracles wrought by his hands, fewer in number than those performed by his Masters. The same Evagrius wrote Books of very great use: one whereof has this Title (b) The Monk, or concerning active Virtue. Another is entitled, The Gnostick, or to him who is reputed worthy of knowledge. This Book is divided into Fifty Chapters. A third is termed Antirreticus, [or The Refutation, being a Collection] from the Sacred Scriptures, against the tempting Evil Spirits;

* Ἀπὸ τῆς παστάδος. Πάστος, or (which has the same import) παστός, signifies a Wedding-chamber, Dining-room, or Entertaining-room. See Stephens's Thesaur. Græc. Ling. in the word πάστος. The seventy two Translators do use this term (at Joel 2. 16. and at Psalm 19. 5.) to express the Hebrew word חֻפָּה Chuppa; which was a Tabernacle or Tent set up on purpose, for the performance of the Solemnities (usual amongst the Jews) of betrothing between the Man and Woman.

(a) In the Original 'tis thus worded, ἐν τοσούτῳ οἰκήματι, in so great an house. Christophorson has rendred it, in tantillo domicilio, in so small an house. But the Greek term will not admit of this rendition. Wherefore, I had rather it should be thus worded, ἐν τῷ σῷ οἰκήματι, in your dwelling. Vales.

Chap. 42.) confirms the common reading. But, as to Evagrius's other Book here mentioned, he words the title of it thus: Γνωστικὸς ἢ περὶ τὸ καλὰ ξιωθέντος γνώσεως, The Gnostick, or concerning him who is reputed worthy of knowledge. It may also be written (as it is here in Socrates) thus, or to him who is reputed worthy of knowledge: which reading we have followed in our Version. Concerning this Evagrius's Books, see Jerome's sentiment, in his Epistle to Ctesiphon against the Pelagians:) where he informs us, that Evagrius was an Origenist. Palladius (in Lausiaca) says Evagrius wrote three Books. The first of these he calls Ἅγιος, The Saint: the second Μοναχὸς, The Monk; the third Ἀντιῤῥητικὸς, The Refutation; which is against the frauds of the Devil. Palladius terms that Book of Evagrius's, The Saint, which Socrates here calls The Gnostick. Vales.

[He wrote] alſo ſix hundred Prognoſtick Problems: and moreover, two Books in Verſe; the one to thoſe Monks [who live] in Monaſteries or Covents; the other to the Virgin. How admirable theſe Books of his are, they that read them will perceive. It is not unſeaſonable, as I ſuppoſe, to annex to what has been ſaid before, ſome few paſſages recorded by him, concerning the Monks: For he ſays word for word, thus. It is alſo neceſſary to make an enquiry into the ways of thoſe Monks, who have heretofore walked * uprightly, and to conform [our ſelves] to the pattern thereof: For many things have been well ſaid and done by them. The ſame Monk freed one of his Brethren from his being diſturbed with Apparitions in the Night, enjoyning him to miniſter to the Sick, whilſt he was faſting. And being asked [why he commanded him to do that,] ſuch troubles as theſe (ſaid he) are compoſed and extinguiſh'd with nothing ſo eaſily, as with mercy and compaſſion. A Philoſopher of thoſe times came to Antonius the Juſt, and ſaid unto him, O Father, how can you hold out, being deſtitute of the comfort of Books? Antonius replied, My Book, O Philoſopher, is the nature of things made, and 'tis ready at hand as often as I am deſirous of reading the Words of God. That aged perſon the Egyptian Macarius, that choſen Veſſel, asked me, Why by remembring the Injuries we receive from Men, we deſtroy that Strength and Faculty of Memory which is in our Minds: But by remembring the miſchiefs done to us by the Devils, we continue unhurt? And when I was doubtful what anſwer I ſhould make, and entreated him to explain the reaſon hereof to me; the firſt (ſaid he) is an Affection of the Mind, which is contrary to nature: The ſecond is agreeable to nature. I went one time to the Holy Father Macarius, at Noonday, when it was very hot, and being moſt extreamly thirſty, requeſted ſome Water to drink. His Anſwer to me was, Content your ſelf with the Shade; for many perſons who are at this time travelling by Land, or making a voyage by Sea, do want [the refreſhment of] that. Then, I conferred with him about Abſtinence, and he ſaid unto me, Be couragious and confident, my Son: For theſe twenty years compleat, I have not taken my fill either of Bread, Water, or Sleep. For I have eaten my Bread by weight; I have drank my Water by meaſure: and I have ſtolen (c) a little part of a Sleep, by leaning my ſelf againſt a Wall. One of the Monks had the news of his Father's death brought to him. His return to him that told him this, was, Forbear ſpeaking impiouſly; for my Father is immortal. One of the Brethren was poſſeſſor of nothing elſe but the Book of the Goſpels: when he had ſold that Book, he gave [the money he had for it,] to feed the hungry, and utter'd this ſaying worthy to be recorded; I have ſold that Book which ſayeth, * Sell that thou haſt and give to the poor. There is an Iſland about Alexandria, ſituate at the Northern part of that City, beyond the Lake called Mareotis. Near that Iſland dwells a Monk (d) of Parembole, and a moſt approved perſon amongſt the Gnoſticks, who has declared, that all things practiſed by the Monks, are done for five reaſons, for the ſake of God, of Nature, on the account of Cuſtom, of Neceſſity, and of the Work of the Hands. It was the uſual ſaying of the ſame perſon alſo, that by nature there was only one virtue, but that in reſpect of the Faculties of the Soul, it was divided into ſeveral Species. For the light of the Sun, ſaid he, is without any figure; but it does uſually receive its figure from the Windows through which it enters. Another of the Monks was wont to ſay, I do therefore every way eſchew pleaſures, that I may * prevent the occaſions of anger. For I know very well, that anger does always † militate for pleaſures, and does diſquiet my mind, and expel knowledge. One of the aged Monks ſaid, that Charity knows not how to keep the || Depoſitum of Meat or Money. This was another ſaying of the ſame perſon; I do not remember that I was ever twice deceived as to the ſame thing by the Devil.

(d) Tranſlators have been notoriouſly miſtaken at this place. For Chriſtophorſon renders it thus; in eâ Monachus ex Sectâ Gnoſticorum vir ſpectatiſſimus habitavit, in that [Iſland] dwelt a Monk, a moſt eminent perſon of the Sect of the Gnoſticks.

Langus, Nicephorus's Tranſlator, has rendred this paſſage in Evagrius, thus: Habitat in eâ Monachus Gnoſticorum Ordinis celeberrimus, in that [Iſland] dwells a moſt famous Monk of the Order of the Gnoſticks. But firſt, Evagrius does not ſay, that that Monk dwelt in that Iſland beyond the Lake Mareotis; but only, that he dwelt near that Iſland. For that's the import of the word παροικεῖ. Secondly, παρεμβολὴ [Parembole] does not ſignifie a Sect, or an Order: nor are the Gnoſticks taken in this place for a Sect of Hereticks; but 'tis a ſort of Monks, concerning whom Evagrius wrote a Book. Parembole therefore is a Village not far from Alexandria, near the Lake Mareotis. Athanaſius makes mention of it in his ſecond Apologetick againſt the Arians, where he produces the Catalogue of Clergy-men, whom Meletius had in the City, and within the Territory of Alexandria. After his mentioning of the Presbyters and Deacons of Meletius's party, which he had at Alexandria, he adds theſe Words; καὶ Μακαρίῳ πρεσβύτερῳ τῆς Παρεμβολῆς, and Macarius Presbyter of Parembole. Parembole is alſo mentioned in the Notitia Imperii Romani, wherein were the Quarters of the ſecond Trajan Legion under the command of the Comes of the Military affairs throughout Egypt. Ptolemæus alſo (in Ammoniaca) places Alexander's Parembole near the Lake Mareotis. Here therefore dwelt that Monk, who was ſo eminent amongſt the Gnoſticks. Valeſ.

Theſe paſſages are word for word recorded in Evagrius's Book, entitled The Practick. In that Book of his, to which he gave this Title, The Gnoſtick, he ſays thus: We have been informed from Gregorius the Juſt, that the Virtues and their Contemplations are four; Prudence, Fortitude, Temperance and Juſtice. And the buſineſs of Prudence, he ſaid was, to contemplate thoſe Intelligent and Holy Powers * without any reaſons. For his Doctrine was, that theſe were manifeſted by Wiſdom: [The property] of Fortitude [as he affirmed,] was, to perſiſt in what was true, although a reſiſtance were made, and † not to turn aſide towards thoſe things which are not. He made anſwer, that it was the property of Temperance, to receive the Seed from the Firſt [and Great] Husbandman, and to repell him who would * Sow over again. [Laſtly, he aſſigned this Work] to Juſtice, to give an account [of things] agreeable to the worth and dignity of every perſon; [which Virtue] *does ſet forth ſome things obſcurely; it gives the knowledge of others by Riddles; and it plainly manifeſts other ſome, for the benefit and advantage of the more unskilful and ſimple Hearers. Grace of God [is increased] by Justice, * Patience, and Mercy: And that the former [sort of Knowledge,] 'tis possible, may be received by those who are liable to Disquietude and Troubles of Mind: But that they only are capable of the latter, who are free from all such Disquietude and Troubles; who also, during the interim of their being at prayer, do contemplate that proper and peculiar Light of their Mind, which does illuminate them. Athanasius, that Holy Luminary of the Egyptians, says, that Moses is order'd † To place the Table on the North-side. The Gnosticks therefore may know, who it is that blows against them, and let them couragiously endure every Temptation; and with a chearful mind nourish those that come unto them. (e) Serapion the Angel of the Church of the Thmüitæ said, that the Mind having drank a full draught of Spiritual Knowledge, is [thereby] perfectly cleansed: But, that the parts of the Mind inflamed with anger, are cured by love: And that wicked Desires, which flow into [the Mind,] are stopt by Abstinence. Exercise you self with a continual Meditation upon the Discourses and Reasons which relate to Providence and the Judgment [of God,] (says that great and skilful Doctor Didymus;) and attempt to bear in mind the Subject of those Reasons and Discourses. For, almost all persons do err in these matters. And the Reasons and Discourses which concern a Judgment, you will find in the difference of Bodies, and * in all parts of the World. But the Accounts and Discourses which relate to a Providence, [you will discern] in those ways which lead us from Vice and Ignorance, to Virtue and Knowledge.

(e) Concerning this Serapion, Jerome (in his Book de Script. Eccles. speaks these Words: Serapio Thmuëos Ægypti Urbis Episcopus, qui ob elegantiam ingenii Scholasticus dictus est, &c. Serapion Bishop of Thmuis a City of Ægypt, who for the Elegance of his wit, was first stiled Scholasticus, &c. He died in Constantius's Reign, before the Seleucian Synod, that is, before the year of Christ 359. For in this Seleucian Synod, amongst the Bishops of Acacius's party, Ptolomæus is reckoned Bishop of Thmuis, a City of Augustonica, or Augustanica. For Baronius is not to be heeded, who (in his Annotations on the Roman Martyrology,) says, Thmuis was a City in the Province Scethis. Scethis was not the name of a Province, but was it self rather in the Province Augustanica. And yet Marcellinus (Book 22.) places Thmuis in (that properly called) Egypt. Vales.

* Κατὰ πάντα κόσμον, throughout all parts of the world.

Thus much we have taken out of Evagrius's Books and inserted here. There was also another admirable person amongst the Monks, by name Ammonius, who had so little of curiosity in him, that being at Rome with Athanasius, he was desirous of viewing none of those magnificent works in that City; but saw only the Cathedral of Peter and Paul. This Ammonius, when he was to have been forced to take a Bishoprick, fled away, and cut off his own Right Ear, that by a * Mutilation of his Body he might avoid being ordained a Bishop. Some time afterwards, Evagrius (who was also to have been forced to [take] a Bishoprick by Theophilus Bishop of Alexandria, and had made his escape, without making any Mutilation upon his own Body;) accidentally met Ammonius, and in a facetious manner said unto him, That he had done ill to cut off his own Ear, and that upon that account he was culpable before God. To whom Ammonius made this return: But do not you think, Evagrius, that you shall be punished, because you have cut out your own Tongue, and out of a love to your self, would not make use of that Grace which was bestowed upon you? Moreover, at that time there were in the Solitudes many other admirable and pious persons, the mention of whom in this Work of ours would be too long and tedious. Besides, we must of necessity digress from the the design we have proposed to our selves, should we give a particular account of the Lives of every one of these Persons, and of the Miracles they performed by their eminent Sanctity wherewith they were endued. If any one be desirous of an accurate account of these Men, and would know what actions they perform'd and did, what sayings they utter'd conducive to the profit and advantage of the hearers, and how the Wild Beasts were obedient to them: there is a particular Book, elaborated by Palladius the Monk, who was Evagrius's Scholar; wherein all things appertaining to these persons, are with great accuracy discoursed of at large. In which Book [Palladius] makes mention of Women also, who followed a course of life like to the foresaid men. Further, Evagrius and Palladius flourished a little after the death of Valens [Augustus.] But we will now return to that place, whence we have digressed.

CHAP. XXIV.

Concerning those Holy Monks who were exiled; how God (by the Miracles they performed) attracted all persons to himself.

WHen therefore the Emperor Valens had by his Edict given order, that as well the Orthodox in Alexandria, as those in the other parts of Egypt, should be forcibly driven from their Habitations; Depopulation and Ruin forthwith defaced and overthrew all things: whilst some persons were dragg'd before the Seats of Judicature; others thrown into Prison; and others tortured by other methods. For they inflicted various sorts of punishment upon persons that were great lovers of peace and quietness. After these things were done at Alexandria, in such a manner as Lucius thought good, and when Euzoius was return'd to Antioch, these [two] persons hastned immediately to the Solitudes of Egypt; [I mean] the Commander in chief of the Milice, with a numerous company of Soldiers, and Lucius the Arian. For he himself was not at that time absent, but (without shewing any compassion in the least towards the assembly of those Holy Men) perpetrated worse Barbarities than the Soldiers themselves did. When they arrived at the place, they apprehended the Men performing their usual exercises; [to wit,] praying, curing diseases, and casting out Devils. But these [Wretches] little regarding God's Miracles, would not permit so much as the usual and solemn prayers to be performed in the Oratories, but drove the Holy Persons even out of those places. Nor did they aquiesce in the doing hereof only, but proceeded on further, and (a) made use of Weapons against them. These [Cruelties] Rufinus says he was (b) present at and saw, and was a fellow-sufferer with these persons. Wherefore, the words of the Apostle were renewed against them. For, they were mock'd and * had trial of Scourgings, they were ſtript naked, were bound, were ſtoned, were ſlain with the Sword, [they were] perſons that wandred about in the Solitudes, in Sheep-skins, and Goat-skins, being deſtitute, afflicted, tormented, of whom the world was not worthy; they wandred in Deſerts, and in Mountains, and in Dens, and Caves of the Earth: †Notwithſtanding they received a teſtimony both from their Faith, and from the Works and Cures, which the Grace of God performed by their hands. But, (as 'tis probable) Divine Providence permitted theſe perſons to ſuffer theſe things, having provided ſome better thing, that by thoſe miſeries which they underwent, others might obtain ſalvation in God. And this was demonſtrated by the event. When therefore theſe admirable perſons were ſuperior to all that force and violence uſed towards them, Lucius, quite out of heart, adviſes the Commander of the Military Forces, to baniſh the Fathers of the Monks. Theſe [Fathers of the Monks] were the Egpytian Macarius, and he of Alexandria who bore the ſame name. Theſe perſons therefore were exiled into an Iſland, wherein there was no Chriſtian Inhabitant. In that Iſland there was an [Heathen] Temple, and a Prieſt in it, whom all the Inhabitants worſhipped like a God. But when theſe pious perſons arrived in that Iſland, all the Dæmons there were ſeized with a fear and trembling. At the ſame time alſo this accident hapned: The Prieſt's Daughter poſſeſt on a ſudden by a Devil, fell into a rage and overturn'd all things. She was extreamly unruly, and could by no means be quieted; but cried out with a loud voice, and ſpake to thoſe pious perſons, ſaying, Why are you come to caſt us out from hence alſo? Theſe Men therefore did in that place give another demonſtration of that * Power of theirs, which they had received from the Grace of God. For they drove the Devil out of the Virgin, and [having reſtored her] to her right mind, delivered her to her Father; whereby they induced both the Prieſt, and alſo all the Inhabitants of that Iſland to [embrace] the Faith of the Chriſtian Religion. Wherefore, (c) they caſt away their Images immediately; changed the Fabrick of their Temple into the form of a Church; receiv'd Baptiſm, and with cheerfulneſs learned all the [Doctrines] of Chriſtianity. Thus theſe admirable perſons, perſecuted upon account of the Homoöuſian Faith, rendred themſelves more approved, brought ſalvation to others, and made the Faith more firm and ſtrong.

(a) Instead of [Τοῖς ὄχλοις ἐκέχρηντο, made use of the multitudes] I read [τοῖς ὅπλοις ἐκέχρηντο, made use of weapons.] This reading is confirmed by Rufinus, Book 2. Chap. 3. Which passage in Rufinus Socrates does here take notice of. Vales.

ABout the ſame times God produced another perſon, by whoſe Teſtimony he thought fit the Faith ſhould be corroborated and confirm'd. For Didymus, a man admirable and eloquent, adorned with all ſorts of Learning, flouriſh'd at that time. This perſon being very young, when he had but juſt learned to read, fell into a diſtemper of his Eyes; wherewith he was ſorely troubled, and loſt his Eye-ſight. But God, inſtead of Corporal Eyes, gave him thoſe of the Mind. For what he could not be inſtructed in by ſeeing, he learnt by hearing. For being of an apt and ingenious diſpoſition from his Childhood, and endued with an excellent wit, he far ſurpaſs'd even thoſe [(a) ripe-witted Children] who had the acuteſt ſight. For he became Maſter of the Rules of Grammar with much eaſe, and arriv'd to the knowledge of thoſe of Rhetorick with more celerity. Proceeding on from thence to Philoſophy, with an admirable facility he learnt Logick, Arithmetick, and Muſick; and treaſured up within his own mind the other Precepts of the Philoſophers, in ſuch a manner, that he could readily diſpute againſt thoſe who had perfectly learnt thoſe Arts by the benefit of their Eyes. Moreover, he was ſo exactly well-skill'd in the Divine Oracles of the Old and New Teſtament, that he publiſh'd many Diſcourſes upon them: He dictated Three Books concerning the Trinity; and interpreted Origen's Books Concerning Principles, ſetting forth (b) Comments thereupon; wherein he aſſerts that thoſe Books were incomparably well-written, and that their Cavils are frivolous, who accuſe Origen, and make it their buſineſs to ſpeak reproachfully of his Works: For they are not able, ſays he, to arrive at the knowledge of that Author's Perſpicacity and Prudence. If any perſon therefore be deſirous of knowing Didymus's great Learning, and the fervency of his mind, he may have an account thereof by a peruſal of the Books elaborated by him. It's reported, that Antonius [the Monk] diſcourſed with this Didymus, (c) long before the times of Valens, at ſuch time as he left the Deſart, and came to Alexandria upon account of the Arians; and that perceiving the Learning and Knowledge of this perſon, he ſpake theſe words to him: O Didymus! let not the loſs of your bodily Eyes trouble you: For you are deprived of ſuch Eyes, (d) as the Flies and Gnats can ſee with: But rejoyce, that you have thoſe Eyes, wherewith the Angels ſee, by which even God himſelf is diſcerned, and his Light comprehended. This was the ſaying of the pious Antonius to Didymus, long before theſe times [we are treating of.] But at that time, Didymus was look'd upon to be the greateſt Patron and Defender of the genuine Faith, who diſputed againſt the Arians, unravel'd their Sophiſtick Cavils, and confuted their Adulterate and Fraudulent Diſcourſes.

Valentinianus and Valens.

(a) The word [ἡμφιεσμένους] which we have rendred [ripe-witted children] muſt be expung'd; which ſeems to have crept in here, out of the foregoing line. Epiphanius Scholaſticus acknowledges it not. For thus he renders it; Qui cum a puero fuiſſet ingenioſus, vincebat etiam acuta conſpicientes, who being from a Boy of an ingenious diſpoſition, excelled even thoſe who ſaw with the greateſt acuteneſs. Valeſ.

(b) Concerning theſe Comments of Didymus on Origens Books περὶ ἀρχῶν, Ferome ſpeaks, in his 1ſt and 2d Book againſt Ruſinus. Valeſ.

(c) Epiphanius Scholaſticus, and the other tranſlators have rendred this place ill; as if Antonius the Monk had come to Alexandria in the times of Valens Auguſtus. But, 'tis manifeſt, that Antonius died in the Reign of Conſtantius. Ferome informs us hereof, in his Chronicon, and in his Life of Hilarion. 'Tis uncertain, in what year of Conſtantius's Empire Antonius left the Solitudes, and came down to Alexandria; whether it was about the beginning of Conſtantius's Reign, before the Ordination of Gregorius the Arian; or rather, after the Synod of Sardica, and Athanaſius's ſecond reſtitution. Valeſ.

(d) Inſtead of [οἷς καὶ μῦαι καὶ κώνωπες βλάπτειν ἰσχύουσιν, as the Flyes and Gnats can ſee with,] in Cedrenus, at the ſixth year of Conſtantius, the reading is [οἷς καὶ μῦαι καὶ κώνωπες βλάπτειν ἰσχύουσιν, as the Flyes and Gnats can do harm to. Nor did Epiphanius Scholaſticus find it written otherwiſe in his Copy, as 'tis apparent from this his Verſion: Quibus & Muſcæ & Culices nocere poſſunt, to which the Flyes and Gnats can do harm. And yet Ruſinus, (Eccleſ. Hiſtor. Book 2. Chap. 7.) out of whom Socrates borrowed this ſtory, defends the common reading, which we have followed in our Verſion. And Ferome alſo does confirm this our reading, in his Epiſtle to Caſtrutius. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXVI.

Concerning Baſilius of Cæſarea, and Gregorius of Nazianzum.

DIvine Providence ſet up Didymus indeed as an Opponent to the Arians at Alexandria: But [in order to their confutation] in other Cities, [it

Valentinianus and Valens.

[it made use of] Basilius Cæsariensis, and Gregorius Nazianzenus. Concerning whom I judge it now opportune to give a short account. The memory and Fame of these two persons, which is still preserved amongst all men, and the learning contained in the Books written by them, might indeed be sufficient to set forth the praises and commendations of each of them. But, in regard they were persons in an eminent manner useful to the Church at that time, and were preserv'd [by God,] as being the Incentives of the [Orthodox] Faith; the Subject of our History does of necessity engage us in an especial manner to make mention of these two men. Should any one therefore be desirous of comparing Basilius and Gregorius with one another, and of giving an account of the Life, Morals and Virtues that were in them; he would be in a great doubt which of them he should prefer before the other; for they were both equal to one another, whether you respect their [pious and] exact course of Life, or their Learning; I mean as well their Grecian Literature, as their knowledge in the Sacred Scriptures. For, when very young, they went to Athens, and were the hearers of Himerius and Prohæresius, the two most eminent Sophistæ of those times; afterwards they frequented [the School of] Libanius at Antioch in Syria, and by their industry arrived at the highest accomplishments of *Eloquence. And when they were judged worthy to be professors of Eloquence, many persons perswaded them to enter upon the teaching and profession thereof. Others advised them to practise the Law, but they despised both these sorts of Life: and discontinuing their studies of Eloquence, embraced a Monastick life. Having therefore had a taste of the Precepts of Philosophy from him who at that time taught Philosophy, at Antioch, not long after they procured Origen's Works, and from them got an insight into the interpretation of the Sacred Scriptures. For the great fame of Origen did at that time fill the whole World. When they had with great studiousness exercised themselves in the perusal of those Books, they powerfully opposed the Assertors of Arianism. And altho' the Arians *cited Origen's Books, in confirmation (as they supposed) of their own opinion; yet these two persons confuted them, and evidently demonstrated, that they understood not the meaning of Origen. Indeed, the Arians, and their then Abettor Eunomius, altho' they were at that time accounted persons of great eloquence, yet, as often as they engaged in a discourse with Gregorius and Basilius, 'twas made evidently apparent that they were men altogether ignorant and unlearned. Basilius was first promoted to a † Diaconate by Meletius Bishop of Antioch; after that he was preferred to the (b) Bishoprick of his own Country, I mean Cæsarea in Cappadocia, and undertook the Care of the Churches.

(a) What Socrates says here, is in my opinion false; viz. that Basilius and Gregorius, after they had finish'd the course of their learned Studies at Athens, were hearers of Libanius the Sophista at Antioch. Gregorius himself does refute this in his Poem concerning his own Life; where he says, that he was in the thirtieth year of his age when he left Athens, and that his Friends would have detained him at Athens, that he might be a Professor of Eloquence; (the same is attested by Rufinus, Book 2. Chap. 9. Eccles. Hist.) but that he fled secretly from thence, and went into his own Country. Vales.

† Or, the Office of a Deacon.

(b) Baronius says, Basilius was preferred to the Bishoprick of Cæsarea, in the year of Christ 369: and this he attempts to prove from Gregorius Nyssenus's testimony. Theophanes and Cedrenus, in his Chronicon, do place the beginning of Basilius's Episcopate, on the ninth year of Valens, which was the year of Christ 371. But the same Authors do affirm, that Basilius was yet but a Presbyter, in the eighth year of Valens. See Theophanes's and Cedrenus's words at the said eighth year of Valens. Gregorius Nazianzenus does confirm the same in his Oration de Laudibus Basilii. Where he does attest in expres's words, that Basilius was yet but a Presbyter only of the Church of Cæsarea, at such time as Valens, guarded with a part of Heretical Prelates, undertook an expedition against the Churches of the East, which he hastned to deliver up to the Arians. Moreover, Valens undertook this expedition against the Orthodox on his own third Consulate, that is on the year of Christ 370, as our Socrates does affirm: (compare the 14th and 17th chapters of this 4th Book.) Gregorius Nyssenus confirms this, in his first Book against Eunomius (who had upbraided Basilius with fearfulness and pusillanimity,) where he describes Valens's preparations and expedition against the Churches, in these words: Ἐξήλαυνε μὲν τῆς Κωνσταντινουπόλεως ὅτε τὴν ἐναν ὁ Βασιλεὺς, &c., The Emperor went from Constantinople into the East, puft up in his mind with the late successful and fortunate Actions he had performed against the Barbarians. That is, after the War against the Goths, and the League made with them. Which hapned in the year of Christ 369, as Amm. Marcellinus attests. Wherefore, that Expedition of Valens's to destroy God's Churches, hapned in the year of our Lord 370, as I have now said. Now, that Basilius was then no more than a Presbyter, his Brother Gregorius does in the same place inform us. For, he says, that the Præfect of the Prætorium, to wit, Modestus, at first made use of flatteries, and promised Basilius a Præsulate and an Ecclesiastick presidency, provided he would obey the Emperor. Nyssen's Words are these: πειθόντι μὲν τὴν ὀν Βασιλέως τιμὴν, ᾗ τὴν ἀρχὴν τῆς Ἐκκλησίας περιέ]νων Therefore Basilius was not Bishop of Cæsarea, at such time as Modestus endeavoured to pervert him. Moreover, Modestus first bore the Præfecture of the Prætorium, when Gratianus II. and Probus were Coss. in the year of Christ 371, as I have remarkt in my notes on the 29th Book of Amm. Marcellinus, pag. 380. It may also be proved by another argument, that Basilius was preferred to the Episcopate of Cæsarea after the year of Christ 370. For Nazianzen in the Funeral Oration which he wrote on him, says that Basilius was but a Presbyter, at such time as that Famine (by far the sorest of all the Famines that are mentioned to have hapned at any time) hapned in Cappadocia. Now, this is the Famine, which our Socrates mentions in the sixteenth Chapter of this Book; it hapned in the third Consulate of Valentinianus and Valens. Vales.

Valentinianus and Valens

For being afraid; lest the novelty of the Arian opinion should prey upon, and devour the Provinces of Pontus, he went (c) with great haste into those parts: Where he constituted Monasteries, instructed the Inhabitants in his own Doctrines, and confirm'd the minds of those that wavered. (d) Gregorius [being constituted] Bishop of Nazianzum a small City in Cappadocia, over which Church his own Father had before presided, took the same course that Basilius did. For he also went up and down to the Cities; and corroborated those that were feeble and dispirited as to the Faith; but more especially, he made frequent journeys to Constantinople, and confirmed the Orthodox in that City by his Preaching and Discourses. Upon which account he was soon after

(c) Gregorius Nazianzenus (who is more to be credited in these things) does attest in his Funeral Oration concerning the praises of Basilius, that Basilius, as yet but a Presbyter, went into those parts, with a design to oppose himself against the perfidiousness of the Arians. Vales.

(d) Socrates borrowed this out of Rufinus; who (in Book 2. Chap. 9. Eccles. Histor.) writes thus: Gregorius vero apud Nazianzun, &c. But Gregorius, being substituted Bishop in his father's stead, at the Town Nazianzum, faithfully bore the storm of the Hereticks. And yet 'tis manifest, that Gregorius was not made Bishop, but Coadjutor only to his own father Gregorius, in the Episcopate of Nazianzum: and upon this condition too, that he should not succeed his Father in that Bishoprick; as he himself attests in his Eighth Oration, and in his Poem concerning his own Life. He was first constituted Bishop of Sasimi by Basilius the Great, who had been the first Founder of this Bishoprick, that he might assure that place to his own Church; as Gregorius attests in the Poem concerning his own Life. From thence he was translated to the Constantinopolitan See, which he quickly left, betook himself to Nazianzum, and governed the Bishoprick of that place some while, till such time as, being wearied out with age and diseases, he made choice of his own Successor. Jerome's account therefore is true, whose words (in his Book De Script. Ecclesiast.) are these: Gregorius primùm Sasimorum, deinde Nazianzenus Episcopus, &c. Gregorius, Bishop first of Sasimi, and afterwards of Nazianzum, &c. And 'tis strange, that altho' he governed three Bishopricks, yet they were all doubtful and uncertain. 'Tis plain, that in his Epistles he himself does frequently deny, that he ever presided over the Episcopate of Sasimi, or ever performed any sacerdotal Office there. Neither Jerome his Scholar, nor Rufinus, do ascribe the Constantinopolitan Bishoprick to him. Lastly, he delivered the Bishoprick of Nazianzum to another, rather than governed it himself. Vales.

Valentinianus and Valens.

ter conſtituted Biſhop over the people at Conſtantinople, by the ſuffrage of many Biſhops. When therefore what * both theſe perſons did came to the Emperor Valens's ears, he forthwith order'd (e) Baſilius to bebrought from Cæſarea to Antioch. Immediately therefore he was convey'd thither, and by the Emperor's order was ſet before the Tribunal of the Præfects: (f) when the Præfect put this queſtion to him, Why he would not embrace the Emperor's Faith? Baſilius with a great deal of confidence found fault with the Emperor's Religion, and commended the Homoöuſian Faith. But when the Præfect threatned him with death, would to God (ſaid Baſilius) it might happen to me, to be delivered from the Bonds of the Body upon account of the Truth! Then, upon the Præfects admoniſhing him to inſpect and conſider the matter more ſeriouſly with himſelf, 'tis reported that Baſilius ſaid, I am the ſame this day that I ſhall be to morrow: (g) I wiſh that you would not have changed your ſelf. After this Baſilius continued that day in cuſtody. Not long after, it hapned, that Valens's Son, a young child, whoſe name was (h) Galates, was ſeized with a ſore diſtemper, in ſo much that his recovery was deſpaired of by the Phyſicians. The Empreſs Dominica, his Mother, did poſitively affirm to the Emperor, that ſhe had been ſorely diſquieted with fearful and horrid Viſions in her Dreams; and that the Child was viſited with ſickneſs, becauſe of the Biſhop's injurious uſage. The Emperor, taking theſe things into conſideration, ſends for Baſilius. And to make tryal of him, expreſſes himſelf to him after this manner: If your Opinion be true, pray that my Son may not die. If you will believe, O Emperor! (replied Baſilius,) as I do; and if [you will aſſent that] the Church ſhall be united, the Child ſhall live. When the Emperor would not conſent to that, the will of God therefore be done (ſaid Baſilius) concerning the Child. After Baſilius had ſpoken theſe words, [the Emperor] order'd he ſhould be diſmiſs'd. But the Child died not long after. Let thus much be compendiouſly ſaid concerning theſe perſons.

Moreover, each of them wrote and publiſhed many, and thoſe incomparable Books, ſome of which Rufinus ſays were by * him tranſlated into Latin. Baſilius had two Brothers, Petrus and Gregorius. Petrus imitated Baſilius's Monaſtick courſe of life: but Gregorius [followed] his eloquent way of teaching. He alſo finiſh'd that Book concerning the ſix days work, (which Baſilius had taken pains about, and left imperfect) after his Brother's death: and recited a Funeral Oration [in praiſe of] Meletius Biſhop of Antioch, at Conſtantinople. There are alſo ſeveral other Orations of his extant.

Concerning Gregorius Thaumaturgus.

BUt, in regard ſome are apt to miſtake, becauſe of the likeneſs of the name, and by reaſon of the Books which in their Title are aſcribed to Gregorius, you are to know, that there was another Gregorius of Pontus; who had his original extract at Neocæſarea in Pontus, and was ancienter than theſe [Gregorius's.] For he was * Origen's Scholar. This Gregorius's fame is very great at Athens, at Berytus, over the whole (a) Pontick Diœceſis, and (I had almoſt ſaid) over the whole World. For having left the Schools at Athens, he went to Berytus, and ſtudied the Civil Law. Where being informed that Origen did interpret the ſacred Scriptures at Cæſarea, he went in great haſte to that City: And having been an hearer of the Magnifick Expoſition of the ſacred Scriptures, he bad farewel to [his ſtudy of] the Roman Laws, and in future became wholly addicted [to Origen.] By whom he was inſtructed in the true Philoſophy, and after that, his Parents recalling him, he returned into his own Country: Where firſt of all, whilſt he was a Laick, he did many miracles; ſometimes healing the diſeaſed; at others driving away Devils by *Letters; [in fine,] he brought over the Profeſſors of Gentiliſm [to the Faith,] not only by his words, but much more by the works he did. He is mentioned alſo by Pamphilus the Martyr, in the Books he wrote (b) concerning Origen. Whereto is annexed (c) Gregorius's Oration, wherein he returned thanks to Origen at his departure from him. There were therefore, that I may ſpeak briefly, [many] Gregorius's. The firſt is this ancient, Origen's Scholar; the ſecond, Nazianzene; the third, Baſilius's Brother. There was alſo another Gregorius at Alexandria, whom the Arians conſtituted Biſhop [of that City] during the time of Athanaſius's Exile. Thus much concerning theſe perſons.

* So Euſeb. Eccleſ. Hiſtor. Book 6. Chap. 30.

* Or, Epiſtles.

That is, Baſilius and Gregorius.

(e) This account diſagrees from what the two Gregorius's, (to wit, Nazianzenus in his funeral Oration, and Nyſſenus in his firſt Book againſt Eunomius) do relate concerning Baſilius. For they do atteſt, that Baſilius was not brought before Modeſtus the Præfect of the Prætorium at Antioch, but that this was done in the City Cæſarea. Sozomen therefore (Eccleſ. Hiſtor. Book 6. Chap. 16. has truly corrected Socrates's miſtake here; where he relates, that Valens came from Antioch to Caſarea, and ordered Baſilius ſhould be brought before the Tribunal of the Præfect of the Prætorium. Further, you muſt obſerve, that Valens Auguſtus came to Cæſarea twice, and made an attempt to vanquiſh Baſilius: His firſt journey thither was when Baſilius was no more than a Presbyter; which (as we have ſhewn before) was in the year 370. This is evidently confirmed by Sozomen in his ſixth Book. When he came the ſecond time thither, 'tis not certain. But I conjecture it was on the year of Chriſt 371, or 372. Which I collect from Modeſtus's Præfecture, which falls on thoſe years. Nazianzenus diſtinguiſhes theſe two journeys of Valens's in his twentieth Oration, pag. 346. of his Works, Edit. Pariſ. 1609. Valeſ.

(f) Socrates took this out of Rufinus, Book 2. Chap. 9. Eccleſ. Hiſt. But Gregorius Nyſſenus, in his firſt Book againſt Eunomius, ſays, that Baſilius ſtood before the Tribunal of Modeſtus the Præfect twice; once when he was Presbyter, and a ſecond time when he was Biſhop. But Nazianzen makes no mention of Baſilius's former Examination. Valeſ.

(g) In Rufinus (Eccleſ. Hiſt. Book 2. Chap. 9.) this paſſage is thus worded; Utinam te non mutares, I wiſh you would not have changed your ſelf. In which Words Baſilius reproves Modeſtus, becauſe from being a Catholick he was become an Arian, that he might pleaſe the Emperor. We are indeed told by Gregorius (in his Funeral Oration) that Modeſtus was an Arian. Valeſ.

(h) Here Valentinianus Junior is called by another name, as we have obſerved before, Chap 10. of this Book, note (a.) He was ſurnamed Galates, becauſe he was born in Galatia. Further, in regard Socrates does here term him νήπιος, a young Child; our Opinion (which we have given in before) is very much confirmed, to wit, that theſe things were done about the Year of our Lord 371, or 372. For Valentinianus Junior was born in the year of Chriſt 366; as we have remarked before: From which year to the year 372, are ſix years compleat. So Valentinianus Junior, called alſo Galates, died at ſix years old. For a Child of that age is rightly termed νήπιος. Valeſ.

(a) At this place I have followed Nicephorus's authority; and inſtead of [προϋπὴ διατριβήν] I have amended it thus [πρωτικὴ διατριβήν, Pontick Diœceſis;] altho' our M. S. copies make no alteration here. See Socrat. Book 1. Chap 9. note (f.) Valeſ.

(b) Inſtead of [περὶ ὠριγένους, concerning Origen,] it would be better thus [ὑπὲρ ὠριγένους, in defence of Origen;] for he means Pamphilus's Apologetick in defence of Origen: concerning which conſult Photius, in his Bibliotheca. Valeſ.

(c) In the Greek, 'tis thus worded: συγκάτικος λόγος Γρηγορίου εἰς Ὠριγένην· which Muſculus renders thus; Liber Gregorii quo Origenem commendavit, Gregorius's Book, wherein he has commended Origen. Chriſtophorſon tranſlates it thus: Oratio Gregorii in Origenis commendationem conſcripta, Gregorius's Oration written in praiſe of Origen. But, I cannot approve of this Verſion: For that Oration was not written by Gregorius Thaumaturgus in commendation of Origen; but to return thanks to his maſter, when he left his School. Indeed, Commendatory Letters are termed συγκατικαὶ· But there were never any Orationes συγκατικαὶ, commendatory Orations. Wherefore, I doubt not but it ſhould be σωτακτικὸς; although Nicephorus confirms the vulgar reading. Now, λόγος συντακτικὸς is a Valedictory Oration, as we have remarked in our notes on Euſeb. Life of Conſtant. Book 3. Chap. 21. note (a) Valeſ.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Concerning Novatus, and those from him termed Novatians. And, that those Novatians who inhabited Phrygia, altered [the time of celebrating] the Festival of Easter, and kept it on the same day the Jews did.

ABout this very time, the Novatians, who inhabited Phrygia, altered the day of celebrating the Feast of Easter. How this was done, I will declare; having first of all told you, upon what account the accurate and exact Canon of their Church does at this present flourish in the Provinces of Phrygia and Paphlagonia. (a) Novatus, a Presbyter of the Roman Church, made a separation therefrom, in regard Cornelius the Bishop admitted those Believers to Communion, who had sacrificed in that Persecution, which the Emperor Decius raised against the Churches. Becoming a Separatist therefore upon this account, and being elected to the Bishoprick [of Rome] by such Prelates as embrac'd the same sentiments with him, he wrote to the Churches every where, that they should not admit such persons as had sacrificed, to the [sacred] Mysteries; but should exhort them to repentance, and leave the pardoning of their offences to God, who is able, and has power to remit sins. The Inhabitants of every Province having received such Letters as these, gave their Judgments of the things therein signified, according to their own * dispositions and humours. For whereas Novatus had given notice, that those were not to be vouchsafed the participation of the † Mysteries, who after Baptism had fallen into [any] deadly sin; the promulgation of this Canon seemed severe and cruel to some: but others admitted of this Rule, as just and equitable, and [of great use] for the establishing a pious and more regular course of life. (b) In the interim that this great controversie was in debate, arrive the Letters of Cornelius Bishop [of Rome,] promising indulgence to those who had sinned after Baptism. Upon these two persons writing thus contrary to one another, and each of them confirming what he asserted by testimony of the sacred Scriptures, (c) every inhabitant of the Provinces betook himself to that party, whereto he had before entertained a greater propensity and inclination. For, such persons as delighted in sin, laid hold of the Indulgence then granted, and in future abused it to all manner of impiety. [Moreover,] the people of Phrygia seem to be more sober, and persons of better Morals than other Nations. For, 'tis very rare that the Phrygians do swear. Indeed the Scythians and Thracians are very ready to be overcome with anger and passion: and those who inhabit that Region [which lies] towards the Rising Sun, are more addicted to the serving of their Lusts. But the Paphlagonians and Phrygians are not prone to either of these vices. For neither Cirque-Sports, nor Theatrical-Shews, are at this present * esteemed amongst them. On which account, as well these persons, as others who embrace the same Sentiments with them, in my judgment seem to have given their assent to what was then written from Novatus. For, amongst them Whoring is reputed a most enormous wickedness. 'Tis apparently known, that the Phrygians and Paphlagonians do live more modestly and temperately, than any other Sect of Men whatever. I am of opinion, that it was the very same reason likewise [which prevailed] with those that inhabit the Western parts, who also have follow'd Novatus's opinion. But Novatus (although he was a Separatist upon account of an accurate and more strict course of life, yet) made no alteration in [the celebration of] the Feast of Easter. For he always celebrated that Festival, after the same manner that those in the Western parts did. Now, the Inhabitants of those parts do always keep that Feast after the Æquinox, agreeable to an usage very anciently delivered to them, even from the time that they first embraced Christianity. [Further,] this * person suffer'd (d) Martyrdom afterwards, [to wit] in the Reign of the Emperor Valerian, who raised a Persecution against the Christians. But those in Phrygia who from his name are called Novatians, (e) having an aversion even for that Communion, they were permitted [to hold with the rest of the Catholicks in the celebrating] of this [Festival,] about this time changed the Feast of Easter also.

(a) The Greeks usually term him Novatus, whose right name was Novatianus. Concerning whose Heresie, you may consult Eusebius, (Eccles. Hist. Book 6. chap. 43.) Epiphanius, the Author of the questions on the Old and New Testament, and Theodoret. Vales.

* Or, Morals.

† He means the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

(b) Instead of [ἐν τοσούτῳ δὲ τούτῳ] it is doubtless to be thus worded [ἐν τούτῳ δὲ τοσούτῳ, &c.] Questionless, Socrates left it written thus; and we have rendred it accordingly. Vales.

(c) The expression in the original is, ἕκας☉ καθ' ἕθ☉; which Musculus renders thus, sicut fieri solet, as it is usually done; and Christophorson thus; ut moris est, as the manner is. But I cannot approve of these Versions. For the Grecian Writers makes use of (not καθ' ἕθος, but) ὡς ἔθος,, to signifie, as it is usually done, or, as the manner is. Wherefore, I am rather of opinion, that it should be ἕκαστος καθ' ἔθνος, every inhabitant of the Provinces: so Epiphanius Scholasticus read it. For he renders it thus; Singuli Provinciarum, &c. Every Subject of the Provinces. Καθ' ἔθνος has the same import with κατ' ἐπαρχίαν; which phrase Socrates has made use of a little before, in this Chapter; where his Words are, τοιαύτας τὰς ἐπιστολὰς οἱ κατ' ἐπαρχίαν δεχόμενοι, the Inhabitants of every Province having received such Letters as these. Vales.

Valentinianus and Valens.

* Or, studiously exercised, or, followed.

* Novatus.

(d) The Novatians did boast, that the Founder of the Sect was a Martyr; and they wrote a Book, the Title whereof was, The Martyrdom of Novatianus. But this Book, which was stuft with Lyes and Fables, has long since been confuted by Eulogius Bishop of Alexandria, in his sixth Book against the Novatians, the Excerptions whereof occur in Photius's Bibliotheca, p. 1621. Edit. David Hoeschel. 1610. Moreover, in those Acts of the Martyrdom of Novatianus, Novatianus was not said to have suffered Martyrdom, but only to have been a Confessor of the Faith of Christ. For, the Author of the Acts says, that of the eight Presbyters of the Roman Church who were under Macedonius Bishop of Rome, seven offered sacrifice to Idols together with Macedonius, and that only Novatus underwent an egregious Martyrdom of confession. And that together with Novatianus three Bishops (almost the only persons of the Western parts) termed it a Martyrdom; to wit, Marcellus and Alexander Bishops of Aquileia, and Agamemnon Bishop of Porta, or rather of Tibur. Who lived apart after that Confession, held Assemblies with Novatianus, and avoided their Communion who had sacrificed to Idols. A little afterwards they laid their hands on Novatianus, and Ordained him Bishop of Rome. Vales.

(e) This place is strangely corrupted. Nor is this fault new; but the Copies were faulty even in Epiphanius Scholasticus's time; for thus he renders it: Hi vero qui ex eo nomen habuerunt, ejusque fuere participes, &c. But these who had their name from him, and were partakers thereof, &c. How Nicephorus read this passage in Socrates, 'tis uncertain, in regard his Greek Text is at this place defective. But Langus, who had seen a Greek Copy of Nicephorus, renders it thus: Qui vero ejus nomine in Phrygia Censentur, &c. But those that are accounted of his name in Phrygia, when by indulging themselves, they had degenerated from his Institutions and Communion, at this time altered the Paschal Festival also. I say nothing concerning the other Translators, in whose Versions you will find nothing of soundness. I am of opinion, that the place, by a small alteration, is thus to be made good: καὶ τὴν κοινωνίαν τάυτ σωχωρηθεῖσαν ἐκτρεπόμενοι. That is, having an aversion even for that Communion they were permitted [to hold with the rest of the Catholicks in the celebrating] of this [Festival.] There is nothing more plain than this sense. Before Valen's time, the Novatians in Phrygia kept Easter at the same time the rest of the Catholicks did. After that, they began to shun the Communion and Society of the Catholicks in this matter also. Further, although I do very much approve of Socrates's judgment, who gives an account why the Phrygians more especially embraced the Novatian Heresie; yet there may another reason be given hereof. For, Novatus, or rather Novatianus, was (as 'tis said) by Country a Phrygian: so Philostorgius asserts, Book 8. Wherefore, 'tis no wonder, that he had many followers of his own opinion in that Province. Vales.

For,

Valentinianus and Valens.

For, ſome few (and thoſe in no wiſe eminent) Biſhops of the Novatians in Phrygia, having convened a Synod in the Village Pazum, (at which place are the * Heads of the River Sangarius,) promulged a Canon, that it ſhould be obſerv'd [yearly on what day] the Jews celebrated their Feaſt of Unleavened Bread, and that together with them the Feaſt of Eaſter ſhould be kept. Theſe things were told me by a certain (f) old man, who ſaid that he was the ſon of a Presbyter, and was together with his Father preſent at the foreſaid Synod. At which Synod, neither Agelius Biſhop of the Novatians at Conſtantinople, was preſent, nor yet Maximus of Nicæa; neither were the Biſhops of Nicomedia, or Cotuæum at it: altho' theſe perſons were the chief Regulators of the Novatian Religion. Theſe things were after this manner tranſacted at that time. But, not long after the Church of the Novatians was divided into two Parties upon account of this Synod, as we will declare in due place. We muſt now paſs from hence, to [a relation of] what happened at this very time in the Weſtern parts.

* Or, Fountains.

(f) I conjecture, that this was long-lived Auxano, a Presbyter of the Novatian Church, whoſe teſtimony Socrates makes uſe of, Book 1. Chap. 10. & 13. But, we muſt not here omit Nicephorus's words concerning our Socrates: he ſays thus, Book 11. Chap. 14. Hæc ſibi renuntiata eſſe Socrates qui hoc loco non abhorrere ſe à Novatianorum inſtitutis palàm præ ſe fert, à ſene quodam ſcribit, &c. Socrates (who in this place plainly ſhews himſelf not to be a deteſter of the Novatian Principles) relates that theſe things were told him by a certain old Man, &c. Notwithſtanding, I am not of Nicephorus's opinion. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXIX.

Concerning Damaſus Biſhop of Rome, and Urſinus. How, a Diſturbance and Sedition hapning in Rome upon their account, there followed a great ſlaughter of Men.

WHilſt the Emperor Valentinianus lived in peace and tranquility, and was vexatious towards no Sect; Damaſus ſucceeded Liberius in the Government of the Biſhoprick of Rome. (a) Under whom the Church of Rome hapned to be diſturb'd, upon this account. One Urſinus, a Deacon of the ſame Church had been a Competitor, when the Election of a Biſhop was made. But, in regard Damaſus was preferred [before him,] Urſinus, unable to bear the being fruſtrated of his expectation, made it his buſineſs to (b) hold aſſemblies that were ſchiſmatical and ſeparate from the Church; and perſwades certain mean Biſhops to ordain him [clandeſtinely] in a ſecret place. And he is ordained, not in a Church, but in an obſcure place, in that called (c) Siſinnius's Pallace. Upon the doing hereof, a diſſention was raiſed amongſt the Populace. They diſagreed among themſelves, not upon account of the Faith, or [any] Hereſie, but about this only, [to wit,] who ought to be put in poſſeſſion of the Epiſcopal Chair. Hereupon there hapned [frequent] conflicts of the multitudes; in ſo much that many were killed, on account of that variance. For which reaſon, many perſons as well Laïcks, as Eccleſiaſticks, were puniſh'd by (d) Maximinus the then Præfect [of the City;] and ſo both Urſinus at that time ceaſed from [proſecuting] his attempt, and alſo thoſe who had a mind to be his Followers, were quieted.

(a) Inſtead of [Ἀφ'] read [Ἐφ' ᾧ, under whom; for that's the reading in the Florent. M. S. and in Nicephorus. Valeſ.

(b) Παρασυναγωγάς. A very elegant term, to ſignifie Sciſmatical Aſſemſemblies and Conventicles, who are ſaid to erect one Altar contrary to another. Hence comes the term παρασυναγωγή, a ſort of Schiſm, concerning which Baſilius ſpeaks, in his Canonical Epiſtle to Amphylochius, de Baptiſmo Hæreticorum. Valeſ.

(c) Amm. Marcellinus (Book 27. pag. 337. Edit. Valeſ.) calls it Siſinnius's Palace; where, ſays he, there is a little private aſſembling place of [the Profeſſors of] the Chriſtian Religion; in which [during the conflicts between Damaſus's and Urſinus's Parties] there was in one day an hundred and thirty ſeven dead Bodies found, &c. Read the Hiſtorians following Words; from the whole paſſage 'tis plain, how diſorderly the Elections of a Biſhop of Rome then were, and at what an height they lived.

(d) Socrates borrow'd this out of Rufinus, Book 2. Chap. 10. Eccleſ. Hiſt. In that year, whereon Urſinus raiſed his Schiſm, Juventius, not Maximinus, was Præfect of the City, as Amm. Marcellinus atteſts, Book 27. pag. 337. But, in regard this Schiſm laſted many years, 'tis poſſible that Maximinus (who was Præfect of the Annona,) might take cognizance of this buſineſs, and torture ſome Eccleſiaſticks, as Rufinus relates. This Maximinus was Præfect of the Annona, in the ſeventh year of Valentinian; as Jerome does aſſert in his Chronicon. Marcellinus ſpeaks much concerning this Maximinus, in his 28th Book. Valeſ.

Valentinianus and Valens.

CHAP. XXX.

How (after the Death of Auxentius Biſhop of Millain,) a Sedition hapning on account of the Election of a Prelate to ſucceed in that See; Ambroſius, Preſident of the Province, going with a military Force to appea theſe Tumult, was by a general Suffrage (the Emperor Valentinianus having given his conſent alſo) preferred before all perſons, and elected Biſhop of that Church.

ABout the ſame time there hapned another thing worthy to be recorded, which came to paſs at Millain. For, (a) Auxentius Biſhop of that Church being dead, who had been ordained by the Arians, the Inhabitants of Millain were again diſturbed about the Election of a Biſhop: and there was a great contention amongſt them, ſome making it their buſineſs to elect one perſon, others another. When a Sedition was raiſed about this matter, the Governour of that Province (a perſon veſted with a Conſular Dignity, whoſe name was Ambroſius,) fearing leſt ſome abſurdity might happen in the City, [cauſed] by that tumult, ran into the Church, in order to his appeaſing of the uproar. After that the people upon his coming thither were quieted, and that he had repreſt the irrational fury of the multitude by a long and very uſeful exhortatory Oration; there hapned on a ſudden an unanimous agreement amongſt all perſons; who cried out, that Ambroſius deſerved the Biſhoprick; and all made it their requeſt that he might be ordained. For, by that means only ['twas ſaid] the People would be united, and embrace a concordant opinion concerning the Faith. In regard therefore, this unanimous conſent of the People ſeemed to the Biſhops that were preſent, to proceed from ſome divine [order and appointment,] without delay they laid hold of Ambroſius: and having baptized him, (for he was then but a Catechumen,) they forthwith went about the promoting of him to the dignity of that Biſhoprick. But, becauſe Ambroſius (though he received Baptiſm with much willingneſs, yet) refuſed the Epiſcopal dignity with all imaginable earneſtneſs; [the Biſhops] acquaint the Emperor Valentinianus with what hapned. The Emperor, admiring the unanimous conſent of the people, (a) Socrates has tranſcribed this following paſſage, almoſt word for word out of Rufinus's Book 2. Chap. 11. Eccleſ. Hiſt. For, he obſerves the ſame order that Rufinus does, after Damaſus's ordination forthwith ſubjoining Ambroſius's promotion. But, although Rufinus and Socrates have conjoined theſe two Ordinations, as if they had been made at one and the ſame time; yet there was a great interval of time between each ordination. For Damaſus entred upon the Biſhoprick of Rome in the Conſulate of Lupicinus and Jovinus, on the year of Chriſt 367. But Ambroſius was promoted to the Epiſcopate of Millain in the year of our Lord 374, in the third Conſulate of Gratianus, which he bore with Equitius; as Baronius has obſerved from Saint Jerom's Chronicon. people, and acknowledge what had come to pass to be the work of God, declared to the Bishops, that they ought to obey God, who commanded he should be Ordain'd; for that he was elected by the suffrage of God, rather than of Men. Ambrosius being after this manner constituted [Bishop,] the Inhabitants of Millain, who had been at variance before, were by his means reduced at that time to unity and concord.

BUt after this, when the Sarmatæ made incursions into the Roman Territories, the Emperor undertook an Expedition against them, at the head of a vast Army. The Barbarians informed of these great preparations for a War, and being sensible of their own inability to make a resistance, sent an Embassy to the Emperor, and requested that they might obtain a Peace upon certain conditions. When the Embassadors were introduced into the Emperor's presence, and appear'd to him to be * vile and despicable Fellows, he ask'd, whether all the Sarmatæ were such sort of persons. The Embassadors made answer, that the noblest Personages of † their whole Nation were come to him: Whereupon Valentinianus was highly incensed, and crying out with a very loud voice, said, That he was very unfortunate to have the Roman Empire devolve upon him, when such a Nation of Barbarians, so vile and contemptible, was not satisfied to continue in safety within its own limits; but would take up arms, || depopulate the Roman Territories, and audaciously break out into a War. And he tore himself in such a manner by his crying out, that all his Veins were open'd, and every one of his Arteries broken. [A vast quantity of] Blood gushing out after this manner, he died in the Castle called Bergition, after Gratianus's third Consulate [which he bore] with Equitius, about the seventeenth of the month November; when he had lived fifty four years, and reigned thirteen. Valentinianus therefore having ended his life, the Milice in Italy, on the sixth day after his death, proclaimed his Son (who had the same name with his Father) Valentinianus (a very young child) Emperor, in (a) Acincum a City of Italy. The Emperors, informed hereof, were displeased, not because Valentinianus Junior (who was Brother to the * one Emperor, and the †other's Nephew) was made Emperor: but in regard he had been proclaim'd without either of their being acquainted with it, whom they themselves were about to proclaim. Notwithstanding, both of them gave their consent to his being made Emperor. After this manner was Valentinianus Junior seated on his own Father's Throne. Further, you must know, that this Valentinianus was begotten by Valentinianus Senior, of Justina, which Woman *he married whilst Severa his former Wife was living, on this occasion. Justus, Father to Justina, (who heretofore, to wit, in Constantius's Reign, had been Governour of the Province Picenum,) had a Dream, wherein (to his own thinking) he saw himself delivered of the Imperial Purple [which he brought forth] out of his right side. This Dream being divulged, at length came to Constantius's hearing also. He guessing at the meaning of the Dream, to wit, that an Emperor should *descend from Justus, sent one who dispatch'd him. His Daughter Justina, bereaved of her Father, for a considerable while continued a Virgin. Some time after, she became known to Severa, Wife to the Emperor Valentinianus, and was continually conversant with the Empress. And a firm familiarity was contracted between them, she bathed herself also together with her. When therefore Severa had seen Justina washing her self, she was † wonderfully taken with the Virgins beauteous composure of body, and discoursed concerning her in the Emperor's presence; [saying] that that Virgin, Justus's Daughter, was endow'd with so admirable a compleatness of body, that she herself, altho' a Woman, was notwithstanding enamoured with her delicate shape. The Emperor treasured up his Wife's discourse in his mind, and consulted about his marriage of Justina; yet so as not to divorce Severa, of whom he had begotten Gratianus, and created him Augustus but a little before. He therefore dictated a (b) Law, and made it publick throughout every City, that any one that would, might have two lawful Wives. This Law was promulged. And he married Justina, by whom he had Valentinianus Junior, and three Daughters, Justa, Grata, and Galla. The two former of which persisted in their resolution of continuing Virgins: but Galla was afterwards married to the Emperor * Theodosius the Great, of whom he begat a daughter, by name Placida. For he had Arcadius and Honorius by (c) Flaccilla his former Wife. But we shall speak in particular concerning Theodosius, and his Sons, in due place.

(a) We meet with a double mistake here, the one committed by Socrates's Transcribers, the other by Socrates himself. We have corrected the Transcriber's error (who, in stead of Acincum, had made it Aconcum, from the authority of the Sfortian and Florent. MSS. It will be sufficient only to take notice of Socrates's mistake here; who calls Acincum a City of Italy, whenas it belong'd to Pannonia. Vales.

(b) There is no mention of this Law of Valentinianus's, any where: No, not in Amm. Marcellinus, who has with great accuracy recorded Valentinianus's affairs. Indeed such a Law as this (in my judgment) is in no wise agreeable to Valentinian a serious Prince, and a Christian. Therefore this whole story of Justina's marriage, is in my opinion, of a credit doubtful and uncertain. Vales.

(c) Epiphanius Scholasticus calls her (not Placida, but) Flaccilla; which is truest: For so the ancient Coins term her. But, 'tis strange that Greek writers should so frequently be mistaken in this name. For we have remark'd before, that Placitus is by Socrates often used instead of Flaccillus, who was Bishop of Antioch. Further, this Flaccilla was the daughter of that Antonius, who was Consul with Siagrius, as Themistius informs us, in his Gratiarum Actione, to Theodosius, for the Peace made with the Goths. Concerning the Philosopher Themistius: And, that Valens, appeased by the Oration he spake to him, did in some measure mitigate his Persecution against the Christians.

VAlens, making his Residence at Antioch, continued in the interim undisturbed by foreign Wars. For the Barbarians did on every side contain themselves within their own Territories. But he * persecuted those who embraced the Homoousian Opinion, in a most grievous manner, and every day invented greater and more acute punishments [to be inflicted] on 'em. ration, by that (a) Speech he ſpake to him; wherein the Philoſopher advertiſes the Emperor, That he ought not to admire at the diſagreement of Opinions amongſt the Chriſtians. For, that the diſcrepancy of Sentiments amongſt them was ſmall, if compared with the multitude and confuſion of Opinions amongſt the Grecians. For they entertained above three hundred Opinions. [Further,] that as touching Opinion there would of neceſſity ariſe a wonderful diſſent [from the variety thereof.] And yet that God is delighted with this difference of Opinion [concerning himſelf,] to the end that all perſons may more highly revere his Majeſty, even upon this very account, becauſe 'tis not obvious and eaſie to have a knowledge of him. The Philoſopher having ſpoken theſe and ſuch-like words as theſe, to the Emperor, he became more mild in future. Notwithſtanding, his rage was not hereby perfectly and entirely appeaſed; but, inſtead of Death, he impoſed Exile as a puniſhment, upon Eccleſiaſtick perſons; till at length, this fury of his alſo was repreſs'd by this accident.

(a) This Oration of Themiſtius's to Valens, is at this time extant, publiſhed in Latine by Duditius. For, what Socrates ſays Themiſtius ſpoke in that Oration concerning the difference of Philoſophick Opinions, occurs in Duditius's Verſion, at pag. 507. The words are theſe; Artes quidem, quarum magnus in vitâ uſus & delectatio eſt, &c. Indeed, thoſe Arts, of which there is great uſe in this life, and which are very delightful had never arrived at ſuch an height and elegancy, had there not been a diſcrepancy of judgments, and a certain ſtrife amongſt the Artiſts themſelves. For, has not Philoſophy it ſelf (the Mother of all laudable Arts,) raiſed from mean and ſmall beginnings, increaſed by the diſſent of Learned Men in ſuch a manner, that nothing may ſeem wanting to its abſolute perfection? Further, what Socrates ſays was ſpoken by Themiſtius in that Oration, to wit, that God is deſirous of this variety of opinions concerning himſelf, that Men may have a greater reverence for the Majeſty of his Deity, becauſe the knowledge of his Divinity is in no wiſe obvious and eaſily attainable; occurs in Duditius's Verſion, at pag. 508. where 'tis thus worded: Quocirca quod à cognitione noſtrâ ſe longiſſimè removit, &c. Wherefore, in regard he has removed himſelf at the greateſt diſtance from our Knowledge, nor does humble himſelf to the capacity of our wits; 'tis a ſufficient argument, that he does not require one and the ſame Law and Rule of Religion from all perſons, but leaves every Man a Licence and faculty of thinking concerning himſelf, according to his own, not another Mans liberty and choice. Whence it alſo happens, that a greater admiration of the Deity, and a more Religious veneration of his Eternal Majeſty, is ingendred in the minds of Men. For, is uſually comes to paſs, that we loath and diſregard thoſe things which are readily apparent, and proſtrated to every underſtanding, &c. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXXIII.

THoſe Barbarians who dwell beyond the Danube, having kindled a Civil War amongſt themſelves, were divided into two Parties; the one of which was headed by Fritigernes, the other by Athanarichus. When 'twas apparent that Athanarichus's Party was the ſtronger, Fritigernes flies to the Romans, and implored their aſſiſtance againſt his Adverſary. This is made known to the Emperor Valens; and he orders thoſe Soldiers, who were engarriſon'd all over Thracia for the defence of that Country, to aſſiſt the Barbarians being at War againſt the Barbarians. And they obtain a Victory over Athanarichus beyond the Danube, having *routed his Forces. This was the reaſon, that many of the Barbarians became Chriſtians. For, Fritigernes, that he might expreſs his thankfulneſs to the Emperor for the kindneſs he had done him, embraced the Emperor's Religion, and perſwaded thoſe under his command to the ſame. Wherefore, many of the Goths are even till this preſent addicted to Arianiſm, having at that time become Adherents to that Hereſie upon the Emperor's account. At the ſame time alſo, Ulfila Biſhop of the Goths, invented Gothick Letters, and having tranſlated the ſacred Scriptures into the Gothick Language, undertook the inſtruction of the Barbarians in the Divine Oracles. But, in regard Ulfila inſtructed not only thoſe Barbarians under Fritigernes, but them alſo who paid obedience to Athanarichus, in the Chriſtian Religion; Athanarichus, *as if violence were offer'd to the Religion of his Anceſtors, inflicted puniſhments on many of thoſe who profeſt Chriſtianity; in ſo much that at that time [ſeveral Arianizing Barbarians were Martyrs. Indeed, Arius, unable to refute the Opinion of Sabellius the Lybian, fell from the true Faith, and aſſerted (a) the Son of God to be a new God. But the Barbarians, embracing Chriſtianity with a ſimplicity of mind, deſpiſed this preſent Life in reſpect of the Faith of Chriſt. Thus far concerning thoſe [Goths] who came over to the Chriſtian Religion.

CHAP. XXXIV.

That the Goths vanquiſhed by other Barbarians, fled into the Territories of the Romans, and were received by the Emperor. Which [Reception of theirs] was the occaſion, both of the Deſtruction of the Roman Empire, and alſo of the Emperor's own Overthrow.

BUt, not long after, the Barbarians having entred into a league of friendſhip with one another, were again vanquiſh'd by other Barbarians their Neighbours, called the Hunni; and being driven out of their own Country, they fly into the Roman Territories, promiſing they would ſerve the Roman Emperor, and do whatever he ſhould command them. This came to Valens's knowledge; who foreſeeing nothing, gave order that the Suppliants ſhould have a kind and merciful reception, ſhewing himſelf in this one inſtance only, mild and compaſſionate. He aſſigns therefore to them [for their habitation] the parts of Thracia; judging himſelf to be in a moſt eſpecial manner fortunate upon this account. For, it was his ſentiment, that he ſhould in future be in poſſeſſion of a ready and well-furniſh'd Army againſt his Enemies; and he hoped, that the Barbarians would be a more terrible Guard [to the limits of his Empire] than the Romans. Upon this account, he in future neglected the increaſing and filling up of the Roman Milice. He deſpiſed thoſe old Souldiers, who in former Wars had fought againſt his Enemies with much courage and gallantry; and he (a) put a money-value upon that Militia, which the Inhabitants of Pro-

For Chryſoſtom uſes this term in this ſenſe, in his 67 Homily on Matth. 21. The old Gloſſes expound ἐξαργυρίζεται by Adæratur, he values by money. Further, what Socrates remarks here, (to wit, that Valens, inſtead of ſupplies of Soldiers, did afterwards exact Gold of his Provinces,) is alſo related by *Amm. vinces were wont, Village by Village, to contribute and furnish out, ordering his Tribute-Collectors to demand eighty * Crowns instead of each Souldier, altho' he had not before in the least lightened or abated their Impositions. This was the original cause of the Roman Empire's being very unfortunate for some small time.

CHAP. XXXV.

That the Emperor, by reason of his Care and Solicitude about a War with the Goths, remitted something of his Persecution against the Christians.

FOr, the Barbarians having been put into possession of Thracia, and quietly enjoying that Roman Province, could not [with moderation] bear their fortunate success: but enter upon a War against those who had been their Benefactors, and subverted all places throughout Thracia and the adjoyning Countries. These things falling out after this manner, came to Valens's hearing, and made him desist from banishing those that embraced the Homoöusian Opinion. For, being troubled at this news, he left Antioch forthwith, and came to Constantinople. Upon the same account also, the War [he had waged] against the Christians in that City, was finish'd. Moreover, at the same time Euzoïus, Bishop of the Arian Faction at Antioch, departed this life, in the fifth Consulate of Valens, and in Valentinianus Junior's first. And Dorotheus is constituted [Bishop] in his place.

CHAP. XXXVI.

That the Saracens also at that time embraced the Faith of Christ, (a Woman, by name Mavia, being their Queen,) and took one Moses, a pious and faithful Person that led a Monastick life, to be their Bishop.

AFter the Emperor's departure from Antioch, the Saracens, who before had been their Allies, revolted from the Romans at that time; they were led by one Mavia a Woman, [the King] her Husband being then dead. All places therefore (a) towards the East, were at that time destroy'd by the Saracens. But an Act of Divine Providence repress'd their fury by this means. A person whose name was Moses, by extract a Saracen, leading a Monastick life in the Solitudes, became exceedingly eminent for his Piety, Faith, and Miracles. Mavia, Queen of the Saracens, requesting she might have this person to be Bishop over her Nation, [promising] upon this condition to put an end to the War. The Roman Commanders hearing this, supposed it would be grateful, if a Peace were made upon these terms; and forthwith gave order for the performance hereof with all possible celerity. Moses therefore was seized, and brought from the Solitudes to Alexandria (b) in order to his being initiated into the Sacerdotal Function. But in regard he was brought before Lucius, who at that time was in possession of the Churches there, he refused Ordination, and expresst himself after this manner to Lucius! Indeed, I account my self unworthy of the Sacerdotal Function; but if this thing be advantageous to the Affairs of the Publick, Lucius shall not * Ordain me, for his Right Hand has been filled with Blood. When Lucius told him, that he ought not to give reproachful language, but should rather learn the Points of Religion from him; Moses replied; An account of the Points [of Religion] is not now required. For the villanous Actions you have committed against the Brethren, do sufficiently demonstrate, how Christian-like Sentiments you have. For a Christian strikes not, reviles not, does not fight; for a Servant of the Lord ought not to fight. But your Facts do loudly cry out, by those who have been exiled, who have been cast to the Wild Beasts, and who have been committed to the Flames. [Moreover,] things seen by the Eyes contain a greater and more convincing demonstration, than what is receiv'd by hearing. When Moses had said these and such-like words as these, his Friends carried him to the Mountain, that he might receive Ordination from those [Bishops] who lived in Exile there. Moses therefore having been after this manner consecrated at that time, the Saracen-War had an end put to it; and for the future Mavia continued so strict an * Alliance with the Romans, that she betrothed her Daughter to Victor the Roman Lieutenant-General. Thus much concerning the Saracens.

CHAP. XXXVII.

That after Valens's departure from Antioch the Orthodox in the East (more especially those at Alexandria*) took courage; and having ejected* Lucius, restored the Churches again to Peter, [who was returned] fortified with the Letters of Damasus Bishop of Rome.

AT the same time that the Emperor Valens left Antioch, those persons in all places who had been persecuted, were mightily encouraged, especially the Alexandrians; (a) Peter at that time returning from Rome with the Letters of Damasus the Roman Bishop, whereby the Homoöusian Faith and Peter's Ordination were confirm'd. The Populace therefore resuming courage, turn out Lucius, and substitute Peter in his place. Lucius went immediately on board a Ship, and sail'd to Constantinople. But Peter, having lived but a little while after this, died, and left Timotheus his Brother to succeed him in his See.

(a) Instead of [ὑπὸ τὴν ἀνατολὴν, under the East] I read [πρὸς τὴν ἀνατολὴν, towards the East.] Vales.

(b) Instead of [δεξάμενος, having been initiated] we read [δεξόμενος, in order to his being initiated, &c.] Further, this story concerning Moses's being made Bishop of the Saracens, and concerning the Peace made with them, Socrates has taken out of Rufinus, Book 2. chap. 6. Eccles. Hist. but has not observed Rufinus's order. For Rufinus has placed it about the beginning of Lucius's Episcopate, after the persecution of the Edessens, not at the latter end of Valens's Reign. And I had rather follow Rufinus's opinion, than that of Socrates and Sozomen. The motive I have to be of this opinion, is grounded on Socrates's words at the close of this chapter, where he says, that Mavia the Queen, having made a Peace with the Romans, betrothed her daughter to Victor the Roman Lieutenant General. Now, Victor, about the latter end of Valens's Reign, was too old to have any thoughts of marrying a Wife. Vales.

(a) Instead of [Πέτρου τετελευτηκότος, and Peter being returned,] the reading should be [Πέτρου τότε ἐπανελθόντος, Peter at that time returning:] and the full-point, which is (in some copies) placed before these words, must be expunged. Epiphanius Scholasticus seems to have followed this reading. Vales.

CHAP. XVIII.

That the Emperor arriving at the City Conſtantinople, and being reproach'd by the People upon account of the Goths, marches out of the City againſt the Barbarians: And coming to an Engagement with them near Adrianople, a City of Macedonia, is ſlain by them; after he had lived fifty years, and reigned ſixteen.

[MOreover,] the Emperor Valens coming into Conſtantinople about the thirtieth of May, in his own ſixth, and in Valentinianus Junior's ſecond Conſulate, finds the People in a very ſad and dejected condition. For the Barbarians, who had already over-run and ruined Thracia, did now plunder and deſtroy the very Suburbs of Conſtantinople; there being then no Forces ready that were fit to make a reſiſtance againſt them. But when the Barbarians attempted to make nearer approaches, even to the very City-Walls, the Citizens were grievouſly troubled thereat; and murmur'd againſt the Emperor, as if he himſelf had brought the Enemy thither, becauſe he did not forthwith march out againſt them, but deferred the War againſt the Barbarians. Moreover, when the Cirque-Sports were exhibited, all with one conſent exclaim'd againſt the Emperor, becauſe he was negligent of the publick affairs. They cried out therefore with a great deal of earneſtneſs, Give us Arms, and we our ſelves will fight. The Emperor was highly incenſed at the hearing of theſe Exclamations againſt himſelf; and about the eleventh of June (a) marches out of the City, threatning that if he return'd he would puniſh the Conſtantinopolitans, both for the reproaches they then caſt upon him, and alſo becauſe they had heretofore been Abettors of Procopius's Tyranny. Having therefore ſaid, that he would totally demoliſh the City, and * Plough it up, he march'd out againſt the Barbarians: Whom he drove a great way from the City; and purſued them as far as Adrianople, a City of Thracia, ſituate in the Frontiers of Macedonia. Ingaging the Barbarians at that place, he ended his life on the ninth of Auguſt, in the now mention'd Conſulate. This was the fourth year of the (b) two hundred eighty ninth Olympiad. 'Tis reported by ſome, that he was deſtroy'd by fire, after he had taken refuge in a certain Village, which the Barbarians aſſaulted and burnt. But others affirm, that having changed his Imperial habit, he ran into the midſt of the main body of Foot; and when the Horſe attempted a defection, and refuſed fighting, the Roman Foot were ſurrounded [by the Barbarians,] and wholly cut off in the Engagement: Amongſt whom ('tis ſaid) the Emperor lay, but was not known, his Imperial habit (whereby it might have been manifeſted which was he,) being not upon him. He died after the fifteenth year of his age, having govern'd the Empire thirteen years with his Brother, and reign'd three years after him. This Book contains [an account of Affairs during] the ſpace of ſixteen years.

THE

The PREFACE.

BEfore we begin the Hiſtory of our Fifth Book, we make a requeſt to thoſe who ſhall read this Work of ours, that they would not blame us; becauſe deſigning to write an Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory, we intermix therewith the Wars alſo which have at ſeveral times hapned, ſo far as we could procure a true Relation thereof. For we do this upon ſeveral accounts. Firſt, to bring [the Readers] to a knowledge of what has been tranſacted. Secondly, that our Readers may not be cloy'd, (a) by being continually detained with [a peruſal of] the contentious Diſagreements of Biſhops, and with the Deſigns they framed againſt one another. But moſt eſpecially, that it might be made apparent, that when the Affairs of the State were diſturbed, thoſe of the Church alſo (by a certain Sympathy as it were,) became diſtempered and diſordered. For, let any Man make an Obſervation, and he will find, that the Miſchiefs of the State, and Troubles of the Church, have gather'd Strength and ſpread together. For, he will perceive, that they have either had their riſe at one and the ſame time, or elſe have immediately followed one another. And ſometimes [the Calamities] of the Church led the way; then follow the [Commotions of the] State: at others, on the contrary. So that I cannot perſwade my ſelf, that the interchangable Courſe [of theſe things] does proceed from any fortuitous Accident, but that they take their beginnings from our Iniquities: And that Calamities are ſent for the chaſtiſement thereof. For, according to the Apoſtle † Some Mens Sins are open before-hand, going before to Judgment: and ſome [Men] they follow after. Upon this account therefore, we have interwoven ſome Affairs tranſacted in the State, with our Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory. What was done in the Wars during the Reign of Conſtantine, becauſe 'tis ſo long ago, we could not find an Account of. But we make a curſory mention of the Actions done ſince, according to the Relation thereof, which we have received from Perſons yet living. We do without intermitting any one of them, include the Emperors in this our Hiſtory, becauſe from ſuch time as they began to embrace the Chriſtian Religion, the Affairs of the Church have depended upon them; and the greateſt Synods have been, and at this preſent are * convened by their determination and appointment. Moreover, we have made mention of the Arian Hereſie, becauſe it has diſquieted the Churches. Let this be ſufficient to have been ſaid by way of Preface. We will now begin our Hiſtory.

How (after the Death of Valens) when the Goths laid ſiege to Conſtantinople, the Citizens ſallied out of the City againſt them, having thoſe Saracens who were under Mavia's Command, to be their Auxiliaries.

AFter the Emperor Valens had ended his life by an unknown ſort of death, the Barbarians made their approaches again to the very Walls of Conſtantinople, and ruined the Suburbs on every ſide of it. The Citizens, ſorely vexed thereat, on their own accord ſallied out againſt the Barbarians, every one taking what came next to hand for Arms. * Dominica, the Emperor's Wife, gave every one that went out upon this piece of ſervice, ſuch pay out of the Imperial Treaſury, as was uſually allow'd to Soldiers. Some few Saracens, their Confederates, aſſiſted them; being ſent from Mavia, whom we have mentioned before. When the Citizens had after this manner made a reſiſtance againſt them at that time, the Barbarians retreated farther off from the City.

CHAP. II.

That the Emperor Gratianus, having recalled the Orthodox Biſhops from their Exile, drove the Heretiks out of the Churches, and took Theodoſius to be his Colleague in the Empire.

GRatianus being together with Valentinianus Junior in poſſeſſion of the Empire, and deteſting his Unkle Valens's cruelty towards the Chriſtians, recalled thoſe who had been Exiled by him. Moreover, he made a (a) Law, that perſons of all Sects might, without any diſtinction, ſecurely meet together in their Oratories; only the Eunomians, Photinians, and Manichæans, were extruded out of the Churches. Being alſo ſenſible of the languiſhing condition of the Roman Empire, and of the growth of the Barbarians; and [perceiving alſo] that the State was in want of a valiant and couragious Man, he chooſes Theodoſius (a perſon deſcended of a noble Family in Spain, who had perform'd many a brave piece of ſervice in the Wars, and upon that account had by all men been long ſince judg'd worthy of the Empire, even before Gratianus's Election of him) to be his Colleague in the Empire. Having therefore proclaimed him Emperor in Sirmium, a City of Illyricum, in the Conſulate of Auſonius and Olybrius, on the ſixteenth of January he divides with him the care of managing the War againſt the Barbarians.

(a) Sozomen mentions this Law of Gratianus's, book 7. chap. 1. and ſo does Theodoret, book 5. chap. 2. who ſays that Sapor, Lieutenant-General, was ſent by Gratianus into the Eaſtern parts of the Empire, to put this Law in Execution. That hapned in the year of Chriſt 378. This Law of Gratianus's is not now extant. And yet it ſeems to be mentioned in the fifth Law in the Theodoſian Code, de fide Catholicâ. Valeſ.

CHAP. III.

What Biſhops were in poſſeſſion of the Precedency over the greater Churches at that time.

AT this time Damaſus preſided over the Church at Rome, who had ſucceeded Liberius. Cyrillus was as yet in poſſeſſion of the Church at Jeruſalem. The Antiochian Church (as I have ſaid,) was divided into three parts. For Dorotheus the Arian, Succeſſor to Euzoïus, was poſſeſt of the Churches. Of the reſt one part paid obedience to Paulinus, the other to Melitius, who was recalled from Baniſhment. Lucius, altho' * living in Exile, preſided over the Arians at Alexandria: The Profeſſors of the Homoöuſian opinion in that City were headed by Timotheus, Succeſſor to Peter. Demophilus was in poſſeſſion of the Churches at Conſtantinople, who ſucceeded Eudoxius in the preſidency over the Arian Faction. Thoſe that abominated Communion with him, celebrated their Aſſemblies apart by themſelves.

* Ἐν φυγῇ διάγων; living in Exile. Lucius was not baniſhed; the people of Alexandria forc'd him to leave that City: See Socrates, Book 4. Chap. 37.

CHAP. IV.

How the Macedoniani, who had ſent an Embaſſy to Damaſus [Biſhop] of Rome in defence of the Homoouſian Creed, returned again to their old Hereſie.

THe Macedoniani, after their Embaſſy ſent to Liberius, for ſome time held a perfect and entire communion with the Churches throughout every City; intermixing themſelves with thoſe, who from the beginning had embraced that Draught of the Creed [publiſh'd] at Nicæa: But when the Emperor Gratianus's Law [was promulg'd, which] allow'd a Liberty to [ſeveral] Sects, they made it their buſineſs *to hold ſeparate aſſemblies again. Being met together at Antioch in Syria, they determined again, that the term Homoöuſios was to be abominated, and that a communion was not in any wiſe to be held with thoſe who embraced the Nicene Creed. But † they proceeded not in their attempt. For many of their own party, finding fault with their [inconſtancy,] becauſe ſometimes they decreed one thing, at others another, left them, and in future became firm Adherents to thoſe that embraced the Homoöuſian Creed.

† Or, they reap no benefit, or delight, from their attempt.

CHAP. V.

Concerning what hapned at that time at Antioch, upon Paulinus's, and Melitius's account.

MOreover, at the ſame time aroſe a great difference at Antioch in Syria, upon Melitius's account. We have told you * already, that Paulinus Biſhop of Antioch, by reaſon of his eminent Piety, was not baniſh'd: and that Melitius, after he had been reſtored by † Julianus, was again baniſh'd by * Valens, and at length recall'd in || Gratianus's Reign. At his return to Antioch, he found Paulinus very much decay'd by reaſon of his great age. Immediately therefore all thoſe who were Melitius's Favourers, uſed their utmoſt endeavours to make Melitius Paulinus's * Coadjutor. But, upon Paulinus's ſaying, that it was contrary to the Canons, to admit of a Coadjutor who had been Ordained by the Arians; the People make uſe of force, and cauſe him to be Conſecrated in one of the Churches without the City. Hereupon a great difference aroſe; but afterwards the People came to an agreement upon theſe terms. Having aſſembled † thoſe perſons that were reputed fit to be intruſted with the Biſhoprick, they find them to be in all ſix; of which number Flavianus was one. They bound theſe Men by an Oath, that none of them ſhould make an intereſt for the Biſhoprick, after the death of one of the * Prelates; but that they ſhould permit the Surviver to continue poſſeſt of the See of the Perſon deceaſed. Having given them an Oath after this manner, the People came to an agreement, nor was there any further diſſention amongſt them. But, the † Luciferiani made a ſeparation from the reſt, for this reaſon, becauſe Melitius, who had been Ordained by the Arians, was admitted to the Biſhoprick. Whilſt affairs at Antioch were in this poſture, a very urgent occaſion obliged Melitius to take a journey to Conſtantinople.

CHAP. VI.

That Gregorius of Nazianzum was, by a general Suffrage of the Orthodox, conſtituted Biſhop of the Conſtantinopolitan Church; at which time the Emperor Theodoſius (after his Victory over the Barbarians,) fell ſick at Theſſalonica, and was baptized by Aſcholius the Biſhop.

AT which time, Gregorius was tranſlated from the Biſhoprick of Nazianzum to that of Conſtantinople, by the common ſuffrage of many Prelates.

Gratianus Valen. Jun. Theodosius.

Prelates. And this was done in such a manner [as I have declared.] About the same time the Emperors, Gratianus and Theodosius, got each of them a Victory over the Barbarians. Gratianus * returned immediately into the Gallia's, because the Alamanni over-ran those Provinces. But Theodosius, after [he had erected] his Trophies, hastned to Constantinople, and arrives at Thessalonica. There he fell sick, and earnestly desired that he might be vouchsafed Christian Baptism: For by his Progenitors he had been been bred up in the Christian Religion, and was a Professor of the Homoöusian Faith. Being desirous with all possible speed to be baptized, because his Distemper increased, and having [for that reason] sent for the Bishop of Thessalonica, he first enquired of him, what Faith he profest. And when the Bishop had made answer, that the Opinion of the Arians had not invaded the Provinces of Illyricum, and that the Novelty which Arius had given birth to, was not so prevalent as to prey upon the Churches in those Countries; but that they continued to preserve that Faith immoveable and unshaken, which from the beginning was delivered by the Apostles, and had been confirmed in the Nicene Synod: [upon this answer] the Emperor was most willingly baptized by Ascholius the Bishop. Not many days after [Theodosius] recovered of his Distemper, and came to Constantinople about the twenty fourth of November, in Gratianus's fifth and his own first Consulate.

CHAP. VII.

That when Gregorius was come to Constantinople, and some Bishops murmur'd at his Translation; he refused the Presidency of the Church. And, the Emperor orders Demophilus the Arian Bishop, either to give his assent to the Homoousian Faith, or else to go out of the City; which latter he chose rather to do.

AT that time Gregorius of Nazianzum, being (a) translated [to Constantinople,] celebrated his Assemblies within the City, in a small Oratory. Whereto the Emperors afterwards joyn'd a stately Church, and named it (b) Anastasia. But Gregorius (a Person for eloquence and piety far more eminent than all Men of his own time,) perceiving that some murmured [at his Translation,] because he was a stranger; after he had expreſt his joy for the Emperor's arrival, refused to make any longer stay at Constantinople. The Emperor finding the Church in this posture, was very sollicitous, how he might make Peace, procure an Union, and enlarge the Churches. Immediately therefore he opens his mind to Demophilus, who presided over the Arian Sect, [and makes a proposal to him] whether he would give his assent to the [Creed published at the] Nicene Synod, unite the people, and embrace peace. Upon Demophilus's refusing to comply with his proposition; If then (said the Emperor) you eschew Peace and Concord, We order you to quit the Churches. When Demophilus had heard these words, and consider'd with himself how difficult it was to make a resistance against those in authority and power; he called the multitude together in the Church; and standing up in the midst of them, spake these words on his own account to his Followers. Brethren, 'tis written (said he) in the *Gospel; if they shall persecute you in this City, flee ye into another. In regard therefore the Emperor (c) excludes us from the Churches, take notice, that to morrow we will have our meetings without the City. Having said these words, he went out; not so, as if he apprehended the true meaning contained in this Evangelic Oracle, [the import whereof is,] that such as flee out of the converse of this World, should seek the Jerusalem which is above. But he [following another sense of these words, went] out of the City-gates, where for the future he had his Meetings. Together with him went out Lucius of Alexandria, who having been ejected, as I said * before, made his escape to Constantinople, in which City he lived. After this manner therefore the Arians (who for the space of forty years had been in possession of the Churches,) declining the agreement they were invited to by the Emperor Theodosius, departed out of the City, in Gratianus's fifth and Theodosius Augustus's first Consulate, on the twenty sixth of November. And the Professors of the Homoöusian Faith succeeding in their places, recover'd possession of the Churches.

Gratianus Valen. Jun. Theodosius.

* See Matt. 10. 23. where 'tis thus worded in the Greek: ὅταν δὲ διώκωσιν ὑμᾶς ἐν τῇ πόλει ταύτῃ, but when they shall persecute you in this City. But here in Socrates the words are: ἐὰν ὑμᾶς διώκωσιν ἐκ τῆς πόλεως ταύτης; if they shall persecute you out of this City, &c.

* Book 4. chap. 37.

(a) Indeed Socrates thought that Gregorius had been translated from the Bishoprick of Nazianzum, to that of Constantinople: which was the opinion of many others also. But Gregorius had never been Bishop of Nazianzum; he was only his father Gregorius's Assistant in that Bishoprick, being sent for thither by his father (then very aged,) out of the Solitudes; whither he had retired after he had accepted of and also refused the Bishoprick of Sasimis, in the year of Christ 371; as Baronius has remarked. Vales.

(b) I am not of Socrates's opinion, who says here, that that Church (wherein Gregorius Nazianzenus used to Preach the Word of God at Constantinople,) was by the succeeding Emperors named Anastasia. For, in Gregorius's own life-time this Church was called Anastasia; which is apparent, both from Gregorius, own Oration, wherein he bids farewel in expres words to Anastasia, and The Apostles; and also from his Elegiack concerning the Dream of Anastasia. Consult Baronius, at the year of Christ 378. Vales.

(c) We found a far different reading in our Florentine and Sfortian M. SS. For, in both those Copies 'tis thus expreſt; ἐκκλησιῶν χρήζει, stands in need of the Churches: this reading Epiphan. Scholasticus has followed, as appears from his Version. For he renders it thus: Quia igitur Imperator Ecclesis opus habet, In regard therefore the Emperor has an occasion for the Churches. Nicephorus maintains the common reading; for instead of [excludes us from] his words are [drives us out of.] The Manuscript reading is in my judgment the better. Vales.

CHAP. VIII.

Concerning the hundred and fifty Bishops convened at Constantinople, and concerning the Determinations made by them, after they had Ordained Nectarius in that City.

[AFter this] the Emperor without any delay summons a Synod of Bishops [who embraced] his own Faith; that by them the Nicene Faith might be confirmed, and a Bishop of Constantinople Ordained. And because he had some hopes of being able to unite the Macedoniani to [a profession of] his own Faith; he summon'd the Prelates of that Heresie also. There met therefore of [the Embracers of] the Homoöusian Faith, Timotheus from Alexandria; from Jerusalem Cyrillus, who having made a Retractation, at that time assented to the Homoöusian Creed: Melitius was come thither from Antioch before, having been sent for to that City on the account of Gregorius's Ordination: also (a) Ascholius from Thessalonica, and many others.

(a) In the Sfortian M. S. both here, and also before, in Chap. 6. of this Book; this person is called Acholius. The Latins do commonly give him that name. For so he is called by Ambrosius, by Prosper in his Chronicon, and by Jordanes in his Book de successione Regnorum. But the Greeks do usually term him Ascholius. This is the Ascholius, concerning whose Death, Virtues, and Miracles, Saint Ambrosius writes, in his 59th Epistle to the Clergy of Thessalonica. Where he says, that Anysius his Scholar succeeded him. Vales.

Gratianus Valen. Jun. Theodosius.

They were in all an hundred and fifty. The principal Persons of the Macedonian Party, were Eleusius of Cyzicum, and Martianus [Bishop] of Lampsacus. [Of this Sect] there were thirty six [Bishops,] most of whom came from the Cities about the Hellespont. They met therefore in the Consulate of Eucharius and Evagrius, in the month of May. The Emperor and the Bishops that embraced his Creed, did their utmost to bring Eleusius and his Followers over to their own side; putting them in remembrance of the *Embassy, which they had sent by Eustathius to Liberius heretofore Bishop of Rome; and (b) that not long since they themselves had entred into a promiscuous Communion [with the Orthodox,] on their own accord: And that they, having once acknowledg'd and profest an agreement in the [points of] Faith, did not do what was right and honest, now to attempt a subversion of what had been well and wisely determin'd by themselves. But the Macedoniani, little regarding either admonitions, or reproofs, chose rather to profess the Arian opinion, than to give their assent to the Homoüsian Creed. Having made this answer, they departed from Constantinople, and wrote to their followers in every City, ordering them in no wise to give their consent to the Creed of the Nicene Synod. But the [Prelates] of the † other party staid [at Constantinople] and entred into a consult about the Ordination of a Bishop. For Gregorius, as we have told you a little before, refused the Bishoprick, and prepared for his departure to Nazianzum. There was a person, by name Nectarius, [a descendant] of a Senatorian Family, a sweet-temper'd Man, admirable for his whole course of life, (c) although he bore the Prætors Office. This person the people seized upon, elected him Bishop, and he was Ordained by the hundred and fifty Prelates then present. Moreover, at the same time [the said Prelates] promulged a Sanction, that the Bp. of Constantinople should have the (d) priviledges of honour after the Bishop of Rome, because that City was New-Rome. They did again confirm the Nicene Creed; and constituted (e) Patriarchs, having made a (f) division of the Provinces; that so

(b) See what Socrates has remarked concerning this Matter in Chap. 4. of this Book. Vales.

† That is, the Orthodox.

(c) Instead of [ᾧ τοὶ, &c. although, &c.] I had rather read [ᾧ τόϑε τὰ τῶ πρώτω, &c. who also at that time bore the Prætor's Office.] Nicephorus confirms our emendation; for he words it thus: ᾧ διὰ πάντων, ὡς εἰπεῖν, θαυμαζόμενος, &c. and admirable, as I may say, for all things; who then bore the Prætor's Office. Vales.

(d) Τὰ πρεσβεῖα τῆς τιμῆς. They are the very words of the third Canon of the Constantinopolitan Synod. Whereby the Constantinopolitan Fathers do confer upon the Bishop of Constantinople a Precedency, or Primacy of honour only; but give him nothing of a Metropolitical or Patriarchal power, or jurisdiction. This is evident, not only from the cautious Expression which the Fathers of this Synod make use of; (for they give him, not τὰ πρεσβεῖα τῆς ἐξουσίας, the priviledges of power or jurisdiction, nor priviledges in general; but they bestow on him only τὰ πρεσβεῖα τῆς τιμῆς, the priviledges of honour:) but also from these very Words themselves, compar'd with the second Canon of this Constantinopolitan Synod, For, in that Canon the Fathers had made a positive sanction, that a Diœcesis should be govern'd by its Bishops, (or, by a Synod of all the Bishops in the same Diœcesis,) and that the said Bishops should exercise their Ecclesiastical Power in that Diœcesis only: ᾧ τὰς τῆς θρᾴκης τὰ τῆς θρᾴκης μόνον οἰκονομεῖν, and that the Bishops of the Thracican Diœcesis should only govern the [Ecclesiastick] Affairs of the said Thracican Diœcesis: These are the very Words of the Canon. Now, every body knows, that Constantinople is situate in the Thracican Diœcesis. In regard therefore, that the present Fathers had committed the whole government of the Thracican Diœcesis to a Synod of all the Bishops in the said Diœcesis; there could nothing remain, which they might assign to any other single Bishop in the said Diœcesis, before the rest of them, save only the bare priviledge of honour; which alone they do here confer upon the Constantinopolitan See situate in the same Diœcesis. And thus, by the order of this Canon, Anatolius Bishop of Constantinople is placed next after Leo the Bishop of Rome's Legates, in the subscriptions of the Council of Chalcedon. See Concil. General. Edit. Bin. Paris 1636. Tom. 3. pag. 452, 453. There occurs an eminent instance of this honour due to the Constantinopolitan Bishop by vertue of this Canon, in Synod. Chalced. Act. 1. vid. Concil. General. Edit. Bin. ut prius, Tom. 3. pag. 61, 62. See the Learned Dr. Beverege's Annotat. on the third Canon Concil. Constantinop. pag. 95.

(e) The first mention (if I mistake not) of Christian Patriarchs (so I term them, because the Jews had grand Officers amongst them thus termed, long before this time;) in any Author worthy of credit, is at this place in our Socrates. However, there is no small stir amongst Learned Men, about defining the time wherein these Patriarchs were first constituted in the Christian Church. Valesius, in his Notes on this Chap. and in his third Book of Ecclesiastical Observations upon Socrates and Sozomen does in a great many words assert, that the Patriarchal Authority was confirmed by the sixth Canon of the Nicene Synod. This assertion of his is sufficiently confuted by Dr. Beveredge, in his Annotat. upon that sixth Canon, pag. 52, &c. At which place, and in his notes on the second Canon of the Constantinopolitan Council, pag. 93, 94. the said Learned Doctor is of opinion (agreeable to our Socrates here,) that Patriarchs were first constituted by this second Oecumenical Council held at Constantinople. Nevertheless, he grants, that most of those priviledges, which Patriarchs afterwards challenged were given them by other Councils. Lastly, Dr. Barrow's sentiment is, that this Diœcesan (or Patriarchical) Form did soon after the Nicene Council creep into the Church, without any solemn appointment, by a spontaneous assumption and submission. See his excellent Treatise of the Pope's supremacy, pag. 240, &c.

(f) The Roman Emperors who preceded Constantine the Great, committed the chief management of affairs in the Civil State of the Empire to one, or at most to two Præfects of the Prætorium. But Constantine the Great introduced a new partition of the Empire, (as Zosimus tells us, Book 2. of his Hist. pag. 439, 440 Edit. Lugd. 1611;) and divided the management thereof amongst four Præfects of the Prætorium; one whereof was Præfect of the Prætorium in the East, a second of Illyricum, a third of Italy, and a fourth of the Gallia's. Each of these Præfects had several Diœcesis's under them: every single Diœcesis was a Combination of divers Provinces together into one Territory. What Diœceses every one of these Præfects had under their District, and what and how many Provinces were included in each Diœcesis; the learned Reader may see in Guidus Pancirolus's Notitia utraque, dignitatum, cùm Orientis, tùm Occidentis, Edit. Lugd. 1608. From which Author we will transcribe the five Diœcesis's (for so many he had under him,) of the Præfect of the Prætorium of the East, as they occur at fol. 3 and 4, of his Comment: because they are necessary, in order to the clear understanding of what we have to say further here. Sub dispositione virorum Illustrium Præfectorum Prætorio per Orientem, &c. Under the dispose of the Illustrious the Præfects of the Prætorium throughout the East, are these Diœcesis's underwritten: The East, Egypt, the Asian, Pontick, and Thracian Diœcesis's.

In conformity to this Model of Government in the Civil State, the Regiment in the Church (which before had been Metropolitical, when the Provinces were independent on each other in Ecclesiastical Administrations,) was adapted. This Diœcesan Form of Governance might, 'tis probable, privately creep into the Church, in that interval of time between the Nicene and Constantinopolitan Councils; which is the opinion of Dr. Barrow (See Note (e.) in this Chapter.) But, 'tis certain, it was confirm'd by the Fathers convened in this second Oecumenical Synod; which Sanction they made upon this occasion. A little before the summoning of this Synod, Melitius Bishop of Antioch in the East, took a journey to Constantinople, where he, together with some other Bishops, promoted Gregorius of Nazianzum to the Constantinopolitan See. So Sozomen tells us, Book 7. Chap. 3 and 7. Soon after Melitius had done this, Peter Bishop of Alexandria sent some Bishops from Egypt to Constantinople, who ordained Maximus the Cynick Bishop of that City. See Sozomen Book 7. Chap. 9. Now, in the Political Partition of the Roman Empire, (as you may see by that Draught we have here given you of the Oriental Oriental Prætorian-Præfecture,) these three places were in three several Diœceſes. For, Antioch in Syria (whence Meletius came) was in the Oriental Diœceſis. Alexandria (from whence the Biſhops were ſent by Peter) was in the Egyptick Diœceſis; and Conſtantinople (where theſe Biſhops had celebrated their Epiſcopal Ordinations) was ſituate in the Thracican Diœceſis. In regard theſe Proceedings had produced a great deal of diſorder and confuſion in the Church; to remedy this in future, the Fathers convened in this Synod, make a Sanction, (See Conc. Conſtantinopol. II. Can. 2. pag. 87. Edit. Bevereg.) that the Eccleſiaſtick Diœceſis's ſhould have the ſame Limits with thoſe of the State; and that it ſhould be as unlawful for Eccleſiaſtick Perſons to perform any Office, or do any buſineſs belonging to them, without that Diœceſis wherein they were placed; as it was for the Civil Miniſter to intermeddle with any affair without the Limits of his Diœceſis. That this had not been duly obſerved in the Church before this Synod, but that Prelates made frequent Excurſions out of one Diœceſis into another, to ordain, &c. is evident, not only from the inſtances we have mention'd juſt now; (where we find Meletius who belong'd to the Oriental Diœceſis, and other Biſhops of the Egyptick Diœceſis; ordaining a Biſhop of Conſtantinople, a City in the Thracican Diœceſis:) but alſo from the Teſtimony of our Socrates, a Perſon who lived ſoon after the convention of this Conſtantinopolitan Synod; who ſpeaking here concerning its Sanctions, καὶ πατριάρχας καθίσταν (ſays he) διανειμάμενοι τὰς ἐπαρχίας, &c. And they conſtituted Patriarchs, having made a diviſion of the Provinces; that ſo thoſe Biſhops [who make their abode] without the bounds of their own Diœceſis, ſhould not invade the Churches without their Limits. For this had been promiſcuouſly done before by reaſon of the Perſecutions. But, notwithſtanding that this Diœceſan form (in imitation of the Civil State of the Empire) was brought into the Church, and thereupon Patriarchal Sees were erected; yet after this, ſeveral Provincial Churches had their ancient priviledges confirm'd to them, (which confirmation is grounded on the ſixth Canon of the Nicene Council, as Dr. Beverege has fully prov'd in his Notes on that Canon, pag. 58;) and remained Independent from the Patriarchal Sees. For inſtance, the Cyprian Church was adjudged to be ſuch an one, in the eighth Canon of the third General Council held at Epheſus, in the year of Chriſt 431. In which Canon, after the Epheſine Fathers had determined the Cyprian Church to be independent from the Biſhop of Antioch; they add this clauſe: τὸ δὲ αὐτὸ καὶ ὅπι περὶ ἄλλων διοικήσεων, καὶ τῶν ἀπανταχοῦ ἐπαρχιῶν φυλαχθήσεται, &c. The ſame ſhall be obſerved in other Diœceſes, and in the Provinces every where; that ſo, none of the moſt Religious Biſhops may invade another Province, which has not been for many years before, and from the beginning under his, or his predeceſſors hand. In like manner, Armenia the Great was exempted from dependence on any Patriarchate; as 'tis apparent from That Order of the Preſidency of the moſt holy Patriarchs, which Dr. Beverege has publiſhed (at his notes on the 36th Canon Concil. Trullan. pag. 135, &c.) from a very ancient Greek Manuſcript in the Bodleian Library. In which Manuſcript, neither England, Scotland, nor Ireland, are reckoned dependents on the Roman Patriarchate; as the Learned Reader, on peruſal, will find. Though, 'tis as certain, that there was a compleat and abſolute Church ſetled in this Iſland, long before this Manuſcript Order was (or can be ſuppoſed to have been) drawn up; as that there was one at Antioch, or Rome it ſelf. For (not to mention thoſe unqueſtionable authorities which might be here produced to prove, that the plantation of the Goſpel in this our Province was as early as the cloſe of Tiberius's Reign;) we have many Witneſſes of an undoubted authority to atteſt, that before the times of the Nicene Council, there was a compleat Church ſetled in this Iſland. For firſt, in the ſubſcriptions to the firſt Council of Arles (convened in France before the Nicene Council, that is, before the year of Chriſt 325, as the Acts of the ſaid Council, publiſht by Jacobus Sirmondus do atteſt;) we meet with the names of theſe Perſons who went thither from this our Iſland: (See Concilia Antiqua Galliæ, Tom. 1. pag. 9. Edit. Sirmondi Pariſ. 1629.) Eborius, Epiſcopus de civitate Eboracenſi, &c. Eborius Biſhop of the City of York in the Province of Britannia. Reſtitutus, Biſhop of the City of London, in the forewritten Province. Adelfius, Biſhop of the City Colonia of the Londoners. From the ſame Province, Sacerdos a Presbyter, Arminius a Deacon. Secondly, Athanaſius (in his ſecond Apology againſt the Arians, p. 720. Edit. Pariſ. does atteſt, that the Biſhops of the Britannia's were preſent at the Sardican Council; which Synod was convened in the Conſulate of Rufinus and Euſebius (ſee our Socrates, Book 2. Chap. 20, note c.) on the year of our Lord 347. Laſtly, to mention no more, Hilarius Biſhop of Poictiers in France, in the beginning of his Book de Synodis (pag. 318. Edit. Pariſ. 1631. which Book was written about the year of our Lord 350.) ſends Greeting Britanniarum Epiſcopis, to the Biſhops of the Britannia's. This is ſufficient to prove we had a Church here in thoſe times. And, that this Church was governed by its own Biſhops, till about the year of Chriſt 600, and ſubject neither to the Roman, nor to any other foreign Prelate, is a thing evidently apparent from what Venerable Bede has recorded in his Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory. For when Gregory Biſhop of Rome, (ſuppoſing the Inhabitants of this Iſland to be ſtill intangled in the Errors of Paganiſm,) had ſent hither Auguſtine the Monk to convert them to Chriſtianity; he unexpectedly found, not only the Chriſtian Religion diſſeminated amongſt them long before his arrival, but Biſhops alſo rightly and duly conſtituted; which Prelates could not (in my ſimple judgment) be ſuppoſed the Subjects of the Roman Biſhop, becauſe he was ſo far from having any knowledge of them, that he did not believe there was one ſingle Chriſtian in this Iſland. But, though Auguſtine at his arrival found not the Britiſh Biſhops dependants on the Roman See; yet, he reſolves to uſe his utmoſt endeavour to make them ſuch. In order to which, by the aſſiſtance of Ethelbert King of Kent (as Bede tells us, Book 2. Chap. 2. Eccleſ. Hiſtor.) he ſummons together the Prelates of the adjacent Provinces of the Britons, adviſes them to alter their ancient uſages, and to accept of him for their Arch-biſhop. But they, having an Arch-biſhop of their own already, to wit, the Biſhop of Kaerleon, and looking upon it to be a ſtrange and unheard-of thing, that they ſhould become Subjects to a Foreigner; wholly refuſed him and his monſtrous propoſal; telling him, that they would not own him for their Arch-biſhop; and, as to their ancient cuſtoms and uſages, that they could not relinquiſh them without the conſent and licence of their own Nation. Whereupon they deſired a ſecond Synod might be convened. At which there met ſeven Britiſh Biſhops (whoſe Names you may ſee in Sir Henry Spelman's Councils, Tom. 1. pag. 106;) and many other Learned Men; who by Dionothus (or, as Bede calls him, Dinooth) Abbot of Bangor gave Auguſtine the Monk this anſwer: (See Sir Henry Spelman, as before, pag. 108, 109.) Be it known to you and without doubt, that we are, and every one of us obedient and ſubject to the Church of God and Pope of Rome, and to every true and pious Chriſtian, to love every one in his degree with perfect charity, and to help every one of them by word and deed to be the ſons of God. As for any other obedience, I do not know that I owe it to him, whom ye call the Pope, or that he hath right to challenge or require to be the Father of Fathers. This obedience we are ready to give and pay to him, and to every Chriſtian continually. Beſides, we are placed under the Government of the Biſhop of Kaerleon upon Uske, who is to ſuperviſe under God over us, to make us keep the ſpiritual way. What treatment the Britiſh Prelates found from Auguſtine's hand, after they had given him this anſwer; the Reader may ſee in Bede, at the Book and Chap. now quoted. Where we find this Auguſtine, their pretended Converter, threatning them with a War. Which by his Inſtigation (ſee Mr. Wheelocks notes on Bed. Eccleſ. Hiſt. Book 2. Chap. 2.) Ethelfridus King of the Northanhumbrians waged againſt them: wherein no leſs than 1200 Britiſh Eccleſiaſticks were ſlain at one time. After this, the Romiſh Biſhop, for upwards of nine Centuries exerciſed a ſupream Eccleſiaſtick Power in this Nation; though ſeveral of our Kings promulged ſevere Laws againſt it. But now at length, his Tyrannick yoke is broken off; and our Church enjoys its ancient priviledges: which may that God continue to it, by the moſt precious Blood of whoſe eternal Son it was purchaſed! Amen.

(g) thoſe Biſhops [who make their abode] without the bounds of their own Diœceſis, ſhould not invade the Churches without their limits. For this had been promiſcuouſly done before, by reaſon of the perſecutions. And to Nectarius was allotted the * Great City and Thracia. Helladius ſucceſſor to Baſilius in the Biſhoprick of Cæſarea in Cappadocia;

* That is, Conſtantinople.

Gratianus Valen. Jun. Theodoſius.

(g) Τὰς ὑπὲρ διοίκησιν ὁπισκόπους. They are the words of the ſecond Canon of the Conſtantinopolitan Synod; which Dionyſius Exiguus renders thus: Qui ſunt ſuper Diœceſim Epiſcopi, &c. the Biſhops who are over a Diœceſis. There may be a twofold ſence of theſe Words. For, firſt, They may be termed ὑπὲρ διοίκησιν ἐπίσκοποι, who are over a Diœceſis, or preſide over a whole Diœceſis; of which ſort is the Biſhop of Alexandria, or the Biſhop of Antioch, who is conſtituted not over a Province, but over a Diœceſis. Or ſecondly, They may be termed ὑπὲρ διοίκησιν, who are without their own Diœceſis: So Zonaras explains theſe Words in his Comment on this Canon. Lucas Holſtenius has embraced the former ſenſe of theſe Words. For, at the Margin of his copy he had made a remark, that this paſſage in Socrates is to be explain'd thus: Ne Epiſcopi, &c. Leſt the Biſhops ſet over their own Diœceſis's, ſhould invade the Churches ſituate without their limits. But, the latter ſenſe is the truer; which the Canon it ſelf declares in the following Words: for the Fathers add, ἀκλήτους δὲ ἐπισκόπους ὑπὲρ διοίκησιν μὴ ἐπιβαίνειν, that the uncalled Biſhops come not beyond their Diœceſis. Wherefore, ὑπὲρ διοίκησιν ὁπίσκοποι are the ſame with ὑπερόριοι, Prelates without their bounds; which title Socrates has given Gregory Nazianzen at chap. 7. of this Book; becauſe of his removal from the Biſhoprick of Saſimi (which was in the Pontick Diœceſis) to Conſtantinople. Further, it is to be noted, that Diœceſis in this Canon does not ſignifie a Dioceſe (as that word is commonly uſed,) or a Province, as the Greek Interpreters Zonaras and Balſamon ſuppoſed; but it imports many Provinces joyned together which are ſubject to one Governour. Whence the title of this Canon is, περὶ διοικήσεως, concerning Diœceſes. For, its expreſs words are, φυλαττομένης δὲ τῶν προγεγραμμένων περὶ διοικήσεων κανόνος, &c. the forewritten Canon concerning Diœceſes being obſerved, 'tis manifeſt that a Provincial Synod will govern affairs throughout every Province. You ſee what the title of this Canon is, and how it diſtinguiſhes a Province from a Diœceſis. For, 'tis not forbidden by this Canon, that Biſhops ſhould go out of one Province into another, to celebrate Ordinations; that being not to be done otherwiſe. To inſtance in the Aſian Diœceſis (ſee note f.) the Fathers prohibit not a removal out of Lycia into Pamphilia, nor out of Caria into Lydia, on account of Eccleſiaſtick buſineſs; but they only forbid them to paſs out of one Diœceſis into another. Valeſ.

Gratianus Valen. Jun. Theodosius.

Gregorius [Bishop] of Nyssa, a City also in Cappadocia, (who was Basilius's Brother; and Otreïus [Bishop] of Meletina in Armenia, had the (b) Patriarchate of the Pontick Diœcesis for their allotment. To Amphilochius of Iconium, and Optimus [Bishop] of Antioch in Pisidia, was assign'd the Asian [Diœcesis]. To Timotheus [Bishop] of Alexandria was given [the Superintendency over the Churches] throughout Egypt. The administration of the Churches throughout the East was committed to the Bishops of that Region, [to wit] to Pelagius of Laodicea, and Diodorus of Tarsus; but to the Antiochian Church were reserv'd the Priviledges [of Honour,] which were given to Meletius then present. They likewise decreed, that if need required, a Provincial Synod should determine the Ecclesiastick affairs of every Province. These Sanctions were confirm'd by the Emperor's own consent. Such was the conclusion of this Synod.

(b) The term πατριαρχια is not here used in such a sense, as to signifie a Patriarchate strictly so taken. Nor, must we think, that these Prelates, here mentioned by Socrates, were constituted Patriarchs properly so called; because (as Valesius well remarks) there are more than one named here to be superintendents over one Diœcesis; for instance, Helladius, Gregorius, and Otreïus, are assigned for the Pontick Diœcesis. Now, what that power was, which is here given to these Prelates by the Synod (or rather by the Emperor Theodosius himself,) will appear from an inspection into the occasion of their being intrusted with this power. The Emperor Theodosius, perceiving the Churches to be notoriously pestred with Arianism, took a resolution to extirpate it. In order whereto, he published an Edict (which is mentioned by Sozomen, Book 7. Chap. 9. and is still extant, being the third Law in the Theodosian Code, Tit. de fide Catholicâ:) to this effect; That in all places, the possession of the Churches should be delivered to such persons only, as would acknowledge and profess one and the same Deity of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, in a subsistency of three persons equal in honour and power. In order to a more clear manifestation of those Persons that owned this acknowledgement and profession; such of them as were in Constantinople and Thracia, were by this Imperial Law obliged to hold communion with Nectarius Prelate of the Constantinopolitan See; those in the Pontick Diœcesis, with Helladius, Gregorius, and Otreïus, &c. For these Prelates (says Sozomen) the Emperor himself approved of, after he had seen and spoken with them; and also, they had an eminent repute for their pious Government of their Churches. And the Emperor orders further in his Edict, that whosoever dissented from a communion of Faith with these Prelates, in their several districts, he should be expelled out of the Church as a manifest Heretick. You see then, that the power given to these Prelates here was not properly Patriarchichal; but only this, that their Faith was to be the standard as it were, to measure that of others by, and a communion with them the Test for admitting persons to, or expelling them from, Ecclesiastick preferments. But, though we affirm, that the Prelates here mentioned by Socrates, were not constituted Patriarchs properly so called: yet we see no reason of making an inference from hence, (as Valesius in his note here does,) that Patriarchs were not constituted by the Constantinopolitan Fathers. For this is plainly repugnant to our Socrates's fore-mentioned words in this chap. viz. παλαιὰρχας καθ' ἕσων, διανεμάμενοι τὰς ἐπαρχίας, they constituted Patriarchs, having made a distribution, or division, of the Provinces. On which distribution of the Provinces, the entire constitution of Patriarchs has its sole dependence. For, from it arose Diœceses, over which Patriarchs were set. See the Learned Dr. Beverege's notes on the 6th Canon of the Nicene Council, pag. 52, &c. and on the second Canon of the Constant. Synod. pag. 94.

CHAP. IX.

That the Emperor Theodosius [ordered] the Body of Paulus Bishop of Constantinople to be honourably translated from [the place of his] Exile. At which time also Meletius [Bishop] of Antioch departed this life.

AT that time the Emperor translated the Body of Paulus the Bishop from the City Ancyra; whom Philippus Præfect of the Prætorium had banish'd upon Macedonius's account, and had order'd him to be strangled in Cucusus a Town of Armenia, as I have * already mentioned. [Theodosius] therefore, having receiv'd [his Body] with much honour and reverence, deposited it in the Church which now bears his own name; which Church the embracers of Macedonius's opinion were heretofore in possession of, at such time as they were Separatists from the Arians; but were then expelled by the Emperor, because they refused embracing of his Faith. Moreover, at the same time Meletius Bishop of Antioch fell into a Distemper, and died: in praise of whom Gregorius, Basilius's Brother, spoke a (a) Funeral Oration. Meletius's Body was by his Friends convey'd to Antioch. Such as were favourers of Meletius, did again refuse to be subject to Paulinus; but caused Flavianus to be substituted in the place of Meletius. By reason whereof a new division did again arise amongst the People. Thus the Antiochian Church was afresh divided into two Parties, on account of their Bishops, not of their Faith.

Gratianus Valen. Jun. Theodosius.

(a) This Funeral Oration in praise of Meletius Bishop of Antioch, is now extant amongst the Works of Gregorius Nyssenus. Vales.

CHAP. X.

That the Emperor ordered a Synod of all the Sects to be convened, at which time Arcadius his Son was proclaimed Augustus; and that the Novatians (who as to their Faith embraced the same Sentiments with the Homoöusians*) were the only persons that had permission to hold their Assemblies within the City. But the other Hereticks were forced from thence.*

BUt, there were disturbances in other Cities also [which hapned] at such time as the Arians were ejected out of the Churches. On account whereof I cannot choose but admire the Emperor's Judiciousness and Prudence. For he suffered not (so far as it was in his power [to prevent them,]) the Cities to be filled with tumultuous disturbances: But within a short space of time, order'd a Synod of all the Heresies to be again convened, supposing that by a mutual conference of the Bishops, one concordant opinion would prevail amongst all men. I am of opinion, that this design of the Emperor's was the cause of that fortunate success he [then] had. For, about the same time, by a particular dispensation of Divine Providence, the barbarous Nations were reduced to a subjection to him. And amongst others, Athanarichus King of the Goths made a surrendry of himself with all his own people unto him, (a) who soon after died at Constantinople. Moreover, at that time the Emperor proclaim'd his son Arcadius, Augustus, in the second Consulate of * Merobaudes which he bore with †Saturninus, on the sixteenth of January. Not long after these things, the Bishops of every Sect arriv'd from all places, in the same Consulate, in the month June. The Emperor therefore having sent for Nectarius the Bishop, consulted with him, what project should be made use of that the Christian Religion might be freed from dissentions, and the Church reduc'd to an union. And he said, that that controversie which caused a separation in the Churches, ought to be discuss'd, that so by a removal of the discord, an agreement might be effected in the Churches. At the hearing of this, Nectarius was full of anxiety and sollicitude. And having sent for Agelius then (a) Athanarichus King of the Goths, entred Constantinople in the Consulate of Eucherius and Evagrius, on the eleventh of January, and died on the twenty fifth of the same Month; as 'tis recorded in Idatius's Fasti, and in Marcellinus's Chronicon. On the year following, which was the year of Christ 382, when Antonius and Syagrius were Consuls, the whole Gothick Nation surrendred itself to Theodosius, on the 3d of Octob. as says the same Idatius. Vales.

* In the Greek he is called Merogaudus here, and hereafter.

† His name in the Greek is Satornilus.

Gratianus Valen. Jun. Theodosius.

then Bishop of the Novatians, (in regard he was a person that embraced the same sentiments with him as to the Faith) he makes known to him the Emperor's intent. He, as to other things, was indeed a very pious person; but being not very able to maintain a dispute concerning the Doctrine [of Faith,] he proposes his Reader under him, by name Sisinnius, as a fit person to manage a Conference. But Sisinnius (an eloquent Man, and well-experienced in affairs, one who had an accurate skill in the Expositions of the Sacred Scriptures, and in Philosophick opinions) knew that these Disputations do not only not unite Dissentions, but also raise Heresies to an higher degree of contention. Upon which account he gave Nectarius this advice: In regard he very well knew, that the Ancients avoided the attributing a beginning of Existence to the Son of God; (for they apprehended him to be co-eternal with the Father;) he advises him to shun Logical disputes; and to produce for evidences the (b) Expositions of the Ancients: and that the Emperor should propose to the Chiefs of each Heresie this question, Whether they wou'd entertain any respect for the Ancients, who (c) flourished before the dissention of the Church, or whether they would reject 'em as estranged from the Christian Religion? For if they reject them [said he,] then let them dare to Anathematize them. And if they shall be so audacious as to do that, the multitude will forthwith extrude them by violence. Upon the doing whereof, the truth will undoubtedly obtain a manifest victory. But, if they shall refuse to reject the ancient Doctors, then it will be our business to produce the Books of the Ancients, whereby our opinion will be attested and confirmed.

(b) Τὰς ἐνδόσεις τῶν παλαιῶν. Christophorson renders these words thus: The forms of the Creed deliver'd by the Ancients. Epiphanius Scholasticus thus: The Traditions of the Ancients. I like neither Version. For Socrates means the Books of the Ancient Doctors of the Church; and more especially, the interpretations of Sacred Scripture put forth by them. 'Tis certain, what he terms ἐνδόσεις [Expositions] here, he does a little after call τὰς βίβλους τῶν παλαιῶν, the Books of the Ancients. Wherefore I have here chosen to render it Expositions, as Musculus does. For, what Socrates here calls ἐνδόσεις, a little lower he terms ἀρχαίων ἔκθεσιν, the Exposition of the Ancients. Vales.

(c) Instead of [προσαρμοσάντων, accommodated] it must undoubtedly be [προσακμασάντων, flourished.] Which Emendation is confirmed by Epiphanius Scholasticus: for thus he renders it: De Antiquis Ecclesiæ Doctoribus, qui ante divisionem floruissent, concerning the Ancient Doctors of the Church, who flourished before the Division. Vales.

Nectarius having heard all this from Sisinnius, goes in great haste to the Palace; and makes the Emperor acquainted with the advice which had been given him. The Emperor embraces it with much eagerness, and handled the matter prudently. For, without discovering his design, he ask'd [the Chiefs of the Hereticks] this one question, Whether they had any respect for, and admitted of those Doctors of the Church [who lived] before [the rise of] the dissention? Upon their non-refusal of them, and their affirming that they highly revered and honour'd them as being their Masters; the Emperor enquired of them again, whether they would *acquiesce in them as witnesses of the Christian Religion worthy be credited? When the Chiefs of the Sects and their Logicians (for they had amongst them many persons well-provided for the combat of dispute;) heard this, they knew not what to do. For every one of them fell into a disagreement of opinion; some affirming that the Emperor's Proposal was good; others [thinking] it not conducive to their design: For some were one way affected towards the Books of the Ancients, others another. Nor could they any longer agree amongst themselves; and they dissented not only from other Sects, but those of the same Sect differ'd one from the other. Concordant malice therefore, like the tongue of those ancient Giants, was divided, and their Tower of mischief demolish'd. After the Emperor perceived their confused † Dissention, and [was sensible] that they confided in dispute only, and not in the exposition of the Ancients, he betook himself to a second project: And orders every Sect to (d) set forth [and deliver in] to him in writing a draught of that Creed which they own'd. Then those [of every Sect] amongst them that were skilfullest and most eloquent, wrote their own opinion, making use of a great deal of caution and circumspection in their expressions. A day also was pitcht upon, whereon the Bishops of each Sect upon summons met at the Palace. At which time were present Nectarius and Agelius, Prelates of the Homoöusian Creed; of the Arians, Demophilus; of the (e) Eunomians, Eunomius himself; of those that embraced Macedonius's opinion, Eleusius [Bishop] of Cyzicum.

Gratianus, Valen. Jun. Theodosius.

† Or, Dispersion.

(d) Instead of [γνωείζειν ἕκαστον αὐτῷ, to make known their Draught of the Creed] I had rather read, as Nicephorus does, [γνωείζειν ἕκαστον αὐτῷ, to set forth [and deliver in] to him in writing, a Draught,] &c. Vales.

(e) This Draught of the Creed, which Eunomius then presented to the Emperor Theodosius, I have by me in Manuscript; for which I am obliged to the most Famous and Learned Emericus Bigotius. In the Bavarian Manuscript, and in Livineius's Copy, this Draught of the Creed was placed at the latter end of Gregorius Nyssenus's Books against Eunomius, as Gretser attests. But, in the Florentine Copy, from which Bigotius transcribed this Creed, it was placed before those Books. Nor will it be unuseful, to insert it here. For, though it contains Eunomius's whole Impiety; yet some things occur in it, in no wise despicable.

EUNOMIUS's CREED.

Τῷ Θεῷ καὶ Σωτῆρι ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστῷ, &c. Whereas God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, according to a most just sentence, has said, that he will confess before God and the Father, those which should confess Him before men, and that he will deny such as should deny Him; and whereas the Apostolick Doctrine does exhort us, to be always ready to [give] an account to every one that asketh it: Whereas [lastly,] the Imperial commands do require this Confession; with all readiness We confess what our Sentiments are, and that We Believe in one only true God, according to his own Doctrine, not honouring Him with a false voice. For He cannot lye: But is by nature and Glory truly one God; without beginning, always, and eternally alone. Not parted or divided into many as to his Substance, according to which he is one: nor existing sometimes one, at others another; nor receding from what he is: nor formed from one Substance into three Persons. For he is altogether and wholly one, continuing always alone in one and the same manner. Having no companion of his Divinity, no partaker of his Glory, no Consort of his power, no Assessor of his Kingdom. For he is one and the only Omnipotent God, God of Gods, King of Kings, and Lord of Lords. The Highest over all the earth, the Highest in the heavens, the Highest in the Highest, the Heavenly things; true in being what he is, and always continuing so. True in his Works, true in his Words. The beginning of all Subjection, Power, Empire. Above Conversion, and free from change, as being incorrupt. Not dividing his own Substance in begetting, nor being the same begetting and begotten, or existing the same Father and Son. For he is incorrupt. In working in no wise wanting matter, or members, or natural instruments. For he stands in need of nothing. WE BELIEVE also in the Son of God, the only Begotten God, the First begotten of every Creature, Christ the true God, not unbegotten: not (before he was,) named the Son without Generation, begotten before every Creature. Not uncreated. The Beginning of the Ways of God [in order to his] Works, and being the Word in the beginning; not without a beginning. The living Wisdom, the operating Truth, the subsisting Power, the begotten Life; as being the Son of God giving Life to the living; and restoring Life to the dead: the true Light enlightning every Man that cometh into the World: Good, and the Minister of Good things; in regard he is begotten of the Goodness and Power of the Father: who hath not divided with him that has imparted the Dignity, nor with any other, his Fathers Substance, or Kingdom. But by Generation is made Glorious, and the Lord of Glory. Who has received Glory from the Father, but has not partaken of the Father's Glory. For, the Glory of the Almighty is incommunicable, as he himself has said, I will not give my Glory to another. Who has been glorified by the Father before ages. Who has been glorified by the Father through ages, and throughout the whole rational and created Substance. Whom the whole celestial Milice doth guard. For he is the Lord and King of Glory, as being the Son of God and God; the Framer of things immortal and mortal, the Framer of spirits and of all flesh. For all things were made by him, and without him nothing was made, The King and Lord of all Life and breath of those [Creatures] that were made by him. For all things were delivered unto him by the Father, according to his holy expression, and the Father hath hath given all things into his hand. Obedient to the framing and creating of the things which are. Obedient to every Adminiſtration. Not receiving his being the Son, or God, from his obedience: but in that he is the Son, and is the only begotten, he is made God. Obedient in Works. Obedient in Words. The Mediator in Sentences [or Decrees]. The Mediator in Laws. Him we acknowledge to be the Son of God, and the only begotten God. Him alone [we acknowledge to be] like to him that begat him upon account of an eminent ſimilitude and a peculiar conception [or ſignification.] Not as the Father [is] to the Father. For there are not two Fathers. Nor as the Son [is] to the Son, there being not two Sons. Nor as the Unbegotten to the Unbegotten. For there is one only Unbegotten, [to wit] the Omnipotent; and one only begotten Son. But [he is like] as the Son to the Father: In regard he is the Image and Seal of every Operation and Power of the Almighty: the Seal of all the Works, Words, and Councels of the Father. Him we acknowledge to be one of thoſe who covered the earth with [a deluge of] waters. Who burnt the Sodomites with fire. Who inflicted puniſhment on the Egyptians. Who made Laws according to the Commandment of the Eternal God. Who in the times of the Prophets converſt with the Ancients. Who called thoſe that refuſed to obey. Who has received all power of Judging. For the Father judgeth no Man; but hath given all judgment to the Son. Who in the laſt days was made fleſh: made of a woman. Made Man in order to the deliverance and Salvation of us Men. Who aſſumed Man [or Humanity] conſiſting of a Soul and Body. Who by his tongue and mouth Preached peace to thoſe that were near and ſuch as were remote. Who was made obedient unto the Croſs and unto death. And who ſaw not corruption, but roſe again the third day. And after his Reſurrection he compendiouſly expounded the myſtery to his [Diſciples.] He ſits on the right hand of the Father: and ſhall come to judge the quick and dead. After this [Perſon,] We Believe in the Paraclete, the Spirit of Truth. The Teacher of Piety. Made by the Only begotten, to whom he was once ſubject. Who is not to be reckoned after the Father, nor together with the Father. For there is one only Father, who is God over all. Nor is he to be equalled with the Son. For he is the Only begotten, and has no Brother begotten at the ſame time with him. Nor yet is he to be compared with any other thing. For he has tranſcended all other things that have been made by the Son, in Generation, Nature, Glory, and Knowledge In regard he is the firſt and beſt, the greateſt and moſt beautiful work of the Only begotten. Who alſo himſelf being one, and the firſt, and the Only, and the moſt eminent of all the Sons compoſures, by reaſon of his ſubſtance and natural Dignity; does perfect every Operation and Doctrine according to the Sons arbitrement by whom he is ſent, and of whom he receives. And he makes a relation to thoſe that are inſtructed; teaching the Truth; ſanctifying the Saints; leading them who come to the Sacrament: diviſing to the Spirit all his free gifts, who gives grace. And he co-operates with the faithful, in order to their underſtanding and contemplation of the things commanded. Who groans with them that pray: is the Guide to what is profitable: gives ſtrength in order to Piety: enlightens ſouls with the light of knowledge: purges the thoughts: chaſes away devils: cures the ſick: heals the diſeaſed: brings back the wanderers [into the way:] comforts the afflicted: erects thoſe that ſtumble and fall: refreſhes thoſe that labour: encourages with ſhouts thoſe that ſtrive: emboldens thoſe that are fearful: is the Guardian and Overſeer of all men: takes all imaginable care, and makes proviſion for the promotion [or acceſs] of the well-minded, and for the preſervation of the more faithful. Further, We Believe in that Reſurrection which ſhall be [effected] by our Saviour; [to wit] of thoſe very Bodies which have been diſſolved, together with their proper members and particles: when nothing ſhall be wanting or changed, of thoſe things which compoſed every mans body in this preſent life. Moreover, [We Believe] the Judgment which ſhall be after this, of thoſe things which have been ill thought or acted; and likewiſe of all the works, words, actions, practiſes, conceptions of the mind, and thoughts which have hapned in this preſent life: ſo that nothing at all, whether of the greateſt matters, or of the leaſt ſhall be concealed: nothing of thoſe things, which have been legally done, or unjuſtly perpetrated, ſhall be neglected or overlookt; but a proportionate and juſt ſentence ſhall be given [or meaſured out.] And thoſe that have continued impious and ſinners to the end [of their lives,] ſhall be ſent away to an endleſs puniſhment. But ſuch as have led Holy and Righteous lives, ſhall be taken up to an eternal life. Theſe are our Sentiments, which we have learned from the Saints, and thus we think and believe. We have omitted nothing of what we have learned, on account of ſhame, or out of fear. Nor have we by reaſon of turpitude or contentiouſneſs made any additions thereto, or perverted any thing therein. Neither are we conſcious to our ſelves of any ſuch falſity or deteſtable impiety as is framed againſt us by thoſe Sycophants, or ſlanderers; Whoſe damnation is juſt.

That this is the Confeſſion of Faith, which was delivered by Eunomius to Theodoſius, in the month June, on the ſecond Conſulate of Merobaudes which he bore with Saturninus; is evident from theſe words which occur at the beginning of this confeſſion; to wit, καὶ τῆς βασιλικῆν προσταγμάτων ταυτὴν ἐπιζητούντων τὴν ὁμολογίαν, and whereas the Imperial Commands do require this Confeſſion. Valeſ.

The Emperor gave them a very kind reception at their meeting: and having received a Draught of the Creed in writing from every one of them, retired into a private apartment alone, where he pray'd with much fervency, that God would give him his aſſiſtance, in order to an Election of the Truth. And having read over every one of the written Draughts of the Creed, he tore all the reſt, (diſapproving of them, in regard they introduced a ſeparation of the Trinity) except the Homoöuſian Creed only, which he commended and embraced. This was the reaſon of the Novatians flouriſhing again, [and of their being permitted] to celebrate their ſacred Aſſemblies within the Cities. For the Emperor admiring their conſent as to the Faith, (f) with thoſe of his own opinion, gave command by [the promulgation of] a Law, that they ſhould ſecurely enjoy their own Oratories; and that their Churches ſhould have the ſame priviledges with (g) thoſe [Churches] of his own Faith. But, the Prelates of the other Sects, by reaſon of their diſagreement amongſt themſelves, were condemn'd and deſpis'd even by their own Diſciples. And being reduced to a deſperation, and overwhelmed with grief, they made their departure: and wrote Conſolatory Letters to thoſe of their own party, perſwading them not to be troubled, becauſe many relinquiſhed them, and became Adherents to the Homoöuſian Creed. For many [they ſaid] were called, but few choſen. Which expreſſion they in no wiſe made uſe of, at ſuch time as the greateſt part of the people * through force and fear became their favourers. But neither were the Profeſſors of the Homoöuſian Creed perfectly free from trouble and diſquietude. For the affairs of the Antiochian Church cauſed a diviſion amongſt thoſe that were preſent at the Synod. For, the Egyptians, Arabians, and Cypriots † gathering together again, ſaid that Flavianus ought to be expelled out of Antioch. But [the Biſhops] of Palæſtine, Phœnice, and Syria ſtood up in defence of Flavianus. What concluſion this affair had, I will declare in its due place.

(f) Inſtead of [περὶ τὰς οἰκείας, about thoſe of his own opinion,] it muſt be thus mended [περὶ τοὺς οἰκείους, with, or to thoſe of his own opinion.] The ſame error occurs before in this Chapter; where he ſays, ἄλλοι γὰρ ἄλλως εἶχον περὶ τὰ βιβλία τῶν παλαιῶν; which we have corrected by rendring it thus: For ſome were one way affected towards the Books of the Ancients, others another. Valeſ.

(g) I read [ἅπερ καὶ οἱ [not οἱ] τῆς αὐτῆς πίστεως ἔχουσι, with thoſe [Churches] of his own Faith. For the word ἐκκλησίαις, Churches, is underſtood. The priviledges of Churches are, a priviledge of ſanctuary, a priviledge of receiving Embaſſies, and the like. Valeſ.

* Ἐξουσιάσας perhaps he means the Imperial power; for Conſtantius and Valens were great favourers of theſe Sects.

Concerning Maximus the Tyrant, how he ſlew Gratianus by treachery: At which time alſo Juſtina, the Mother of Valentinianus Junior, deſiſted, though unwillingly, from her Deſign againſt Ambroſius Biſhop of Millain, for fear of Maximus.

ABout the ſame times wherein theſe Synods were held at Conſtantinople, theſe tranſactions hapned in the Weſtern parts. (a) Maximus [coming] out of the Iſland Britannia, invaded the Roman Empire, and makes a treacherous attempt upon Gratianus then engaged in a War againſt the Alamanni. In Italy, during Valentinianus's minority, Probus, a perſon that had been Conſul, had the chief management of affairs, who at that time bore the Præfecture of the Prætorium.

(a) Muſculus and Chriſtophorſon ſeem to have thought (as by their Verſions appears) that this Man was born in Brittain; which (though perhaps true, yet) cannot be made out from this paſſage in our Socrates. Zoſimus (Hiſtor. Book 4.) ſays this Maximus was a Spaniard. Our Country-man Guildas calls him Germen Plantationis Britannicæ, a branch of the Britannick Plantation. Camden mentions him in his Britannia (pag. 240, 241, Edit Lond. 1607.) where he quotes ſome Verſes out of Auſonius; in which he terms him Rhutupinus Latro, the Richborow-Thief.

Gratianus Valen. Jun. Theodosius.

Justina (Mother to Valentinianus Augustus,) a Woman that was a Arian, during her Husband's life, had no power to be mischievous towards the Embracers of the Homoöusian Creed. But after [her Husband's death,] when her Son was very young, she went to Millain, and raised great disturbances against Ambrosius the Bishop, issuing out an Order that he should be banish'd. And whilst the People made a resistance [against this Order,] out of their excessive love to Ambrosius, and opposed those that endeavour'd to hale him away into Exile; in that interim news came, that Gratianus was treacherously slain by the Tyrant Maximus. For Andragathius Maximus's Lieutenant (being hid in a Carriage put into the form of a woman's Horse-litter, and carried by Mules; and having given the Guards a Command, that they should before-hand spread abroad a report, that the Emperor Gratianus's Wife was in that Litter;) meets the Emperor before Lyons, a City in France, passing the River. The Emperor supposing it to be his Wife, was not aware of the Treachery: but, as a blind man does into a Ditch, fell into the hands of his Enemy. For Andragathius leapt out of the Litter on a sudden, and slew Gratianus. Gratianus therefore ended his life in the Consulate of * Merobaudes and Saturninus, after he had reigned fifteen years, and lived twenty four. This accident cool'd the Emperor's Mothers heat against Ambrosius. Moreover, Valentinianus, though against his will, complied with the necessity of that juncture, and admitted Maximus to be his Colleague in the Empire. At which time Probus, afraid of Maximus's power, resolves upon a retreat into those parts of the Empire nearer to the East. Immediately therefore he departs out of Italy; and arriving in Illyricum, he fix'd his residence (b) in Thessalonica [a City] of Macedonia.

* Or, Merogaudus.

(b) I will here propose my doubt to the Reader. I am of opinion therefore, that Thessalonica, which was the chief City of Macedonia, was under Theodosius's Empire. My reasons are; (1.) because Theodosius, after he had been Proclaimed Augustus by Gratianus at Sirmium, went to Thessalonica, resided there a long while, and receiv'd the Embassies of the Cities of the East; and when he fell sick, he was baptized by Acholius Bishop of that City, as Zosimus, Prosper, Socrates, and others do relate. (2.) During his Residence in that City, he published many Laws, which are extant in the Theodosian Code, in the Titles de fide Catholica, and de Hæreticis; which Laws are dated at Thessalonica. (3.) Lastly, in the Constantinopolitan Synod, at which 'tis manifest the Eastern Bishops only were present, Acholius Bishop of Thessalonica is reckoned, as may be seen in the eighth Chapter of this Book. After Theodosius's times, there is no doubt but Thessalonica was under the Eastern Emperors. For 'twas the chief City of the Oriental Illyricum, which contained Macedonia and Dacia, as we are informed from The Notitia of the Roman Empire. But, whether or no it was under the Eastern Emperors, about the beginning of Theodosius's Reign; may deservedly be doubted. For Aurelius Victor, and Zonaras do expressly affirm, that Gratianus gave Theodosius only the East and the Thracia's. And Zosimus relates, that Valentinianus Junior (upon his division of the Empire with his Brother,) had Italy, Africk, and Illyricum. Neither had Constantius, or Valens (who governed the Eastern Empire before Theodosius) Illyricum under their Dominion. In the times of Valens, 'tis certain, Mamertinus Præfect of the Prætorium, governed Italy, Africa, and Illyricum at the same time; as Amm. Marcellinus attests. Notwithstanding, Valens (after his Brother Valentinianus's death) seems to have annext Macedonia and Dacia to his own Empire, by the consent of his Brother's Sons. Which Collection I make from the close of Amm. Marcellinus's thirty first Book; where he says, that Valens's Soldiers and Palatines, who had been besieged by the Goths at Adrianople, went out after that Siege was broken up, and hastned some into Dacia, others into Macedonia, supposing that Valens had retired thither. See Amm. Marcellinus, pag. 468. Edit. Par. 1636. Vales.

CHAP. XII.

Valen. Jun. Theodosius.

That the Emperor Theodosius having provided a numerous Army against Maximus, (at which time Flaccilla bare him his Son Honorius;) left Arcadius at Constantinople; but went himself to Millain, where he came to an Engagement with the Tyrant.

But the Emperor Theodosius was extreamly full of care and sollicitude, and formed a very powerful Army against the Tyrant; being afraid lest he should treacherously murder Valentinianus Junior also. At the same time arrived Embassadors from the Persians, requesting Peace of the Emperor. Moreover, then also a Son was born to the Emperor, named Honorius, of whom his Wife Flaccilla was deliver'd, in the Consulate of * Richomeres and Clearchus, on the ninth of September. In the same Consulate died Agelius Bishop of the Novatians, a little before [Honorius's birth.] On the year following, whereon Arcadius Augustus bore his first Consulate with Bauton, Timotheus Bishop of Alexandria ended his life, who was succeeded in that See by Theophilus. A year after this, Demophilus Bishop of the Arian Heresie, concluded his life. The Arians sent for one Marinus, a Bishop of their own Heresie, out of Thracia, whom they intrusted with the Bishoprick. But Marinus sat [Bishop] not long. For under him the Arian Sect was divided into two Parties, as we shall declare hereafter. Wherefore they sent for Dorotheus out of Antioch in Syria, and constituted him their Bishop. In the interim, the Emperor proceeded to a War against Maximus, and left his Son Arcadius Augustus at Constantinople. Arriving at Thessalonica, he finds (a) Valentinianus and those about him in great sadness and anxiety, because out of necessity they had admitted the Tyrant to be Emperor, as it were. But Theodosius, in outward appearance, gave no indication of his mind [in favour of either side.] For he neither (b) rejected, nor admitted Maximus's Embassy. But he could not endure the sight of a Tyrannical Government over the Romans, cover'd with the specious pretence of an Imperial name. Having therefore muster'd his Military Forces, he marcht to (c) Millain. For thither Maximus was already come.

* Or, Richomelius.

(a) The Phrase is, τὸς περὶ Βαλεντινιανόν· which Christophorson renders ill, thus, Valentinian's Soldiers. For Socrates means Valentinian himself, who was on this year (when Valentinian himself was the third time Consul, with Eutropius,) conquer'd by Maximus, (as Sulpitius informs us, in his first Book concerning the Life of Martinus) and together with his Mother Justina, his Præfects and Comites, fled to Thessalonica. Vales.

(b) But Zosimus says, that Maximus's Embassy was received by Theodosius, and that he acknowledged him to be Emperor and admitted of his Statues; and ordered Cynegius Præfect of the Prætorium in the East, that Maximus's Statues should be proposed to publick view at Alexandria, and that he should declare to the people that Maximus was Colleague of his Empire. Which thing Sigonius (in his Book de Occidentali Imperio) has done ill to place on the year of Christ 384, when Richomeres and Clearchus were Consuls; in regard it was done in Valentinianus's third Consulate, which he bore with Eutropius, on the year of Christ 387. For, on this year Cynegius was Præfect of the Prætorium. Vales.

(c) He should rather have said Aquileia: For thither Maximus went, as Zozimus and the other Chronologers do inform us. Vales.

Concerning the Disturbance raised at Constantinople by the Arians.

About the same time that the Emperor was busied in the War, the Arians in Constantinople raised a disturbance, by this Artifice. 'Tis usual uſual with * Men to frame ſtories of things they are ignorant of. And if at any time they have gotten an occaſion, they ſpread greater Rumours concerning the things they have a mind to, being always extreamly deſirous of Changes and Alterations. This was the caſe of Conſtantinople at that time. For ſome framed and divulged one thing concerning the War which was waged at that great diſtance, others another; always preſuming upon the worſt event of affairs. And when nothing of action had happened in the War, as if themſelves had been Spectators upon the very Spot, they diſcourſed concerning things which they knew not: [to wit,] that the Tyrant had gotten a Victory over the Emperor's Army, That thus many were ſlain on this ſide, and ſo many on that; and that the Emperor was juſt upon falling into the Tyrant's hands. Then the Arians, at that time highly incenſed, (for they were ſorely vex'd becauſe thoſe that had been perſecuted by them heretofore, were now in poſſeſſion of the Churches within the City:) began to enlarge the Reports. But afterwards, ſome of the ſtories that were told, induced even the Coyners themſelves of theſe falſe rumours to believe, that the reports they had framed and divulged, were not feign'd but undoubtedly true. For, ſuch perſons as had taken them up upon hear-ſay, affirmed to the Authors of theſe Lies, that the account of Affairs was exactly agreeable to what they had heard from themſelves. Whereupon, the Arians became embolden'd, brake out into an irrational violence; threw fire into the Palace of Nectarius the Biſhop, and burnt it. This was done in Theodoſius's ſecond Conſulate, [which he bore] with Cynegius.

CHAP. XIV.

Concerning the Emperor Theodoſius's Victory, and the Tyrant's Overthrow.

But whilſt the Emperor was upon his march towards the Tyrant, the Forces under Maximus's Command, inform'd of the great military preparations, could not ſo much as reſiſt an aſſault of the fame thereof; but, being put into a conſternation, bound the Tyrant, and deliver'd him to the Emperor. He was ſlain in the ſame Conſulate, on the (a) twenty ſeventh of Auguſt. But Andragathius (he that ſlew Gratianus with his own hand,) after he underſtood that Maximus was routed, caſt himſelf into the adjacent River, and was drowned. Then, both the Victorious Emperors made their Entry into Rome. Honorius, Theodoſius's Son, a Child very young, was with them. For after Maximus was vanquiſhed, his Father ſent for him from Conſtantinople. They continued therefore at Rome, celebrating their triumphal Feſtivals. At which time Theodoſius the Emperor ſhewed a ſignal inſtance of his Goodneſs and Clemency, towards (b) Symmachus, a perſon that had been Conſul. For, this Symmachus was the eminenteſt perſon of the Senate at Rome, and was admired for his great skill in the Roman Literature. There are now extant many Orations of his written in the Latin tongue. But, in regard he had compoſed an Oration in praiſe of Maximus whilſt he was alive, and had ſpoken it to him in publick, he was afterwards charg'd with the crime of High-treaſon. Upon this account he was afraid of a capital puniſhment, and took ſanctuary in the Church. But the Emperor had ſo great a reverence for the Chriſtian Religion, that he not only highly honour'd the Prelates of his own Faith; but gave gracious reception to the Novatians alſo, who embraced the Homoöuſian Creed. Therefore, that he might gratifie Leontius Biſhop of the Novatian Church at Rome, he pardon'd Symmachus's crime. Symmachus having his pardon granted him, wrote an Apologetick to the Emperor Theodoſius. Thus this War, which at the beginning ſeemed to threaten [the Empire] with great calamity, was terminated by this ſudden concluſion.

(a) Socrates is miſtaken. For Maximus was ſlain, not on the 27*th* of Auguſt, but on the 28th of July, as Idatius ſays in his Chronicon. The ſame is recorded in thoſe Faſti, which Jacobus Sirmondus has publiſhed under Idatius's name. For, theſe are the words there: Theodoſio Aug. II. & Cynegio Coſſ. &c. In the ſecond Conſulate of Theodoſius Auguſtus [which he bore] with Cynegius, on that year, Maximus the Tyrant, that publick Enemy, is ſlain by Theodoſius Auguſtus, three Miles from Aquileia, on the fifth of the Calends of Auguſt [that is, on the 28th of July] Alſo, his Son Victor is ſlain a few days after, in the Gallia's, by Theodoſius's Comes. Further, this Victor had been created firſt Cæſar, and then Auguſtus, by his Father; as we are informed from this Old Inſcription recorded by Sigonius, in his 9th Book, de Occidentali Imperio: DD. NN. MAG. CL. MAXIMO, ET FL. VICTORI PIIS FELICIBUS SEMPER AUGUSTIS BONO R. P. NATIS. Where you ſee Maximus has two Prænomina, to wit, Magnus Clemens. Sulpitius Severus (Book 2. Hiſtor. Sacr.) calls him Clemens Maximus. But, by Oroſius he is termed Magnus Maximus. Valeſ.

(b) Here is a miſtake, either of Socrates, or of his tranſcribers; in calling Symmachus ὑπατικὸν, a perſon that had born the Conſulate. For Symmachus whoſe Epiſtles are extant at this day, had not at that time been Conſul; but three years after he bore a Conſulate with Tatianus. Valeſ.

Concerning Flavianus of Antioch.

At the ſame time theſe affairs were tranſacted (a) at Antioch in Syria. After the death of Paulinus, the people who had been his Followers, had an averſion for Flavianus. Upon which account they caus'd Evagrius to be ordained Biſhop of their own party. He having not long ſurvived his Ordination, no other perſon was afterwards conſtituted in his place; which was effected by the diligence and endeavours of Flavianus. Notwithſtanding, thoſe that had an averſion for Flavianus, in regard he had violated his * Oath, kept their aſſemblies apart by themſelves. But Flavianus left no ſtone unturned, (as the ſaying is,) that he might bring theſe perſons alſo to own a ſubjection to him. Which he effected ſoon after, [to wit,] when he had appeaſed the anger of Theophilus then Biſhop of Alexandria, by whoſe interceſſion Flavianus procured a reconciliation alſo with Damaſus Biſhop of Rome. For both theſe Prelates had been incenſed againſt Flavianus, not only on account of his perjury, but alſo in regard he had given an occaſion of a ſeparation, amongſt that people who had been brought to an † agreement. Theophilus therefore being pacified, ſent Iſidorus a Presbyter, and reconciled Damaſus, as yet offended; telling him, 'twas very conducive for the effecting an union amongſt the people, to paſs by the fault which Flavianus had committed. Communion being after this manner reſtored to Flavianus; the people of Antioch were within a ſmall ſpace of time reduced to a reconciliation. Such was the concluſion of this affair at Antioch. For the Arians in that City were ejected out of the Churches, and had their meetings in the Suburbs thereof. Moreover, in this interim died Cyrillus Biſhop of Jeruſalem, who was ſucceeded by Johannes.

CHAP. XVI.

Concerning the demolishment of the Idol-Temples at Alexandria ; and concerning the Fight betwixt the Pagans and Christians, which hapned on that account.

AT the very same time, this disturbance also hapned at Alexandria. By the solicitation of Theophilus the Bishop, the Emperor issued forth an Order, for the demolishment of the Heathen-Temples at Alexandria ; and gave command, that this Order should be put in execution by Theophilus's care. Theophilus being thus empower'd, us'd his utmost endeavours in order to the exposing the Heathen Mysteries to ignominy and contempt. He cleansed Mithra's Temple, and destroy'd that belonging to Serapis. He also exposed to publick view the bloody Mysteries of the * Mithreum. And shew'd how full of ridiculousness the Mysteries of Serapis and of the other Gods were ; ordering that the † Priapus's should be carryed thro' the midst of the Forum. The Heathens at Alexandria, more especially those that profest Philosophy, upon sight of the doing hereof, were unable to repress their discontent ; but made an addition to the * former tragic actions which they had perpetrated. For, upon a sign given which they had agreed on before-hand, they made an unanimous assault upon the Christians, and murther'd every one they met : Moreover, the Christians defended themselves ; and thus mischief was attended with mischief. This fight was continued so long, till a satiety of slaughter put an end to it. Few of the Heathens were destroy'd in this conflict ; but of the Christians [there fell] a great many. The wounded on both sides were innumerable. After the perpetration of this action, a fear seiz'd the Heathens, who dreaded the Emperor's anger. Wherefore, having done what they pleased, and satiated their minds with slaughters, they absconded, some in one place, others in another. Moreover, many of them fled from Alexandria, and dispers'd themselves into several Cities. Amongst which number were the two Grammarians, (a) Helladius and Ammonius ; whose Scholar I was at Constantinople, when very young. Helladius was stiled Jupiter's Priest ; Ammonius was † Simius's. This mischief being thus composed, the (b) Præfect of Alexandria, and the Commander in chief of the Milice in Egypt, assisted Theophilus in demolishing the Heathen Temples.

* That is, Mithra's Temple : what these Mysteries were, Socrates has told us, Book 3. chap. 2.

† Πιθήκου ; that is, The Ape's Priest. For the Egyptians worship an Ape, as Lucian tells us, in his piece, περὶ θυσιῶν.

(b) Sozomen (Book 7. chap. 15.) calls this Præfects name Evagrius ; and the Commander in chief of the Milice in Egypt, he names Romanus. Eunapius likewise (in the Life of Ædesius,) names both these persons ; and attests, that they gave a great assistance to Theophilus Bishop of Alexandria, in destroying the Temple of Serapis. I will insert Eunapius's own Words here, because they want correcting ; (See Eunap. in vita Ædesii, pag. 63. Edit. Colon. Allobrog. 1616 :) Καὶ τὰ περὶ τὸν Κανώβου ἱερὸν ταὐτὸ τοῦτο ἔπασχον, Θεοδοσίου μὲν τότε Βασιλεύοντος, Θεοφίλου δὲ περισατοῦντος τῶν ἐναγῶν ἀνθρώπων· τίνος εὐρομέδοντος ; ἐς τοῦθ' ὑπερθύμοισι γιγάντεσσιν βασίλευεν· Ἐυετίου δὲ τῆς πολιτικῆς ἄρχοντος· Ρωμανοῦ δὲ τὰς κατ' Αἴγυπτον στρατιώτας πεπιστευκότος ; That is, the Temples about the City Canobus underwent the same thing, Theodosius being at that time Emperor, and Theophilus Presiding over those execrable Persons ; he was a certain Eurymidon, that reigned over the haughty Gyants : Evetius being then Governour of the Civil affairs, and Romanus intrusted with the Command of the Milice throughout Egypt. On my peril, correct it thus : Εὐαγρίου δὲ τῆς πολιτικῆν ἀρχὴν ἀρχοντος, Evagrius being then Governour of the Civil affairs. In the Theodosian Code, (title, De Paganis,) there is a Law extant of Theodosius's, directed to this Evagrius Præfect of Egypt, and to Romanus Comes of the Milice throughout Egypt ; which Law was dated at Aquileia, in the Consulate of Tatianus and Symmachus. From which Law it may be concluded, that Serapis's Temple was demolished at Alexandria, in the year of Christ 391. But Marcellinus, in his Chronicon, contradicts this ; and says, this Temple was destroyed when Timasius and Promotus were Consuls ; which was the year of Christ 389. And this, in my judgment, is the truer. For Cynegius Præfect of the Prætorium, at his being sent into Egypt, had a command from Theodosius, that he should pull down the Heathen-Temples ; as Zosimus relates in his first Book. And he had executed that command, as Idatius attests in his Fasti. Now, Cynegius died in his own Consulate, on the year of Christ 388. Vales.

The Temples therefore were ruin'd, but the Images of their Gods were molten into Caldrons, and into other utensils necessary for the Alexandrian Church ; the Emperor having given [the Images of] the Heathen-Gods [to that Church,] for the relief of the Poor. Wherefore Theophilus brake in pieces all [the Images of] the Gods, save one, to wit, the Image of the fore-mention'd God, which he order'd to be preserv'd unmelted, and caused it to be set up in a publick place ; lest (said he) the Heathens should in Ages to come deny, that they had been Worshippers of such Gods. At which action [of Theophilus's,] Ammonius the Grammarian was, to my knowledge, highly disgusted : for he was wont to say, that the Religion of the Gentiles had suffer'd most horrid abuses, (c) because but one Image only was not melted down ; but was preserv'd meerly to render Gentilism ridiculous. But Helladius made his boasts in some persons hearing, that in the Conflict he had slain nine men with his own hand. Such were the doings in Alexandria at that time.

(c) Instead of [ἵνα μὴ ᾖ] it should be [ὅτι μὴ ᾖ, because but, &c.] Socrates means the Image of their God Simius, which Theophilus had ordered to be reserved on purpose. And thus Epiphan. Scholasticus has explained this place in Socrates, much better than Christophorson ; who understood those Words of Socrates [τῷδε τῷ Θεῷ] as spoken concerning a certain (or rather uncertain) God. Vales.

CHAP. XVII.

Concerning the Hieroglyphical Letters found in the Temple of Serapis.

[MOreover,] at such time as Serapis's Temple was rifled and demolish'd, there were Letters found [in it,] ingraven on stones ; (a) which [Letters] they call Hieroglyphical. These characters had the forms and resemblances of Crosses. When the Christians and Heathens saw these characters, each party * adapted them to their own Religion. For the Christians, who affirm that the Cross is the sign of Christ's salutary Passion, thought this Character was properly and peculiarly theirs. The Heathens alledg'd it was some thing [that belonged in] common both to Christ, and to Serapis ; for, a Character [said they] made in form of a Cross, betokens one thing amongst the Christians, another amongst the Heathens. [Letters] they call Hieroglyphical :] so Epiphanius Scholasticus seems to have read. Indeed, Socrates and Sozomen do relate, that these Hieroglyphical Letters were found in the Temple of Serapis, cut upon the Walls thereof. But Rufinus does not say they were found there : He tells us rather, that they were kept and expounded at Canopus. At his second Book, Eccles. Hist. chap. 26 ; these are his Words : Jam vero Canopi quis enumeret superstitiosa flagitia ! &c. But now, who can enumerate the superstitious impieties at Canopus ? Where, under a pretext of their sacerdotal Letters, (for so they call the ancient Letters of the Egyptians ;) there was in a manner a publick School of Magick Art. Vales.

* Fitted, or applied.

(a) Instead of [τὰ καλούμενα ἱερογλυφικὰ, called an Hieroglyphick ;] it ought rather to be thus written [τὰ καλούμενα ἱερογλυφικά, which

Valen. Jun. Theodoſius.

While ſt theſe things were controverted amongſt them, ſome of the Heathens (who were converted to the Chriſtian Religion,) having Skill in theſe Hieroglyphical Letters, gave an interpretation of the Character made in form of a Croſs, and ſaid it ſignified Life to come. This the Chriſtians took hold of with much earneſtneſs, as being more advantageous to their Religion in particular; and were not a little proud of it. (b) But after it had been manifeſted by other Hieroglyphical Letters, that Serapis's Temple would have an end, when a Character in form of a Croſs ſhould appear; (for thereby was ſignified Life to come:) then many more came over to the Chriſtian Religion, and after a Confeſſion of their ſins were baptized. This is a relation of what hapned upon account of the Character [that was diſcovered,] made in form of a Croſs; which relation I had from report. But, I am not of opinion, that the Egyptian Prieſts foreknew what ſhould happen to Chriſt, and therefore cauſed the figure of a Croſs to be ingraven on ſtones. For, if the Myſtery of [our Saviour's] coming into the world were hid from Ages, and from Generations, as the Apoſtle * ſays; and if the Devil himſelf, the Prince of wickedneſs, knew nothing of it; 'twas much more unknown to his Miniſters, to wit, the Egyptian Prieſts. But Divine Providence deſign'd the ſame thing ſhould happen at the enquiry made into this Character, which he had heretofore demonſtrated in the Apoſtle Paul's [Preaching.] For he, inſpired with wiſdom by the divine Spirit, made uſe of the ſame method towards the Athenians, and brought many of them over to the Faith [of Chriſt;] at ſuch time as he read the * Inſcription upon [one of their] Altars, and adapted it to his own diſcourſe. Unleſs any one ſhould perhaps ſay, that the word of God had the ſame operation upon the Egyptian Prieſts, that it had on Balaam and Caiaphas. For thoſe † two perſons (tho' they did it contrary to their will and knowledge,) utter'd propheſies concerning good things. But, let thus much be ſaid concerning theſe things.

(b) Socrates borrow'd this out of Ruffinus's ſecond Book, Eccleſ. Hiſtor. chap. 29. He apprehended not Ruffinus's meaning. For Ruffinus ſays not, that it was predicted to the Pagans by other Sacerdotal Letters, that Serapis's Temple would then be deſtroy'd, when that ſign of the Croſs ſhould appear: he only ſays, that the Egyptians received this as a tradition from their Anceſtors, to wit, that the Temples wherein they then worſhipp'd, ſhould ſtand ſo long, till that ſign ſhould come, wherein there was Life.

But, becauſe mention is here made of Serapis's worſhip, and of the Letters found in his Temple; nothing hinders, but we may here explain, (in favour of the ſtudious) an Old Epigram concerning Serapis, which is recorded by Euſebius in his Books de Demonſtratione Evangelicâ. For it contains both the manner how this God was worſhipped by the Egyptians; and beſides, Scaliger underſtood it not, in his Animadverſions on Euſebius, Number 1730. The Epigram therefore runs thus:

Ἑπτά με φωνήεντα θεὸν μέγαν ἄφθιτον αἰνεῖ
Γράμματα, ϑ πάντων ἀκάματον πατέρα·

That is,

The ſeven Vowels do my praiſe reſound,
Who am the Great, Immortal Deity,
Th' unwearied Father of the Univerſe.

You muſt know, that the Egyptian Prieſts were wont to praiſe their God Serapis in no other manner, than by a recitation now and then of the ſeven Greek Vowels. Therefore, inſtead of Hymns and Songs, the Pipe and Harp; the ſound of the ſeven Vowels was heard in Serapis's Temple. Dionyſius Halicarnaſſenſis does atteſt this, in his Book περὶ ἑρμηνείας, in the chapter de Colliſione Vocalium. Where after he has informed us, that the Colliſion of the Vowels is not ſo much to be avoided, in regard it ſometimes produces a pleaſant noiſe; he adds theſe words: ἐν αἰγύπτῳ δὲ ϗ τὰς θεὰς ὑμνοῦσι διὰ τῶν ἑπτὰ φωνήεντων οἱ ἱερεῖς, &c. Moreover, in Egypt the Prieſts ſing praiſes to the Gods by [repeating] the ſeven Vowels, ſounding them out one after the other. And, inſtead of the Pipe and Harp, the ſound of theſe Letters is heard. Elias Vinetus (in his notes at Auſonius's eighteenth Epiſtle,) does declare that he had ſeen an old Inſcription, which was found upon a golden plate, fixt on the breaſt of a dead body. This plate contained the ſeven Greek Vowels, repeated in ſeven Verſes, in ſuch order as you may ſee there. But I doubt not but there were ſeven other Verſes on the reverſe of the ſaid plate, in the ſame order with thoſe on the foreſide. To wit, in ſuch a manner that the ſecond Verſe of the reverſe ſide began with Omicron, the fourth with Ypſilon, the ſixth with Omega. Vinetus could not explain this Riddle. In my judgment Serapis's name is denoted by theſe Letters; which God (as Heſychius atteſts) was called Ἑπταγράμματος, not only becauſe there are ſeven Letters contained in his name, but in regard he was uſually praiſed by the ſeven Vowels. Now, it was an uſage amongſt the ſuperſtitious Heathens to engrave Serapis's name upon a brazen plate, and wear it hung about their Necks in form of a Buckler. Artemidorus (Book 4.) gives us an account of this uſage, in theſe words: ἔδοξέ τις τὸ ὄνομα τῦ σεράπιδος ἐγγεγραμμένον λιθίδι καλῇ φέρειν ἐπὶ τραχήλου δεδέσθαι, ὡς περὶ σφυρίδα. Valeſ.

In what order the ſeven Greek Vowels were placed on the foreſide of this golden plate; the Learned Reader may ſee in Vinetus's Notes on the 18th Epiſtle of Auſonius, written to Tetradius; Edit. Burdigal. 1590.

CHAP. XVIII.

That the Emperor Theodoſius, during his ſtay in Rome, did a great deal of Good to that City, both by demoliſhing thoſe Receptacles for Thieves in the Bake-houſes, and alſo [by prohibiting] the obſcene [uſe] of Bells in the Stews.

MOreover, the Emperor Theodoſius, during his ſhort ſtay in Italy, was in many inſtances highly beneficial to the City of Rome, partly by his donation of ſome things, and partly by his abrogating others. For his donations were many and great: and he *regulated two villainous and moſt infamous abuſes (frequently practiſed in] that City. The one whereof was this. There were in the † great City Rome houſes of a vaſt bigneſs and largeneſs, long ſince [built,] wherein the bread was made which was diſtributed among the Citizens. The Maſters of theſe houſes (whom the Romans in their language term (a) Mancipes) in proceſs of time turn'd theſe Edifices into Receptacles for Thieves. For, in regard the Bake-houſes in theſe buildings were ſituated under ground; at the ſide of each of theſe Structures they built Victualling-houſes,

† Or, in the Greateſt Rome.

(a) Among the Romans, Bakers were called Manciper, becauſe they were [Mancipati] bound to the Colledge of Bakers, and to the Trade of making Bread; and their goods and families were obnoxious to this Function. See the eighteenth Law of the Theodoſian Code de Piſtoribus. In which Law, they are the Decuriales, (concerning whom I have made ſeveral remarks in my notes on Amm. Marcel.) who were of the Decuriæ of the City of Rome. Theſe Officers had the cuſtody of all the publick Acts and Monuments; eſpecially the ſentences of Judges, Contracts, Adoptions, and the like. On which account (as Caſſiodorus tells us, Book 5. Epiſt. 21,) the quiet and ſecurity of all men, and the publick Faith was kept in their Desks. There was over all theſe a Rector of the Decuriæ; concerning whoſe Office ſee Caſſiodorus, Book 5. Epiſt. 21, 22. But, to return to the Mancipes; it is obſervable, that in the fore-mentioned Law the Function of the Mancipes or Bakers is termed Mancipatus. So alſo it is called in that One Law in the Theodoſian Code de Mancipibus: which Law was publiſhed at Rome by Theodoſius, in the Conſulate of Timaſius and Promotus; at the ſame time that theſe things (which Socrates here relates) were done. See Meurſius's Gloſſary in the word μαγκιπεῖον. It is further to be remarkt, that thoſe Conſtitutions made at Rome by Theodoſius (which Socrates treats of in this chapter, and places after the Emperor's Victory over the Tyrant Maximus,) are by Cedrenus placed after Theodoſius's Victory over the Tyrant Eugenius. But Cedrenus's words (you will meet with this paſſage in Cedrenus, at pag. 266, Edit. Baſil.) are corrupt, which I mend thus: μετὰ δὲ τὴν νίκην τότε εἰσελωὼν ἐν ῥώμῃ, πλεῖσον τῇ πόλει ἐχαρίσατο, ϗ τὰ ἐν τοῖς μαγκιπείοις χϒ [in the fore mentioned Edition of Cedrenus the word χϒ againſt is omitted] τῶν ἐμπιπτόντων ξένων [in Cedrenus, inſtead of ξένων ſtrangers, it is ζῴων living Creatures:] ἄχει γήρως τοῖς μύλωσι συγκλειομένων, ϗ ἀλήθειν κατεπειγομένων ἐκώλυε; that is, making his Entry into Rome after his Victory over this perſon [Eugenius,] he did a great deal of good to that City, and aboliſhed what [had been uſually done] in the Bake-houſes againſt ſtrangers that fell in thither, whom they ſhut up in the Bake-houſes till they became aged, and forced them to grind. The Author of this emendation in Cedrenus, is Theophanes, who alſo relates this fact of Theodoſius's, after his Victory over Eugenius. Concerning theſe Mancipes there is an eminent paſſage extant in the Excerptions of Joannes Lydus de Menſibus Græcorum, in the month March. Valeſ.

wherein they prostituted Whores, by which device they * trepanned many persons; some going in thither to supply themselves with food, others to satisfie their libidinous and filthy desires. For, by a certain Engin [purposely made on that account] they were † conveyed from the Victualling-house down into the Bake-house. This trick was chiefly put upon strangers that sojourned at Rome. Such as were after this manner trepann'd, they forced to work in the Bake-houses. In which places many continu'd till they were grown old; being not permitted to go out, and their relations taking it for granted that they were dead. One of the Emperor Theodosius's Soldiers fell into this snare. But after the Soldier was shut up in the Bake-house, and not suffer'd to go out, he drew a Dagger that he had, and killed those that oppos'd [his escape.] The rest of them, affrighted at what had hapned, let the Soldier go out. The Emperor having had notice hereof, punish'd the Mancipes, and gave order that those houses, which were Receptacles for Thieves, should be pulled down. This was one of the ignominious practices, from which the Emperor freed the Imperial City. Another was of this sort. If a woman were taken in adultery, they punish'd the delinquent, not with such a sort of punishment as might make her better, but in such a manner rather as should aggravate her offence. For they shut her up in a narrow Brothel-house, and forced her to play the whore in a most impudent manner. And, during the time of performing that most unclean act, they caus'd little (b) Bells to be rung, to the end that what was done [within] might not be conceal'd from those who passed by; but that that ignominious punishment shou'd be made known to all people by the sound of the Bells rung. When the Emperor had information of this impudent usage, he would by no means tolerate it; but commanded those Sistra (for by that name these Stews were called,) to be pull'd down; and gave order that women taken in adultery, should be * punished by other Laws. From these two most wicked and reproachful † usages, the Emperor Theodosius freed the City [of Rome. Who, after he had well settled all other affairs, left Valentinianus Junior, Emperor at Rome. But he himself, together with his Son Honorius, returned to Constantinople, and entred that City in the Consulate of Tatianus and Symmachus, on the tenth of November.

* Intrapped.

(b) I can scarce believe, that the Romans inflicted this sort of punishment upon adultéresses. For, after Constantine's time, they always punish'd adultery with a capital punishment. We are informed hereof from the Emperor's Laws extant in Both the Codes, Tit. ad Legem Juliam de Adulteriis. I omit the testimony of Amm. Marcellinus, Book 28. Further, any one may conjecture, that those little Bells, mentioned here by Socrates, were not found out to punish adultéresses; but were commonly made use of by all Whores, who prostituting themselves in their Cells, by this sign called Travellers unto them. Concerning which custom Dio Cassius (in the Fragments of his 79th Book, which I have some time since published,) speaks these Words: ᾧ τέλος, ἐν τῷ παλατίῳ οἴκημά τι ἀποδείξας, &c. In fine, having made a Cell within the Palace, he acted his lechery therein, standing naked before the door thereof, as whores usually do, shaking his shirt which was hung up with golden rings, and with a soft, delicate, and broken voice, inviting his companions to him. Vales.

These Words Dion Cassius speaks of Avitus or Heliogabalus, Emperor of Rome; the Learned Reader will find this passage at pag. 912. Edit. Hanov. 1606.

CHAP. XIX.

Concerning the Penitentiary Presbyters, how [these Officers in the Church] were at that time put down.

ABout the same time it was judg'd requisite to extinguish [the Office of] those Presbyters in the Churches, whose charge it was to oversee Penitents: [which was done] upon this account. (a) From such time as the Novatians made a separation of themselves from the Church, because they were unwilling to communicate with those that had lapsed in the Persecution under Decius; the Bishops added a Presbyter, who was to have the charge of penitency, to the (b) Canon of the Churches; to the intent that

(a) The course of discipline in relation to penitency, as it was practised by the Fathers during the first and purest times, reformed open Transgressors, by putting them into Offices of open Penitence, especially Confession, whereby they declared their own Crimes in the hearing of the whole Church, and were not from the time of their first convention capable of the holy Mysteries of Christ, till they had solemnly discharged this Duty. During which times, offenders in secret also knowing themselves altogether as unworthy of admission to the Lord's Table, as the other who were withheld; and being perswaded, that if the Church did direct them in the Offices of their penitency, and assist them with publick Prayer, they should more easily attain what they sought, than by trusting wholly to their own endeavours: Lastly, having no impediment to stay them from it but bashfulness, which countervailed not the forementioned inducements; and besides, was greatly eased by that good Construction, which the Charity of those times gave to such Actions, (wherein Men's piety and voluntary care to be reconciled to God purchased them much more love, than their faults were able to procure disgrace;) these Offenders in secret, I say, were not nice to use some one of God's Ministers, by whom the rest might take notice of their faults, prescribe them convenient remedies, and in the end, after publick confession, all joyn in prayer to God for them. But, as professors of Christianity grew more numerous, so they waxed worse; when persecution ceased, the Church immediately became subject to those mischiefs, that are the product of Peace and Security; to wit, Schisms, Discords, Dissentions, &c. Faults were not corrected in Charity, but noted with Delight, and treasured up for malice to make use of, when the deadliest opportunities should be offered. Whereupon, in regard publick confessions became dangerous and prejudicial to the safety of well-minded Men, and in divers respects advantageous to the Enemies of God's Church; it seemed first unto some, and afterwards generally requisite, that voluntary penitents should cease from open confession. Instead whereof, private and secret confession was usually practised, as well in the Latin, as in the Greek Church. The cause why the Latins made this change of publick confession into private, Leo the Great declares, in his Decretal Epistles, Epist. 80, ad Universos Episcopos per Campaniam, &c. pag. 148, 149. Edit. Ludg. 1633. This alteration was made in the Greek Church, about such time as the Heresie of the Novatianists had its original, (which is our Socrates's Sentiment here, and is very probable;) upon this occasion. The Church resolving (contrary to the opinion of Novatus, or rather Novatianus, and his followers; concerning which, see Euseb. Eccles. History, Book 6. chap. 43.) to admit the Lapsed in the Decian persecution to Communion, and judging it fit, that before that their admission, they (and all other voluntary penitents in future) should do pennance, and make confession in private only; (to the end that the Novatianists might not take occasion at the multitude of publick Penitents, of insulting over the Discipline of the Church, as they usually had done, and did:) constituted in every Church a Penitentiary-Presbyter: whose Office it was, to take the confessions and appoint the pennances of secret Offenders. So that, if penitents in secret, being guilty of Crimes whereby they knew they had made themselves unfit Guests for the Table of our Lord, did seek direction for their better performance of that which should set them clear; it was in this case the Penitentiary's duty to take their confessions, to advise them the best way he could for their soul's good, to admonish them, to counsel them; but not to lay upon them more than private Pennance. As for notorious wicked Persons, whose Crimes were known; to convict, judge, and punish them, was the Office of the Ecclesiastical Consistory; Penitentiaries had their institution to another end. This Office of the Penitentiary was continued in the Greek Church for the space of above some hundred years; till Nectarius, and the Bishops of Churches under him begun a second alteration, abolishing even that confession which their Penitentiaries took in private, upon that occasion which Socrates mentions here in this chapter. See Mr. Hooker's Eccles. Polity, Book 6. pag. 332. &c. Edit. Lond. 1666; also Dr. Cave's Primitive Christianity, Part 3. Chap 5.

(b) In Rob. Stephens's Edit. the reading is, οἱ ἐπίσκοποι τὴν ἐκκλησίαν κανόνι τῷ πρεσβύτερον τῷ ἐπὶ τῆς μετανοίας προσέθεσαν, The Bishops added a Presbyter, who was to have the charge of penitency, to the Canon of the Churches. In the Sfortian M. S. the reading is [τῷ ἐκκλησιαστικῷ κανόνι, to the Ecclesiastick Canon;] which reading Epiphanius Scholasticus and Nicephorus found in their Copies, as appears by the Version of the first, and the Greek Text of the second. Which two Authors took Canon to signifie a Rule or Ecclesiastick Decree. Petavius, in his notes on Epiphanius, pag. 242. took these Words of Socrates in such a sense, as if the import of them were, That the Bishops, by publishing of a Canon then newly found out, added a Presbyter who should take charge of the penitents; which opinion of his he confirms by these following Words of Socrates: ἔστι δὲ ὁ κανὼν, &c. this Canon is in force to this day amongſt other Hereſies; where the term Canon is manifeſtly taken for a Rule and Decree. But Valeſius is not of Petavius's opinion. His reaſons are. (1) The propriety of the Greek tongue admits not of this ſenſe. (2) If a new Canon were then made concerning the inſtitution of a Penitentiary Presbyter, he queries, where, and in what Council it was publiſhed. Valeſius's Sentiment therefore is, that the term Canon is here to be taken for the Matricula, or Roll of Eccleſiaſtick Officers belonging to the Church. In which ſenſe, he ſays, 'tis taken in the 2 Can. Concil. Chalcedon. pag. 112. Edit. Bevereg. where ('tis true) it muſt be taken in a more comprehenſive ſenſe, than to ſignifie the Clerus only; that is, thoſe who are ordained by impoſition of hands: becauſe the Fathers in that Canon ſpeak of all the Eccleſiaſtick Officers, ſuch as were the Oeconomi, the Defenſores, the Manſionarii, &c. concerning whom ſee Dr. Beverege's Notes, pag. 109. But, whether it is to be uſed in this ſenſe here, I determine not; let the Learned judge.

(e) What the courſe of diſcipline in relation to penitency was, as it was practiſed by the Fathers during the firſt and pureſt times, before Penitentiaries were inſtituted;

ſuch Perſons as had ſinned after Baptiſm, might make a confeſſion of their Crimes (e) before this Presbyter inſtituted for that purpoſe. This Canon is in force to this day amongſt other Hereſies. Only the Homoöuſians, and (who embraced the ſame Sentiments with them, as to the Faith,) the Novatians, have refuſed [making uſe of] the Penitentiary Presbyter. For the Novatians admitted not of this * additional Function at its firſt inſtitution. But [the Homoöuſians] who are at this preſent in poſſeſſion of the Churches, after they had retained [the Office of the Penitentiaries] for a † long time, abrogated it in the times of Nectarius the Biſhop, on account of this accident which hapned in the [Conſtantinopolitan] Church. There came a (d) Gentlewoman to the Penitentiary [of the Church of Conſtantinople; to whom] ſhe made particular confeſſion of thoſe ſins, which ſhe had committed after Baptiſm. The Presbyter adviſed the woman to faſt, and pray continually, that together with her confeſſion, ſhe might have ſome (e) work alſo worthy of Repentance to ſhew. (f) Some time after this the woman detected her ſelf of another crime. For ſhe confeſſed that a Deacon of that Church had lain with her. Upon her diſcovery hereof, the Deacon was ejected out of the Church; and the (g) people were in a kind of tumult diſturbed. For they were not only offended at what was done, but alſo becauſe that fact had brought an infamy and diſgrace upon the Church. When therefore Eccleſiaſtick perſons were reproacht upon this account, one Eudæmon a Presbyter of that Church, by birth an Alexandrian, adviſed Nectarius the Biſhop, to (h) aboliſh the Penitentiary Presbyter's [Office;] and to leave every perſon to his own conſcience, for the participation of the [Holy] Myſteries: Valen. Jun. Theodoſius.

(e) Valeſius ſays here, he can't be induced to believe, that this Gentlewoman did publick pennance. His reaſons for this are (1) Women were very rarely compelled to do publick pennance, the Church being indulgent towards the modeſty of Matrons. (2) Nothing occurs at this paſſage, which may make us think this Matron's pennance was publick. (3) in regard ſhe is injoyned to faſt and pray continually; that may be underſtood of private ſatisfaction, which ſhe performed at home and in ſecret. To which reaſons of Valeſius's, a fourth may be added, drawn from the Penitentiary's Office: which was to take the Confeſſion of ſecret penitents, to adviſe them the beſt way he could for their ſouls health, to admoniſh and counſel them, but not to lay on them more than private pennance. See note (a) in this chapter.

(f) In the original 'tis thus expreſt, ἡ δὲ γυνὴ προσελθοῦσα· προσελθοῦσα has the ſame import here with προϊοῦσα, That is, in proceſs of time, or ſome time after this. For Socrates's meaning is, that this was the woman's ſecond confeſſion. Which is confirmed by Nicephorus, and Sozomen; who (in his Eccleſ. Hiſt. Book 7. Chap. 16,) words this paſſage thus; τῆς χάριν ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ διατρίβουσα, &c. Whileſt ſhe made her abode in the Church upon this account, [to wit, of performing the pennance injoyned her by the Penitentiary,] ſhe confeſſed that ſhe had been debaucht by a Deacon. It may alſo not unfitly be thus: ἡ δὲ γυνὴ προσελθοῦσα,, &c. But the woman came to [the Penitentiary,] and detected, &c. Valeſ.

(g) Here ariſes a difficulty, to wit, how this fact could come to the people's knowledge, if the woman's confeſſion were ſecret? How alſo the Biſhop could know this wicked fact, who degraded the Deacon on account thereof? My Sentiment is, that the Penitentiary Presbyter, to whom the woman had confeſſed this impious act, firſt ſent for the Deacon, reproving him before the woman, and forced him to a confeſſion of his Crime; then, he made a report of the whole matter to Nectarius the Biſhop, by whom he had been ſet over the penitents, and whoſe deputy he was in that Office. For the Biſhop himſelf reconciled penitents. Nor ought any one to make this objection, viz. if we admit what you have ſaid to be true, it follows that the ſecrets of confeſſion may be diſcovered. I deny that conſequence. For the Penitentiary Presbyter made known the Deacon's wickedneſs only to the Biſhop; the Matron's name he concealed. Further, the Deacon's degradation does plainly confirm what I have aſſerted. For Nectarius the Biſhop could not have depoſed him, had he not had intimation from the Penitentiary, who had detected the Deacon of whoredom. Valeſ.

(h) The Learned Reader muſt have obſerved, that there is nothing wherein the Romaniſts do more diſagree amongſt themſelves, than in their accounts of this fact of Nectarius. Petavius (in his notes on Epiphanius, pag. 243.) does maintain, that Nectarius abrogated publick pennance only, but continued confeſſion, that is, private confeſſion; for publick, he ſays, was never in uſe in the Church. Valeſius (in his note at this place) does aſſert, that neither confeſſion, nor pennance were aboliſhed by Nectarius; but that the Biſhop removed this particular Penitentiary Presbyter only, and that but for a time, becauſe of the diſcontented people's indignation. One John Haſſelius, (who is mentioned by Pamelius, in his 92th Note on Saint Cyprian's Treatiſe de Lapſis,) wrote a Book on purpoſe to ſhew that Nectarius did but put the Penitentiary from his Office, and abrogated not the Office itſelf. But all theſe aſſertions are palpably contradicted (1) by the whole advice which Eudæmon gives Nectarius in this chapter, to wit, of leaving the People from that time forward to their own Conſciences; (2) by the Conference between our Socrates and Eudæmon, which follows in this chapter; wherein complaint is made of ſome inconvenience which the want of this Office would breed: (3) by that which the Hiſtory declares concerning other Churches, who did as Nectarius had done before them, not in depoſing the ſame Man (for that was impoſſible) but in removing the ſame Office out of their Churches, which Nectarius had abrogated in his. All theſe particulars are evident from this chapter in Socrates; with whom Sozomen (Book 7. chap. 16.) agrees, and adds further, that we have declared at note (a.) in this chapter, moſtly in Mr. Hooker's own words. Which incomparable Author, in the forecited Book of his Eccleſ. Polity, has by unexceptionable authorities made it evident, (whatever the Learned Reader may find ſaid to the contrary by Baronius at the year of Chriſt 56, by Petavius in his Diatriba about this point, which occurs at pag. 225, of his notes on Epiphanius, or by Bellarmine:) that the ancient ἐξομολόγησις, or confeſſion, which the Primitives uſe to ſpeak of in the exerciſe of repentance, was made openly in the hearing of the whole both Eccleſiaſtical Conſiſtory and Aſſembly. After the inſtitution of Penitentiary Presbyters in every Church, this publick confeſſion was abrogated; and ſuch as were guilty of Crimes, confeſſed them not ὀπὶ τῷ λαῷ, in the preſence of the people, but (as Socrates here ſays) ἐπὶ τῷ προβλητῷ τῷ πρεσβυτέρῳ, before this Presbyter inſtituted for that purpoſe. The ſame is confirmed by Sozomen, Book 7. Chap. 16. where he tells us, how a Presbyter Elected to the Office of a Penitentiary, was to be qualified. One of his qualifications was, that he ought to be ἐχέμυθον, a perſon that could hold his tongue: by which 'tis plain, that the confeſſions made to him were private, and to be kept concealed.

* That is, the Office of the Penitentiary. For theſe Hereticks admitted no Perſon to their Communion upon any repentance, who was once known to have ſinned after Baptiſm: See Euſeb. Eccleſ. Hiſt. Book 6. Cap. 43. which practice of theirs, how fair ſoever their pretence might ſeem, made ſinners not the fewer, but the cloſer, and the more obdurate.

† To wit, from the Perſecution under the Emperor Decius, till after the Election of Nectarius to the Epiſcopate of Conſtantinople.

(d) Valeſius, in his note here, ſtarts this query; whether the confeſſion made by this Gentlewoman were publick, or private? In order to the anſwering whereof, he remarks, that ſhe confeſt twice before the Penitentiary. At her firſt confeſſion, ſhe made known all her ſins; whereupon ſhe is adviſed to continue in faſting and prayer. At her ſecond, ſhe diſcovered her having been debaucht by the Deacon. Theſe two confeſſions (continues Valeſius) were different both in time and manner. The firſt was of all her faults κατὰ μέρος, particularly (as Socrates words it;) the ſecond was of one crime only. All which may perhaps be true. After this remark made, Valeſius concludes both theſe confeſſions to have been ſecret; which (ſays he) is apparent from theſe two reaſons; (1) becauſe publick confeſſion was never in uſe in the Church: (2) in regard Socrates ſays, that this Woman accuſed not herſelf before the People, but before the Penitentiary. Valeſius's firſt reaſon appears evidently falſe, not only from Mr. Hooker's Words quoted before, and the unqueſtionable authorities he there produces to prove what he aſſerts; but from a paſſage in Sozomen, Book 7. Chap. 16. where that Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtorian, (giving reaſons of the alteration which the Grecians made, by abrogating publick confeſſion, and inſtituting Penitentiaries throughout all Churches to take the confeſſions and appoint the penances of ſecret offenders,) aſſignes this for one: φορτικὸν, ὡς εἰκὸς, ἐξ ἀρχῆς τοῖς ἱερεῦσιν ἔδοξεν, &c. It did from the beginning deſervedly ſeem burthenſome to the Prieſts, that ſins ſhould be declared before the whole congregation of the Church as witneſſes, in a Theatre as it were; from which Words 'tis evident that publick confeſſion was once in faſhion in the Church. Valeſius's ſecond reaſon we have before cleared and confirmed by the joint Teſtimony of Socrates and Sozomen. See note (c.)

that in his time (he lived in the reign of the Younger Theodosius,) the same abolition did still continue, and that the Bishops had in a manner every-where followed the example given them by Nectarius. But, though the Romanists differ (as you see) in their Sentiments about this fact of Nectarius's: yet they all unanimously agree in this, to wit, that Nectarius did not abrogate Auricular Confession. The reason of their consent in this assertion is plain: should it be acknowledged, that Nectarius did abrogate Auricular (or private) Confession, (as 'tis evident he did, from the attestation both of Socrates and Sozomen,) it would enforce them to grant, that the Greek Church at that time held not Confession, as the Latin Church now doth, to be the part of a Sacrament instituted by our Saviour Jesus Christ, which therefore the Church till the World's-end hath no power to alter. See Mr. Hooker's Eccles. Politie, pag. 343. Edit. Lond. 1666.

For this [in his judgment] was the only way of freeing the Church from obloquie and disgrace. I my self have heard these words from Eudæmon, have taken the boldness to insert them into this my History. For, as I have often said, I have used my utmost care and industry to procure an account of affairs from those that knew them best; and to make accurate researches into them, lest I should record any passage which is untrue. But my answer to Eudæmon [when he told me hereof] first, was this; (i) Whether your advice, O Presbyter! hath been for the Churche's good, or otherwise, God knoweth. But I see that it has given an occasion, of our not reprehending one anothers faults any more, nor of our observing that Apostolick Precept, which saith, * Ephes. 5. 11. Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them. But, let thus much be sufficient to have been said concerning these things.

(i) From this answer of Socrates's to Eudæmon, 'tis apparent, that Nectarius's abolition of the Penitentiary-Presbyter's Office, displeased our Socrates.

Whence we may evidently conclude, (whatever Baronius and Petavius have said to the contrary, at the places before quoted) that our Socrates was no Novatianist. For, had he embraced that Heresie, he would doubtless never have found fault with that Sanction of Nectarius's, whereby he abrogated the Penitentiary: nor would he have doubted to pronounce these Words concerning the advice Eudæmon suggested to Nectarius, to wit, Whether it were useful or hurtful to the Church: for the Novatians never admitted either of Penitency, or of the Penitentiary Prebyter. Besides, Socrates in this place terms the Assembly of the Homoöusians barely and simply The Church: which he would questionless never have done, had he been a follower of the Novatian Heresie. Vales.

CHAP. XX.

That there were [at that time] many Schisms amongst the Arians, and other Hereticks.

BUt I think it fit, not to leave unmention'd those things also which hapned amongst others; I mean the Arians, Novatians, and those who had their denominations from Macedonius and Eunomius. For the Church being divided, rested not in that division once made. But turning again, came to an engagement one with another; and taking hold of a small and frivolous pretence, rais'd mutual separations and divisions. Now, in what manner, when, and for what reasons each party were the authors of dissentions amongst themselves we will manifest in the procedure of our History. But this you must know, that the Emperor Theodosius persecuted none of them, except Eunomius; who holding his meettings in private Houses at Constantinople, and reciting the Books he had written, was by the Emperors order sent into banishment, in regard he corrupted many persons with his doctrine. But the Emperor molested none of the other [Hereticks,] nor did he force them to a communion with himself, but permitted every one of them to meet at their private Conventicles, and to entertain such Sentiments concerning the Christian Faith, as every of them * could attain to in their conceptions thereof. He gave the other Hereticks a Licence of building themselves Oratories without the Cities. But order'd, that the Novatians, (in regard they embraced the same Sentiments with himself, as to the Faith,) should without any fear continue in their Churches within the Cities, as I have said before. Concerning whom I judge it opportune to relate some passages, and shall make a short repetition of what has been said before.

CHAP. XXI.

That the Novatians also disagreed amongst themselves.

AGelius presided over the Church of the Novatians at Constantinople during the space of forty years, from the times of Constantine until the sixth year of the Emperor Theodosius, as I have * somewhere related before. Being near his death, he ordains Sisinnius to succeed him in his Bishoprick. He was a Presbyter of that Church over which Agelius presided; a person of great eloquence, and had been instructed in Philosophy by Maximus the Philosopher at the same time [that he read to] the Emperor Julian. But when the Novatian Congregation found fault with this Ordination, because [Agelius] had not rather ordain'd Marcianus, a Person of an eminent piety, by † whose interest the Novatians had continued unmolested during Valens's Reign; Agelius, desirous to appease the People's discontent, ordained Marcianus also: and being somewhat recovered from his distemper, he went into the Church, and spake these words to the people on his own account; After my decease, (says he) take Marcianus [for your Bishop,] and after Marcianus, Sisinnius. Having survived these words a small time, he ended his life. Marcianus therefore being constituted Bishop over the Novatians, there arose a division in their Church also, upon this account. One Sabbatius, (a Person that had turn'd Christian from being a Jew,) being by Marcianus promoted to the dignity of a Presbyter, continu'd notwithstanding a zealous promoter of Judaism, wherewith he had been leavened before. Moreover, he was extreamly ambitious of being made a Bishop. Having therefore procur'd two Presbyters (Theoctistus and Macarius, who were privy to his ambitious design,) to be his Assistants, he took a resolution of defending that Innovation [made by the Novatians] in Valens's Reign, concerning the Festival of Easter, at Pazum a Village in Phrygia; which I have mentioned || before. And first of all, under pretence of [following] an Ascetick and more austere course of life, he secretly withdrew from the Church, saying that he was aggrieved upon the account of some Persons; in regard he had a suspicion, that they were unworthy of a participation of the * Mysteries. But in process of time his design was discovered, to wit, that his desire was to hold private and separate meetings. When Marcianus understood this, he himself complained of his own mistake in ordaining, to wit, because he had promoted Persons so ambitious of vainglory to the † Presbyterate. And being grieved, did frequently use to say, That it had been better he had laid his hands on thorns, than when he preferred Sabbatius to the dignity of a Presbyter.

Moreover, * he procured a Synod of Novatian Biſhops to be convened at (a) Sangarum; which is a Mart-Town in Bithynia, lying near Helenopolis. [The Biſhops] being convened there, ſent for Sabbatius, and ordered him to ſet forth before the Synod the reaſons of his grief. Upon his affirming, that the diſſention about [the obſervation] of the Feaſt [of Eaſter] was the cauſe of his being troubled, (for it ought [as he ſaid] to be kept in the ſame manner that the Jews obſerv'd it, and agreeable to that Sanction which thoſe convened at Pazum promulged:) the Biſhops preſent at the Synod, having a ſuſpicion, that Sabbatius pretended all this on account of his being deſirous of a Biſhoprick, bound him with an Oath, that he ſhould never accept of a Biſhoprick. When he had ſworn to this, they publiſh'd a * Rule concerning the Feaſt of Eaſter; to which Canon they gave this Title, † Adiaphoros: affirming that a diſagreement about the Feſtival [of Eaſter] was not a ſufficient reaſon for a ſeparation from the Church; and that thoſe convened at Pazum did no prejudice to the Catholick and Univerſal Rule. For, the Ancients, [they ſaid,] and thoſe who lived neareſt the Apoſtles times, altho' they differed in the obſervation of this Feſtival, yet communicated one with another, and in no wiſe raiſed any diſſention [on that account.] Beſides, the Novatians, [they added,] who inhabit the Imperial City Rome, never followed the Jewiſh uſage; but always kept Eaſter after the Æquinox; and yet they ſeparated not from thoſe of their own Faith, who obſerved not the Feaſt of Eaſter after the ſame manner that they themſelves did. Upon theſe and many ſuch-like mature Conſiderations, they made that Indifferent Canon (which I have mention'd concerning Eaſter: whereby it was left to every one's arbitrement, to celebrate Eaſter according to that uſage which by a prejudicate opinion he had embraced: And that there ſhould be no diſſention in relation to Communion, but that thoſe who celebrated that Feſtival after a different manner, ſhould notwithſtanding continue in the unity and agreement of the Church. This Rule therefore concerning the Feaſt of Eaſter, having at that time been conſtituted and confirmed by them; Sabbatius being bound by his Oath, (if at any time there hapned a diſcrepancy in the celebration of the Feaſt of Eaſter,) himſelf anticipated the Faſt by keeping it in private by himſelf, (b) and having watch'd all night, he celebrated the ſolemn day of the Sabbath of the Paſſover. And again, on the day following he came to the Church at ſuch time as the whole Congregation were aſſembled there, and together with them partook of the Myſteries. This he did for many years; and therefore could not avoid being taken notice of by the multitude. Upon which account ſome of the ſimpler ſort of people, more eſpecially the Phrygians and Galatians, thinking they ſhould be juſtified by this fact, imitated Sabbatius, and kept the Paſſover in ſecret agreeable to his faſhion. But ſome time after this, Sabbatius diſregarding his Oath, held ſchiſmatical Meetings by himſelf, and was conſtituted Biſhop over thoſe that were his own followers, as we ſhall manifeſt in the Procedure of our Hiſtory.

† That is, Indifferent.

(b) This place is corrupted; nor is this fault of a ſhort ſtanding. For even in Epiphanius Scholaſticus's age, this miſtake had crept into the copies of Socrates, as 'tis apparent from his Verſion. For Epiphanius renders it thus: Cum hæc ab eis tunc fuiſſet regula definita, &c. When this determination had at that time been made by them, Sabbatius bound by his Oath, (if at any time there hapned any diſcrepance in the Paſchal ſolemnity,) faſted by himſelf, and by night celebrated the ſolemn Day of the Paſſover on the Sabbath; and again, met with the whole Congregation in the Church, and partook of the Myſteries. Chriſtophorſon has expreſt the ſame ſenſe in his Verſion. Nicephorus alſo (Eccleſ. Hiſt. Book 12. Chap. 31.) has followed the ſame ſenſe. For he ſays, that Sabbatius, (as often as the Chriſtians differed from the Jews in the Celebration of Eaſter,) was wont to faſt in private by himſelf, and to celebrate the Paſſover on the Paſchal-Sabbath about evening, after the Jewiſh manner. Then on the Sunday following, after the Solemn Vigils, his uſage was to celebrate Eaſter with the reſt of the Chriſtians, or rather Novatians. But this interpretation does in no wiſe please me. For thus Sabbatius (as often as the Jewiſh Paſſover differ'd from the Chriſtian-Paſchal Feaſt,) could not have celebrated the firſt Paſchal-ſolemnity with the Jews. Then, if Sabbatius always celebrated the firſt Paſchal-ſolemnity on the Sabbath-day at evening after the Jewiſh manner, how is it poſſible, that he could celebrate the Solemn Vigils in the Church on the ſame Sabbath-day? For this is atteſted in expreſs Words by Socrates here, and by Sozomen, Book 7. chap. 18. My Sentiment therefore is, that the Words in this place of Socrates are tranſpoſed, and muſt be put into their Priſtine order after this manner: ὁ Σαββάτιος τοῖς ὅρκοις δεθεὶς, εἴποτε διαφωνία ἐγένετο ἢ τὸ πάσχα ἑορτὴν, αὐτὸς καθ' ἑαυτὸν προλαμβάνων ἐνήστευε, καὶ ἐπετέλει τὸ πάσχα. Καὶ νυκτερεύων τὴν νενομισμένην τῷ Σαββάτῳ ἡμέραν, πάλιν τῇ ἑξῆς ἅμα πᾶσι καὶ τὴν ἐκκλησίαν συνήγετο, καὶ τῶν μυστηρίων μετελάμβανε· that is, Sabbatius being bound by his Oath, (if at any time a diſagreement hapned in the celebration of the Paſchal-Feſtival,) himſelf by way of anticipation faſted in private at home, and celebrated the Paſſover. And watching all Night on the ſolemn day of the Sabbath, again on the next day he went to Church together with the reſt of the Congregation, and partook of the Myſteries. Sozomen does evidently confirm this our Emendation, in his ſeventh Book chap. 18. where he ſets forth the ſame thing much more clearly in theſe words: ἐξ ἐκείνου δὲ Σαββάτιος τοῖς Ἰουδαίοις ἑπόμενος, &c. But from that time Sabbatius following the Jews, (unleſs it by chance hapned that all Perſons [as well Chriſtians, as Jews] did celebrate the Feaſt [of Eaſter] at one and the ſame time,) faſted before-hand, as the manner is, and celebrated the Paſchal ſolemnity in private by himſelf, according to the ſanctions [of the Moſaick Law.] But on the Sabbath, from the evening to a fit time, he continued watching and making the uſual Prayers, and on the day following met in the Church in common with the Congregation, and partook of the Myſteries. Sabbatius therefore kept the Paſchal ſolemnity twice in one and the ſame year; the firſt time with the Jews, the ſecond with the Chriſtians: unleſs it by chance hapned, that the Chriſtians agreed with the Jews in the time of celebrating the Paſchal Feaſt. Which could very rarely happen. Valeſ. Our Engliſh-rendition of this paſſage agrees with the Greek Text in Rob. Stephens's Edition, and that in this Edition of Valeſius.

CHAP. XXII.

This Hiſtorian's Sentiment concerning the diſagreements which appear in ſome places, in relation to the Feaſt of Eaſter, Baptiſms, Faſts, Marriages, the Order of celebrating the Euchariſt, and other Eccleſiaſtick Rites and Obſervances.

BUt, I think it not unſeaſonable to declare in ſhort what comes into my mind concerning Eaſter. Neither the Ancients, nor the Moderns who have ſtudiouſly follow'd the Jews, had in my judgment any juſt or rational cauſe of contending ſo much about this Feſtival. For they conſider'd not with themſelves, that when the Jewiſh Religion was changed into Chriſtianity, thoſe accurate [Obſervances] of the Moſaick Law, and the Types [of things future] wholly ceaſed. And this carries along with it its own demonſtration. For, no one of Chriſt's Laws has permitted the Chriſtians to obſerve the Rites of the Jews. Moreover, on the contrary, the Apoſtle has expreſly forbid this, and does not only reject Circumciſion, but alſo adviſes againſt contending about Feſtival-days. Wherefore, in his Epiſtle to the Galatians, his words are theſe, * Tell me, ye that deſire to be under the Law, do ye not hear the Law? And having ſpent ſome few words in his diſcourſe hereof, he demonſtrates, that the people of the Jews are Servants, but that thoſe who have † follow'd Chriſt are called to liberty. Moreover, 'tis his admonition, that days and months and years ſhould in no wise be observed. Besides, in his Epistle to the Colossians he does loudly affirm, that [such] Observations are a shadow. Wherefore he says, * Let no man judge you in meat, or in drink, or in respect of any holy-day, or of the new moon, or of the sabbath-days; which are a shadow of things to come. And in the Epistle to the Hebrews, this very [Apostle] does confirm the same things in these words, † For the priesthood being changed, there is made of necessity a change also of the law. The Apostle therefore, and the Gospels have no where imposed the yoke of servitude on those who have approached the preaching [of the Faith:] but have left the Feast of Easter, and the other Festivals, to be honoured by their gratitude and benevolence, who have had benefits conferred upon them [on those days.] Wherefore, in regard Men love Festivals, because thereon they have a cessation from their labours, each person in every place, according to his own pleasure, has by a certain custom celebrated the memory of the saving Passion. For neither our Saviour, nor his Apostles, have enjoyn'd us by any Law to observe this Festival. Nor have the Gospels, or the Apostles threatned us with any Mulct, Punishment, or Curse, as the Mosaick Law does the Jews. For, 'tis meerly for the History's sake, in order to [a publishing of] the reproach of the Jews, (because they polluted themselves with blood on their very Festivals,) that it has been recorded in the Gospels, that our Saviour suffered even on the Days of unleaven'd bread. Moreover, it was not the Apostles design, to make Laws concerning Festival-days, but to introduce good Life and Piety. And it seems to me, that, as many other thiugs in several places have been establish'd by custom, so the Feast of Easter also had a peculiar observation amongst all persons from some old usage, in regard none of the Apostles, as I have said, have made any determinate Decree about it. Now, that the observation of this Festival had its original amongst all Men in the primitive times from Custom rather than Law, the things themselves do demonstrate. For, in Asia the Less, most people kept the fourteenth day of the Moon, disregarding the Sabbath-day. And tho' this was their practice, yet they never made a separation from those who celebrated the Feast of Easter otherwise; till such time as Victor Bishop of Rome, over-much heated with anger, sent an * Excommunicatory Libel to the † Quartodecimani in Asia. For which fact Irenæus Bishop of Lyons in France severely reprov'd Victor by Letter; blaming him for his immoderate heat; and informing him, that altho' the Ancients differ'd in their celebration of the Feast of Easter, yet they did in no wise separate from a mutual communion. Also, that Polycarp Bishop of Smyrna, (a) who afterwards suffer'd Martyrdom under Gordianus, communicated with Anicetus Bishop of Rome, and made no separation from him on account of this Festival, altho' Polycarp himself, according to his own Country-usage [practised] in [the Church of] Smyrna, kept Easter on the fourteenth day of the Moon, as Eusebius says in the * Fifth Book of his Ecclesiastical History. Some therefore in Asia the Less, as I have said, kept the fourteenth day of the Moon. Others in the (b) Eastern parts, celebrated that Feast on the † Sunday indeed; but they differ'd concerning the Month. Those [first mentioned] were of opinion, that the Jews were to be followed, altho' they observed not an exact Rule. (c) These celebrated Easter after the Æquinox, refusing to keep that Feast with the Jews. For they affirm that Easter must always be kept when the Sun is in Aries, on that Month which the Antiochians term Xanthicus, and the Romans April. And in their practise hereof, they followed [as they affirmed] not the modern Jews who mistake almost in all things, but the Ancients of that Nation, and Josephus; agreeable whereto are the words of that Author in his Third Book of the Jewish Antiquities. And thus these Persons disagreed amongst themselves. But all other [Christians] in the Western parts, as far as the Ocean it self, are found to have celebrated Easter after the Æquinox, from a very ancient Tradition. For all these persons keep it after this manner, and have never disagreed amongst themselves. Nor did the * Synod under Constantine alter this Festival, as (d) some have noised it abroad. For Constantine himself writing to those persons who differ'd about this Festival, advised them, in regard they were but few, to become Followers of those who exceeded them in number. You will find the Emperor's Letter entire, in the Third Book of Eusebius's Life of Constantine. But that part of it [which treats] concerning the Feast of Easter, runs thus: —— * And since 'tis a decent Order, which all the Churches in the Western, Southern, and Northern parts of the World do observe; and some places also the in East. Upon which account all persons have at present judg'd it good and right. (and We Ourself also have engaged it will please Your Prudence;) [to wit,] That what is observed with one concordant mind in the City of Rome, throughout Italy, Africa, all Egypt, Spain, the Gallia's, the Britannia's, the Libya's, all Greece, the Asian and Pontick Diœceses, and Cilicia; will willingly be embraced by your Prudence also; which will attentively consider, not only that the number of Churches in the fore-named places is greater; but also, that 'tis most just and commendable, that all persons should chiefly and in common desire that which strict reason seems to require; and

(b) He seems to mean the Syrians, Cilicians, and Mesopotamians, who kept Easter with the Jews before the Nicene Council, as Athanasius informs us, in his Epistle to the Africans, in these Words: ἐπειδὴ οἱ κατὰ συρίαν, &c. in regard the Syrians, Cilicians, and Mesopotamians differ from us, and celebrate [Easter] at the same time that the Jews keep it. Those [Eastern People therefore, concerning whom Socrates speaks, followed the Jews indeed, in that they observed the fourteenth day of the Moon of the first month before the Æquinox. But they celebrated not Easter on the same day whereon the Jews kept it, but on the Sunday following. (a) But Socrates is mistaken. For Polycarp did not suffer Martyrdom in Gordianus's reign, but that of Marcus Antoninus, as 'tis manifest from Eusebius, and other Writers. 'Tis certain, that Irenæus does relate, (in his third Book against Heresies, which piece he wrote during Eleutherius's Presidency over the Roman Church, that is, in the times of Marcus Antoninus,) that Polycarp had at that time suffered Martyrdom. Wherefore these Words [who afterwards suffered Martyrdom under Gordianus] are rather to be placed a little above, after these [Irenæus Bishop of Lyons in France.] For they are more accomodate to Irenæus, than to Polycarp. But let the prudent Reader, determine hereof according to his own arbitrement. I know indeed, that in St. Benignus Divionensis's Chronicle, the Martyrdom of Irenæus Bishop of Lyons is placed before Polycarp's. For the Author of that Chronicle does relate, that Irenæus, after his Martyrdom, appeared to Polycarp Bishop of Smyrna in his sleep, and commanded him to send Benignus into the Gallia's. But these are meer trifles. Vales.

(e) to have no ſociety with the perjury of the Jews. Such is the Emperor's Letter. Further, the Quartodecimani do affirm, that the obſervation of the fourteenth day of the Moon was delivered to them by John the Apoſtle. But the Romans, and thoſe in the Weſtern parts ſay, that the uſage in force with them was delivered by the Apoſtles Peter and Paul. Notwithſtanding, neither of theſe two parties can produce any written teſtimony in confirmation hereof. Moreover, that the Feaſt of Eaſter is kept in all places from ſome uſage and cuſtom, I do from hence conjecture. No Sect of Religion obſerves the ſame Ceremonies, (f) although it embraces one and the ſame Opinion concerning God. For they that are of the ſame Faith, differ amongſt themſelves concerning Rites. Wherefore, it will not be unreaſonable to add a few words concerning the different uſages of Churches. Firſt therefore, you may find that the Faſts before Eaſter are obſerved one way by ſome, and in a manner different by others. (g) For they at Rome faſt three continued Weeks before Eaſter, excepting Saturdays and Sundays. The Inhabitants of Illyricum, thoſe throughout all Achaia, and (h) they at Alexandria, obſerve a Faſt of ſix weeks before Eaſter, which they term

(e) Inſtead of [ἔχει have,] the reading in the Florent. and Sfortian M. SS. is [ἔχειν, to have] ſo it is in Euſebius; and ſo Epiphan. Scholaſticus reads, as appears by his Verſion. Valeſ.

(f) Inſtead of [κἂν τὼ ἀυτὼ περὶ πάντων δόξαν ἀσπάζηται,] in my judgment the reading ſhould be [κἂν τῶ ἀυτῶ περὶ τῦ Θεῦ δόξαν ἀσπάζηται, altho' it embraces one and the ſame opinion concerning God.] Socrates's meaning is this; All Religions and Sects have different Rites and Ceremonies, altho' they entertain the ſame Sentiments concerning God. Socrates adds, For they that are of the ſame Faith, &c. Nicephorus alſo favours this our amendment; for he has expreſt the paſſage in Socrates thus: For though all Men are of the ſame opinion, yet they obſerve not the ſame traditions throughout the Churches. Valeſ.

(g) Baronius, at the year of Chriſt 57 and 391, accuſes Socrates of a double miſtake; Firſt, becauſe he ſays that the Romans faſted three weeks only in Lent before Eaſter; Secondly, in regard he aſſerts, that in thoſe three weeks, Saturdays were excepted, on which days the Romans faſted not. As to the firſt, Socrates's opinion is defended againſt Baronius, by Halloixius in his Notes on the 11th chapter of Irenæus's Life, pag. 678. That which makes me incline to Socrates's opinion, is the authority of Caſſiodorus, who in his Tripartite Hiſtory has put this paſſage in Socrates into theſe Words: Romani enim tres ante paſcha Septimanas, præter Sabbatum & Dominicam, ſub continuatione jejunant; the Romans faſt three weeks before Eaſter without intermiſſion, except on Saturday and Sunday. Could Caſſiodorus be ignorant of the cuſtom of the Roman Church in the obſervation of the Lent-Faſt, who was himſelf a Senator, Conſul, and Præfectus Prætorio in the City of Rome? Who can believe he would have put theſe Words of Socrates into his Hiſtory, if he had known the thing had been otherwiſe? Doubtleſs Caſſiodorus, had he known this to have been falſe, would on purpoſe have omitted Socrates's Words, leſt he ſhould lead his Reader into a miſtake. Which in regard Caſſiodorus has not done, but was reſolved to have Socrates's teſtimony, concerning the Romans Lent-Faſt read in the Hiſtory which bears his name; from thence 'tis apparent, that what Socrates has ſaid concerning the Romans Faſt is true. In the Catholick Church, though, the Lent-Faſt was always obſerved by all Perſons, yet they faſted not after one and the ſame manner, as Irenæus informs us in his Epiſtle to Victor Biſhop of Rome; a conſiderable part whereof is quoted by Euſebius Eccleſ. Hiſt. Book 5. Chap. 24. wherefore Baronius is impertinent in oppoſing Socrates with the teſtimony of Gregorius Magnus. For the Romans faſted in Lent after one manner in Socrates's age, after another in the days of Gregory the Great. In the times of Pope Leo, with which Socrates was in a manner equal, the Romans faſted three days of the week only in Lent, to wit, on Monday, Wedneſday and Friday, as 'tis apparent from that Pope's Sermons concerning Lent. In the Roman Order I have in my judgment found a footſtep of that ancient Cuſtom, which Socrates relates here. For, that Sunday of Lent vulgarly termed Dominica de paſſione Domini, is called Dominica Mediana; which name, 'tis ſaid, was given it by command of the Roman See. Now, I ſee no other reaſon why it ſhould be ſo termed, than, that of the three weeks wherein the Romans faſted in Lent, this was the ſecond Sunday. Bede (in his Book concerning the Vernal Æquinox) relates, that in Italy ſome faſted twenty days, others ſeven. But now, what Socrates ſays concerning Saturday, may be truly defended. For in Pope Leo's age, the Romans faſted not on Saturdays in Lent; as 'tis apparent from the cloſe of that Pope's fourth Sermon concerning Lent. Add hereto Bede's teſtimony, in his Book de Officiis; where he relates, that moſt people faſted not in Lent on Thurſdays and Saturdays. Valeſ.

(h) Sozomen atteſts the ſame, Book 7. Chap. 19. Moreover, the Alexandrians began the Lent-Faſt, not from the Sunday of the ſixth week before Eaſter, (as Johannes Fileſacus ſuppoſed, in the 7th chapter of his book concerning Lent,) but from the Munday which followed that Sunday. Therefore, the firſt Sunday of the Alexandrians Lent was the fifth Sunday before Eaſter. And this is manifeſtly aſſerted by Theophilus and Cyrillus, in their Homilies or Paſchal Epiſtles. Which I wonder Fileſacus perceived not, who produces Theophilus's teſtimony againſt himſelf. Valeſ.

* the forty days Faſt. (i) Others in a different manner from them, begin their Faſt from the ſeventh week before Eaſter, and tho' they faſt three five days only [part of three weeks,] and that by intervals; yet nevertheleſs they alſo call that time the forty days Faſt. And I cannot but wonder, how theſe Perſons, (tho' they diſagree about the number of the days, yet) ſhould in common give it the ſame name [to wit,] the forty days Faſt. Of which appellation ſome aſſign one reaſon, others another, according to their particular fancies and humours. You likewiſe find ſeveral Perſons diſagreeing not only (k) about the number of the days, but differing alſo in their abſtinency from Meats. For ſome abſtain wholly from [eating of] living creatures; others, of all living creatures feed on fiſh only. Otherſome, together with fiſh, eat fowl alſo; affirming, according to Moſes's* words, that theſe were made likewiſe of the waters. Some abſtain from all manner of fruits of trees, and from eggs. Others feed upon dry bread only: otherſome eat not even this. Others, having faſted till the (l) ninth hour, (m) feed upon any ſort of food whatever, making no diſtinction. (n) Again, amongſt other Nations, there are other uſages: for which innumerable reaſons are aſſign'd. And in regard no one can produce a command in writing concerning this thing, 'tis manifeſt that the Apoſtles left every one to his own will and free choice in this caſe; to the end that no perſon might be compelled through fear or neceſſity, to the performance of what is good. Such is the diſagreement throughout the Churches about their faſtings. Nor is the variety [amongſt them] leſs, (o) about their performances in their Religious Aſſemblies.

(k) In the Florent. and Sfortian M. SS. the reading here is [about the number of the Faſts:] But the other reading, which we have followed, is confirmed by Socrates a little above, where his words are [And I cannot but wonder, how theſe perſons, (though they diſagree about the number of the days, yet) ſhould in common give it the ſame name [to wit,] the forty-days Faſt.] Valeſ.

(m) In the Greek the reading here is [διάφορον ἔχυσι τὴν ὄψιν, make uſe of a different ſort of food:] but I am of opinion it ſhould be [ἀδιάφορον ἔχυσι τῶ ὄψιν, feed upon any ſort of food without making any difference.] So Epiphanius Scholaſticus read this place; for thus he renders it; alii uſque ad nonam jejunantes horam, ſine diſcrimine ciborum reficiuntur, others having faſted to the ninth hour, refreſh themſelves without making any difference about the ſorts of food. Valeſ.

(n) After theſe Words [Again, amongſt other Nations, there are other uſages] Sir Henry Savill in his Manuſcript had placed a Subdiſtinction, (that is, a ſingle point, which Greek writers uſually placed at the bottom of the Letter; See Valeſius's Preface to his Edition of Euſebius:) but I had rather place a middle diſtinction (that is, a Colon) here. Which is confirmed by Nicephorus, who has expreſt this paſſage of Socrates thus: ἀλλὰ παρ' ἄλλοις ἔθεσι καὶ φύλοις· ἐν οἷς καὶ μυρία τοιάυτων εἰσὶν· and there are other uſages amongſt other Nations and Tribes; amongſt whom alſo there are infinite cauſes of ſuch [cuſtoms] as theſe. Valeſ.

(o) Περὶ συνάξεων. Synaxis is a word uſed by Chriſtian Writers in ſeveral ſenſes. (1) 'Tis ſometimes a general term, and contains all things uſually done in the Religious Aſſemblies of Chriſtians; in which ſenſe we ſuppoſe it to be taken here. (2) The Celebration of the Lord's Supper is by a peculiar name termed Synaxis. (3) 'Tis uſed ſo as to ſignifie the Chriſtian Conventions or Aſſemblies, without any reſpect had to the Euchariſt. (4) Synaxis is ſometimes expreſsly diſtinguiſhed from the Celebration of the Sacrament: in which ſenſe our Socrates uſes it a little lower in this chapter, where his words are theſe, πάντα τὰ τὰ συνάξεως ῥήματα, δίχα τῆς τῶ μυστηρίων τελέσεως, and all things are performed which belong to the Church-Aſſembly, except the Celebration of the Myſteries [or, the Euchariſt.]

The Reader will find good authorities assigned for all these significations of this term, by the Learned Casaubon, Exercit. 16. ad Annal. Eccles. Baronii. Num. 42.

Valen. Jun. Theodosius.

For, tho' [almost] all Churches over the whole world do celebrate the Sacred Mysteries on the Sabbath-day at the period of every week; yet the Alexandrians and they at Rome, on account of some ancient tradition, refuse to practise this. The Egyptians who are neighbours to the Alexandrians, and the Inhabitants of Thebaïs, have their Religious Meetings on the Sabbath: notwithstanding, they participate not of the Mysteries, in such a manner as is usual amongst the Christians. For after they have feasted, and filled themselves with all manner of victuals, in the evening they * offer, and partake of the Mysteries. Again, at Alexandria, on the † fourth Feria, and on that termed the ‖ Preparation-day, the Scriptures are read, and the Doctors expound them; and all things are performed which belong to the Church-Assembly, except the celebration of the Mysteries. And this is an usage of great antiquity at Alexandria. For 'tis manifest that Origen most commonly taught in the Church on these days. Who, being a very Learned Doctor, and perceiving that the secret of the Mosaick Law was not to be expounded literally, reduc'd his discourse concerning the passover to a Mystical sense; asserting that there had been one only true Passover, [to wit,] that which our Saviour celebrated, at such time as being fastned to his Cross, he vanquished the adverse powers, making use of this Trophy against the Devil. In the same City Alexandria, as well the Catechumens, as the Faithful, are without difference or distinction made Readers and (p) Psalm-setters, whereas in all other Churches, the Faithful only are promoted to this dignity. (q) I my self, when I was in Thessaly, knew another custom also. A Clergy-man in that Country (if after his taking Orders, he does lie with his Wife, whom he had legally married before his being Ordained) is (r) degraded: whereas in the East all [Clergy-men] (s) of their own accord do abstain from their Wives] even the Bishops themselves; notwithstanding, they do this [voluntarily,] not by force or compulsion of a Law. For many of them, during even the time of their being Bishops, have begotten Children of a lawful Wife. Moreover, the Author of this usage in Thessaly was Heliodorus, [Bishop] of Trica in that Country, under whose name there are Love-Books extant, which he (t) composed when he was a young Man, and entitled them Æthiopici. This same custom is observed in Thessalonica, in Macedonia, and in Achaia. I have also known another custom in Thessaly. They baptize there on the days of Easter only. Upon which account all of them, except a very few, die unbaptized. At that Antioch which is in Syria, the site of the Church is inverted. For the Altar * stands not towards the East, but towards the West. In Achaia, at Jerusalem, and in Thessaly, they go to (u) Prayers when the Candles are lighted, in the same manner that the Novatians do at Constantinople. Likewise, at Cæsarea, in Cappadocia, and in Cyprus, on Saturdays and Sundays, always in the Evening, after the Candles are lighted, the Presbyters and Bishops expound the Scriptures. Those Novatians in the Hellespont perform not their Prayers wholly after the same manner, with them who live at Constantinople; but they are (w) in most things conform to [the usages of] the Catholick Church.

(p) Ὑποψάλτης. Musculus and Christophorson have rendred this term very ill, thus, interpretes, Expounders. But Epiphanius translates it Psalmi Pronunciatores, Pronouncers [or Setters] of the Psalm; which rendition is good. It seems to have been these Persons Office, to begin to sing the first words of the Psalm; and then the People sang the rest after them. ὑποψάλτης were heretofore termed Monitores who prompted the Players whilest they were Acting: they put the Actors in as oft as they forgot any passage in the Play, and were out. There were Monitores also in the Prayers, of whom mention is made by Tertullian in his Apology; where he says, that the Christians prayed without a Monitor, because they prayed by heart. But Nicephorus at this place reads ὑπογραφεῖς, Notaries; instead of ὑποψάλτης, Monitors: which reading displeases me not. For the Bishops had their Notaries, who were learned young Men. Thus Proclus is said to have been Atticus's Notary, as Socrates attests, Book 7. Chap. 41. And long before that, Athanasius was Notary to Alexander Bishop of Alexandria, as Sozomen relates, Book 2. chap. 17. In Pope Gelasius's Decrees, cap. 2. amongst the first Ecclesiastick degrees, the Lectores, Notarii, and Defensores are reckoned. In Cæsarius Arelatensis's Life, chap. 22. are these words: Lector aut Notarius coram illo non cessabat clamare, that is, the Reader or Notary ceased not to cry before him. In the First Action of the Ephesine Synod, Epaphroditus is termed the Reader and Notary of Hellanicus Bishop of the Rhodii. From all which authorities 'tis apparent, that the Notary's and Reader's Office was in a manner the same; to wit, to read the Psalms or other Books of the Sacred Scripture, either in the Church, or in the Bishop's presence. And this Simeon Metaphrastes confirms, in the Acts of the Notaries Marcianus and Martyrius, which occur in Surius at the twenty fifth day of October. These Notaries registred the Acts which were made in the Church; on which account they seem to have had this name given them. In the Gesta Collationis inter Catholicos ac Donatistas, we meet with this Title: Excipientibus quoq; Januario & Vitale Notariis Ecclesiæ Catholicæ, Victore & Cresconio Notariis Ecclesiæ Donatistarum, &c. that is, also Januarius and Vitales Notaries of the Catholick Church, Victor and Cresconius Notaries of the Church of the Donatists, registring [the Acts, &c.] There was over these a Primicerius Notariorum, [or the Chief of the Notaries,] who was usually chosen out of the Presbyters, as we are informed from the first Action of the Ephesine Council, wherein Petrus Presbyter of Alexandria, and Primicerius of the Notaries, recites the Emperor Theodosius's Edict to Cyrillus and the other Metropolitanes. But the chief duty of the Notaries was, to carry the Verge or Staff before the Bishop, as 'tis related in the second Book concerning the Life and Miracles of Cæsarius Arelatensis. Vales.

(q) In Rob. Stephens's Edition, this place is pointed thus: ἔγνων δὲ ἐγὼ κὴ ἕτερον ἔθος ἐν Θεσσαλίᾳ, ῥώμῳ κληρικὸς ὢν· I my self knew another custome also in Thessaly, being made a Clergy-man there: If this punctation were true, it would follow, that Socrates was a Clergy-man in Thessaly. But this is in no wise probable, in regard Socrates does every-where stile himself Scholasticus, that is, an Advocate. Wherefore, I doubt not but this place must be otherwise pointed, to wit, after this manner: ἔγνων δὲ ἐγὼ κὴ ἕτερον ἔθος ἐν Θεσσαλίᾳ· ῥώμῳ κληρικὸς ὢν &c. I my self when I was in Thessaly knew another custom also: A Clergy-man in that Country, &c. Notwithstanding Musculus and Christophorson have followed another punctation here, to wit, this; ἔγνων δὲ ἐγὼ κὴ ἕτερον ἔθος ἐν Θεσσαλίᾳ· ῥώμῳος κληρικὸς ὢν, &c. I my self knew another custom also in Thessaly: One being made a Clergy-man there, &c. Which distinction I can't approve of. For the term ῥώμῳος would be superfluous, and the word γίνεσθαι would be too often repeated in the same period. Further, that Socrates had been conversant in Thessaly, is apparent from his following Words. For a little after this he adds, κὴ ἄλλο δὲ ἔθος ἐν Θεσσαλίᾳ οἶδα γινόμενον, also I have seen [or known] another custom in Thessaly. Although the term οἶδα is ambiguous, and may be meant as well of an absent, as a present Person. Vales.

(r) Ἀποκήρυκτος γίνεται. In Nicephorus the reading is ἀπόκλητος, put out of his Orders, or, made no Clergyman; which displeases me not. Notwithstanding, the term ἀποκήρυκτος seems to denote something that is heavier, to wit, his being excommunicated. Vales.

(s) We owe the amendment of this place to the Florentine M. S. For, whereas in the common Editions the reading here was [ἐν ἀναίσχυντον πάντων γνωρίμων ἀπεχομένων, whereas all the most illustrious Persons in the East do abstain;] in that M. S. the reading is [ἐν ἀναισχύντῳ πάντων γνώμῃ ἀπεχομένων, whereas in the East all [Clergymen] of their own accord do abstain, &c.] Which emendation is confirmed by Nicephorus. Vales.

(t) Instead of [ἔταξε] I had rather read [συνέταξε, composed;] in Nicephorus 'tis [συνετάξατο:] But what Nicephorus adds, [to wit, that Heliodorus was ordered in a Synod either to burn his Love-Books, or else to relinquish his Bishoprick,] seems to me to be fabulous. For there is no sufficient Evidence, whether those Books concerning the Amours of Theagenes and Charicles, were written by Heliodorus the Bishop, or by some body else. Vales.

(u) This Office the Greek Church terms λυχνικὸν, the Latin, Lucernarium; as Jacobus Syrmondus has observ'd in his notes on Eunodius. See Meursius's Glossary, in the Word λυχνικὸν; and the notes on Cassianus, at the words Lucernaris Hora. Vales.

(w) I doubt not but instead of [παραπλησίως δὲ παρὰ πολλὰ] Socrates wrote [παραπλησίως δὲ τὰ πολλὰ, but they are in most things conform;] and so Nicephorus has worded it. Musculus and Christophorson read thus also. For Musculus has rendred it thus: Sed in multis se imperiali conformant Ecclesiæ, but in many things they conform themselves to the Imperial Church. Christophorson translates it after this manner: Sed tamen ex multò majore parte, primariæ apud illos Ecclesiæ consuetudinem sequuntur, but yet much the greater part, they follow the Custom of the Primary Church amongst them. Neither of these theſe Tranſlators underſtood what was meant by theſe Words here, to wit, ἡ κρατοῦσα ἐκκλησία. Socrates uſually gives this appellation to the Catholick Church, becauſe at that time it had gotten the chief power and authority. So in chap. 19. of this Book, to the Novatians he oppoſes τὰς κρατούσας τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν, thoſe who are in poſſeſſion of the Churches, that is, the Catholicks: Ναυατιανοὶ μὲν γὰρ (ſays he,) ἐδέ ποτε ἀρχὴν τὴν προσθήκην ταύτην ἐδέξαντο, οἱ δὲ νῦν τῶν ἐκκλησιῶν κρατοῦντες, &c. For the Novatians admitted not of this additional Function at its firſt inſtitution. But [the Homoöuſians] who are at this preſent in poſſeſſion of the Churches, &c. Valeſ.

In ſum, in all places, and amongſt all Sects, you will ſcarcely find two Churches exactly agreeing about their Prayers. At Alexandria, a Presbyter does in no wiſe Preach. And this [uſage] had its beginning from ſuch time as Arius raiſed a diſturbance in that Church. At Rome they faſt every (x) Saturday. (y) At Cæſarea in Cappadocia they exclude thoſe from Communion who have ſinned after Baptiſm, as the Novatians do. The ſame is alſo practiſed by the Macedoniani in the Helleſpont, and by the Quartodecimani in Aſia. The Novatians in Phrygia admit not of * Digamiſts. Thoſe Novatians who inhabit Conſtantinople, neither openly admit, nor openly reject them. But in the Weſtern parts they are openly † received. The Biſhops, who in their ſeveral times preſided over the Churches, were (in my judgment) the Occaſioners of this diverſity. And thoſe who received theſe Rites and Uſages, tranſmitted them to poſterity in manner of a Law as 'twere. To give in a Catalogue of all the Rites and Cuſtoms in uſe throughout all Cities and Countries, is a thing difficult, or rather impoſſible. But theſe we have produced, are ſufficient to demonſtrate, that the Feaſt of Eaſter was by reaſon of ſome certain uſage celebrated in a different manner in every particular Province. Wherefore, they are too profuſe in their talk, who have ſpread abroad a rumour, that [the time of celebrating] Eaſter was alter'd in the Nicene Synod. For the Fathers conven'd in that Synod made it their buſineſs to reduce the people, (who at firſt diſſented from the far greater part of the Church,) to an agreement. Now, that there hapned many differences upon this account, even in the Apoſtles times, was a thing not unknown even to the Apoſtles themſelves, as the Book of the Acts does atteſt. For when the Apoſtles underſtood, that a diſturbance was raiſed amongſt the faithful, by reaſon of a diſſention of the Gentiles; being all met together, they promulged a Divine Law, drawing it up in form of a Letter: whereby they freed Believers from a moſt burthenſome ſervitude and vain contention about theſe things; and taught them a moſt exact * way of living well, which would lead them to true piety; mentioning to them only ſuch things as neceſſarily ought to be obſerved. The Epiſtle it ſelf is recorded in the Acts of the Apoſtles: yet nothing hinders but we may inſert it here. * The Apoſtles, and Elders, and Brethren, ſend Greeting unto the Brethren which are of the Gentiles in Antioch, and Syria, and Cilicia. For as much as we have heard, that certain which went out from us, have troubled you with words, ſubverting your ſouls, ſaying, ye muſt be circumciſed, and keep the Law, to whom we gave no ſuch commandment: it ſeemed good unto us, being aſſembled with one accord, to ſend choſen Men unto you, with our Beloved Barnabas and Paul: Men that have hazarded their lives for the name of Our Lord Jeſus Chriſt. We have therefore ſent Judas and Silas, who ſhall alſo tell you the ſame things by mouth. For it ſeemed good to the Holy Ghoſt, and to us, to lay upon you no greater burthen than theſe neceſſary things: that ye abſtain from meats offered to Idols, and from blood, and from things ſtrangled, and from fornication: from which if you keep your ſelves, ye ſhall do well: fare ye well. Theſe things pleaſed God. For theſe are the expreſs words of the Letter, It ſeemed good to the Holy Ghoſt to lay upon you no greater burthen than theſe neceſſaries to be obſerved. Notwithſtanding there are ſome, who diſregarding theſe [Precepts,] ſuppoſe all Fornication to be a thing indifferent; but contend about Holy days, as if it were for their lives: [theſe perſons] invert the commands of God, and make Laws for themſelves, not valuing the Decree of the Apoſtles; nor do they conſider, that they practiſe the contrary to thoſe things which ſeemed good to God. It were indeed poſſible, to have extended our diſcourſe concerning Eaſter much farther, and to have demonſtrated, that the Jews obſerve no exact Rule, either in the time, or manner of [celebrating] the Paſchal ſolemnity; and that the Samaritans, who are a Schiſm of the Jews, do always celebrate this Feſtival after the Æquinox. But this Subject requires a particular and more copious Treatiſe. I only ſay this, that they who ſo affectedly imitate the Jews, and are ſo ſolicitouſly accurate about Types and Figures, ought in no wiſe to diſſent from them, [in any particular whatever.] For, if they have taken a reſolution of obſerving all things with an accuracy; they muſt not only obſerve days and months, but all other things alſo, which Chriſt (conſtituted under the Law) did after the manner of the Jews, or which he ſuffered unjuſtly from the Jews; or [Laſtly], which he wrought typically whileſt he was doing good to all Men. [For inſtance,] he entred into a Ship and taught: He ordered the paſſover to be made ready in an upper room: He commanded the Aſs that was tied to be looſed: He propoſed him, who bore a pitcher of water, as a ſign to them for haſting their preparations of the paſſover: [theſe things, I ſay they muſt obſerve] and infinite others of this nature which are recorded in the Goſpels. And yet they who ſuppoſe themſelves to be juſtified by this Feſtival, make it their buſineſs to obſerve none of theſe things in a bodily manner. For no Doctor ever Preach'd out of a Ship: no Perſon ever went up to an upper room, and celebrated the Paſſover there: they never tyed, and again unlooſed an Aſs that was tyed: [in fine] no perſon ever enjoyned another to carry a pitcher of water, to the end that the Symbols might be fulfilled. For they thought that theſe and ſuchlike things as theſe * ſavoured rather of Judaiſm. For the Jews are ſolicitous about keeping (x) Except thoſe Saturdays in Lent, and in the Ember-weeks. For in Lent the Romans faſted not on Saturdays, as we have ſhown before, at note (g.) in this chapter, from Pope Leo's Sermon concerning Lent. Nor did the Romans faſt on Saturdays in the Faſt of the Ember-weeks; but only on Wedneſdays and Fridays: on Saturdays they watched at St. Peter's Church, as the ſame Leo informs us in his Sermons concerning the Faſt of the tenth month, concerning the Faſt of Pentecoſt, and concerning the Faſt of the ſeventh month. Wherefore, Baronius, Petavius, and Halloixius do undeſervedly reprove our Socrates, becauſe he has ſaid that the Romans faſted not on Saturdays in Lent. Valeſ.

But it may be anſwered, that after Baſilius's death, there was perhaps another uſage obſerved in the Church of Cæſarea. For Socrates ſpeaks of a Rite then in uſe, when he wrote this Hiſtory. Valeſ.

ing their (z) solemn Rites and Ceremonies in their bodies, rather than in their souls. Upon which account they are obnoxious to the Curse, because they conceive the Law of Moses [to consist] in Types and Figures, but [understand it] not according to the truth. But those persons, who are favourers of the Jews, do indeed refer these things to an allegorical sense and meaning: But they raise an irreconcilable War about days and months, contemning an allegorical interpretation of them; in so much that, as to this particular, they themselves as well as the Jews, are of necessity condemned, and bring the sentence of Execration upon themselves. But I think this sufficient to have been said concerning these things. Let us now return to our Subject, whereof we have made mention a little *before: to wit, that the Church [once divided] rested not in that first division; and that those who were divided, did again engage one another, and taking hold of a small and very frivolous pretence, raised mutual separations †and divisions. The Novatians, as I have † said, were divided amongst themselves on account of the Feast of Easter: Nor was the division among them concerning this [Festival] single. For some throughout divers Provinces [observed it] after one manner, others after another; and they disagreed amongst themselves not only about the month, but about the days of the week also, and about other matters of a small importance, part of them holding separate Assemblies, and part joyning in a promiscuous Communion.

(z) The reading here is [τὰ συμβαίνοντα, The accidents;] in which, what sense there can be, I see not. I am of opinion it should be [τὰ σύμβολα, the Symbols] which term Socrates makes use of a little above, where he says, to the end that the Symbols might be fulfilled. By Symbols, Socrates means the Legal Ceremonies and Commands; for instance, Circumcision, which the Jews kept in their bodies, but not in their hearts. Nicephorus has worded this passage in Socrates thus; ᾧ γὰρ ἐμφαίνει τὰ συμβαίνοντα μᾶλλον τοῖς σώμασιν ἢ ταῖς ψυχαῖς σάζειν σπουδάζουσι. Which words Langus renders thus: Siquidem & Judæi ea quæ sic in corporibus accidunt, majore studio, quàm si animabus eveniant, observare contendunt; for the Jews also with a greater industry strive to observe those things which so happen to their bodies, than if they happen to their Souls. You see, that neither Nicephorus, nor his Translator, apprehended Socrates's meaning. Socrates speaks concerning the Jews, who observed the law of works in their bodies, rather than their hearts; whom the Apostle (Rom. 2. 28.) terms Jews outwardly. Vales.

Concerning the Arians at Constantinople, who were also termed the Psathyriani.

MOreover, there arose dissentions amongst the Arians, upon this occasion. The contentious questions daily [started] amongst them, had reduced their discourses to some absurdities. For, whereas it has been always believed in the Church, that God is the Father of the Son, the Word; there hapned this Query amongst them, whether or no God could be called Father even before the Son existed? And, in regard they asserted, that the Word of God was not begotten of the Father, but existed of *nothing; being thus mistaken about the first and chiefest Article of Faith, they deservedly fell into an absurd contentiousness about a bare word. Dorotheus therefore † who had been sent for from Antioch by them, maintained, that [God] neither was nor could be termed a Father, before the Son existed. But Marinus (whom they had called out of Thracia before Dorotheus) having got a fair opportunity, (for he was next because Dorotheus had been preferred before him:) undertook to defend the contrary opinion. For this reason there hapned a dissention amongst them; and being divided on account of the aforesaid Term, each party held separate Meetings. Those under Dorotheus continu'd possest of their own Meeting-houses. But Marinus's followers built themselves private Oratories, wherein they had their Assemblies; and asserted that the Father was always the Father, even when the Son existed not. Moreover, the maintainers of this assertion were termed (a) Psathyriani, because one Theoctistus by Country a Syrian, a * Psathyropola by Trade, was a zealous defender of this Opinion. Selenas Bishop of the Goths became a follower of these persons Tenets: † He was a Man of a mixt descent, a Goth by his father's side, by his mother's a Phrygian. And upon this account he taught in the Church very readily in both these Languages. Further, this faction soon after quarrelled amongst themselves; Marinus disagreeing with Agapius, whom he himself had preferred to the Bishoprick of Ephesus. But these two contended not one with another about [any point of their] Religion, but about * Primacy; the Goths sided with Agapius. Wherefore, many of the Eccleasticks under their jurisdiction (abominating the contest raised between them two, as being the product of their vain-glory,) deserted them, and became adherents to the Homoöusian Faith. When therefore the Arians had continued divided amongst themselves during the space of (b) thirty five years, afterwards, (c) under the Reign of Theodosius Junior, in the Consulate of Plintha Master of the Milice, the Heresie of the Psathyriani, being perswaded to cease from contending, were again united in one body [with the rest of the Arians.] And they made a Sanction [amongst themselves] in form of a Law as it were, that that Query, which had caused the separation between them, should in future never be mentioned. But they could bring this to effect no-where save at Constantinople only. For in other Cities (if any of these two parties chanced to be inhabitants therein,) they persisted in their former separation. Thus much concerning the division amongst the Arians.

CHAP. XXV.

Concerning Eugenius's Tyranny, and the Death of Valentinianus Junior; alſo, concerning the Emperor Theodoſius's Victory over the Tyrant.

IN the Weſtern parts, a Grammarian by name Eugenius, having ſometime been a Teacher of the Latin tongue, afterwards left his School, and undertook a Military Employment in the Emperor's Palace, where he was made (a) Maſter of the Emperor's Desks. And in regard he was a Perſon of great eloquence, and upon that account more highly eſteem'd than others, he could not with moderation bear his proſperous ſucceſs. But, taking one Arbogaſtes (born in (b) Galatia the Leſs, who was Maſter of the Milice, a perſon of a rough Temper, cruel and bloody-minded) to be his Aſſiſtant, he reſolved to uſurp the Imperial Crown. Both theſe Perſons therefore determine to murther the Emperor Valentinianus, having (c) hired the Eunuchs that belonged to the Emperor's Bed-chamber, to be partakers in their deſign. Theſe Eunuchs, having received [from them] promiſes of greater places than they had at preſent, (d) ſtrangled the Emperor in his ſleep. Eugenius therefore immediately poſſeſt himſelf of the ſupream management of affairs in the Weſtern parts of the Empire, and did ſuch things as were likely to be acted by a Tyrant. The Emperor Theodoſius inform'd hereof, was again extreamly diſturbed and diſquieted, in in regard a way was hereby made for other Troubles after [the War waged againſt] Maximus. Having therefore ſummon'd together his Military Forces, and proclaim'd his Son Honorius Auguſtus in his own third Conſulate [which he bore] with Abundantius, on the tenth of January he marched again in great haſte into the Weſtern parts, (e) leaving both his Sons [now created] Auguſti at Conſtantinople. Many of the Barbarians [inhabitants] beyond the Danube follow'd him in this Expedition he undertook againſt Eugenius, coming in voluntarily to give him their aſſiſtance againſt the Tyrant. After ſome ſhort time he arriv'd in the Gallia's with a very numerous Army. For there the Tyrant * had put himſelf into a poſture of receiving him, who alſo had a vaſt Army. They came to an Engagement therefore near the River named Frigidus, which is diſtant (f) from Aquileia thirty ſix miles. In that part of the Armies where the Romans engaged the Romans, the fight was doubtful. But where the Barbarians (who were the Emperor Theodoſius's Auxiliaries,) engaged, Eugenius's forces had much the better. When the Emperor ſaw the great ſlaughter that was made by the Enemy amongſt the Barbarians, being in a great agony, he caſt himſelf upon the ground, calling upon God

Theodoſius.

(a) Ἀντιγραφεὺς τῶν δεσπότου: which I have rendred thus, Magiſter Scriniorum Imperatoris, Maſter of the Emperors Desks: for the Greeks call thoſe ἀντιγραφεῖς, whom the Latins term Magiſtros Scriniorum, Maſters of the Desks; as Cujacius has truly remark'd. But Salmaſius, in his notes on Vopiſcus, pag. 481. affirms, that the ἀντιγραφεῖς were the Proximi of the ſacred Desks, not the Maſters. For his opinion is, that there was only one Maſter of all the Desks, who had under him four Antigraphei or Proximi [that is, Clerks:] to wit, one in each Desk. But Salmaſius is diſproved, firſt by the Theodoſian Code; and ſecondly, by the Notitia Imperii Romani. For, in the Notitia Imperii Romani, there are four Maſters of the Desks of the Roman Emperors reckoned; to wit, the Maſter of the Memory, the Maſter of the Letters, the Maſter of the Libels, and the Maſter of the Greek Letters. And, in the Theodoſian Code, in the ſixth Book, there is a particular Title de Magiſtris ſacrorum Scriniorum, whom the Emperors will have preferred before the Vicarii. But concerning the Proximi, there follows another Title, at a great diſtance from this, wherein the Emperors give order only, that the Proximi, after two years ſpace, ſhould leave the Scrinia, and be followed by the Vicarii. From whence 'tis evident, that the Proximi of the Desks are diſtinguiſhed from the Maſters: for the Maſters were choſen by the Emperors Codicil [or Letters Patents,] as were the reſt of the Officers of the Palace. But the Proximi came to that place by degrees and order of promotion: and they were more than one in every Desk; whereas there was but one Maſter in each Desk. The Proximi therefore are not the ἀντιγραφεῖς; in regard there were only four ἀντιγραφεῖς, as we are inform'd from the Gloſſes of Julianus Anteceſſor. See Petrus Patricius in Excerpt. Legationum. Philoſtorgius relates, that Eugenius was preferr'd to the dignity of a Maſter, before he broke out into his Tyranny. Valeſ.

(b) Inſtead of [Gallia the Leſs,] the reading in the Florentine M.S. is truer, thus [Galatia.] Altho' Arbogaſtes was not born in Gallia, but in Francia, as all Hiſtorians agree. Valeſ.

(d) Valentinianus Junior was murther'd at Vienna, in Arcadius's ſecond Conſulate which he bore with Rufinus; as Idatius rightly informs us in his Faſti. But Marcellinus ſays, that fact was perpetrated in the Conſulate of Tatianus and Symmachus, on the Ides of March. Notwithſtanding, this appears to be falſe, from the fourth and fifth Law in the Theodoſian Code de Apoſtatis. Valeſ.

(e) Zoſimus (in his fourth Book) ſays, that only Arcadius was left by Theodoſius at Conſtantinople; and that Honorius followed his Father in his Expedition againſt Eugenius. The ſame is aſſerted by Marcellinus in his Chronicon. But Philoſtorgius agrees with Socrates. Valeſ.

For Bacurius his own Master of the Milice was so far encouraged, as to run with his Van-guard to that part where the Barbarians were * hardest prest upon by the Enemy, who broke through their Ranks; and routed those that a little before were on the pursuit. There hapned another accident also, worthy of admiration. For a very violent wind arose on a sudden, which retorted the Darts cast by Eugenius's Forces, upon themselves; and moreover, it carried those thrown by Theodosius's Souldiers with a greater force against the Enemy. So prevalent was the Emperor's Prayer. The success of the Battle being after this manner turned, the Tyrant cast himself at the Emperor's feet, and requested that his life might be saved. But the Souldiers beheaded him, as he lay prostrate at the Emperor's feet. These things were done on the sixth of September, in Arcadius's third, and Honorius's second Consulate. But Arbogastes (who had been the Author of these great mischiefs) being on his flight upon the third day after the Battle; as soon as he knew there were no hopes of life for him, ran himself through with his own Sword.

THE SIXTH BOOK OF THE Ecclesiastical History OF SOCRATES SCHOLASTICUS.

The PREFACE.

WE have finish'd the Task enjoyned by You (most Sacred Man of God Theodorus! ) in the Five foregoing Books; wherein, according to our best ability, we have comprized the History of the Church from the Times of Constantine. But you must know, that we have not been curious about our Stile; for we considered, that should we have been careful about an Elegancy of Expression, we might peradventure have mist of our design. Besides, could we have accompliſh'd [our design,] yet we were altogether unable to write such things as are extant in the Composures of Ancient Historians; whereby any one of them might suppose himself able either to amplifie, or disimprove Transactions. Further, such a Stile would in no wise have edified the Many and the Simpler sort of Persons; who are desirous of knowing Affairs only, not *of admiring the Stile for its elegant Compoſure. That therefore our Work might not be unuſeful to both theſe ſorts of Perſons; to the Learned, becauſe 'tis unworthy of being compared with the elegant Stile of Ancient Writers; and to the Unlearned, in regard they cannot attain to [the knowledge of] affairs, being concealed by a Pride and Over-elegancy of Expreſſion: We have deſignedly made uſe of ſuch a Stile, * as ſeems indeed to be lower and more mean, but is notwithſtanding plainer and more conſpicuous.*

* Or, as ſeems indeed to be plainer and more perſpicuous, but is notwithſtanding lower and more mean.

But, before we begin our Sixth Book, we muſt give this Premonition: In regard we undertake [the writing a Narrative] of the Affairs which have hapned in our own Age; we are afraid, leſt we ſhould ſeem to record ſuch things as will diſpleaſe many Perſons: (a) Either becauſe (according to the Proverb,) Truth is bitter; or in regard we mention not their names, whom [all Men] have a great love for, with an Encomium; or, [Laſtly,] becauſe we extol not their Actions. The Zealots of our Religion will condemn us, becauſe we do not give the Biſhops the Title of Moſt dear to God, or Moſt Holy, or ſuch like. Others alſo will ſometimes makes curious Remarks, becauſe we term not the Emperors Moſt Divine, and Lords; nor [do give them] thoſe other Titles which are uſually attrib uted to them. But, in as much as I am able to prove and demonſtrate from the Teſtimony of Ancient Writers, that a (b) Servant amongſt them did uſually call his Maſter by his proper name, and made no account of his Dignity [or Title,] by reaſon of the urgency of Affairs; and in as much as [my endeavour is] to obey the Laws of Hiſtory, which do require a ſincere, pure, and true Narrative of Tranſactions, free from all manner of Masks and Covers; I will in future proceed in the ſame Narration; recording thoſe things which either I my ſelf ſaw, or could learn from thoſe who had ſeen them; and making a judgment of the Truth from their not varying in their Relations, who told me them. But, my Labour in diſcovering the Truth hath been great, in regard many, and thoſe different Perſons, gave me an account of Affairs; ſome of whom affirming they were preſent at the tranſacting of theſe things; and others aſſerting they knew them better than any other Perſons.

(a) This whole Clauſe [either becauſe (according to the Proverb,) Truth is bitter] is in my judgment to be expunged, in regard it diſturbs the Senſe. Or, if it has a place here, it muſt be put at the cloſe of the period, after theſe Words [extol not their Actions.] If this diſpleaſes any one; 'twill be ſufficient, to expunge the particle [n, either,] and put this Clauſe to the head of that following. Valeſ.

(b) To wit, in the Comœdies of Menander, and others. You may ſee the ſame in Plautus's and Terentius's Latine Comœdies; wherein the Servants do uſually call their Maſters barely by their Names. Valeſ.

CHAP. I.

That after the Death of the Emperor Theodoſius, when his Sons had divided the Empire [between them,] and Arcadius had met the Army returning from Italy, after ſome ſhort ſtay there; Rufinus the Præfectus Prætorio was killed by the Souldiers at the Emperor's Feet.

Arcadius and Honorius.

THE Emperor Theodoſius having ended his Life in the Conſulate of Olybrius and Probinus, on the ſeventeenth of the month January; his Sons ſucceeded him in the Roman Empire. Arcadius had the Government of the Eaſtern Empire, and Honorius of the Weſtern. [The Biſhops] who preſided over the Churches at that time, were Damaſus in the Imperial [City] Rome; Theophilus at Alexandria; Johannes was in poſſeſſion of the Churches at Jeruſalem; and Flavianus of thoſe at Antioch. At Conſtantinople, [termed alſo] New Rome, Nectarius filled the [Epiſcopal] Chair, as we have related in the foregoing Book. About the eighth of the month November, in the ſame Conſulate, Theodoſius's Body was brought [to Conſtantinople,] and interred by his Son Arcadius with an honourable and ſolemn Funeral. Not long after this, on the eight and twentieth of the ſame month, the Army alſo arrived, which had been employed in the War againſt the Tyrant, under the Emperor Theodoſius's command. When therefore the Emperor Arcadius (agreeable to the uſual cuſtom) had met the Army without the City-gates, the Souldiers at that time ſlew Rufinus the Emperor's Præfectus Prætorio. For Rufinus lay under a ſuſpicion of turning Tyrant, and 'twas believed, that he had called the (a) Hunni (a barbarous Nation) into the Roman Territories. For at that time they deſtroyed Armenia, and ſome parts of the Eaſt, by making Incurſions into thoſe Provinces. Moreover, on the ſame day whereon Rufinus was killed, Marcianus Biſhop of the Novatians died. He was ſucceeded in that Biſhoprick by Siſinnius, of whom we have made mention * above.

* See Book 5. Ch. 21.

Arcadius and Honorius.

(a) Zoſimus (Book 5.) relates, that Alaricus and the Goths, not the Hunni, were ſollicited by Rufinus, to invade the Roman Provinces. The ſame is aſſerted by Marcellinus in his Chronicon. But Sozomen (Book 8. chap. 1.) agrees with Socrates. Nor, is there any diſagreement between the forecited Authors. For Rufinus called in both thoſe Nations againſt the Romans; the Goths firſt, under their Chief, Alaricus: After the Goths were routed by Stilichon, he excited the Hunni to aſſiſt the Goths, as Claudian tells us, in his firſt Book againſt Rufinus; and in his ſecond Book, he ſets forth the ſame more clearly, near the beginning thereof. But Sigonius, in his tenth Book de Occidentali Imperio, where he makes it his buſineſs to relate this whole Story, ſpeaks not one Word concerning this Irruption of the Hunni; which negligence of his is inexcuſable. Valeſ.

CHAP. II.

Concerning Nectarius's Death, and the Ordination of Johannes.

WIthin a ſmall interval of time, Nectarius alſo, Biſhop of Conſtantinople, departed this life, in the Conſulate of Cæſarius and Atticus, about the twenty ſeventh of the month September. Forthwith therefore, a * Contention aroſe about the Ordination of a Biſhop; and ſome deſired one Perſon, others another. When a Conſult had been ſeveral times held about this matter, it was at laſt concluded on, that † Johannes a Presbyter of the Antiochian Church, ſhould be ſent for from Antioch. For a fame was ſpread concerning him, for his || Learning and Eloquence. Within ſome ſmall ſpace of time therefore, the Emperor Arcadius (with the common conſent of all Perſons, I mean the Clergy, Clergy, as well as Laity) sends for him. And, to the end that his Ordination might be accompliſh'd with more of firmneſs and authority, by the Emperor's order many other Prelates were preſent, as was alſo Theophilus [Biſhop] of Alexandria; who made it his buſineſs to * blacken Johannes's glory, and to promote Iſidorus (a Presbyter under himſelf) to the Biſhoprick; whom he had a great love for, becauſe Iſidorus had undertaken a very dangerous affair upon his account. What that buſineſs was, we muſt now declare. When the Emperor Theodoſius was actually engaged in a War againſt the Tyrant Maximus, Theophilus ſent Preſents by Iſidorus to the Emperor, and deliver'd two Letters to him, ordering him, to preſent the Gifts and Letters to him that ſhould be Conqueror. Iſidorus, in obedience to theſe commands, arriving at Rome, ſtaid there expecting the * Event of the War. But this buſineſs could not lie long concealed; for a Reader who accompanied him, ſtole the Letters privately. On which account Iſidorus being in a great fear, fled forthwith to Alexandria. This was the occaſion of Theophilus's being ſo highly concern'd for Iſidorus. But [the Grandees] of the Imperial Palace, gave Johannes the preference. And in regard many Perſons raiſed Accuſations againſt Theophilus, and preſented Libels (ſome upon one account, others on another) againſt him, to the Biſhops that were preſent; Eutropius the chief Perſon of the Bed chamber to the Emperor, took the written Accuſations, and ſhew'd them to Theophilus, bidding him take his choice, whether he would Ordain Johannes, or be brought to his Tryal, and anſwer the Accuſations on foot againſt him. Theophilus terrified herewith, Ordained Johannes. Johannes therefore being Ordained, was ſeated in the Epiſcopal Chair, in order to [his bearing] the Office of a Biſhop, on the twenty-ſixth of February, in the following Conſulate, (a) which the Emperor Honorius celebrated at Rome, and Eutychianus (at that time (b) Præfectus Prætorio) at Conſtantinople, with Games and Sports. But in regard this Johannes is famous, both for the Books he left written, and alſo for the many Troubles he fell into, I judge it fit not to paſs his affairs over in ſilence, but relate as compendiouſly as 'tis poſſible, what might be declared more at large; and to ſet forth whence he was, from whom extracted, how he was called to the Epiſcopate, after what manner he was deprived of it; and [laſtly,] upon what account he was more honour'd after his death, than whilſt he was living.

For in the Greek it muſt be [τῆς Βασιλείων.] The ſame miſtake in the ſame Word I have taken notice of before. Eutychianus therefore was Conſul and Præfectus Prætorio on the ſame year; which was the common uſage of thoſe times, as 'tis apparent from the Theodoſian Code. CHAP. III.

Concerning the Deſcent and Education of Johannes Biſhop of Conſtantinople.

JOhannes therefore was born at Antioch [a City] of Syria-Cœle, the Son of Secundus, and his Mother's name was Anthuſa, perſons of a noble Family in that Country. He was Scholar to Libanius the Sophiſta, and an hearer of Andragathius the Philoſopher. Being ready to betake himſelf to the practice of the Civil Law, and perceiving how laborious and unjuſt a life they lead, (a) who are converſant in the * Forum, he choſe rather to follow a quieter ſort of life. And this he did, in imitation of (b) Evagrius; who having been educated under the ſame Maſters, had long before betaken himſelf to a more ſedate and quieter courſe of life. Changing therefore forthwith his Garb and his Gate, he applied his mind to reading the Sacred Scriptures, and frequently went in great haſte to the Church [on account of praying.] Moreover, he perſwades Theodorus and Maximus (who had been his School-fellows under Libanius the Sophiſta) to leave their Profeſſion which had a reſpect to nothing but gain, and betake themſelves to a more ſimple and meaner courſe of life. Of theſe two Perſons, Theodorus was afterwards Biſhop of Mopſueſtia a City in Cilicia; and Maximus of Seleucia in Iſauria. But being at that time very ſtudious and diligent about Virtue, they were inſtructed in a monaſtick courſe of life by Diodorus and Carterius, who then preſided over the (c) Monaſteries.

Arcadius and Honorius.

* Or, Courts of Judicature.

(a) That conjecture diſpleaſes me not, which came heretofore into my Mind, to wit, that at this place, inſtead of [τὸν ἐν τοῖς δικαστηρίοις] it ſhould be [τῆς ἐν τοῖς δικαστηρίοις.] Further, Socrates and Sozomen do indeed affirm, that John Chryſoſtome did not follow the Practice of the Civil Law. For they ſay, that he went from Libanius's School, when it was ſuppoſed he would have pleaded cauſes, and on a ſudden betook himſelf to a quieter ſort of life. Notwithſtanding there are thoſe who do affirm, that for ſome time he did plead Cauſes. Which ſeems to be intimated by Libanius's Epiſtle, which Iſidorus Peluſiota records Book 2. Epiſtol. But that Epiſtle of Libanius's is, I fear, written to ſome other Johannes, who then pleaded Cauſes at Conſtantinople, and ſpoke a Panegyrick there to Theodoſius, on account of his aſſuming his Sons to be his Colleagues in the Empire. Now, our Chryſoſtome (who went from Libanius's School about the beginning of Valens's Reign,) neither left Antioch, that Libanius (who profeſt Rhetorick at Antioch) might write Letters to him being abſent; nor could he praiſe Theodoſius, who at that time was not Emperor. Nor can Libanius's Words be underſtood of any other Emperor, than of Theodoſius. who took in his Sons to be Partners with him in the Empire. However, that Chryſoſtome did for ſome time practiſe the Civil Law, is apparent from the beginning of his firſt Book de Sacerdotio. Valeſ.

(b) What Evagrius this ſhould be, who having left Libanius's Auditory long before Chryſoſtome had embraced a pious and religious courſe of life, 'tis hard to determine. For I cannot think it was Evagrius of Pontus, who wa afterwards a Deacon at Conſtantinople, under Gregorius Nazianzenus, and under Nectarius; and thence remov'd into the Solitudes of Egypt. Baronius, at the year of Chriſt 382, calls this Evagrius, Chryſoſtome's School-fellow, Evagrius Junior, Son of the moſt noble Evagrius a Citizen of Antioch; and ſays that he went into the Deſart before Chryſoſtome, and led a monaſtick Life under Diodorus and Carterius. But, I know not what authority Baronius had for this, nor why he ſhould term this Perſon Evagrius Junior. Unleſs perhaps he has called this Perſon Evagrius Junior, to diſtinguiſh him from Evagrius Senior the Antiochian, whom he had made mention of before at the year of Chriſt 372, from Baſilius Magnus's Epiſtle to Euſebius of Samoſata; the Words whereof are theſe: ὁ πρεσβύτερος Εὐάγριος ὁ υἱὸς πομπηϊανοῦ τοῦ ἀντιοχέως, ὁ συναπάρας ποτὲ ἐπὶ τὴν δύσιν τῷ μακαρίῳ Εὐσεβίῳ. The Presbyter Evagrius, the Son of Pompeianus of Antioch, who ſometimes went into the Weſt with the Bleſſed Euſebius. The Latin Tranſlator has rendred it Evagrius Senior, &c; whereas he ſhould have tranſlated it, Evagrius the Presbyter, &c; concerning whom Hieronymus (in the Chronicon of Euſebius) writes thus: Zenobia apud Immas, haud longe ab Antiochia Vincitur, &c. Zenobia is conquered at Immæ, not far from Antioch; in which fight Pompeianus the Commander, ſurnamed Francus, fought moſt valiantly againſt her: his Family continues at this Day at Antioch, from whoſe Race our deareſt Evagrius the Presbyter deſcended. Jerome makes mention of the ſame Perſon in his Book de Scriptor. Eccleſ. And in my judgment, this is the Evagrius, Chryſoſtome's School-fellow, whom Socrates mentions here. For, what Baronius writes concerning Evagrius Junior, is founded on no Author. Valeſ.

(c) Inſtead of [ἀσκητηείῳ[which is the Dative Caſe, the Rules of Grammar do require it ſhould be [ἀσκητηείων, over the monaſteries] in the Genitive Caſe: the reading in Sozomen is the ſame, as was alſo that in Epiphanius Scholaſticus's Copy, as appears from his Verſion. Further, Baronius (following indeed the Greek Writers) is of opinion, that theſe Monaſteries of Diodorus, and Carterius, were ſituated without the City. But a Learned Perſon, who has lately publiſhed the Life of Johh Chryſoſtome in French, does affirm they were within the City of Antioch: to whom notwithſtanding I cannot aſſent. 'Tis more probable, that theſe Little Houſes were placed in the Suburbs, to the end that Pious and Religious Perſons, who were continually imployed in Contemplation and reading of the ſacred Books, might be far remote from noiſe and diſturbance. But what the ſame Learned Perſon objects out of Theodoret, (to wit, That Diodorus was continually converſant in Antioch, and made a couragious reſiſtance againſt the rage and force of the Arians;) does in no wiſe weaken our opinion. For Diodorus, as often as he pleaſed, could eaſily come out of a Monaſtery in the Suburbs, into the City. Valeſ.

Of theſe two Diodorus, afterwards made Biſhop of Tarſus, wrote many Books, being intent upon the bare Letter [and obvious ſenſe] of the Sacred Scriptures; but avoiding the (d) Allegorical interpretation thereof. Thus far concerning theſe Perſons. Moreover, Johannes, (who (e) converſt frequently and familiarly with Baſilius (f) at that time ordained a Deacon by Meletius, but afterwards conſtituted Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia) was made Reader of the Antiochian Church, by (g) Zeno the Biſhop in his return from Jeruſalem. Whilſt he continued in the degree of a Reader, he wrote a Book againſt the Jews. Having not long after obtained the dignity of a Deacon from Meletius, he wrote his Books concerning Prieſthood, and thoſe againſt Stagirius: Moreover, thoſe concerning the incomprehenſible nature of God, and thoſe concerning * ſubintroduced women. After this, when Meletius was dead at Conſtantinople; (for he made a journey thither, on account of Gregorius Nazianzenus's Ordination:) Johannes made a ſeparation from the † Meletianiſts, nor did he communicate with Paulinus; but lived quietly for the ſpace of three whole years. Afterwards, when Paulinus was dead, he is ordained Presbyter by (h) Evagrius, Paulinus's ſucceſſor. This (to ſpeak compendiouſly) was Johannes's courſe of life, before his being made Biſhop. He was a Perſon (as 'tis ſaid) ſower and moroſe, by reaſon of his [overmuch] Zeal for temperance; and (as one of his intimadoes has reported;) from his younger years more addicted to anger, than baſhfulneſs. Becauſe of his * Sanctity of Life, he was not cautious and circumſpect in relation to things future; and by reaſon of his ‖ plainneſs, he was open and eaſie. He uſed too great a liberty in ſpeaking to thoſe who diſcourſed him. In his teaching, he made it his chief buſineſs to improve the Morals of his hearers: and in his conferences, he was ſuppoſed by thoſe who knew him not, to be proud and arrogant.

(d) Sozomen ſays the ſame of Diodorus Biſhop of Tarſus; that he expounded the ſacred Scriptures, πρὸς τὸ ῥητὸν, literally; but avoided the more abſtruſe and myſtical ſenſe. Jerome ſays the ſame concerning him, in his Book de Scripto. Eccleſ. Extant ejus in Apoſtolum Commentarii, &c. his Comments upon the Apoſtle are extant, and many other pieces, belonging rather to Euſebius Emiſenus's Character: whoſe ſenſe altho' he has followed, yet it could not imitate his eloquence, becauſe of his ignorance in Humane [or Secular] Learning. Jerom ſays, that Diodorus has followed Euſebius Emiſenus's ſenſe, that is, his method in explaining the Scriptures. Let us ſee therefore, what ſenſe Euſebius Emiſenus has followed. Jerome himſelf will inform us; whoſe Words concerning Euſebius Emiſenus are theſe: Magiſque Hiſtoriam Secutus, ab iis qui declamare volunt, ſtudioſiſſime legitur, and having rather followed Hiſtory, he is moſt ſtudiouſly read by thoſe, who have a mind to declaim. From whence it appears that Euſebius in his expoſition of the Scriptures, has chiefly followed the Hiſtorical and Literal ſenſe; but has not touched the Myſtick and Allegorical. For the term Θεωρία comprehends theſe ſenſes. Allegoria therefore differs from Theoria, as a ſpecies does from the Genus. Indeed, Diodorus Biſhop of Tarſus, of whom we now ſpeak, had written a Book with this Title, Τίς διαφορὰ Θεωρίας καὶ Ἀλληγορίας, that is, what may be the difference between Theoria and Allegoria. But I wonder at Jerome, who ſays that Diodorus was inſtructed neither in Eloquence, nor in the knowledge of humane Learning. And yet Theodoret (Hiſtor. Book 4.) compares his eloquence to a moſt limpid River; and Photius in his Bibliotheca) does atteſt, that in his diſcourſes he was clear and perſpicuous. Valeſ.

(e) That Chryſoſtome converſt familiarly with Baſilius, 'tis evident from Chryſoſtome's Books de Sacerdotio. But who that Baſilius was, concerning whom Chryſoſtome ſpeaks in thoſe Books, 'tis uncertain. Socrates does in this place affirm, that it was Baſilius Magnus. Photius (in his Bibliotheca) ſays it was Baſilius Biſhop of Seleucia. Baronius (at the year of Chriſt 382,) does deſervedly diſprove both theſe Opinions. Chryſoſtome ('tis certain) does atteſt in the beginning of his Book, that himſelf and that Baſilius, concerning whom he there ſpeaks, had always the ſame Maſters. Now Baſilius Magnus learnt Rhetorick at Athens: but Chryſoſtome was Libanius's hearer at Antioch a long while after that. If that were Baſilius the Great, whom Chryſoſtome affirms to have obtained the principal place amongſt his own Companions and Friends, doubtleſs ſome footſteps of his Friendſhip would at this day be extant in Baſilius's Epiſtles. But, amongſt ſo many of his Epiſtles which have been preſerved to our times, there occurs not one, written to our Johannes. Wherefore I agree with Baronius, who ſays, that that Baſilius who was companion to Chryſoſtome, was Baſilius Biſhop of Raphanea, or elſe Baſilius Biſhop of Byblus. For both theſe Perſons were Chryſoſtome's Contemporaries, in regard they ſubſcribed the Conſtantinopolitane Council. Valeſ.

(f) Inſtead of [πώ ποτε μὲν διακόνῳ, ſometimes made a Deacon, &c.] In my judgment it ſhould be [πώ τότε μὲν διακόνῳ, at that time made Deacon, &c.] For it follows [but afterwards conſtituted Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia.] Epiphanius Scholaſticus confirms our conjecture, as 'tis apparent from his Verſion; for thus he renders it, qui tunc à Meletio factus erat Diaconus, who was then made Deacon by Meletius. Further, Baſil was made Deacon by Meletius Biſhop of Antioch. But that Book is ſtuft with Fables and Lies. Doubtleſs, in regard Baſil the Great was by lawful degrees promoted to be Reader and Presbyter at Cæſarea, (as Gregorious Nazianzenus does atteſt, in his Funeral Oration concerning the praiſes of the ſame Baſilius) 'tis ſcarce credible, that he ſhould have been made Deacon any where elſe, but at Cæſarea. Valeſ.

(g) Nicephorus (what Author he follows, I know not,) makes this Zeno, Biſhop of Gaza or Majuma. But, whereas Zeno was created Biſhop of Majuma in the Reign of Theodoſius, (as Sozomen relates Book 5. chap. 8.) he muſt neceſſarily be a different Perſon from that Zeno who ordained Chryſoſtome Reader; in regard Chryſoſtome was made a Reader in Valens Auguſtus's Reign, about the year of our Lord 370. But Baronius (at the Year of Chriſt 382.) ſays that this Zeno (by whom Chryſoſtome was ordained a Reader of Antioch) was Biſhop of Tyre, the ſame Perſon who was preſent at the Conſtantinopolitan Council; and was then (Meletius being abſent) his Deputy in the Church of Antioch. In which thing I do really aſſent to Baronius. But whereas he reproves Socrates there, for his ſaying, that Zeno was Biſhop of Jeruſalem; therein the Cardinal is evidently miſtaken. For Socrates does not make Zeno Biſhop of Jeruſalem; he only ſays, that Zeno the Biſhop, returning from Jeruſalem, Ordained Chryſoſtome Reader of Antioch. Now Zeno had made a journey to Jeruſalem, either on the account of Prayer, (as it was the cuſtom of thoſe times,) or by reaſon of ſome Eccleſiaſtick Affair. But here ariſes a difficulty. For, if Zeno in his return from Jeruſalem, Ordained Chryſoſtome Reader of Antioch; the City of which he was Biſhop, muſt neceſſarily be farther remote from Jeruſalem, than Antioch was; or at leaſt it muſt lie at the ſide of Antioch. Which cannot be ſaid of the Cities Tyre, and Gaza. For both thoſe are far nearer to Jeruſalem, than Antioch is. Therefore, this Zeno, who ordained Chryſoſtome Reader of Antioch, was Biſhop of ſome other City. In Baſil the Great's 69th Epiſtle, there is mention of one Zeno a Biſhop, who was preſent at the Antiochian Council under Meletius: but the name of his See is not ſet down. I know Palladius (in the Life of Chryſoſtome) does relate, that Chryſoſtome was ordained Reader by Meletius. But this, in my judgment, is ſo to be underſtood, that that may be ſaid to have been done by Meletius, which was performed by Zeno, ſupplying his place. Valeſ.

† That is, Meletius's party.

(h) This is the Evagrius, of whom we have ſpoken at note (b) in this Chapter. But, what Socrates ſays, (to wit, that Chryſoſtome was ordained Preſbyter, by Evagrius,) has but little of probability. For, if that be true which Socrates ſays, (I mean, that Chryſoſtome, after Meletius's death, abſtained from Paulinus's Communion;) how can it be ſuppoſed that Chryſoſtome ſhould admit of Evagrius's Ordination, who was Succeſſor to Paulinus? It is better therefore to follow Palladius, Simeon Metaphraſtes, and others, who relate that Chryſoſtome was promoted to the Presbyterate by Flavianus the Biſhop. Valeſ.

Concerning Serapion the Deacon, and how by his inſtigation Johannes became offended with, and an enemy to his Clergy.

THis being the humour and diſpoſition of Johannes, after his promotion to the * Epiſcopate, he was more ſupercilious and ſevere towards his Clergy than was fitting; his deſign in that being (as he expected,) to rectifie the lives of thoſe under him. Immediately therefore

* Biſhoprick.

Arcadius and Honorius. fore at his very entry [upon the Bishoprick] he seemed rough and austere to the Ecclesiasticks, and incurred their Odium*, many of them became his Enemies, and declined him as an angry person. Serapion his Deacon incited him to † alienate all Mens minds from himself. And on a time, when all the Clergy were present, he spake aloud to the Bishop, after this manner, You will never be able (O Bishop!) to get the mastery over these Persons, unless you drive them all out with one Rod. This expression of his excited an Odium against the Bishop. Not long after the Bishop ejected many Persons out of the Church, some for one reason, others for another. But they (as it usually happens in such violent proceedings of Governors,) enter into a Combination against him, and calumniated him to the People. That which induced the hearers to a belief of what was spoken against him, was, that the Bishop would not eat with any body, nor would he upon any invitation go to a Feast. Upon which account most especially, the Calumny against him improved, and grew greater. Upon what design ‖ he refused to eat with any Person, no one could ever certainly tell. For those who are desirous of defending him, say that he had a very weak Stomach, and could hardly digest meat; for which reason he did eat alone. Others affirm, he did this on account of his Ascetick and most severe course of life. Whatever of truth there was in this matter, it was of no small advantage to his Accusers, in order to their calumniating him. Notwithstanding, the People did highly approve of him upon account of the Sermons he preach'd in the Church, loved the Man exceedingly, and disregarded those Persons who attempted to accuse him. Moreover, what his Sermons were, (as well those published by himself, as them taken by the Notaries from his mouth as he preach'd them,) how elegant, inviting and perswasive; it is needless now to declare, in regard those that are desirous may read them, and reap abundant benefit from them.

CHAP. V.

That Johannes differed not only with the Clergy, but with the Magistracy also. And concerning Eutropius the Eunuch.

AS long as Johannes was offensive to the Clergy only, the designs framed against him were weak and infirm. But after he attempted to reprove many of the Magistracy also, beyond the bounds of what was fit, then the envy against him was much more enkindled. Many things were spoken against him, most whereof were in future believed by the Hearers. But that which made an addition to the calumny, was the Oration at that time spoken by him against Eutropius. For Eutropius the Eunuch (the chief Person of the Bed-chamber to the Emperor, the † first Eunuch that was vouchsafed the dignity of a Consul by the Emperor,) desirous to be revenged upon some persons who had taken sanctuary in the Church, made it his business to get an Edict published by the Emperors, prohibiting any Person from flying into the Churches for sanctuary; but that such as had fled thither should by force be drawn out thence. But [Divine] Vengeance follow'd immediately hereupon: for the Law was promulged, and not long after Eutropius himself, having offended the Emperor, made his escape into the Church. The Bishop therefore (whilst Eutropius lay under the Altar, and was terrified with fear,) (a) sitting in the Pulpit (out of which it had before been his usage to preach, in order to his being heard more easily;) made an Oration in reproof of him. Whereupon he seem'd to give a greater offence to some Persons, because he was not only incompassionate towards an unfortunate Man, but on the contrary even reproved him. Eutropius therefore at that time bearing the Consulate, was by the Emperor's order beheaded, for some crimes [he had committed.] His name was rased also out of the † Fasti Consulares, and only Theodorus's name, who had been his Colleague in the Consulate, was (b) recorded therein. 'Tis reported likewise, that Bishop Johannes, making use of his usual freedom and boldness in speaking, did sharply reprove Gaina also, at that time Master of the Milice, because he took the confidence to make a request to the Emperor, that one of the Churches within the City might be assign'd to the Arians, who were of the same opinion with himself. He also reproved several other of the Grandees upon various accounts, with much freedom and boldness; by reason of which liberty of his, he gained the Ill-will of many Persons. Wherefore, Theophilus also Bishop of Alexandria, soon after Johannes's Ordination, began to consider, how he might undermine and ruin him. And with some Persons that were present he discoursed privately concerning that affair; but he imparted his own design [by Letters] to many others who were at a great distance. For he was not only vexed at Johannes's too great boldness; but also because he had not been able to promote Isidorus, a Presbyter under him, to the Bishoprick of Constantinople. In this posture were Bishop Johannes's affairs; and immediately, at the very beginning of his Episcopate, he felt the pangs of Mischief and Disquietude. But we will declare the matters that concern him, in the procedure of our History.

(a) From this place 'tis apparent, that the Bishops heretofore did not usually Preach to the People out of the Pulpit. For this Socrates takes notice of as a thing singular in Chrysostome, to wit, That being about to make an Oration, he went up into the Pulpit, that he might be the easier heard by the People. Most commonly the Bishops Preached standing on the steps of the Altar. We are informed hereof from King Childebert's Constitution, which Sirmondus has recorded, in his first Tome of the Councils of France, pag. 300; but it is there imperfect. We will make good one defect in it, from the most ancient Corbeiensian Manuscript, after this manner: Qualiter in sacrilegos Dei injuria vindicetur, nostrum est pertractandum. Et quia fides nostra ut verbo de altario sacerdote faciente quæcunque de Evangelio, Prophetis vel Apostolo fuerit adnuntiatum, in quantum Deus dat intellectum: ad nos querimonia processit, &c. The sense of these Words, which are very corrupt, is this: Because the Priests have complained, whilest they make Sermons to the People, that the Bansatrices [what the import of that Word is, I cannot find] walk through the fields, and recal the People from the Church; Therefore we command, &c. See Baronius at the year of Christ 407, number 17. Vales.

Concerning the Tyranny of Gaïna the Goth, and the Disturbance raised at Constantinople; and concerning his Death.

I Will now relate an affair worthy to be recorded, which hapned at this very time; and will demonstrate, how Divine Providence freed the City and Roman State from the greatest danger imaginable, by unexpected assistances. What that was must now be declared. Gaina was by extract a Barbarian. Having made himself a

Arcadius and Honorius.

Subject to the Romans, and ingaged in a Military Employ, he rose by degrees, and was at length constituted General both of the Roman Horse and Foot. When he had gotten so great a power, he knew not himself, nor could he moderate his own mind. But (as the saying is) moved every stone, that he might render the Roman Empire subject unto himself. He sent for the whole nation of the Goths, out of their own Country. (a) And took care that such as were his relations should have the Command of the Military Forces. [Moreover,] when Tribigildus (one of his kindred, Tribune of those Soldiers lodged in Phrygia,) * raised a Rebellion by Gaïna's instigation, and ruined the whole Province of Phrygia. Gaïna orders the matter so, that the care of affairs there should be committed to himself; to which the Emperor Arcadius foreknowing nothing [of his design,] readily yielded. Gaïna therefore forthwith made an Expedition, pretendedly indeed against Tribigildus; but in reality, with a resolution to turn Tyrant. He took along with him a vast multitude of the Barbarous Goths: And when he was arrived in Phrygia, laid all places desolate. The Romans were on a sudden mightily disturbed, not only by reason of the vast number of Barbarians who were with Gaïna, but also in regard the [fertilest and] most useful Provinces of the East were highly endanger'd. But then the Emperor, in relation to the present juncture of affairs, made use of a prudent and useful advice, and by subtlety made an attempt upon the * Barbarian. Having therefore sent [Ambassadors] to him, he took a resolution of appeasing him as well by words, as deeds. Upon Gaïna's demanding two of the eminentest Personages of the Senatorian Order (who had born the Consulate, to wit, Saturninus and Aurelianus, (b) Persons whom he look't upon as hinderers of his designs;) to be Hostages; the Emperor, in compliance with the necessity of that time, deliver'd them, tho' unwillingly. These two Persons, prepared to undergo death for the good of the publick, with a couragious mind obey'd the Emperor's Command. And went forth to meet the Barbarian, some distance from Chalcedon, at a place term'd the Hippodrome; being ready to endure whatever he should inflict. However, they suffered no harm. But Gaïna made use of * dissimulation, and came to Chalcedon, whither the Emperor Arcadius also went to meet him. The Emperor and the Barbarian going both into that Church, where the body of the Martyr Euphemia is deposited, bound themselves in a mutual Oath, that they would not frame designs one against the other. The Emperor, a Person that had a pious and religious esteem for an Oath, and was upon that account beloved by God, kept the ingagement he had entred into: But Gaïna violated it, and receded not from the design he had proposed to himself; but was intent upon causing burnings and plunderings, both at Constantinople, and also (if he could have effected it) over the whole Roman Empire. The * City therefore was turned into a Barbary, by reason of the innumerable multitudes of Barbarians, and its Inhabitants had the treatment of Captives. [Moreover,] so great was the danger which hung over the City, that a vast Comet, which reached from Heaven even to the Earth, the like to which no Man ever saw before, gave an Indication thereof. Gaïna therefore in the first place impudently attempted to make plunder of the Silver, publickly exposed to sale in the Shops: But when, by a preceding rumour thereof, [the Money-changers] abstained from exposing their Silver on their Tables; he betook himself to another design. And in the dead of the night he sends a great number of Barbarians to burn down the Palace. At which time it was perspicuously manifested, how great a care God had of the City: For a multitude of Angels appeared to the Traytors, in the form of armed Men of a vast stature; whom the Barbarians conjecturing to be in reality a numerous and valiant Army, were astonished thereat, and departed. When this was told to Gaïna, it seemed incredible to him. For he well knew, that the greatest part of the Roman Army was then absent, being engarison'd in the Cities [of the East.] On the next night therefore, and on many nights afterwards, he sent other persons. But when he had sent (c) several Men, who still brought him the same news; (for God's Angels always appeared in the same form to the Traytors:) at length he himself went accompanied with a great multitude, to be a spectator of the Miracle. Supposing them really to be an * army of Soldiers, which on the day-time lay concealed, and in the night opposed his attempts; he framed a design, prejudicial (as he thought) to the Romans, but which (as the event demonstrated) was of great advantage to them. For feigning himself to be possest with a Devil, upon a pretence of prayer, he goes to the Church of John the Apostle, which is seven miles distant from the City. The Barbarians went out with him, and carried out their Arms covertly, hiding them partly in Tuns, and partly making use of other devices. But when the Guard that kept the City-gates, having discover'd the trick, would not suffer them to carry out their Weapons, the Barbarians drew their Swords, and slew those that guarded the Gates. Hereupon arose a horrid tumult in the City, and death seem'd to be impendent on all persons. Notwithstanding, at that time the City suffer'd no harm, all its Gates being strongly fortified. But the Emperor made a seasonable use of prudent advice, and having proclaim'd Gaïna a publick Enemy, he commanded those Barbarians who were left in the City to be slain. One day (d) after the Men that guarded the gates had been slain, the Souldiers that were present engage the Barbarians within the City-gates, near the Church of the Goths. For all the Barbarians who were left in the City, flock'd thither. They burnt the Church, and slew a great many of the Barbarians. Gaïna, informed that those Moreover, of these two Persons Aurelianus bore the Consulate on this very year with Stilichon: Saturninus had been Consul long before with Merobaudes, in the times of Theodosius Senior. those of his Party who could not get out of the City were slain; and perceiving that his artifices were unsuccessful to himself, left [St. John's] Church, and went in great haste into Thracia. Being come to Cherronesus, he endeavoured to pass over from thence, and take Lampsacus, that from that place he might make himself Master of the Eastern parts. But upon the Emperor's sending Forces immediately both by Land and Sea, there appear'd another admirable effect of Divine Providence. For whilst the Barbarians, wanting Vessels, patch'd up Ships in great haste and disorder, wherein they might make their passage; on a sudden the Roman Navy appear'd in sight, and a West-wind blew hard. The Romans had a safe and easie passage in their Ships; but the Barbarians, together with their Horses in their Ships, were tossed up and down and dispersed by a Storm, and at length perish'd in the Sea. Many of them also were destroy'd by the Romans. After this manner a numerous multitude of Barbarians at that time lost their lives in their passage: But Gaina got away from thence, and flying through Thracia, falls into the hands of another party of the Roman Forces, by whom he is slain, together with the Barbarians in his company. Let thus much be sufficient to have been said (e) cursorily concerning Gaina. If any one be desirous of having an accurate account concerning the transactions of that War, let him read the Gainëa written by Eusebius (f) Scholasticus, who at that time was an Auditor of Tro lus the Sophista: and having been a Spectator in that War, he related the transactions thereof in four Books, written in Heroick Verse. For which Poem he was much admir'd, whilst the memory of things was fresh. And very lately Ammonius the Poet has made a Poem upon the same subject, and recited it before the Emperor Theodosius Junior, in his sixteenth Consulate which he bore with Faustus; on account whereof he has gotten a great repute. Moreover, this War was ended on the Consulate of Stilichon and Aurelianus. And the year following Fravitus bore a Consulate, a Personage by extract indeed a Goth, but one who had expreſt much of kindness and fidelity towards the Romans, and had done them excellent service in this very War. On which account he had the dignity of a Consulate bestow'd upon him; in whose year the Emperor Arcadius had a Son born, Theodosius the Good, on the tenth of * April. Let thus much be said concerning these things. [Further,] whilst the affairs of the Roman State were thus tempestuous, those intrusted with the Prelacy, abstained not in the least from framing designs and plots one against another, to the reproach and disgrace of the Christian Religion: For at this very time the Bishops employ'd their thoughts about raising Tumults and Insurrections against one another. Which mischief took its beginning from Egypt, upon this account.

Arcadius and Honorius.

Concerning the Dissention which hapned between Theophilus [Bishop] of Alexandria, and the Monasticks in the Solitude. And how Theophilus Anathematized Origen's Books.

A Little before this, a question had been started, whether God were a Body, and had a Human shape; or whether He were incorporeal and foreign, not only to an Human, but to any other bodily shape and figure whatever. By reason of this question, Strifes and Contentions were raised amongst many Persons: Some favouring this Opinion; others patronizing that. The greater part of the plainer and simpler sort of Ascetick asserted, that God was corporeal, and had an Human shape. But most [other Persons] condemned their Opinion, affirming God to be incorporeal, and wholly void of all manner of bodily shape. Whose Sentiment was embraced by Theophilus Bishop of Alexandria; insomuch that he inveighed publickly in the Church, in the presence of the People, against those who asserted God had an Human shape; and did himself expresly determine, that he was incorporeal. The Egyptian Ascetick understanding this, left their Monasteries and came down to Alexandria; and raised a tumult against Theophilus, condemning him of impiety, and were resolved to kill him. Theophilus, acquainted herewith, was sorely perplex'd, and employ'd his Mind about a Device, how he might avoid the Death he was threatned with. Being come into the presence of these Men, he addrest himself to them in a flattering way, and spoke to them on this wise: * Whilst I behold you, to my thinking I see God's Countenance. These words mollified the fury of the Monks. Their return to him was: If you speak true, [to wit,] that God's Countenance is like ours, then Anathematize Origen's Works. For some Persons have disputed out of those (a) Books, and contradicted our Opinion. But if you refuse to do that, expect from us the treatment due to impious persons and enemies to God. I will do whatever seems good to you, (replied Theophilus) and therefore be not incensed against me: For I my self do abominate Origen's Books, and judge those Persons worthy of reprehension who admit of them. Theophilus therefore having after this manner given the Monks a repulse, dismiss'd them. And perhaps the Controversie about this matter, which had come to this height, might have been quieted and appeased; had there not another accident forthwith hapned of this nature. There presided over the Monasteries in Egypt four pious Men, Dioscorus, Ammonius, Eusebius, and Euthymius. These Persons were own Brothers; and from their [stature of] body were termed The Long. They were eminent both for their [Sanctity of] life and eloquence: And upon that account their fame was very great at Alexandria. Moreover, Theophilus Bishop of Alexandria had an high esteem for these Men. For which reason he constituted one them, to wit, Dioscorus, Bishop of Hermopolis; having by force constrained him [to undertake that Eccleſiastick Charge.] Two more of them he intreated to continue with him, and could scarcely perswade them to it: But in regard he was Bishop, at length he forced them [to ſtay;] and (b) having honour'd them with the Dignity of Clergy-men, he committed the diſpoſal of [the Revenue of] the Church to them. They, neceſſitated thereto, ſtay'd; and diſcharged their Office of Stewardſhip very well. Notwithſtanding, they were diſpleaſed, becauſe they could not philoſophiſe as they had a mind to do, nor be intent upon [their ſtudies of] an Aſcetick Diſcipline. But when in proceſs of time, they were of opinion that their Souls received harm, in regard they perceived the Biſhop wholly intent upon Lucre, and making it his chief concern to amaſs Money together, (and upon that account, as 'tis commonly ſaid, moving every ſtone,) (c) then they refuſed to live any longer with him, ſaying, they were in love with the Solitude, and preferr'd that before a City-life. The Biſhop, as long as he was ignorant of the true reaſon [why they reſolved to be gone,] entreated them to ſtay. But after his perceiving himſelf condemned by them, he was fill'd with rage, and threatned to do them all manner of miſchief. When they, diſregarding his menaces, were departed into the Solitude; Theophilus being (as may be conjectured) a perſon of an hot and haſty temper, raiſed no ſmall diſturbance againſt theſe perſons; but ſet all engines to work to create them trouble. He forthwith entertained an hatred for their Brother Dioſcorus alſo, Biſhop of Hermopolis. For he was ſorely vexed at him, becauſe the Aſceticks were his favourers, and had an high veneration for him. He very well knew, that he could no way damnifie theſe perſons, unleſs he could make the Monks their enemies. He therefore makes uſe of this method. 'Twas certainly known to him, that thoſe Men, in their frequent diſputes with him, [had ſtrongly aſſerted] that God was incorporeal, and in no wiſe had a human ſhape: For, human paſſions do of neceſſity accompany an human ſhape. And this had been diligently inquired into by the Antients, eſpecially by Origen. Although this was Theophilus's own ſentiment concerning God, yet that he might be revenged of his enemies, he was not aſhamed of contradicting what he and they had well and truly aſſerted. But * impoſed upon moſt of the Monks; perſons innocent indeed and ſincere, but who were unſkilful in learning, yea moſt of them illiterate. For he ſends Letters to the Monaſteries in the Solitudes, giving them advice that they ought not to be perſwaded by Dioſcorus, nor his Brethren, who affirm God to be incorporeal. For God (ſaid he,) according to the [teſtimony of the] Sacred Scriptures, hath eyes, ears, hands, and feet as Men have. But thoſe Perſons about Dioſcorus, being followers of Origen, do attempt to introduce an * impious opinion; to wit, that God hath neither eyes, nor ears, nor feet, nor hands. With this impoſture he deceives moſt of the Monks; and there ariſes a very hot diſſention amongſt them. Such as had their minds † cultivated with Learning, were in no wiſe caught with this fraud; but continued their adherence both to Dioſcorus and Origen. But the ſimpler ſort, who were the moſt in number, and had the greateſt warmth and zeal, forthwith made an inſurrection againſt the Brethren. A diviſion therefore was made amongſt them, and they reproach'd one another as impious Perſons. Theophilus's Party term'd the Brethren Origeniſts and impious Perſons. On the contrary, the other Faction ſtiled thoſe inſtigated by Theophilus || Anthropomorphitæ. Whereupon no ſmall contention aroſe, and an irreconcilable war was kindled between the Monks. As ſoon as Theophilus underſtood that his deſign ſucceeded according to his own mind, he went to Nitria (where the Monaſteries are) accompanied with a great multitude, and (d) Arms the Monks againſt Dioſcorus and his Brethren. They having been in great danger of loſing their lives, at length with great difficulty made their eſcape. Johannes of Conſtantinople was in the interim wholly ignorant of what had been done in Egypt: and he grew famous for his Learning and Eloquence, on account whereof he became eminent [in all places.] He was alſo the firſt Perſon that enlarged the Prayers [uſually made] in the Nocturnal Hymns, [which he did] for this reaſon.

Arcadius and Honorius.

(b) Johannes Launoius (in his Book concerning the true interpretation of the ſixth Canon of the Nicene-Council) produces this paſſage in Socrates, to prove, that the Biſhop of Alexandria ordained all the Biſhops, Presbyters, and Deacons, throughout all Egypt. For he remarks, that Theophilus did two things here. Firſt, he made Dioſcorus Biſhop of Hermopolis; then he ordained his two Brothers Clergy-men, and joyned them to the ſame Dioſcorus. 'Twas indeed Launoius's opinion, that Ammonius and his brother were by Theophilus made Clergy-men of the Hermopolitane Church. Which was alſo the Sentiment (as I ſee) of the Author of the Sacred Geography. But in my judgment, both theſe Perſons are miſtaken. For Theophilus made them not Clergy-men of the Hermopolitane Church; but kept them with himſelf, and ordained them Clerks of his own (that is, of the Alexandrian) Church. This is atteſted by Socrates, in theſe words: δύο δὲ ἐξ αὐτῶν παρεκάλεσε συνεῖναι αὐτῷ, Two more of them he entreated to continue with him. Beſides, the following words in Socrates do more clearly evince this: For Socrates adds, that being made Stewards of the Church by Theophilus, in the firſt place they were diſpleaſed, becauſe being raviſhed from the Solitude, they had no further leiſure to mind the Monaſtick Philoſophy. But at length, when they diſcerned Theophilus's incredible Avarice and deſire of riches, and perceived themſelves vitiated by converſing with him, they requeſted a diſmiſſion from him. From which Words the proof is ſufficient, that they converſt with Theophilus; and being as it were his Companions and Domeſticks, had an inſight into his Vices and Rapines: For they were the œconomi, that is, the Stewards of the Revenue of the Church. Moreover, theſe Learned Men were impoſed upon by Epiphanius Scholaſticus's Verſion; who has rendred this paſſage in Socrates thus: Quamobrem Dioſcorum violenter tractum, &c. Wherefore he took Dioſcorus by force, and made him Biſhop of Hermopolis. Two more of them he intreated to dwell with him, and (altho' a Biſhop) ſcarcely prevailed: having ordained them, he made them Stewards of the Church. Valeſ.

|| That is, perſons that affirmed God had an humane ſhape.

(d) Socrates conceals the true reaſon why thoſe Monks, termed The Long-Brethren, were driven out of the Monaſteries of Nitria by Theophilus. For, they were forced from thence, becauſe they were defenders of Origen, whom, together with his Errors, Theophilus had condemned in the Alexandrian Synod. Socrates ſeems to have been impoſed upon by ſome Perſon that was an Origeniſt, who favouring Ammonius and his Brethren, had given Socrates, a Narrative of that buſineſs, otherwiſe than it really was. Baronius, not content to fix the Novatian Hereſie upon our Socrates does openly call him an Origeniſt. But we only ſay this, that Socrates had this his relation from ſome one of Ammonius's friends. I do not in the leaſt doubt, but Theophilus, out of a grudge and hatred towards Ammonius and his brethren, made the Errors of Origen and the Crime of Hereſie his pretext only; as he did afterwards frame the ſame Calumny againſt John Chryſoſtome. Concerning the Prayers of the Nocturnal Hymns [ſung] by the Arians and Homoöuſians; and concerning the ingagement which hapned between them: and that the ſinging of Hymns in parts, wherein one ſang one Verſe, another another, had its original from Ignatius (a) Theophorus.

(a) So the holy Martyr Ignatius is uſually ſtiled. This term is differently accented in the Greek, which makes its import different alſo. For if it be written Θεοφόρος, it denotes a Divine Perſon, one whoſe Soul is full of God. If it be Θεόφορος, its import is paſſive, and implies one born or carried by God. We are told by many Learned Men, that Ignatius had this title from our Saviour's taking him up in his arms. For, he was that very Child (they ſay) whom our Saviour (Mar. 9. 36.) took up, and ſet in the midſt of his Diſciples. Others, on the contrary, affirm this Story to be groundleſs and uncertain. See Dr. Cave's Life of Ignatius.

Arcadius and Honorius.

THE Arians, as we have said, had their meetings without the City. Every week therefore, as often as the Festival days occurr'd (I mean the Sabbath, and Sunday,) whereon Assemblies were usually held in the Churches, they flock'd together within the City, about the publick *Piazza's, and sang Hymns adapted to the Arian Heresie, answering one another by turns. And this they did for the most part all night long. Early in the morning they sang the same alternative Hymns, passed through the midst of the City, out of its Gates, and so went to the places where they met. But in regard they would not desist from making use of such terms as gave a provocation to the Assertors of the Homoöusian Opinion: (for they frequently sang such words as these; Where are they who affirm Three to be One Power?) Johannes being afraid, lest any of the more ignorant sort might be drawn away from the Church by such Hymns, in opposition to them appoints some of his own People, that they might employ themselves in singing of Nocturnal Hymns, and by that means both obscure the Sedulity of the Arians about these things, and also confirm his own Party [the Orthodox] in the profession of their Faith. This design of Johannes's was seemingly good and useful; but the conclusion of it was Disturbance and Dangers. For, in regard the Hymns of the Homoöusians, in their singing them in the night, were performed with more of pomp and show: (for Johannes invented Silver-Crosses, whereon were carried Wax-tapers lighted; the Empress Eudoxia being at the charge hereof:) the Arians, who were very numerous, and possest with an envious emulation, resolved to be revenged, and to make an attack against them. For by reason of that power and sway which they had formerly had, they were as yet hot and ready for such conflicts, and likewise they despised their Adversaries. Without delay therefore, on one of those nights they engaged. Briso, the Empress's Eunuch, who at that time was the Singers Instructor, received a wound in his Forehead by a Stone: and moreover, some Persons on both sides were slain. The Emperor incensed hereat, prohibited the Arians from singing their Hymns any more in publick. Such, as we have declared, were the Transactions then. We are further to relate, whence this usage of singing alternative Hymns in the Church had its original. (b) Ignatius the the third Bishop of Antioch in Syria from the Apostle Peter, who also converst with the Apostles themselves, saw a Vision of Angels, praising the Holy Trinity by singing of alternative Hymns, and he deliver'd that way of singing, which he had seen in his Vision, to the Antiochian Church. Whence the same Tradition was spread over all other Churches. This is the account we have received concerning alternative Hymns.

* Covered, or, Arched Walks.

(b) I cannot imagine whence Socrates had this Story. For 'tis manifest, that Flavianus and Diodorus were the first Persons, who in Constantius's Reign divided the Quires of Singers at Antioch into two parts, and gave them David's Psalms, to be sung alternatively, or by turns: which usage being first practised at Antioch, afterwards spread over all the Churches of the World. Theodoret attests this in his Hist. lib. 2. cap. 24. as does also Theodorus Mopsuestenus (a Person ancienter than he) who lived in the same times with Flavianus and Diodorus. Theodorus's words are quoted by Nicetas in Thesauro Orthodoxæ fidei, lib. 5. cap. 30. Altho' that way of singing Psalms seems to have been used by the Syrians, before Flavianus and Diodorus's times. For Theodorus writes, that Flavianus and Diodorus were the first Persons, who translated that kind of Psalmodie which they term Antiphonæ; [That is, when one singeth one Verse, another another] out of the Syrian Language into the Grecian; and that those two Persons appeared almost the only Authors of this thing, to all the parts of the World. What therefore the Syrians had done long before Flavianus's time, (to wit, in singing of David's Psalms alternatively in Syriack,) that Flavianus and Diodorus ordered to be done, by the Grecians of Antioch in their singing the Psalms in Greek. Concerning those termed The Long Monks, and how Theophilus having conceived an implacable hatred against Johannes upon their account, made it his business to get him deposed [from his Bishoprick.]

Arcadius and Honorius.

NOt long after this, the Monks together with Dioscorus and his Brethren, went from the Solitudes to Constantinople. They were accompanied by Isidorus, a Person for whom Theophilus had heretofore had a great *love; (a) but was then become his most deadly enemy upon this account. One Peter was (b) Chief-Presbyter of the Alexandrian Church. Theophilus had conceived an hatred against him, and took a resolution of ejecting him out of the Church. He charged him with this accusation, that he had admitted a Woman, by Sect a Manichæan, to [a participation of] the sacred Mysteries, before he had brought her off from the Manichæan Heresie. But in regard Peter said that the Woman had renounced her Heresie, and that she had not been admitted [to the Eucharist] contrary to Theophilus's mind; Theophilus was for that reason highly incensed, in regard he was calumniated. For he affirmed himself to be wholly ignorant of what had been done. Peter therefore summon'd Isidorus to attest, that the Bishop was not ignorant of what had been done concerning the Woman. It hapned that Isidorus was at that very time at the Imperial City Rome: For he had been sent by Theophilus to Damasus Bishop of Rome, that he might make a reconciliation between him and Flavianus Bishop of Antioch. For Meletius's Adherents made a separation from Flavianus on account of his Oath, as has been declared * before. Isidorus therefore being returned from Rome, and summon'd by Peter to give in his evidence, affirm'd that the Manichæan Woman was admitted [to the Sacrament] agreeable to the Bishop's consent: and that the Bishop himself administred the [Sacred] Mysteries to her. Hereupon Theophilus was highly enraged, and out of anger ejected them both [out of the Church.] This was the occasion of Isidorus's accompanying Dioscorus and his Brethren to Constantinople; that the designs which had fraudulently been formed against them, might be inspected and laid open before the Emperor himself, and Johannes the Bishop. Johannes informed hereof, gave the Men an honourable reception;

* See the second Chapter of this Book.

(a) Besides this reason of Theophilus's hatred against Isidorus, Sozomen (Book 8. Chap. 12.) relates two other causes. The first was, because Isidorus had refused to give evidence in favour of Theophilus's Sister. The second, because he had reproved Theophilus for his over-much diligence in building Churches, whereby he wasted the Money of the Church, which ought rather to have been bestowed on the poor. I am easily induced to believe, that these were the Reasons of Theophilus's hatred against Isidorus; in regard both Socrates and Sozomen do expressly attest it. Notwithstanding, Isidorus was not for these reasons ejected out of the Church; but was condemned by the sentence of the Bishops, on account of Origen's Errors, which he maintained; as Baronius has long since informed us from Palladius in Lausiaca. Vales.

(b) S Arsacius, who succeeded Chrysostome in his Bishoprick, is term'd πρωτοπρεσβύτερος, Chief-Presbyter, in the Acts of the Synod ad Quercum; and one Martyrius is stiled πρωτο-διάκονος, Chief-Deacon. Sozomen calls this Peter Arch-Presbyter. This is a name of honour, not of ancientness. For the Bishops Elected whom they pleased out of the Colledge of Presbyters to be Arch-Presbyters, as Liberatus informs us in his Breviarium, chap. 14. Vales.

ption; and excluded them not from communion of the Prayers; but ſaid, he would not allow them a Communion of the [Sacred] Myſteries, before cognizance had been taken of their Caſe. Whilſt the affair was in this poſture, a falſe report is brought to the hearing of Theophilus, as if Johannes had both admitted them to the Sacred Myſteries, and was alſo ready to give them aſſiſtance. Wherefore [Theophilus] made it his whole buſineſs, that he might not only be revenged upon Dioſcorus and Iſidorus, but caſt Johannes alſo out of his [Epiſcopal] Chair. He ſends Letters therefore to the Biſhops of every City, concealing indeed his own deſign, and to appearance blaming therein Origen's Books only: [notwithſtanding,] Athanaſius, (who lived long before him,) in confirmation of his own Faith, has frequently made uſe of the authority and teſtimony of Origen's Writings, in his Orations againſt the Arians.

CHAP. X.

That Epiphanius [Biſhop] of Cyprus being alſo led away by Theophilus's Frauds, convened a Synod of Biſhops in Cyprus, to determine againſt Origen's Writings; and reproved Johannes for reading Origen's Books.

HE became reconciled alſo to Epiphanius Biſhop of Conſtantia in Cyprus, with whom he had heretofore diſagreed. For Theophilus (a) had been angry with Epiphanius, in regard he entertained abject thoughts of God, and ſuppoſed Him to have an Human ſhape. Altho' Theophilus embraced theſe ſentiments concerning God, and reproved thoſe who ſuppoſed the Deity had an human ſhape; yet by reaſon of the hatred he had conceived againſt ſome other perſons, he openly denied his own thoughts; and at that time entredinto a friendſhip with Epiphanius (with whomhe had before been at difference) as if he had altered his mind, and entertained now the ſame ſentiment with him concerning God. He was very earneſt with Epiphanius likewiſe, to convene a Synod of the Biſhops in Cyprus, that therein Origen's Writings might be condemned. Epiphanius being by reaſon of his ſingular piety, a perſon of a plain diſpoſition, and unacquainted with ſubtlety, was ſoon induced into error by Theophilus's Letters. And having aſſembled a Synod of the Biſhops within the Iſland [Cyprus:] prohibits the reading of Origen's Books. He ſent Letters alſo to Johannes, intreating him to abſtain from reading Origen's Works; and [requeſting] that he alſo would convene a Synod, and make the ſame determination he had done. Theophilus therefore having wound in Epiphanius, a perſon famous for his piety, to embrace his own Opinion; and perceiving that his deſign throve according to his wiſh; became more confident, and he alſo himſelf (b) aſſembled many Biſhops; in which Convention (agreeable to what had been done by Epiphanius) a ſentence of Condemnation was pronounced againſt the Writings of Origen, who had been dead (c) almoſt two hundred years: Not that this was Theophilus's principal deſign, but [he did it chiefly] to be revenged on Dioſcorus and his Brethren. Johannes gave little heed to what he was acquainted with, either from Epiphanius, or Theophilus himſelf; his mind being wholly employ'd about preaching in the Churches; and for that indeed he was extraordinarily eminent: But he altogether ſlighted the Plots and Deſigns form'd againſt him. But after it came to be apparently known to moſt perſons, that Theophilus made it his buſineſs to diveſt Johannes of his Biſhoprick, then all thoſe Men who had an hatred for Johannes, joyn'd in their raiſing calumnious complaints againſt him. And many, as well of the Clergy, as of the Grandees who had a great intereſt in the Imperial Palace, ſuppoſing they had a very fair opportunity offer'd them of being reveng'd upon Johannes, procured a Grand Synod to be convened at Conſtantinople, ſending into divers parts [for the Biſhops,] partly by Letters, and partly by Meſſengers.

(a) 'Tis falſe that Epiphanius was ever ſo ſimple, as to be addicted to the Hereſie of the Anthropomorphitæ; he had indeed once received a check upon that account from John [Biſhop] of Jeruſalem. But Jerome has refuted this Calumny, and alſo Epiphanius himſelf, in that Sermon he Preach'd at Jeruſalem in the preſence of John himſelf; as Jerome (in his Book to Pammachius concerning the Errors of John of Jeruſalem) and Baronius (at the year of Chriſt 393) do relate. Wherefore, there was no need of Theophilus's feigning himſelf an Anthromoporphite, to curry favour with Epiphanius. Both Socrates and Sozomen were impoſed upon by ſome Origeniſt, a favourer of Ammonius and Dioſcorus, who told them theſe things. For 'twas uſual with the Origeniſts, (as Baronius has truly remarked,) to fix the Crime of this Hereſie upon the Catholicks, by whom they were condemned. Valeſ.

(b) Socrates (and Sozomen who has followed him herein) is miſtaken here, in ſuppoſing that the Alexandrian Synod (wherein Theophilus condemned Origen's Books togerher with Origen himſelf,) was held after that Synod convened at Conſtantia by Epiphanius. 'Tis manifeſt, that Theophilus did firſt of all convene a Synod at Alexandria, and condemn that Hereſie in the Year of Chriſt 399. Which was done after many Conferences concerning that matter, held by the Biſhops who came thither, as Poſtumianus informs us in Sulpicius's Dialogues de Vita B. Martini. After this Theophilus ſent a Synodick Letter to all the Biſhops, and he wrote a particular Letter to Epiphanius, beſeeching and intreating him that he would convene all the Biſhops of the Iſland, condemn the ſame Hereſie himſelf, and ſubſcribe his Synodick Letter. This Letter of Theophilus's is at this day extant, tranſlated by St. Jerome. Valeſ.

(c) Περὶ διακοσίων ϗ πεῤῥίπου ἐτῶν. The particle ϗ muſt be expunged. Moreover, Socrates here uſes a perfect number for an imperfect. And for this reaſon he adds the Term πεῤῥίπου, That is, almoſt, or, thereabout. But if we would ſpeak exactly, above fifty Years muſt be taken from this number. For Origen died on the year of Chriſt 252, as may be made out from what we have ſaid at note (b.) and (c.) on Euſeb. Eccleſ. Hiſtor. Book 7. chap. 1. From which Year, to the Year of Chriſt 399. wherein Origen was condemned in the Alexandrian Synod, there are 147 Years. Valeſ.

CHAP. XI.

Concerning the [two] Syrian [Biſhops] Severianus and Antiochus, how, and for what reaſons they diſagreed with Johannes.

MOreover, the Odium againſt Johannes was increaſed by another accident of this nature. There were two Biſhops who flouriſhed at one and the ſame time, by extract they were Syrians, [their names] Severianus and Antiochus. Severianus preſided over the Church of Gabala, which is a City of Syria; and Antiochus over that of Ptolemaïs ſcituate in Phœnice. Both of them were famous for their eloquence. Severianus, though he ſeemed to be very learned, yet did not pronounce the Greek tongue exactly and diſtinctly: But whilſt he ſpoke Greek, his voice had the ſound of Syriack. Antiochus came firſt to Conſtantinople from Ptolemais; and having for ſome time preached in the Churches [of the Imperial City] with much labour and diligence, and from them procured a great ſum of Money, at length he return'd to his own Church. Afterwards, Severianus being inform'd that Antiochus had gotten a great deal of Money at Conſtantinople, made it his buſineſs to follow his example. Having therefore exerciſed himſelf very much, and made many Sermons, he alſo comes to Conſtantinople: Where being courteouſly received by Johannes, for ſome time time he sooth'd and flatter'd him, and was notwithstanding belov'd and honour'd by Johannes: In the mean while he grew famous for his Sermons, and on that account came to be taken notice of by *many great Persons [of that City,] and moreover, by the Emperor himself. It hapned that the Bishop of Ephesus died at that time, and Johannes was necessitated to make a journey thither, to Ordain a Bishop there. Being come to that City, and finding some endeavouring to promote one person to the Bishoprick, others another, (who also strove very earnestly amongst themselves upon their account, for whom they gave their Suffrages;) Johannes perceiving that both Parties contended most pertinaciously, and would in no point be obedient to his admonitions; resolv'd to put an end to their contention † without offending either Faction. He himself therefore preferr'd one Heraclides his Deacon, by Nation a Cypriot, to the Bishoprick. And so both parties desisted from their mutual contentiousness, and were at quiet. On this account Johannes was necessitated to stay at Ephesus a long time. In the interim that he resided there, Severianus gain'd a greater esteem and affection from his Auditors at Constantinople. Nor was this thing unknown to Johannes; for he was with all imaginable speed acquainted with whatever hapned. When therefore Serapion (of whom we have made mention || before) suggested to him, and told him the Church was disturb'd by Severianus, Johannes was provok'd to an emulation. And having *incidently taken away many Churches from the Novatianists and Quartodecimani, he return'd to Constantinople; where he renew'd the care of the Churches which were incumbent on him. But no body was able to endure Serapion's haughtiness and arrogancy. For in regard he was in possession of a great † interest and favour with Johannes the Bishop, his insolence towards all persons was immeasurable. For which reason the Odium also against the Bishop became more enkindled. Upon a time, when Severianus pass'd by him, Serapion refused to give him the honour due to a Bishop; but continued in his seat, demonstrating thereby that he had but a very slight esteem for Severianus's presence. Severianus could not bear this contempt of Serapion's; but spake with a loud voice to those that were present, If Serapion dies a Christian, Christ hath not been incarnate. Serapion having gotten this occasion, did openly render Severianus odious to Johannes. He conceal'd the first Clause of the Sentence [to wit, this,] if Serapion dies a Christian; and affirmed that Severianus said these words only; doubtless Christ was not incarnate. He produced a company of his own [Faction] who attested that the words were spoken so. Johannes therefore forthwith expels Severianus out of the City. This coming to the knowledge of the Empress Eudoxia, she reproves Johannes severely; and gave order that Severianus should forthwith be recalled from Chalcedon in Bithynia. He return'd immediately. But Johannes declined his Friendship; nor could he be induced thereto by the intreaty of any one: (a) Till at length the Empress Eudoxia, in that Church called The Apostles, cast her Son Theodosius (who now reigns successfully, but was then a very young Child;) before Johannes's knees, and (b) having adjured him frequently by her Son, with much ado prevailed with him to admit of a friendship with Severianus. After this manner therefore these two persons were to appearance reconciled: nevertheless they retained a rancour'd mind one towards another. Such was the occasion of Johannes's grudge against Severianus.

Arcadius and Honorius.

(b) Κατ' αὐτῆς καθοσιώσασα; that is, having adjured him by her Son. The Ancients were wont to swear by their Children. So in Virgil,

Per caput hoc juro, per spem surgentis Iüli:
I swear by this head, by the hopes of growing Iülus.

After the same manner, when they would earnestly entreat others, they beseeched them by their own Children, and whatever they accounted most dear to themselves. In this manner therefore Eudoxia spake to John Chrysostome at that time: By this little Child of mine, and your spiritual Son, whom I brought forth, and whom you received out of the sacred Font; be reconciled with Severianus. 'Tis certain Chrysostome had received Theodosius Junior out of the sacred Font, as Nicephorus relates at this place, from Simeon Metaphrastes, as I suppose. Further, Baronius places this reconciliation between Severianus and Chrysostome, on the year of Christ 401, in the Consulate of Vincentius and Fravitus. But I had rather place it on the year following. For if it be true that Theodosius was then baptized, as we have before related from Nicephorus: (which is indeed highly probable; for Eudoxia would not have brought her Son into the Church of the Apostles, had he not been baptized,) this reconciliation of the Bishops must necessarily happen on the year of Christ 402. For Theodosius Junior was born in the Consulate of Vincentius and Fravitus, (which was the year of Christ 401,) on the tenth of April. For so 'tis recorded in the Alexandrian Chronicle, and in Marcellinus's which was put forth by Onufrius. The reading in Sirmondus's Edition is false, where it is on the eleventh of April. Nor is it credible, that he could be baptized, except in the Easter of the year following. If any one notwithstanding shall maintain, that he was baptized a few days after his birth, (as Marcus seems to intimate in the Life of Porphyrius;) we will allow this, if he pleases. But who can believe, that Theodosius would have been brought into the Church by his Mother, and placed at Chrysostome's Knees, before he was a year, or ten months old? Vales.

CHAP. XII.

That Epiphanius coming to Constantinople, held Assemblies, and perform'd Ordinations contrary to Johannes's mind, that he might gratifie Theophilus.

NOt long after this, Epiphanius the Bishop comes again out of Cyprus to Constantinople, induced thereto by Theophilus's * Persuasives: He brought along with him † a Copy of a Sentence of a Synod, wherein he had not declared Origen to be Excommunicate, but had condemned his Books only. Arriving therefore at Saint John's Church, (which is distant from the City seven miles,) and coming ashoar, he celebrated an Assembly, (a) and ordain'd a Deacon; after which he entred into the City. That he might gratifie Theophilus, he declined Johannes's Invitation, and lodg'd in a little private House. And having called together those Bishops who were then at Constantinople, he produced a Copy of the Sentence of Condemnation against Origen's Books, and recited it to them: (b) Having nothing † Τὰ καθαιρετικά.

(a) Baronius does at this place charge Socrates with a mistake, because he has said, that Epiphanius ordained a Deacon at Constantinople without the consent of the Bishop of that City. Epiphanius had done that before indeed, in the Diocess of John Bishop of Jerusalem, as 'tis manifest from Jerome's Epistles. Socrates therefore, and those that follow him, being deceived by the likeness of the name, thought that was done by Epiphanius in the Church of John Bishop of Constantinople. This device Baronius has invented to excuse Epiphanius. But, who sees not, that there is no reason, why we should charge Socrates with a Lye in those things which he himself was able to see? For what had been once done already by Epiphanius in Palestine, why could it not afterwards be made use of by the same person at Constantinople? For there was not so great a Crime in ordaining a Deacon, whom notwithstanding Epiphanius ordained not, but by the entreaty of the multitude that stood by. Vales.

(b) Instead of [οὐκ ἔχω, I have nothing;] it must doubtless be [οὐκ ἔχων, having nothing:] in the next line, we read [ἐδόκει, were pleased] instead of [δοκεῖ, is pleased.] Vales.

(a) Instead of [ἕως ἧς ἡ Βασίλισσα, in so much that the Empress,] in my judgment it should be [ἕως ἕ ἡ Βασίλισσα, till at length the Empress.] Nor do I doubt but Socrates wrote thus. Nicephorus words it expressly according to our Emendation. And in Sozomen the reading is [εἰσότε, until,] which is the same. Vales.

thing againſt thoſe Books, only he and Theophilus were pleaſed to reject them. Some [of the Biſhops] out of that reverential reſpect they bore Epiphanius, ſubſcribed [this Decree of the Synod:] but very many of them refuſed to do it. Amongſt which number was Theotimus Biſhop of Scythia, who made this anſwer to Epiphanius. I (ſaid he) will neither be injurious (O Epiphanius!) to a perſon who has long ſince ended his life piouſly; nor dare I attempt ſo impious a fact, as to condemn what our Predeceſſors have in no wiſe rejected; eſpecially when I do not (c) know of any ill Doctrine in the Books of Origen. After this he produced a Book of Origen's, which he began to read, and ſhewed the Eccleſiaſtick Expoſitions [of Scripture which occur'd] therein. And then he ſubjoyn'd theſe words: They who are injurious towards theſe Writings, perceive not that they fix a reproach upon thoſe very Books, concerning which theſe are written. This was the return which Theotimus (a perſon eminent for his piety and rectitude of life) made to Epiphanius.

(c) I agree with Chriſtophorſon, who inſtead of [εἰπὼν, ſaying,] reads [εἰδὼς, know,] and at the end of this clauſe placed a full point.

Notwithſtanding, 'tis my opinion, that there is ſomething more wanting here. And after the word [Origen,] I think the place is to be made thus, ταῦτα εἰπὼν, προκομίσας τὸ βιβλίον, having ſaid theſe Words, and produced a Book, &c. Which is confirmed by Sozomen and Nicephorus. And Epiphanius Scholaſticus ſeems to have read thus, as may be collected from his Verſion. Valeſ.

CHAP. XIII.

What this Writer can ſay in defence of Origen.

BUt in regard ſuch as delight in reproaching have impoſed upon many perſons, [and diſſwaded them] (a) from reading Origen, as being a blaſphemous Author; I judge it not unſeaſonable to diſcourſe a little concerning them. Vile and deſpicable Men, who of themſelves can't arrive at an eminency, are deſirous of getting a name from diſcommending thoſe who are better than themſelves. The firſt perſon affected with this diſtemper was Methodius Biſhop of that City in Lycia, named Olympus. Then, Euſtathius, who for ſome ſmall time preſided over the Church in Antioch. After him Apollinaris, and laſtly, Theophilus. This Meſs of Revilers have calumniated Origen, but proceeded not in one and the ſame method. For one has broke out into an accuſation againſt him upon one account, another upon another; whereby each of them hath ſufficiently demonſtrated, that he has fully approv'd of whatever he has not found fault with. For, whereas one blamed him in particular for one opinion, another for another, 'tis manifeſt that each of them has wholly admitted as true what he had not cavil'd at; his ſilence approving of that which he hath not found fault with. Methodius indeed, when [in his Books] he had in many paſſages ſeverely inveigh'd againſt Origen, does notwithſtanding, afterwards unſay as it were what he had written; and (b) admires the

(a) Inſtead of [ὡς βλασφήμως προσέχειν τῷ Ὠριγένει;] the reading in the Sfortian M. S. is [ὡς βλασφήμῳ, &c.] And ſo Epiphanius Scholaſticus found it written in his Copy. For thus he renders it: Sed quoniam detractores, &c. But, in regard Revilers, ſtealing privily upon many Perſons, do reject Origen, as being a blaſphemous Author. I read therefore, ὡς βλασφήμῳ μὴ προσέχειν τῷ Ὠριγένει, from reading Origen, as being a Blaſphemous Author. Valeſ.

(b) Baronius, at the year of Chriſt 402, does charge Socrates here with a Lye and Calumny, becauſe he has ſaid, that Methodius (when he had before reproach'd Origen,) did afterwards unſay what he had written, and ſet forth his praiſes, in his Dialogue, intitled Xenon, or, the Houſe of Entertainment. But Baronius affirms, that Methodius did the contrary. For when he had at the beginning praiſed Origen, afterwards having detected his Errors, he inveighed againſt him. Baronius confirms this by the teſtimony of Euſebius, who in the ſixth Book of his Apology in defence of Origen, writes thus: Quomodo auſus eſt Methodius nunc contra Origenem ſcribere, qui hæc & hæc de Origenis locutus eſt dogmatibus: How dares Methodius write againſt Origen now; who has ſpoken in theſe and theſe things, concerning Origen's opinions. Which paſſage in Euſebius St. Jerome quotes in his Apology againſt Rufinus, to ſhew that he had done the ſame thing which Methodius did before. But Euſebius, in the place now cited, does not ſay plainly, that Methodius had heretofore ſpoken in defence of Origen. For he does not ſay [who had ſpoken theſe and theſe things concerning Origen's opinions;] but only [who has ſpoken, &c.] which may be taken on either ſide. Therefore Socrates is not to be charged with a Lye. Valeſ.

Arcadius and Honorius.

Man in the (c) the Dialogue to which he gave the title of Xenon. But, I do affirm, that an addition is made to Origen's commendation, from his being accuſed by theſe perſons. For they who have gotten together whatever they ſuppoſed blame-worthy [in Origen,] and notwithſtanding have not in the leaſt found fault with him in theſe their Collections, for entertaining ill Sentiments concerning the Holy Trinity; [theſe Men, I ſay,] do moſt evidently demonſtrate and bear witneſs to his true and orthodox Piety. And by their not blaming him in this particular, they commend him by their own teſtimony. But Athanaſius a couragious Defender of the Homoëuſian Faith, in his Orations againſt the Arians, does with a loud voice cite this Author as a Witneſs of his own Faith, interweaving his words with his own, after this manner; The moſt admirable and laborious Origen, (ſays he) does by his own teſtimony confirm our ſentiment concerning the Son of God, affirming him to be coeternal to the Father. They therefore who reproach Origen, have forgot themſelves [and conſider not] that they ſpeak calumniouſly of Athanaſius, Origen's praiſer. But let thus much be ſaid concerning Origen. We will now return to the Sequel of our Hiſtory.

(c) Methodius wrote his Books commonly in the way of Dialogues, as 'tis apparent both from his Convivium which is lately publiſhed by two Learned Men; and alſo from his Books concerning the Reſurrection, which he had written againſt Origen, out of which Book Epiphanius produces ſome Excerptions. Of the ſame ſort alſo was this Dialogue of his, entitled Xenon, that is, the Houſe of Entertainment, wherein Strangers lodge. For, as παρθενὼν is a place for Virgins to dwell in: ſo ξενὼν is an houſe for Strangers to dwell in. This Book is mention'd in Photius's Bibliotheca, in his Excerptions out of Methodius's Book περὶ ἀναστάσεως, where theſe Words occur; ὅτι τὸ μὴ βάλητε τὸ ἅγιον τοῖς κυσὶ, μηδὲ τοὺς μαργαρίτας ὑμῶν ἔμπροσθεν τῶν χοίρων, μαργαρίτας μὲν τὰ ξενῶνος τὰ μυστικώτερα τῆς θεοσδότου θρησκείας ἐπαλαμβάνοντος μαθήματα· χοίρους δὲ, &c. ὁ μέγας μεθόδιος φησὶν, &c. Which place the Tranſlator has rendred very ill; it is thus to be tranſlated: That paſſage in the Goſpel [caſt not that which is Holy to the Dogs, nor your Pearls before Swine] is thus explained by Xenon, that by Pearls are meant the more ſecret Myſteries of the Religion given by God: But the Hogs, &c. the great Methodius ſays, &c. In this Dialogue therefore, the title whereof was περὶ ἀναστάσεως, an Origeniſt was introduced, by name Xenon, againſt whom Methodius diſputed, not in his own name, but under another Perſon, as Photius atteſts in the ſame Excerptions. Hence 'tis apparent, that that Dialogue of Methodius's, which Socrates calls Xenon, was the ſame to which Photius gives the title of περὶ ἀναστάσεως; and that Xenon is not to be taken for a place of Entertainment, but rather for a Perſon of the Dialogue. But ſome one will object that in that Dialogue intitled Xenon, Origen was highly commended by Methodius; but in the Dialogue intitled περὶ ἀναστάσεως, Methodius terms him a Centaure. For ſo 'tis extant in two places in Photius's Excerptions. My anſwer is, 'Tis poſſible that in the beginning of that work Methodius might have been ſharp upon Origen; but in the end or procedure of it, he might ſound a Retreat as it were, and praiſe him highly. Notwithſtanding, if any one has a mind ſtifly to maintain, that the Dialogue Xenon differed from that intitled περὶ ἀναστάσεως; then it muſt be ſaid, that Xenon was not the proper name of any Man, but that thereby is rather meant the whole School of Origen, wherein the Auditors and Scholars, coming from divers parts of the World, were converſant. Which in my judgment is the trueſt. 'Tis certain, if ξενὼν were a proper name, it would have the accent in the laſt ſyllable ſave one. Valeſ.

ry to the Canons. Whereat Epiphanius was terrified, and returned into his own Country.

(a) JOhannes was in no wise angry, because Epiphanius had made an Ordination in his Church, contrary to the Canon; but invited him to come and lodge with him in the Bishop's Palace. But his answer was, that he would neither abide nor pray with him, unless he would expel Dioscorus and his Brethren out of the City, and with his own Hand subscribe the Condemnation of Origen's Books. Upon Johannes's deferring to do these things, and saying, that nothing ought rashly to be done * before a determination of a General Council; those that hated Johannes put Epiphanius upon another design. For they contrive, that at the next Religious Meeting which was to be held in that Church named The Apostles, Epiphanius should come forth publickly, † condemn Origen's Books in the presence of all the People, excommunicate Dioscorus with his Followers, and reproach Johannes as being their Favourer. These things were declared to Johannes; and on the day following he sends this message to Epiphanius (who was then come into the Church) by Serapion: Epiphanius, you do many things contrary to the Canons: First, you have made an Ordination in the Churches under my jurisdiction: Then, without any order from me, you have made use of your own Authority, and ministred in the said Churches: Further, when (b) heretofore I invited you hither, you refused to come, and now you allow your self that liberty. Take heed therefore, lest a tumult being raised amongst the People, even you your self incur danger therefrom. Epiphanius having heard this, was fearful and went from the Church: and after he had very much blamed Johannes, he began his Voyage to Cyprus. Some Persons report, that at his going a-board, he spake these words to Johannes; I hope you will not die a Bishop. And, that Johannes made him this return, (c) I hope you will not arrive in your own Country. I cannot positively affirm, whether they who told me these things spake true. Notwithstanding, the event was agreeable to both their wishes. For Epiphanius arrived not at Cyprus: but (d) after his departure died on Shipboard. And within a small time afterwards, Johannes was deposed from his Bishoprick, as we shall manifest in the Procedure of our History.

(a) This beginning is too abrupt, especially in regard that digression concerning Origen went before. Therefore in my judgment [ὁ ιβ'] should precede here; and the beginning of the next period should run thus, ὁ δὲ οὐκ ἔφη, &c. But his answer was, &c. Vales.

* Or, before a Catholick, or, general disquisition.

† Or, reproach.

(b) Instead of [πάλιν τε, and again] in should in my judgement be [πάλαι τε, heresofore;] (although this reading be disagreeable to all our Copies.) For 'tis opposed to what follows, to wit, νῦν, and now. Valesius.

(c) The reading in the Florentine M.S. pleases me best; which is, ἔλπιζε μὴ ἔτι ἐλθεῖν τῆς σαυτῆς πατρίδος, do not hope, Epiphanius, to arrive in your own Country. Moreover Baronius does deservedly deride these Predictions of Epiphanius and Chrysostome, as fabulous and forged. Socrates relates them not for true and certain; and in my judgment they are altogether misbecoming Holy Men and Bishops. Vales.

(d) Baronius does indeed place that contest between Epiphanius and Chrysostome on the year of Christ 402. But concerning Epiphanius's death he dissents from Socrates, Sozomen, and the other Writers, who tell us that Epiphanius died soon after, in his return to his own Country. And yet Baronius confesses he knows not what year Epiphanius died on. Which I cannot wonder at enough. For, whereas Baronius follows Socrates and Sozomen in the foregoing account of that contest which hapned between those two eminent Men, what reason had he to dissent from them about the death of Epiphanius? They might indeed have been mistaken in their relating the mutual predictions between Epiphanius and Chrysostome; nor is it sufficiently manifest, whether or no they predicted those accidents to one another. But the things which hapned to each of them are most certain, nor could Socrates and Sozomen be ignorant hereof; the latter of whom was born at Salamine, over which City Epiphanius had been Bishop; and both of them were almost Epiphanius's Contemporaries. It ought therefore to be look't upon as certain from the Testimony of these Writers, that Epiphanius died at the close of the year 402, or at least on the beginning of the year following, before the Synod ad Quercum. Theophilus informs us hereof in his Epistle to Saint Jerome, which Epistle Jerome has prefixt before Theophilus's Paschal Epistles, which he translated into Latin. For in that Epistle Theophilus speaks these Words concerning Chrysostome then condemned: Sed ille, ut cætera ejus flagitia taceam, &c. But he, not to mention his other Crimes, admitted the Origenists to a familiarity with himself, and preferred many of them to the Sacerdotal Office; on account of which fact he sadned the Heart of that Man of God Epiphanius of Blessed memory, (who shined as a bright Star in the World amongst the Bishops;) and therefore has deserved to hear, Babylon is fallen, is fallen. Where you see Theophilus does speak of Epiphanius, as then dead; for he terms him a Man of blessed memory: and he intimates, that he was dead before Chrysostome's condemnation. Vales.

CHAP. XV.

How after Epiphanius's departure, Johannes made an Oration against Women; and upon that account (by the care of the Emperor and Empress,) a Synod was convened against him at Chalcedon, and he is ejected out of his Church.

FOR, after Epiphanius's departure, Johannes received information from some Persons, that the Empress Eudoxia had animated Epiphanius against him. And being a Person of an hot disposition, and of a ready expression; without delay he made an Oration in the presence of the People, the Contents whereof were the discommendation of all Women in general. The Multitude understands that Oration so, as if it had been * Ænigmatically spoken against the Empress. This Speech is taken in writing by malevolent Persons, and brought to the knowledge of the Emperors. The Empress, informed hereof, complains to the Emperor of the injury done to herself, and tells him that her injury was his. She takes care therefore, that Theophilus should forthwith convene a Synod against Johannes: which was in like manner urged by Severianus; for he still retained his grudge [against Johannes.] Within a small interval of time Theophilus arrived, accompanied with many Bishops of several Cities [whom he had summoned together by his Letters.] (a) For, the Emperor had given him this order by his Rescript. They flock'd together, most especially, who were displeas'd with Johannes, some upon one account, others on another. They came also, whom Johannes had turned out of their Bishopricks. For Johannes had deposed many Bishops in Asia, when he went to Ephesus upon account of ordaining Heraclides. All of them therefore by agreement met together at Chalcedon [a City] of Bithynia. One Cyrinus was at that time Bishop of Chalcedon, by Country an Egyptian: he prated [against Johannes] before the Bishops, terming him an impious, arrogant, and (b) inexorable person. With which words the Bishops were mightily pleased. But Maruthas Bishop of Mesopotamia, against his will trod upon Cyrinus's Foot: By reason of which

* Darkly, or, obscurely.

(a) Instead of [τοῦτο δὲ καὶ τῆς Βασιλέως, &c. Moreover, the Emperor, &c.] I had rather it should be [τοῦτο γὰρ καὶ, &c. For the Emperor, &c.] Moreover, Chrysostome affirms the contrary to what is said here, in his Epistle to Innocentius. For he says that the Emperor commanded Theophilus to come to Constantinople alone, to plead his cause: but, that he came thither, accompanied with many Bishops. Notwithstanding, these things may be reconciled, if we say that the Emperor gave Theophilus this order at the beginning, when the Monks had gone to him. But afterwards, at the instigation of his Wife Eudoxia, who was angry with Johannes, the Emperor commanded Theophilus to bring the Bishops out of Egypt with him. Vales.

(b) Ἀγύναλον. Musculus renders it inflexible. Christophorson, contumacious. I would rather translate it inexorable; for we fall down at their knees, whom we entreat. Vales.

which [bruiſe] he was in very great pain, and could not accompany the reſt of the Biſhops in their paſſage to Conſtantinople. He therefore continued at Chalcedon; but the reſt ſailed over to Conſtantinople. None of the Eccleſiaſticks went out to meet Theophilus, nor ſhewed him the uſual reſpect and honour: for he was known to be [Johannes's] open Enemy: The Alexandrian Mariners, whoſe Corn-fleet hapned to be there at that time, went forth to meet him, and received him with Acclamations of joy. Theophilus refuſed to go into the Church; but took up his Lodgings in one of the Emperor's Houſes named Placidiana. Thence-forward many Accuſations were raiſed againſt Johannes. Nor was there the leaſt mention now made concerning Origen's Books: but they betook themſelves to other abſurd Criminations. Proviſion being made before-hand after this manner; the Biſhops met at a place * near the City Chalcedon, termed the † Oak, whither they cited Johannes immediately, that he might make his Defence in reference to the Crimes he ſtood charged with. Together with him they ſummoned in Serapion [his Deacon,] Tygris the Eunuch a Preſbyter, and Paulus a Reader: For theſe perſons were accuſed together with Johannes. But, in regard Johannes made uſe of an (c) Exception, and refuſed thoſe that ſummon'd him in, as being his Enemies, and appeal'd to a General Council; without any delay they cited him in four times. And when he refuſed to appear, but gave them always the ſame anſwer, they condemned and depoſed him; laying no other crime to his charge but this only, that upon his being ſummon'd he would not appear. This buſineſs being divulged about Evening, put the Multitude into the greateſt tumult imaginable: Wherefore they watched all night long, and would in no wiſe ſuffer him to be taken out of the Church; but cried out, that cognizance ought to be taken of his Caſe in a greater Synod. But the Emperor iſſued out an Order, that he ſhould be forthwith ejected, and carried into baniſhment. Johannes underſtanding this, ſurrendred himſelf about (d) Noon on the third day after his Depoſition, the People not knowing of it. For he was afraid, leſt a diſturbance might have been raiſed upon his account. So, he was convey'd away [and baniſh'd.]

* Ἐν πρεσαείῳ. See Euſeb. Book 7. chap. 11. note (k.)

(c) Inſtead of [παρεγγέφετο] it muſt be [παρεγεγράφετο;] which is a Civil-Law term: and we have rendred it accordingly. For παρεγγεγραφὴ ſignifies an Exception. Now, one kind of an Exception is a refuſal of the Judges. Valeſ.

(d) John Chryſoſtome, in his Epiſtle to Innocentius, does atteſt, that he was put on Shipboard late in the Evening, and carried into baniſhment. Upon which account Baronius (at the year of Chriſt 403.) charges Socrates with a miſtake here. But, if we weigh Socrates's Words more attentively, we ſhall find them in no wiſe differing from Chryſoſtome's Narrative. For Socrates ſays only, that John Chryſoſtome ſurrendred himſelf to the Emperor's Officers about Noon; therefore the Emperor's Officers might detain him in cuſtody till the Evening, that he might be conveyed into baniſhment with more ſecrecy in the Night. Valeſ.

CHAP. XVI.

That the People being tumultuous becauſe of Johannes*'s Baniſhment*, Briſo the Empreſs's Eunuch was ſent to bring him back again to Conſtantinople.

BUt the people were intolerably tumultuous. And (as it uſually happens in ſuch caſes) thoſe who had conceived an hatred againſt him changed it into a compaſſion, and affirmed him to be calumniated, whom a little before they deſired to ſee depoſed. Upon this account therefore they were the moſt numerous, who exclaimed both againſt the Emperor, and the Synod of Biſhops. But in a more eſpecial manner they fix'd the occaſion of this Calumny upon Theophilus. For his frauds could no longer continue concealed; but [were diſcovered] both by many other Indications, and alſo becauſe he communicated with Dioſcorus and thoſe termed the Long Monks, (a) ſoon after Johannes's Depoſition. Moreover, at that time Severianus alſo (in a Sermon which he preach'd in the Church,) ſuppoſing he had a fair opportunity of reproaching Johannes, ſpake theſe words; Although Johannes had been condemned for nothing elſe, yet his proud and arrogant Diſpoſition was crime ſufficient [juſtly to have occaſion'd] his Depoſition: For Men are forgiven all other ſins, but God reſiſteth the proud, as the Sacred Scriptures inform us. Theſe words provoked the Populace to an higher degree of obſtinacy and contention. Upon which account the Emperor gave order he ſhould be recalled immediately. Briſo therefore the Empreſs's Eunuch being ſent, found him at (b) Prænetum, which is a Mart-Town ſituate over-againſt Nicomedia, and ordered him to return to Conſtantinople. But in regard Johannes, after he was recalled from exile, refuſed to enter the City, before he had been declared innocent by a greater Judicature; in the interim therefore he abode in a (c) Village at ſome diſtance from the City, termed Marianæ. Upon his making delays, and refuſing to enter the City, the multitude was incenſed, and forthwith began to caſt forth opprobrious words againſt the Emperors. For which reaſon Johannes was forced to return. The Populace therefore went forth to meet him with [expreſſions of] the greateſt veneration and honour, and bring him directly to the Church; entreating him to place himſelf in the Epiſcopal Chair, and (according to his former uſage) pray for peace upon the People. Upon his refuſing to do that, and ſaying that that ought to be done by a determination of the Judges, and that it was neceſſary his Condemners ſhould acquit him; the Multitude grew more inflamed, they being extreamly deſirous to ſee him ſitting in the [Epiſcopal] Chair, and to hear him preach again. At length the People prevailed to have theſe things done. And Johannes after he had ſeated himſelf in the Epiſcopal Throne, according to his uſage prayed for peace upon the People: and moreover, being conſtrained thereto, he preach'd a Sermon to them. This thing gave Johannes's Adverſaries an occaſion of [raiſing] another calumnious accuſation againſt him. But concerning that they ſpake not one word then.

Arcadius and Honorius.

(a) Yea, he communicated with them, before Johannes's caſe was inquired into: So Sozomen tells us, Book 8. Chap. 17. Valeſ.

(b) This Town's name is written variouſly. Hieroeles, Theophanes, Cedrenus, Nicephorus, and Moſchopulus, call it Prænetum. Sozomen terms it Pronetum. In Stephanus 'tis named Pronellus. In the Peutingerian Table it is called Pronetio. Valeſ.

(c) Mannours or Farms in the Country, which were at ſome diſtance from the City, were termed προάστια, (as we have remark'd in our Notes on Euſebius, Book 7. Chap. 11.

Note (k.) which the Latines do ſometimes call Suburbana. Wherefore Ortelius (in his Theſaurus Geographicus) is miſtaken, in his ſuppoſing Marianæ to be the Suburbs of Conſtantinople; whereas it was a Village, ſo called from its Builder. Sozomen (Book 8. Chap. 18.) ſays this Village was then in the Empreſs Eudoxia's poſſeſſion. Valeſ.

CHAP. XVII.

That upon Theophilus*'s deſiring to diſcuſs* Heraclides*'s Caſe then abſent, and* Johannes*'s refuſing to permit him; an Engagement hapned between the* Conſtantinopolitans and Alexandrians, wherein many were ſlain [on both ſides.] At which Theophilus and ſome other of the Biſhops were terrified, and fled from the City.

BUT in the firſt place Theophilus made an attempt to call in queſtion Heraclides's (a) Ordi-

Arcadius and Honorius.

(a) Ordination; that ſo, if poſſible, he might make that an occaſion of depoſing Johannes [again.] Heraclides was not preſent; but was judged in his abſence, as if he had unjuſtly beaten ſome perſons, bound them with chains, and cauſed them to be led thorow the midſt of the City Epheſus.

(a) Inſtead of [καὶ ἐ τῶ χειροτονίαν] it muſt undoubtedly be [τὰ χ τῶ, &c.] which is the reading in Gregorius Alexandrinus's Life of John Chryſoſtome. Valeſ.

And when Johannes and his Favourers affirmed, that judgment ought not to be * paſſed upon thoſe that were abſent; the Alexandrians on the contarry ſtifly maintained, that Heraclides's Accuſers ought to be admitted, altho' they accuſed him in his abſence. A tumult therefore and a ſharp conflict was forthwith raiſed between the Conſtantinopolitans and Alexandrians: And a Fight hapned, wherein many perſons received Wounds, and ſome few were ſlain. Upon ſight hereof, Theophilus fled forthwith to Alexandria: the ſame thing was done by the other Biſhops, excepting a few who were of Johannes's ſide. And all of them made their eſcape and went to their own [Sees.] Theſe things hapning thus, Theophilus was condemned in the judgment of all Men. Moreover, the Odium againſt him was increaſed, by his being in no wiſe aſhamed of reading Origen's Books conſtantly after this. Being asked therefore by one, Why he would again embrace thoſe Books which he had condemned; his anſwer was this: Origen's Books are like a Meadow adorned with all manner of Flowers. If therefore I find any thing that is good amongſt them, I gather it: But if any thing appears thorny to me, that (in regard it pricks) I let alone. This was Theophilus's anſwer; but he conſidered not this ſaying of wiſe Solomon: that † the words of the wiſe are as goads, and they ought not to kick againſt them, who are pricked by the Precepts [contained therein.] For theſe reaſons Theophilus was condemned in all Mens judgments. Moreover Dioſcorus (one of thoſe termed The Long Monks) Biſhop of Hermopolis, (b) died a little after Theophilus's Flight, and was honoured with a ſplendid Funeral, being buried in the Church at The Oak, wherein the Synod upon Johannes's account had been convened. But Johannes employed himſelf about Preaching: And ordains Serapion (for whoſe ſake the Odium againſt him had been raiſed,) Biſhop of Heraclea in Thracia. Not long after, theſe things alſo hapned.

Or, made againſt.

†The firſt Clauſe of this ſaying occurs at Eccleſ. 12. 11.

(b) Dioſcorus Biſhop of Hermopolis was dead before the Convention of the Synod at the Oak, nor was he buried in the Church at the Oak, but in St. Mocius's Church; as Sozomen atteſts Book 8. chap. 17. St Mocius's Church was at Conſtantinople, as we are informed by Procopius and others. Wherefore Socrates is miſtaken, who attributes that to Dioſcorus, which was rather to have been ſaid concerning his Brother Ammonius. For, at ſuch time as the Synod ad Quercum [that is, the Synod at the Oak,] was ſummoned, Ammonius fell into a diſtemper: And having paſſed over to The Oak, he died ſoon after, and was honoured with a ſpendid Funeral, in the Monaſtery of that place, as Sozomen tells us, Book 8. Chap. 17. Valeſ.

CHAP. XVIII.

Concerning Eudoxia's Silver-Statue; and how Johannes was ejected out of his Church again on account of that, and conveyed into Baniſhment.

(a) Marcellinus (in his Chronicon) reports this Statue to have been

A (a) Silver-Statue of the Empreſs Eudoxia, cloath'd in a Womans Stole, had been erected upon a Pillar of Porphyry. It ſtood upon an high Baſis, not very near, nor yet at any great diſtance from that Church named Sophia: but there was the diſtance of half the breadth of the Street between them both. At that Statue publick Sports were uſually celebrated. Johannes ſuppoſing what was performed [at thoſe Sports] to be done in contempt to the Church, re-aſſumed his uſual freedom and boldneſs of Speech, and armed his Tongue againſt thoſe who did theſe things. And whereas he ought to have perſwaded the Emperors by an Exhortatory Oration, to abſtain from ſuch Sports; he did not do that; but made uſe of his ſharp Tongue, and reproach'd thoſe who had ordered theſe [Sports] to be performed. The Empreſs did again apply theſe Expreſſions to her ſelf. And ſuppoſing Johannes's words [to be ſpoken] in contempt to her, ſhe makes it her buſineſs to have another Synod of Biſhops convened againſt him. Johannes, made ſenſible hereof, preach'd that famous Sermon of his in the Church, the beginning whereof is this: * Herodias rages again, ſhe is again diſturbed, ſhe dances again, ſhe again deſires to receive John's Head in a Charger. Hereby the Empreſs was more highly exaſperated. And not long after the Biſhops arrived, to wit, Leontius Biſhop of Ancyra in Galatia the Leſs: Ammonius of Laodicea which is in Piſidia: (b) Briſo of Philippi in Thracia: Acacius of Beræa in Syria, and ſome others. After theſe Prelates were come, thoſe who had accuſed Johannes before, were ſet up again. Johannes was embolden'd with a greater degree of confidence before theſe Judges: and deſired that the Crimes he was accuſed of, might be inquired into. [In the interim, the Feaſt of of] Our Saviour's Nativity approached, and the Emperor, as he had uſually done before, went not to the Church; but gave Johannes notice, that he would not communicate with him, till ſuch time as he ſhould clear himſelf of the Crimes he ſtood charged with. Farther, in regard Johannes's Accuſers ſhew'd a deſpondency and fearfulneſs of mind, by reaſon of his great confidence, the Biſhops that were preſent ſuperſeded their reſearches into any thing elſe, and affirmed that a ſcrutiny was to be made concerning this only, to wit, That after his depoſition he had thruſt himſelf into his Epiſcopal Chair, without having had it adjudg'd to him by the authority of a Synod. When Johannes made anſwer, that ſixty Biſhops who held communion with him, had decreed that; Leontius rejoyned [in theſe made in the Conſulate of Theodoſius Junior and Rumoridus, which was the year of Chriſt 403: his words are theſe, Eudoxiæ Arcadii uxoris ſuper porphyreticam Columnam argentea Statua juxta Eccleſiam poſita hactenus ſtitit; a Silver Statue of Eudoxia, wife to Arcadius, placed upon a Porphyry-pillar near the Church ſtill ſtands. Theophanes relates the ſame, who ſays, that that Statue was erected in that place called Pittacia, near the Church of St. Irene; and that at the dedication thereof the Præfect of the City (who was a Manichæan and a Semipagan) excited the People to ſhout and dance in ſuch a manner, that the Divine Service could not quietly be performed in the Church, becauſe of the noiſe made by the multitude of Dancers. Notwithſtanding, Baronius places the Dedication of this Statue on the year of Chriſt 404. But in regard Marcellinus Comes, in his Chronicon does in expreſs Words place it on the Conſulate of Theodoſius Junior and Rumoridus, I judge it more ſafe to follow his opinion; provided it be ſaid to have been made after the Synod ad Quercum, and after Chryſoſtome's firſt condemnation, that is, about the cloſe of the year 403. And this is confirmed by Socrates: For he adds a little after, that when the Nativity of our Lord drew near, Arcadius gave Johannes notice, that he could not come to the Church. Now John was depoſed a little before Eaſter, in the Year of Chriſt 404. Valeſ.

* Πάλιν ἡρῳδιὰς μαίνεται, πάλιν ταράττεται, πάλιν ὀρχεῖται, &c. This Homily occurs at Tom. 7. pag. 545. of Sir Henry Savill's Edition of Chryſoſtome.

(b) This Briſo ſeems to be a different Perſon from Briſo the Biſhop, (who (as Cedrenus tells us) was one of John Chryſoſtome's Scholars. And Socrates ſeems to have put Philippi inſtead of Philippopolis. For Philippopolis is an eminent City of Thracia. But Philippi is a City of Macedonia. Valeſ.

Arcadius and Honorius.

these words,] (c) But they were the more in number, O Johannes! who condemned you in the Synod. Again, when Johannes urged, that that was not a Canon of the Catholick Church, (b) but of the Arians making; (for the Bishops * heretofore, convened at Antioch in order to the subversion of the Homoüusian Faith, out of their hatred to Athanasius made that Canon:) [Leontius and his Party] rejected his defence, and pronounced sentence against him; not considering, that by making use of that Canon, (e) they deposed Athanasius also. These things were transacted at the approach of the Feast of Easter.

(c) Baronius (at the year of Christ 404,) charges Socrates with a lye here. For, in the Synod at the Oak thirty six Bishops only had condemned Johannes; of which twenty nine were Egyptians, the rest were of divers Provinces, as Theodorus (in Palladius, in his Dialogue concerning the Life of Chrysostome,) relates from the Acts of the Synod at the Oak. But when he was afterwards recalled to Constantinople, he had been admitted to Communion by sixty five Bishops. Either therefore Socrates must necessarily be mistaken, who has said that Chrysostome was condemned by more Bishops than those by whom he had been admitted to Communion and restored; or else it must be said that Palladius is out. Unless any one will reconcile these things by saying thus, viz. That Leontius the Bishop has here reckoned the suffrages of the Bishops together, who had condemned John Chrysostome in both Synods, as well that held at the Oak, as the other assembled at Constantinople. For although, at such time as Leontius spake these Words, the Bishops present in the Constantinopolitane Synod had not pronounced sentence against Chrysostome, yet Leontius, who knew they were incensed against Chrysostome, made not the least doubt of their Suffrages. Vales.

* See Socrat. Book 2. chap. 10.

(d) Palladius tells us, that this very answer was given by John Chrysostome's defenders, against the Canon of the Antiochian Synod; to wit, that that Canon was made by the Arian Bishops. But Chrysostome's Adversaries rejected this defence, asserting that Canon to have been made by the Catholick Bishops. And when Elpidius, a Bishop of Chrysostome's party, urged them to subscribe that draught of the Creed then promulged by those Bishops; they answered in presence of the Emperor, that they were ready to subscribe it: but they put off that business to another time. Therefore, what must we determine concerning this question? Athanasius indeed, in his Book de Synodis, does wholly reject that Antiochian Synod, together with its draught of the Creed, as having been held by the Arians with a design to subvert the Nicene Creed. But to Athanasius (who cannot be a sufficient Witness in his own case,) we in the first place oppose Hilarius, then Pope Julius, and lastly, all the Eastern and Western Bishops, who have now at length by a general consent admitted of that Synod. Hilarius, 'tis certain, (in his Book de Synodis) does fully admit of it, and commends that form of the Creed drawn up there, as being useful and necessary, on account of the Heresies which sprang up after the Nicene Council. Moreover, Pope Julius wrote a Synodick Epistle to all the Bishops who had been convened in that Synod; amongst whom were Eusebius, Narcissus, Theodorus, and Maris. Which Synodick Epistle Athanasius does record intire, at pag. 739, &c. Tom. 1. Edit. Paris. 1626. In the Title and Body of that Letter, Julius terms them Beloved Brethren; which undoubtedly he would never have done, had he lookt upon them to have been Arians. Now, what reason had he to look upon them to be Arians, who as yet had not been condemned by the sentence of any Synod; and amongst whom there were many stiff maintainers of the Nicene Creed, which Baronius himself does not deny? Of which sort was Dianius Bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, whom Julius names in the first place; concerning whose praises Basil the Great has a peculiar Epistle extant. Lastly, all the Easterns have acknowledged that Synod to be Catholick, and inserted its Sanctions into the Book of Canons, soon after John Chrysostome's times, as appears from the Chalcedon-Council. And at length the Western Church has by degrees admitted of those Canons, rendred into Latine by Dionysius Exiguus. Notwithstanding, in John Chrysostome's times they might be rejected, in regard they were not received by a general consent of the whole Church, nor as yet admitted by the Romish Church. Pope Innocentius, in his Epistle to the Constantinopolitan Church, (which Sozomen has recorded, Book 8. Chap. 26.) does in no wise admit of these Canons. Vales.

(e) Christophorson supposed that these Words were spoken by Socrates concerning the Bishops convened in the Antiochian-Synod. But I think they are to be understood concerning the Bishops then assembled at Constantinople against John Chrysostome. And in this sense Epiphanius Scholasticus and Musculus took this place: For Epiphanius has rendred it thus, Non intelligentes, quod dum hâc regulâ uterentur, Athanasium quoque deponerent; not understanding, that whilest they made use of this Canon, they deposed Athanasius also: and Musculus has translated it happily after this manner: Nec cogitantes, non Johannem se modò, sed & ipsum Athanasium hoc Canone utentes deponere, not thinking, that by using of this Canon, they deposed not only Johannes, but even Athanasius himself. Vales.

The Emperor therefore gives Johannes notice, that (f) he could not come to the Church, because two Synods had condemned him. Wherefore Johannes desisted in future, and went not any more to the Church. On which account those of his Party left the Church immediately, and celebrated Easter in the publick Baths termed Constantianæ. There were with them many Bishops, Presbyters and others of the Ecclesiastick Function; who were termed Johannitæ, because from that time they held Meetings in several places apart by themselves. Johannes appeared not at all in publick for the space of two months, till such time as the Emperor issued out an Order for his being carried away into Exile. By virtue whereof he was drawn out of the Church, and convey'd into Banishment. On which very day some of the Johannitæ set the Church on fire. Whilst that was burning, an Easterly Wind blew, which conveyed the Fire to the (g) Senate-house, whereby that was burnt. This hapned on the twentieth of June, in Honorius's sixth Consulate, which he bore with Aristænetus. Moreover, what mischiefs the Præfect of Constantinople (whose name was (h) Optatus, an Heathen as to his Religion, and therefore an hater of the Christians) did to Johannes's Friends upon account of this Fire, and how he destroyed many of them by a capital punishment, I think fit to omit.

Arcadius & Honorius.

(f) Christophorson thought these words were spoken concerning John, who after this was withheld from entring the Church. But I had rather they should be understood of the Emperor himself; in which sense Epiphanius and Musculus take them. Our sentiment is confirmed by that passage in Socrates, which occurs a little before in this chapter: where he relates, that Arcadius at the approach of Christmas, gave John notice, that he could not come into the Church, unless John (who had been condemned by the sentence of a Synod,) should first clear himself. After the same manner therefore, at the approach of Easter, Arcadius gives John notice, that he could not go to the Church, as long as John, condemned now by two Synods, resided therein. Vales.

(g) This Edifice was called the Senate-house. The Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle, at the sixth Consulate of Honorius which he bore with Aristænetus, has these words: καὶ αἰφνιδίου ἐκάη ἡ μεγάλη ἐκκλησία σὺν τῷ σενάτῳ ἀπὸ κεκτόντων αὐτὴν τὴν λεγομένων ξυλοκερκῶν ἡμέρᾳ δευτέρᾳ ὥρᾳ ς'. And on a sudden the Great Church was burnt together with the Senate-house, [fired] by those who held it, termed the Xylocercetæ, on the second day, at the sixth hour. See Chronic. Alexandr. pag. 714. Edit. Monach. 1615. Zosimus describes this Structure about the middle of his fifth Book. It was in the Second Ward of the City Constantinople, as we are informed from the Old Description of that City, published before the Notitia Imperii Romani. Vales.

(h) This (if I mistake not) is the Manichæan and Semipagan Præfect of the City, who, at the dedication of Eudoxia's Statue, had mocked the Christians, as we have related before (see Note (a.) in this chapter,) from Theophanes. Palladius (in the Life of Chrysostome) speaks concerning the same Optatus; that when he was Præfect of the City, he compelled the Noble Matrons either to communicate with Arsacius, who had been put into John Chrysostome's Bishoprick, or else to pay two hundred pounds of Gold into the Exchequer. Vales.

CHAP. XIX.

Concerning Arsacius, who was ordained Johannes's Successor, and concerning Cyrinus [Bishop] of Chalcedon.

SOme few days after, Arsacius is ordained Bishop of Constantinople; he was Brother to Nectarius, who had been Johannes's Predecessor in that Bishoprick, and had governed it well: but he was very aged. For he was above eighty years old. During his calm and peaceable presidency over that Bishoprick, by reason of his singular mildness, Cyrinus Bishop of Chalcedon, * whose foot Maruthas Bishop of Mesopotamia had unawares trod upon, was in so very ill a condition, that his foot putrified, and he was forced to have it cut off. Nor was this abscission performed once only, but it was many times iterated. For † the Gangrene preyed upon his whole Body, body, in so much that it seized his other foot, which he was forced to have cut off also. I have mention'd this thing for this reason, in regard many persons did affirm, that Cyrinus suffered all this on account of the opprobrious words he had spoken against Johannes; for he frequently termed him an inexorable person, as I have said *before. And because [about the same time] their fell an hail, [the stones whereof were] of a vast bigness, at Constantinople and in the Suburbs round that City; (which hapned in the † fore-mention'd Consulate, about the thirtieth of September:) this was said to have been an act of Divine vengeance for Johannes's unjust depositon. These reports had more of credit given to them, and were improved by the Empress's death, which hapned soon after. For she ended her life on the fourth day after the hail fell. Others affirmed, that Johannes was deservedly deposed, because, when he was in Asia and Lydia, he had seized upon many Churches belonging to the Novatianists, Quartodecimani, and some other [Hereticks, to wit,] at such time as he made a journey to Ephesus on account of Heraclides's Ordination. But, whether Johannes's deposition were just, agreeable to their saying who were incensed against him; or whether Cyrinus underwent a due punishment for his reproachful language; and whether the hail fell, and the Empress died, upon Johannes's account; or whether these things hapned for other reasons, or for both, God knows, who is the Discerner of things secret, and the just Judge of Truth it self. I have recorded what the common reports of men were at that time.

CHAP. XX.

How, after Arsacius, Atticus obtained the Constantinopolitan See.

BUt Arsacius did not long survive his taking the Bishoprick: For, on the following Consulate, which was Stilichon's second, and Anthemius's first, about the eleventh of November he died. Many persons being exceedingly desirous of obtaining the Bishoprick, and for that reason much time having been spent, on the following Consulate, which was Arcadius's sixth, and Probus's first, a religious person was promoted to the Bishoprick, his name Atticus. By original extract he was of Sebastia in Armenia, but had followed an Ascetick course of life from his younger years; and, besides his being furnished with a competency of Learning, he was endowed with a greater degree of natural prudence. But I shall speak concerning this person hereafter.

CHAP. XXI.

Concerning Johannes's departure to the Lord in exile.

JOhannes being carried into banishment, died at Comana upon the Euxine Sea, on the fourteenth of (a) September, in the following Consulate, which was Honorius his seventh and Theodosius's second. He was a person (as I have said * before) by reason of his zeal for Temperance, more addicted to anger than bashfulness; and because of his sanctity of life, he always made use of too great a liberty of speech. But it is to me a wonder, how he, who was so zealous a follower of Temperance, should teach in his Sermons, that Temperance was to be contemn'd. For, whereas the Synod of Bishops allowed Repentance but once to those who lapsed after Baptism, he was so bold as to say, [(b) although] you have repented a thousand times, approach. For which doctrine many of his acquaintance rebuked him; but more especially Sisinnius Bishop of the Novatianists: who wrote a Book against this saying [of Chrysostome's,] and reproved him sharply for it. But, these things hapned long before this time.

Arcadius and Honorius.

* Chap. 3.

(a) In what Homily this was said by Chrysostome, I cannot find. And yet we have little reason to question Socrates's authority, because he lived in the same times, and could have heard the Sermons, as well of Chrysostome, as of Sisinnius Bishop of the Novatians. Moreover, it may be more certainly concluded from this passage, than from any other, that Socrates was a Novatianist. For he does both put an ill interpretation upon Chrysostome's saying, and also openly favours Sisinnius Bishop of the Novatian party, against John Chrysostome——You must know further, that this saying was objected to Chrysostome by Bishop Isaacius in the Synod ad Quercum; because he gave Sinners a liberty, in regard he taught, if you have sinned again, repent again. And, as often as you sin, come to me and I will heal you. Vales.

CHAP. XXII.

Concerning Sisinnius Bishop of the Novatianists, what expressions he is said to have used in his discourses with Johannes.

BUt, I judge it not inopportune, to speak something briefly concerning Sisinnius. He was (as I have often said) an eloquent person, and an excellent Philosopher: But in a more especial manner he had taken pains about Logick, and was incomparably well versed in interpreting the Sacred Scriptures: In so much that Eunomius the Heretick would [out of fear] frequently avoid his judicious and powerful acuteness in discourse. His diet was not slender. But though he was eminently temperate, yet his Fare was sumptuous and magnificent. His way of living was splendid and delicate, [he was clad] in a white garment, and bathed himself twice a day in the publick Baths. Being on a time asked by one, why he that was a Bishop would bathe twice a day; his answer was, because I cannot bathe thrice. At another time, when out of respect he went to give Arsacius the Bishop a visit, he was asked by one of those about Arsacius, why he would wear a garment mis-becoming a Bishop? And where it was written, that a Priest should be cloathed in a white garment? His answer was, Tell me first where is it written, that a Bishop should wear a black garment? And when he that asked him, was in doubt [how to return answer] to this contrary question, Sisinnius added; You, said he, can never shew that a Priest ought to wear black. But Solomon is my Author, whose words are, * Let thy garments be white. And our Saviour in the † Gospels, appeared cloathed in a white garment. Moreover, he shewed Moses and Elias, wearing white garments, to the Apostles. Having with readiness said these and many other such words as these, he was greatly admired by those that were present. When Leontius Bishop of Ancyra in Ga-

(a) Instead of [November,] it must be [September,] as it is in the Sfortian M. S. and in Epiphanius Scholasticus's Version. Nor did Nicephorus read otherwise, who adds, that the day whereon John Chrysostome died, was dedicated to the Exaltation of the Holy Cross. For so it was agreeable, that he who had passed his whole life under the Cross, and had gloried in nothing but in the Cross of his Lord, should be loosed from the Frame of his body on that Festival, as the same Nicephorus does elegantly write. Vales.

latia the Less, had taken the Church [there] from the Novatianists, and was [at that time] come to Constantinople, Sisinnius went to him, and entreated him to restore the Church. But Leontius in an heat made answer, and said to him, You Novatianists ought not to have Churches, [in regard] you take away Repentance, and exclude the Loving-kindness of God. After Leontius had spoken these and more such ill words against the Novatianists, Sisinnius made answer, But no person repents in such a manner as I do. When Leontius added again, How do you repent? Sisinnius subjoyned, because I have seen you (a). One time Johannes reproved Sisinnius, and said to him, a City cannot have two Bishops; Sisinnius's answer was, Nor has it. Johannes being angry hereat, and saying, you seem desirous of being the only Bishop; Sisinnius replied, I do not say that; but that I am not a Bishop in your account only, when as notwithstanding other persons look upon me to be such. Johannes incensed at that answer, I (said he) will make you leave preaching; for you are an Heretick. To which Sisinnius made this pleasant return; But I will give you a reward, if you will free me from so great pains. Johannes being mollified with this answer, replied, I will not make you leave off preaching, if that Office be troublesome to you. So facetious was Sisinnius, and so ready at answering. It would be tedious to write and record all his sayings: wherefore, I have accounted it sufficient, by these few to shew what manner of person he was. I will only add this, that he was very eminent for his Learning; on which account all the Bishops that were his Successors, loved and honoured him. Moreover, all the eminent personages of the Senatorian Order had a great affection for, and admired him. He wrote many Books; but * he is too studious about words in them, and intermixes Poetick terms. He was more admired for his speaking, than his writing: for, in his Face and Voice, in his Garb and Aspect, and in the whole Motion of his Body, there was a gracefulness. By reason of which [accomplishments] he was beloved both by all Sects, and chiefly by Atticus the Bishop. But, I think thus much sufficient [to have been said] concerning Sisinnius.

(a) In Suidas, at the word Σισίννιος, this whole passage in Socrates is transcribed, where the word [ἀπεκρίνατο, he answered] is wanting. Which word must either be expunged here as superfluous, [which we have done in our Version;] or else the word [ἔφη, subjoyned] which went before, must be blotted out, Vales.

* Or, he hunts after words, &c.

CHAP. XXIII.

Concerning the Death of the Emperor Arcadius.

NOt long after the death of Johannes, the Emperor Arcadius died; a man of a mild and quiet temper, and who at the close of his life gat the repute of a person beloved by God, for this reason. There is at Constantinople a very spacious House, which is termed * Carya. For, in the Court of this House there is a Nut-tree, on which ('tis reported) the Martyr Acacius was hanged, and compleated his Martyrdom. On this account a small Church was built near that Tree. The Emperor Arcadius desirous to see this Church, went into it [one day:] and when he had said his Prayers, came out again. All those persons who dwelt near that Church, ran together to see the Emperor. Some went out of the House, and made it their business to take their standings before hand in the streets, from whence they supposed they might have a plainer view of the Emperor's Countenance, and of the Guards that were about him. Others followed, until all persons, together with the Women and Children, were got out of the Church. After which, all that great House, the Buildings whereof enclosed the Church on every side, fell down immediately. Hereupon followed an outcry, together with an admiration, because the Emperor's Prayer had delivered so great a multitude of persons from destruction. This hapned thus. [Moreover, Arcadius] leaving his Son Theodosius, then but eight years old, ended his life in the Consulate of Bassus and Philippus, on the first of May: this was the second year of the two hundredth ninety seventh Olympiad. He reigned with his Father Theodosius thirteen years: after his Father's death [he reigned] fourteen; he lived one and thirty years. This Book contains the † History of twelve years and six months.

† Or, the Space.

Arcadius and Honorius.

* In other Copies this following passage occurs, not as if it were omitted, but worded in a different manner. We judged it therefore meet to annex it. On which account we have added it at this place.

* This Appendix is part of the eleventh chapter of this Book, worded in a different manner only. Musculus, Grynæus, and Dr. Hanmer have omitted it in their Versions. Christophorson, Curterius, and Valesius have inserted it in their translations. The Greek Text of it occurs in Stephens's Edition, and in Valesius's; from which latter we have rendred it into English.

BUt, in regard the Bishop of Ephesus hapned to die in the interim, Johannes was necessitated to go to Ephesus, to ordain a Bishop. Being arrived in that City, and some endeavouring to promote one person, others another; he preferred one Heraclides, his own Deacon, by Country a Cypriot, to the Bishoprick. Whereupon a disturbance being raised in Ephesus, because Heraclides was [reputed] unworthy of the Episcopate; Johannes was forced to stay at Ephesus for some time. During his residence there, Severianus grew more beloved and esteemed by his Auditors at Constantinople. Nor was this unknown to Johannes. For he was speedily acquainted with what hapned by Serapion, whom he had a singular affection for, and to whom he committed the whole care of his Episcopate, in regard of his piety, his fidelity in all concerns, his prudence in the management of all matters, and his studiousness about defending the Bishops Rights. After some time, Johannes returns to Constantinople, and personally undertook again a becoming care of the Churches. But between Serapion the Deacon, and Severianus the Bishop, there arose a great * dissention; Serapion opposing Severianus, because he strove to out-do Johannes in his Preaching; and Severianus envying Serapion, because Johannes the Bishop favoured him highly, and entrusted him with the whole care of his Episcopate, Being thus affected one towards the other, the vehemency of their hatred hapned to be much increased by this reason. To Severianus on a time passing by, Serapion † shewed not that honour which is due to a Bishop; but continued in his seat; whether it was because he saw him not, (as Serapion afterwards affirmed upon oath before the Synod;) or whether it was because he slighted the presence of a Bishop, (as Severianus averred) [which of these was truest] I cannot say: God only knows. But Seve-

Arcadius and Honorius. Severianus could not then bear Serapion's contempt; but immediately, even before cognizance had been taken of the Cause in a publick Synod; with an (a) Oath condemns Serapion, and not only [divests him] of the dignity of a Deacon, but excommunicates him also from the Church. Johannes hearing this, took it very ill: But afterwards, when the business came under scrutiny before a Synod, and Serapion excused the fact, and averr'd that he saw him not, and also produced witnesses [in confirmation thereof;] the whole Synod of Bishops then convened pardon'd him, and entreated Severianus to admit of Serapion's excuse. But Johannes the Bishop, that he might fully satisfie Severianus, removes Serapion, and suspends him from the * Office of a Deacon for a weeks space: although he used him as his Right Hand in all businesses, in regard he was a most acute and diligent person about Ecclesiastick Disputes and Answers. Notwithstanding, Severianus could not thus be prevailed with: but made it his whole business to get Serapion not only wholly degraded from his Diaconate, but excommunicated also. Johannes was sorely vexed hereat, went out of the Synod, and left the Bishops then present to determine the Cause, having spoken these words to them: Do you inquire into the Cause, and make such a definitive Determination as you shall think fit. For I refuse to determine the difference between them. After Johannes had spoken these words, and was risen up, the whole Synod arose likewise, and left the Cause in the same state it was in, blaming Severianus rather, because he † acquiesced not in what had been said by Johannes the Bishop. But Johannes admitted not Severianus to a familiarity any more in future: but advised him to return into his own Country, signifying thus much to him: Severianus, (said he) 'tis not expedient, that the Dioceſs you are intrusted with should for so long a time continue unlook'd-after, and destitute of the presence of its Bishop. Wherefore, hasten your return to your Churches, and neglect not the Gift [which God hath bestowed] upon you. When Severianus had begun his Journey, the Empress Eudoxia, informed hereof, reproves Johannes, and causes Severianus to be forthwith recalled from Chalcedon in Bithynia. He came back immediately. But Johannes declined a Friendship with him, and could by no persons entreaty be prevailed upon: till such time as the Empress Eudoxia, in that Church called the Apostles, cast her Son Theodosius Junior, then a very young Child, before Johannes's knees, and having conjured him frequently by her Son, with much a-do perswaded him to admit of a Friendship with Severianus. After this manner therefore, || &c.

(a) He means the oath mentioned before, at the 11th chapter, to wit, if Serapion dies a Christian, Christ hath not been incarnate. Further, these words [condemns] and [excommunicates] denote Severianus's Menaces, rather than the thing it self. For Severianus Bishop of Gabali had no power of condemning or deposing a Deacon of another Dioceſs; but he only threatned to do this, and committed his complaint to the Judgment of the Bishops. Valeſ.

(a) Nicephorus (Book 14. chap. 1.) relates that this Anthemius enlarged the Pomœrium, [that is, a space about the Walls of a City or Town, as well within as without, which was not to be built upon] of the City Constantinople, demolished the old Walls, and built new ones towards the Continent, which (says he) are now standing: and that he finished the work with incredible swiftness, to wit, within the space of two months. For so I render χερσαῖα τεῖχη, that is, Walls to the Landward, and not as Langus does, Brick-walls. But Nicephorus seems to be mistaken, who attributes that to Anthemius, which was done long after

He never did any thing without advice, but conſulted with many of his acquaintance concerning what ought to be done; chiefly, with (b) Troïlus the Sophiſta, who, beſides the (c) wiſdom that was in him, was Anthemius's equal in political knowledge. Wherefore, almoſt all things were done with Troïlus's advice.

(b) This Troilus the Sophiſta was one of Anthemius's chief-eſt friends, as (beſides Socrates) Syneſius informs us in his Epiſtle to Troïlus. Socrates mentions the ſame Troïlus, at Chap. 6. Concerning Atticus Biſhop of Conſtantinople, what manner of perſon he was as to his Temper and Diſpoſition.

DUring therefore the Emperors being in the eighth year of his age, Atticus was in the third year of his Epiſcopate over Conſtantinople, and was highly eminent. He was a perſon (as we have ſaid * before) beſides his great Learning, pious and prudent. Wherefore, he much augmented the Churches under his juriſdiction. For he did not only defended thoſe of his own Creed, but cauſed the Hereticks alſo to admire his prudence. He was in no wiſe vexatious to them; but when he had attempted to terrifie them, afterwards he ſhewed himſelf mild towards them. Nor was he careleſs about his ſtudies: For he beſtowed much pains in reading ancient Writers, ſpending whole nights in peruſing them. Wherefore he was not unacquainted with the Diſcourſes of the Philoſophers and Sophiſtæ. Moreover, to thoſe that addreſt to him, he was pleaſant and delectable: He groaned with ſuch as were ſorrowful; and, that I may ſpeak ſummarily, according to the Apoſtle's [example,] * he was made all things to all men. Formerly, during his being a Presbyter, he made Sermons, gat them by heart, and preacht them in the Church. But afterwards, by his aſſiduity, he procured ſuch a readineſs of expreſſion, as to be able to ſpeak † extempore, and followed a Panegyrical way of preaching. Notwithſtanding, his Sermons were not ſuch, as were either received by his Hearers with applauſe, or committed to writing. But, concerning his Temper, Morals, and Learning, let this ſuffice. I will now relate thoſe memorable paſſages which hapned in his times.

Honorius and Theod. Jun.

Concerning Theodoſius and Agapetus Biſhops of Synnada.

IN (a) Synada a City of Phrygia Pacatiana, one Theodoſius was Biſhop, who ſeverely perſecuted the Hereticks in that City, wherein there were many of the Sect of the Macedoniani: he drove them not only out of the City, but from the [adjacent] Villages alſo. Which practice of his was not (b) agreeable to that of the Orthodox Church, which does not uſe to perſecute; nor was [he incited hereto] by a zeal for the true Faith; but being a perfect ſlave to the love of money, he made it his buſineſs to amaſs riches together, [by taking them] from the Hereticks. Wherefore, he made all imaginable attempts againſt thoſe that embraced the Sect of the Macedoniani, putting the Clergy that was under him in arms; and practiſed a thouſand ſtratagems againſt them: nor did he forbear (c) binding them [over] to the Courts of Judica-

(a) It would be more truly written Synnada, with a double n. For ſo the name of this City is more frequently inſcribed on old Coyns. Johannes Triſtanus has produced a Coyn of the Emperor Caracalla's, which has this inſcription, Σωνναδέων [Synnadeon.] Yet 'tis ſometimes written with a ſingle n. So it is in an old Coyn of the Emperor Nerva's, in the reverſe whereof Jupiter is engraven with this Inſcription, ΔΙΑΠΑΝΔΙΜΟΝ ϹΥΝΑϹΙS.

This Coyn was in the Archives of that illuſtrious perſonage the Lord Bryennius, concerning the meaning whereof when I was asked by the Learned Franciſcus Ogerius, (to whom Patinus had communicated that Coyn,) my anſwer was; It was to be read thus, διὰ πάνδημον σωναδεῖς. For the Synnadenſians worſhipped Jupiter under the name of Pandemos, becauſe having heretofore been gathered together out of many ſorts of people in Greece, by Acamas, Theſeus's ſon, they inhabited the City Synnada. Whence ſays Stephanus, the City was ſo named, ἀπὸ τῆ σὺν ναίειν, from their dwelling together. Further, thoſe people out of whom the Colony of the Synnadenſians was firſt collected, were of two ſorts; to wit, the Macedonians, and the Athenians, or Ionians, who were in Aſia; as the ſame Stephanus relates. Whence we underſtand, why (in the Emperor Caracalla's Coyn, which Johannes Triſtanus has ſet forth,) the Synnadenſians, are termed Dorienſes and Ionians. For, this is the inſcription, σωναδέων δωριέων ἰώνων. For the Macedonians, a Colony whereof Acamas brought thither, were originally Dorienſes. But the Athenians who went thither with Acamas Theſeus's ſon, and the Colonies which Acamas is reported to have gathered out of Aſia, were Ionians, ſo termed from Ion the Athenian. Valeſ.

(b) It is a famous queſtion, and uſually diſputed on both ſides, whether it be lawful for Catholicks, eſpecially Biſhops, to perſecute Hereticks. In the determination whereof, I am of opinion, that a diſtinction is requiſite. For 'tis certain, that on account of amaſſing Money together it is not lawful for Catholicks to moleſt and vex Hereticks; which thing Theodoſius Biſhop of Synnada at that time did. Alſo, to perſecute them by criminal ſentences, and to thirſt after their blood, is in like manner unlawful; as Idatius and ſome other Prelates of Spain did in their perſecution of the Priſcilianiſts. To whoſe communion when St. Martin had for ſome time joyned himſelf, he acknowledged that great detriment befel him from that thing, as Sulpicius Severus does relate in his Life. Notwithſtanding, it is and always was lawful for Catholicks, to implore the aid of Princes and Magiſtrates againſt Hereticks, that they be reſtrained, and kept within the bounds of duty; leſt they ſhould behave themſelves inſolently over the Catholicks, or leſt they ſhould inſult over and ſcoff at the Catholick Religion. St. Auguſtine confeſſes indeed, that heretofore this was his Sentiment, to wit, that Hereticks were not to be moleſted and vexed by Catholicks, but that they were to be invited by all inſtances of manſuetude and mildneſs. But afterwards he altered his opinion, being moſt certainly informed, that the Laws of Princes made againſt Hereticks, are uſeful to Hereticks themſelves in order to their Converſion. And he ſays this was acknowledged by the Donatiſts themſelves, who had afterwards returned to the Catholick Church. For they affirmed, that they had never returned to the Church, but had always continued in their error, had they not been provoked and drawn as it were by thoſe Penalties and Mulcts [contain'd in] the Imperial Laws. There is a moſt elegant paſſage of Auguſtine's [about this matter] in his 48th Epiſtle to Vincentius; to which is to be added another paſſage of the ſame Author, in his firſt Book againſt Gaudentius, chap. 23. Valeſ.

ture. More especially, he did several ways disquiet their Bishop, whose name was Agapetus. But in regard the Governours of Provinces in no wise had (as he supposes) a sufficient power to punish [Hereticks,] he ran to Constantinople, and petition'd for Edicts from the Præfecti Prætorio. In the interim therefore that Theodosius staid at Constantinople on this account, Agapetus, who, as I have told you, presided over the Sect of the Macedoniani, betook himself to a [prudent and] good (d) course. For, having communicated the affair to his whole Clergy, and called together the people under him, he perswades them to embrace the Homoöusian Faith. Having effected this, he went directly into the Church, accompanied with a great multitude, or rather with the whole body of the People in general. Where * when he had solemnized the Prayers, he took possession of the Chair, wherein Theodosius was wont to sit. And having united the people, and professing in future the Homoöusian Creed, he became possest of the Churches belonging to Synada. These things having been after this manner transacted, Theodosius arrives within a short time, and brings along with him a Præfecturian assistance; and being ignorant of what had been done, goes immediately to the Church. From whence he was driven by all persons unanimously, and went again to Constantinople. Being arrived there, he made complaint before Atticus the Bishop, of what had been done against him, to wit, that he had been (e) unjustly ejected out of his Bishoprick. Atticus knowing that this accident was advantagious to the Church, gave Theodosius comfortable words, perswading him with patience to embrace a quiet course of life, and informing him that he ought to prefer the good of the publick before his own private concern. But he wrote to Agapetus, [ordering him] to continue in possession of the Bishoprick, and [bidding] him not to be suspicious of any molestation from Theodosius's displeasure Concerning the Paralytical Jew, who was cured by Atticus the Bishop in Divine Baptism.

THis was one useful accident which befel the Church in the times of Atticus. Nor was the state of these times without Miracles, or Cures. For a Jew, who had been a Paralytick* for many years, was confined to his Bed. And when all medicinal Remedies had been applied to him, and no prayers of the Jews could do him any good; at length he betook himself to Christian Baptism, hoping that this would be his only true and salutary Physician. Atticus the Bishop was soon acquainted herewith. Having therefore instructed him in the Rudiments of Christianity, and declared to him the hope in Christ, he ordered him to be carried in his Bed to the Font. The Paralytical Jew receiving Baptism with a sincere Faith, immediately upon his being taken out of the Water in the Font, was freed from his Disease, and continued sound and healthy in future. This [admirable] Cure, the power of Christ vouchsafed to shew to men even in our times: by reason whereof many Heathens believed and were baptized. But the Jews, although they seek after Signs, notwithstanding could not be induced [to believe,] by present Miracles. Such benefits as these were conferred upon men by Christ.

CHAP. V.

How Sabbatius, who from being a Jew had been made a Presbyter of the Novatianists, deserted those of his own Opinion.

BUt many persons slighting these things, persisted in their Impiety. For the Jews did not only disbelieve these Miracles which happened; but such persons also as were studious followers of them, were found to hold the same Sentiments they did. For Sabbatius, of whom we have made mention a little * before, not willing to continue in the degree of a Presbyter to which he had been promoted, but being from the beginning ambitious of a Bishoprick, in these times separated from the Church of the Novatianists, making the observation of the Jewish Passover his pretence. Holding therefore Assemblies that were schismatical and separate from his own Bishop Sisinnius, in a place of the City which is termed Xerolophus, where Arcadius's Forum now is, he attempted an audacious fact * that deserved many punishments. For, on one of his Meeting-days, he read a passage in the Gospel, whereat these words occur, † Now it was a feast called the Passover of the Jews; to which he made an addition of his own, that was never written, nor ever heard of before; to wit, these words, Cursed (says he) be that person who celebrates the Passover (a) not on the days of unleavened bread. These words of his being heard, spread immediately. And the simpler sort of the Novatian Laity, circumvented by this artifice, betook themselves to him. But his fraud proved unsuccessful to himself: and his forgery had an unhappy event: for not long after (b) he celebrated the Festival by way of Anticipation, when many persons flock'd to him. And whilst they were keeping the (c) Solemn Vigils by watching all night in the Church, a Dæmoniacal terror seised them; as if Sisinnius their Bishop was come with a great multitude, [to fall] upon them. Hereupon a a disturbance was raised, as it usually happens, and they being shut by night in a strait place, trod upon one another: in so much that above seventy persons of them lost their lives. For this reason many deserted Sabbatius. Notwithstanding, some possest with a * rude anticipate opinion, continued with him. But how Sabbatius violated his Oath, and got into a Bishoprick, we will declare by and by.

(a) Ἔξω ἀζύμων. I like not the Version of Langus and Christophorson, who have rendred this place thus: maledictus qui absq; azimis pascha celebrat; cursed is he who celebrates the Passover without unleavened Bread. In my judgment it must be rendred thus, beyond [or, not on] the days of unleavened bread. For in the Greek it is not ἄνευ or χωρὶς, that is, without: but ἔξω, which imports beyond, out of, or, saving on. Vales.

(b) Τὴν ἐκ προλήψεως ἑορτὴν ἐπιτέλει. Which Langus and Christophorson render thus: Cum ex anticipata opinione Festum Paschæ celebraret, when he celebrated the Paschal Festival by an anticipated opinion. I like Musculus's Version better, who translates it thus: per anticipationem celebraret, he celebrated [the Festival] by way of anticipation. For Sabbatius celebrating the Paschal solemnity after the Jewish manner, prevented the Christians, and kept that Festival before the Sunday. If these Words are thus to be understood; it must be written, τῇ ἑορτῇ ἐκ προλήψεως. Socrates uses the same term a little lower in this Chapter; where speaking concerning the same thing, his words are: τῇ ἀγερωχικῇ προλήψει κεχρ[illegible]μένοι, possest with a rude anticipate opinion. Where notwithstanding, πρόληψις seems to be taken for an anticipate opinion. Vales.

(c) I understand The Vigil of the Paschal Festival. Nor can ἡ ἐξ ἔθους παννυχὶς be any other than the Vigil of the Paschal Festival. For Sabbatius (although he anticipated Easter, and celebrated it with the Jews yet) kept the Vigils on the Paschal Sabbath with the rest of the Christians; with whom also he celebrated Easter-day in a dissembling and negligent manner, as Socrates has related before, in Book 5. chap. 21. And thus this passage in Socrates was understood by Nicephorus, whose Words his Translator hath not rendred well. Nicephorus's words words are theſe: τῇ δὲ εἰωθυίᾳ πανυχίδι τὸ σεμνὸν γέρας ἀφοσιωμένων, &c. Which are to be tranſlated thus, But in regard they celebrated the ſolemn Vigil with a congruous worſhip meerly for faſhions-ſake, &c. Moreover, why Sabbatius (although he followed the Jews in the obſervation of Eaſter, notwithſtanding) would feign a celebration of Eaſter with the Chriſtians, this in my judgment is the reaſon; becauſe he feared the Laws of the Emperors who hade made a Sanction that they ſhould be accounted Hereticks, who kept not Eaſter on one and the ſame day with all other Chriſtians. This was the command of the Emperor Theodoſius, in the ninth Law of the Theodoſian Code de Hæreticis. Valeſ.

DOrotheus Biſhop of the Arian Hereſie (who had been tranſlated by the Arians from Antioch to Conſtantinople, as we have related * before,) having lived an hundred and nineteen years, died in Honorius's ſeventh and Theodoſius Auguſtus's ſecond Conſulate, on the ſixth of November. After this perſon Barba preſided over the Arian Sect: In whoſe time the Arian Hereſie was very happy in having two eloquent Men, both whom were dignified with a Presbyterate. The name of the one was Timotheus; the other was called Georgius. Georgius was furniſh'd with more of Grecian Literature: but Timotheus had beſtow'd greater pains about the Sacred Scriptures. Moreover, Georgius had Ariſtotle's and Plato's Books always in his hands; but Timotheus was † an admirer of Origen: And in his Expoſitions of the Sacred Scriptures in publick, he [ſhewed himſelf] not to be unskilled in the Hebrew Tongue. Timotheus had formerly been an Adherent to the Sect of the || Pſathyriani. But Georgius had been ordained by Barba. I my ſelf diſcourſed with this Timotheus, and evidently perceived how ready and expedite he was in returning anſwers to thoſe who queſtioned him, and in explaining the moſt obſcure places which occur in the Sacred Scriptures. He always quoted Origen as a moſt evident Witneſs of what he aſſerted. I cannot therefore but wonder, how theſe two perſons ſhould perſiſt [in their adherence] to Arianiſm; the one of whom had Plato always in his hand; and the other had Origen in his mouth. For neither does Plato aſſert, that the ſecond and third Cauſe (as he uſually terms them) took a beginning of Exiſtence. And Origen every where acknowledges the Son to be co-eternal with the Father. But, tho' they continued in their own Church, yet the Arian Hereſie was by them reduced to a better and more moderate temper. For by their own Doctrine they baniſhed many of Arius's Blaſphemies. But thus far concerning theſe perſons. Not long after this, Siſinnius Biſhop of the Novatianiſts died, in the ſame Conſulate, and Chryſanthus is ordained, concerning whom we ſhall ſpeak hereafter.

How Cyrillus ſucceeded Theophilus Biſhop of Alexandria.

SOme little time after this, Theophilus Biſhop of Alexandria fell into a * Lethargick diſtemper, and died in Honorius's ninth and Theodoſius's fifth Conſulate, on the fifteenth of the month October. And a contention being raiſed there alſo about the Biſhoprick, ſome endeavoured to place Timotheus the Arch-deacon in the Epiſcopal Chair; others Cyrillus, (a) who was Theophilus's Siſter's Son. When a Sedition aroſe hereupon amongſt the People, Abundatius Commander of the Milice [in Egypt] favoured Timotheus's Party. Wherefore, on the third day after Theophilus's death, Cyrillus was placed in the Chair, and came to the Biſhoprick with a greater power than Theophilus had done: For from that time, the || Biſhops of Alexandria (b) ſurpaſſing the Sacerdotal degree and bounds, exerciſed a Principality, and took upon them the [Secular] Government of Affairs. Cyrillus therefore forthwith ſhut up the Churches of the Novatianiſts at Alexandria; and in the firſt place he took away all their ſacred Veſſels and Ornaments; after which he deprived their Biſhop Theopemptus of all he had.

Concerning Maruthas Biſhop of Meſopotamia, and how the Chriſtian Religion was by him propagated in Perſia.

Between the Romans and Perſians frequent Embaſſies are continually ſent: (a) for there are ſeveral reaſons, why they ſhould frequently ſend Embaſſies to one another. There hapned therefore to be a neceſſity at that time, that Maruthas Biſhop of Meſopotamia (whom we have mentioned a little * before) ſhould be ſent by the Roman Emperor to the King of the Perſians. The Perſian King having found that this perſon was endowed with an eminency of Piety, honoured him highly, and gave him attention, as being really and truly a Friend of God. The Magi, (b) whoſe intereſt is great with the Perſian King, were incenſed hereat. For they were afraid leſt he ſhould perſwade the King to turn Chriſtian. For Maruthas by his Prayers had cured the King of a Pain in his Head, wherewith he had been a long while troubled, which the Magi could not cure him of. Wherefore, the Magi betake themſelves to the inventing of a fraudulent deſign. But Maruthas, a Man truly acceptable to God, was very earnest in putting up his prayers, whereby he detected the fraud which the Magi had framed.] He addressed himself] therefore to the King in these words, Be not deluded, O King! But go into [the house,] and when you shall hear the voice, dig up the ground, and you will discover the Fraud. For the fire speaks not, but the invention of men does this. The King of the Persians is perswaded by Maruthas, and goes into the little house again, * where fire is kept always burning. And when he had heard the same voice again, he order'd the place to be dug up where he that utter'd the words, which were supposed to be God's, was found. Therefore, the King was highly incensed, and gave order that the * Tribe of the Magi should be ‖ decimated. After this was done, he spoke to Maruthas to build Churches whersoever he pleased. From that time the Christian Religion was propagated amongst the Persians. Moreover, Maruthas having then left Persia, return'd to Constantinople. But, not long after he was sent Embassador again to the Persians. And the Magi betook themselves to the invention of Plots and Intrigues again, to hinder his being admitted by the King. (c) For by a device they raised a most horrid stink in that place, (d) into which the King usually came; and the calumniously accused the Christians, as if they had caused it. But when the King, in regard he already had a suspicion of the Magi, made a more exact scrutiny about the occasioners [of this stink,] the Magi were found again to be the causes of this ill smell. Wherefore he punished many of them again: but he had a greater honour and esteem for Maruthas. And he loved the Romans, with whom he embraced a friendship. Yea, the King himself wanted but little of turning Christian, after Maruthas, together with (e) Abdas the Bishop of Persia, had shewed another * Miracle. For both these Persons, when they had fasted long, and been earnest in prayers, cast out a devil that vexed the King's Son. That Rome became subject to the Barbarians at that time, and was destroyed by Alarichus.

AT that very time Rome hapned to be taken by the Barbarians. For one Alarichus a Barbarian, (who had been an Allie of the Romans, and had assisted the Emperor Theodosius in the War against the Tyrant Eugenius, on which account he was honoured with (a) Roman dignities,) could not bear his fortunate success. He presumed not indeed to seize the Empire; but retired from Constantinople, and went into the Western parts. Being arriv'd in Illyricum, he laid all places desolate immediately. The Thessalians resisted him in his march, about the mouths of the River Peneus, from whence there is a pass * over the mountain Pindus to Nicopolis [a City] of Epirus. And coming to an engagement, the Thessalians killed about three thousand [of his Forces.] After this the Barbarians that were with him, burnt and ruined whatever was in their way, and in fine took Rome it self. Which City they destroyed, and burnt the greatest part (b) of the admirable works and structures therein: but they made plunder of the mony, and divided it [amongst themselves.] They also forced many of the Senatorian Order to undergo various punishments, and [afterwards] slew them. [Alarichus] likewise, in contempt to Empire, proclaimed one Attalus Emperor. Whom he ordered to go guarded like an Emperor one day; and the next made him appear in a servile habit. After he had done all this, he fled, being terrified with a Rumor, as if the Emperor Theodosius had sent an Army to fight him. Nor was this Rumor false; For an Army did really come. And he was unable to bear the fame thereof; but, as I have said, fled away. 'Tis reported, that as he went to Rome, he was met by a pious Person that led a monastick life, who adviséd him not to rejoyce in [perpetrating] so great and notorious mischiefs, nor to delight in slaughter and blood: To whom Alarichus made this return, I go not thither of my own accord. But some * thing does every day vex and disquiet me, saying, go to Rome, and ruin that City. Thus much concerning this Person.

But, a little afterwards, when being sent for by Rufinus, he had ruined Græcia and Epirus, he was created Master of the Militia throughout Illyricum; as Claudian informs us in his second Book against Eutropius.

AFter Innocentius, Zoſimus was poſſeſt of the Churches at Rome, for the ſpace of two years. After whom, Bonifacius preſided over that Church three years, who was ſucceeded by Celeſtinus. And this Celeſtinus deprived the Novatianiſts alſo at Rome of their Churches, and forced their Biſhop Ruſticula to hold his Meetings in private and obſcure Houſes. For till this time the Novatianiſts flouriſhed mightily at Rome, had many Churches, and aſſembled numerous Congregations therein. But envy * impaired them alſo; the Roman Biſhoprick, having (like that of Alexandria) ſurpaſſed the Sacerdotal Degree and Bounds, and degenerated long before into a Secular Principality. And for this reaſon the [Roman] Biſhops would not permit, even thoſe who agreed with them in the Faith, peacably and quietly to celebrate their Meetings, but took from them all they had; only they praiſed them for their agreement in the Faith. Notwithſtanding, the Conſtantinopolitan Biſhops were not thus affected: for they not only permitted [the Novatianiſts] to have their Meetings within the City, but had a ſingular love and affection for them alſo, as I have ſufficiently declared already.

Concerning Chryſanthus Biſhop of the Novatianiſts at Conſtantinople.

AFter Siſinnius's death, Chryſanthus was by force made Biſhop. He was the Son of that Marcianus, who had been Biſhop of the Novatianiſts before Siſinnius. From his younger years he had had a military Employ in the Palace; afterwards, in the Reign of Theodoſius the Great, he was made Conſularis of Italy, and after that Vicarius of the Britannick Iſlands; for his management of both which Charges he was much admired. Being grown elderly, he return'd to Conſtantinople; and deſiring to be made Præfect of that City, he was againſt his will compelled to take the Biſhoprick. For Siſinnius having mention'd him at the time of his death, as a fit perſon for the Biſhoprick, the Novatian People, with whom Siſinnius's Words were a Law, attempted to draw him by force, even againſt his will. But when Chryſanthus fled, Sabbatius ſuppoſing an opportune ſeaſon was offer'd him, wherein he might be made Poſſeſſor of the Churches, gets himſelf ordain'd Biſhop by ſome obſcure [Prelates] and ſlights the Oath which he had bound himſelf in. Amongſt thoſe who ordain'd Sabbatius Biſhop, Hermogenes was one, who had been excommunicated and curſed by Sabbatius, for his blaſphemous Books. But Sabbatius's deſign proved unſucceſsful to him: for the People hating * his unreaſonable ambition, (becauſe (a) he did all things with a deſign of getting into the Biſhoprick,) made it their whole buſineſs to find out Chryſanthus. Whom they found abſconding in Bithynia, whence they brought him by force, and preferr'd him to the Biſhoprick. He was a perſon of as great prudence and modeſty, as any man was: and by his means the Church of the Novatianiſts at Conſtantinople was preſerved and increaſed. He was the firſt perſon who diſtributed Gold * of his own to the Poor. He received nothing from the Churches, ſave only (b) two Loaves of the Bleſſed Bread every Sunday. Moreover, he was ſo careful about his Church, that he took (c) Ablabius the eloquenteſt Orator of his own time, from Troïlus the Sophiſta's School, and ordain'd him Presbyter: Whoſe elegant and acute Sermons are now extant. Concerning the Fight which hapned at Alexandria between the Chriſtians and Jews, and concerning Cyrillus the Biſhop's Difference with Oreſtes the Præfect.

ABout the ſame time the Jewiſh Nation were driven out of Alexandria by Cyrillus the Biſhop, for this reaſon: The Alexandrians are more ſeditious and tumultuous than any other people; and if at any time they get an occaſion, they [uſually] break out into intolerable miſchiefs: For their rage is not appeaſed without blood. It hapned at that time, that the Populace of that City were tumultuous amongſt themſelves, not upon any weighty or neceſſary occaſion, but by reaſon of that miſchief which abounds in all Cities, I mean an earneſt deſire of looking upon Dancers. For in regard a Dancer gathered great multitudes together on the Sabbath-day, becauſe the Jews work not on that day, nor are buſied in hearing their Law, but [ſpend their time in ſeeing] Theatrical Shows, that day uſually occaſion'd mutual Factions and Diviſions among the People. And although this was in ſome meaſure regulated and repreſſed by the Præfect of Alexandria, nevertheleſs the Jews conti-continued enraged against those of the contrary Faction: and besides their being always enemies to the Christians, they were much more incensed (a) against them on account of the Dancers. Therefore, when Orestes, Præfect of Alexandria (b) made a Police (so the Alexandrians do usually term publick Orders,) in the Theatre; some of Bishop Cyrillus's Favourers were present there also, being desirous to know the Orders that were made by the Præfect. Amongst whom was a person, by name Hierax, a teacher of the (c) meaner sort of Learning.

(a) Instead of [καθ' ἑαυτὸν] Musculus and Christophorson read κατ' αὐτὸν, against them.] Which reading I like better. Notwithstanding Nicephorus retains the common reading. Vales.

(b) Πολιτείαν ἐν τῷ δεκάτῳ ποιοῦντος. Epiphanius Scholasticus was mistaken in thinking there was a Festival which the Alexandrians called Politia. Nor was Christophorson less out, in supposing the publick Edicts of the Imperial Præfects to be so termed by the Alexandrians, which Orestes published then in the Theatre. In which he is doubly mistaken. First, because he thought that all the Imperial Edicts were by the Alexandrians called Politia; whereas, those Edicts only had that name, which belonged to the quiet and profit of the City. Agreeable whereto, those Orders made in respect to the prices of Corn and other vendible Commodities, usually exposed to sale in the Market, at Paris we now term in French a Police, and the Orders of Police. Secondly, Christophorson mistakes in supposing that these Edicts were published by Orestes in the Theatre. For Socrates does not say so, but only that Orestes made, (that is, dictated, or rehearsed to his Officers) these Orders in the Theatre. For the Roman Magistrates were wont to sit in Judgment and decide Matters in the Law, in the Theatre, Circus, or in any other place they had a mind to. So Amm. Marcellinus relates (Book 15.) concerning Leontius Præfect of the City. Moreover, the Orders then made by Orestes, respected the Theatre, and the publick Shows. Vales.

He was a zealous hearer of Cyrillus the Bishop, and always mighty diligent about raising the * Clappings at his Sermons. The Jewish multitude spying this Hierax in the Theatre, cried out immediately, that he came into the Theatre for nothing else, but to raise a sedition amongst the people. Moreover, Orestes had long before conceived an hatred against the Secular Government of Bishops, because it diminished much of their power who had been appointed Governours of Provinces by the Emperor; and also more especially, because Cyrillus was desirous of prying into his Acts and Orders. Having seized Hierax therefore, he made him undergo tortures publickly in the Theatre. With which Cyrillus being acquainted, sends for the chief of the Jews, and threatned them with condign punishment, unless they desisted from being tumultuous against the Christians. Of which menaces after the Jewish multitude were made sensible, they became more pertinacious; and contrived Plots to damnifie the Christians. The chiefest of which designs of theirs, and which occasion'd their expulsion out of Alexandria, I will relate here. Having † agreed upon a Sign amongst themselves, [which was,] that every one of them should wear a Ring on their fingers made of the bark of a Palm-tree-branch, they took a resolution of making an attack upon the Christians by a night-fight. One night therefore they sent some persons provided for that purpose, who cried out in all the ‖ streets of the City, that Alexander's Church was on fire. The Christians hearing this, ran some one way, others another, that they might preserve the Church. Then the Jews set upon them immediately, and slew them: they abstained from killing those of their own party, by shewing their Rings; but they murder'd all the Christians they hapned to meet with. When it was day, the Authors of this nefarious fact were not concealed. Cyrillus highly incensed hereat, went accompanied with a great multitude to the Jews Synagogues (so they term their Houses of Prayer) which he took from them: He also expelled the Jews out of the City, and permitted the multitude to make plunder of their Goods. The Jews therefore, who had inhabited that City from the days of Alexander the Macedonian, were all forced to remove naked from thence at that time, and were dispersed some in one place, others in another. Adamantius, [one of them] (d) a Professor of Physick, went to Constantinople, and fled to Atticus the Bishop; and having turn'd a Professor of Christianity, returned afterwards to Alexandria again, and fix'd his residence there. But Orestes Præfect of Alexandria was highly incensed at what was done; being exceedingly troubled, because so great a City was on such a sudden emptied of so numerous a company of Inhabitants. Wherefore he acquainted the Emperor with what had been done. Cyrillus himself likewise made known the Jews Wickednesses to the Emperor; nevertheless he sent Messengers to Orestes, on accouut of procuring a Reconciliation. For the People of Alexandria compelled him to do this. And when Orestes would not admit of any conferences about a Reconciliation, Cyrillus (e) held forth the Book of the Gospels to him, thinking he should by that strike a Reverence into Orestes. But when he would not be mollified even by this means, but continued an irreconcileable War between himself and Cyrillus; this accident hapned afterwards.

(d) Ἰατρικῶν λόγων σοφιστής. These Persons the Greeks in one word term ἰατροσοφιστὰς, that is, Professors of Physick. Such a one was Magnus Medicus, who professed Physick publickly at Alexandria; but was a better Orator then Physician; as Eunapius informs us, in his Book De Vitis Sophistarum. Such a one also was Gesius the Physician in the times of the Emperor Zeno; concerning whom see Stephanus Byzantius, in the word Γέα. Damascius (in the Life of Isidorus) spends a great many words about this Gesius; and from him Suidas, in the word Γέσιος. Where he divides Physick into two parts, Theory and Practice. Vales.

(e) Cyrillus therefore held forth the Book of the Gospels, that thereby he might conjure and earnestly beseech Orestes Præfect of Egypt, to be reconciled with him. We have remarked already (see Book 6. Chap. 11. note b.) that the Ancients did usually conjure and earnestly beseech, by those things which they used to swear by. The Christians usage was to swear by the Gospels, laying their Hands on those sacred Books, as 'tis evidently known. Vales.

That the Monks of Nitria came down to Alexandria in defence of Cyrillus, and raised a Sedition against Orestes the Præfect.

SOme of the Monks who inhabited the mountains of Nitria, retaining an heat of mind from Theophilus's times, who had armed them unjustly against Dioscorus and his Brethren; were incensed with a Zeal then also, and took a resolution of fighting couragiously in defence of Cyrillus. About five hundred persons therefore of them went out of their Monasteries, came down to the City, and observe the Præfect going forth in his Chariot. They came to him, and called him Sacrificer and Pagan, and gave him many other reproachful terms. The Præfect having a suspicion that a Plot was framed against him by Cyrillus, cried out that he was a Christian, and had been baptized by Atticus the Bishop at Constantinople. But when the Monks heeded not what he said, one of them, by name Ammonius, flings a stone and strikes Orestes on the head: by which wound he was all over besmear'd with bloud: and his * Apparitors ritors that attended him, except a very few, receded, ran ſome one way, others another, [and hid themſelves] in the Crowd, to avoid being killed by the throwing of ſtones. In the interim the Alexandrians flock'd together, with a reſolution to be revenged upon the Monks on the Præfect's account. They put all the reſt of them to flight; but ſeized Ammonius, and bring him before the Præfect. He, agreeable to the Laws, (a) put him to the Queſtion publickly, and tortured him in ſuch a degree, that he died. Not long after he acquainted the Emperors with what had been done. But Cyrillus gave the Emperor a Narrative [of the buſineſs] contradictory [to Oreſtes's.] And he took Ammonius's body, depoſited it in one of the Churches, altered his name, calling him Thaumaſius, order'd he ſhould be ſtiled a Martyr, and extolled his Magnanimity publickly in the Church, as if he had undergone the Combat in defence of Piety. But the modeſter and more ſober perſons even of the Chriſtians, approved not of this favour of Cyrillus's ſhewn towards Ammonius. For they certainly knew, that Ammonius had undergone the puniſhment of his raſhneſs, and died not under his tortures, as forced to renounce Chriſt. Wherefore, Cyrillus himſelf cauſed the memory of this affair to be by little and little buried in ſilence. But that fierce contention between Cyrillus and Oreſtes ſtopt not here. For it was (b) re-kindled by another accident not unlike thoſe foregoing.

(a) That is, tortured him. Inſtead of [ὑπολαβὼν, undertaking,] it muſt undoubtedly be [ὑποκαλῶν, put him to, or made him undergo,] as Sir Henry Savil had mended it at the Margin of his Copy. Nor did Muſculus read otherwiſe, who has rendred this place thus: quem ille publicè ſecundum leges torturæ ſubjicit, whom he makes to undergo torture in publick, agreeable to the Laws. Where you ſee Muſculus took the word δημοσίᾳ for an Adverb, and is therein followed by Chriſtophorſon. For thus he renders it: Præfectus palàm, uti leges poſtulant, de eo quæſtionem exercere, The Præfect, as the Laws required, put him to the Queſtion openly. Notwithſtanding, δημοσία may be taken adjectively in the ſame ſenſe. I have obſerved a little before from Amm. Marcellinus, that the Roman Magiſtrates were wont to take Criminals openly and in publick, and torture them; in regard they had their Apparitors always about them. Therefore, even whileſt they rode in their Chariots, they put Offenders to the Queſtion, as Marcellinus relates concerning Leontius, and Socrates at this place concerning Oreſtes. Valeſ.

(b) The Verb, ἀπέσβεσε, extinguiſhed, is in no wiſe agreeably uſed here. I had much rather make it ἀνέφλεξε, rekindled. For ἀνῆπτε (which Verb Sir Henry Savil and the Geneva-Printers have ſet in the margin from Chriſtophorſon's Copy,) is not to be born with, in regard it ſignifies, was kindled, not, was renewed. I found here no alteration in the M. SS. Copies. Nicephorus has alſo followed the common reading. For, inſtead of ἀπέσβεσε, extinguiſhed, he makes uſe of ἠμαύρωσε, was obſcured, or, obliterated. Valeſ.

THere was a woman at Alexandria, by name Hypatia: She was daughter to (a) Theon the Philoſopher: She had arrived to ſo eminent a degree of learning, that ſhe excelled [all] the Philoſophers of her own times, and ſucceeded in (b) that Platonick School derived from Plotinus, and expounded all the Precepts of Philoſophy to thoſe who would hear her. Wherefore, all perſons who were ſtudious about Philoſophy, flockt to her from all parts: By reaſon of that eminent *Gracefulneſs and Readineſs of expreſſion, wherewith ſhe had accompliſh'd her ſelf by her Learning, ſhe addreſſed frequently even to the Magiſtrates, with a ſingular modeſty. Nor was ſhe aſhamed of appearing in a publick aſſemby of men. For all perſons revered and admired her for her eximious modeſty. Envy armed it ſelf againſt this woman at that time. For, becauſe ſhe had frequent conferences with Oreſtes, for this reaſon a calumny was framed againſt her amongſt the Chriſtian populace, as if ſhe hindred Oreſtes from coming to a reconciliation with the Biſhop. Certain perſons therefore of fierce and over-hot minds, who were headed by one Peter a Reader, conſpired againſt the woman, and obſerve her returning home from ſome place. And having pulled her out of her Chariot, they drag her to the Church named (c) Cæſareum: Where they ſtript her, and murder'd her with Shells: And when they had torn her piece-meal, they carried all her Members to a place called Cinaron, and conſumed them with fire. This fact * brought no ſmall (d) diſgrace upon Cyrillus and the Alexandrian Church. For, murthers, fights, and things of that nature, are wholly foreign to the embraces of Chriſtianity. Theſe things were done on the fourth year of Cyrillus's Epiſcopate, in Honorius's tenth, and Theodoſius's (e) ſixth Conſulate, in the month of March, in Lent.

(a) The incomparably Learned Sir Henry Savil, at the margin of his Copy, had made this remark, which we thought good to communicate to the ſtudious Reader. Theo Interpres Ptolemæi, &c. that is, Theon Ptolemie's Interpreter, in the 81ſt year of the Diocletian Epocha (which was Valens's fifth year, as I ſuppoſe,) obſerved two Lunar Conjunctions, the one Synodicam the other Panſelenon. See pag. 277, and 282. of Theon's Comments upon the Almageſtus, Edit. Baſil. 1538. Therefore, 'tis very probable, that this Theon was Hypatia's Father. For, from thoſe Obſervations to Hypatia's death, there are 47 years. Valeſ.

(b) At Alexandria there was heretofore a School of Platonick Philoſophy, over which, amongſt others, Hierocles the Philoſopher preſided; as Damaſcius (in the Life of Iſidorus, pag. 1038,) and Æneas Gazæus (in Theophraſto) do inform us. But the Succeſſion of this School is not to be deduced from Plotinus. For Plotinus never taught Philoſophy at Alexandria. Plotinus was indeed inſtructed in Philoſophy at Alexandria, by Ammonius; but he himſelf never kept a School there, but continued teaching at Rome for the ſpace of twenty ſix years compleat, until his death; as Porphyrius relates in his Life. Wherefore, inſtead of Plotinus, I would more willingly put Ammonius here. Unleſs we ſhould ſay, that the Alexandrian School had aſſociated Plotinus to themſelves, as being the eminenteſt Maſter and Inſtructor of the Platonick Philoſophy. By this means our Socrates may be excuſed. Valeſ.

* Or, wrought no ſmall diſgrace to, &c.

(c) Athanaſius mentions this Church in his Epiſtle ad Solitarios, pag. 860. ὅτε ἐν τῇ μεγάλῃ ἐκκλησίᾳ, τῇ ἐν τῷ καισαρείῳ γενομένας θυσίας, καὶ νῦν χεῖρα βλασφημίας, ἃς ἐξ ἐντολῆς αὐτῶν πεποιήκασιν Ἀρειανοί τε καὶ Ἕλληνες: have not the Arians and Pagans offered ſacrifice in the Great Church, in the Cæſareum, and [performed] blaſphemies againſt Chriſt, by his command as it were? He means the Cow, which the Pagans would have offered in the Great Church, of which he had ſpoken before, at pag. 848. Epiphanius ſays a great deal concerning the ſame Church, in Hæreſ. Arian. chap. 2. 'Tis called Baſilica Cæſarea in Liberatus's Breviarium, cap. 18. Valeſ.

(d) Tis certain, that Damaſcius (in the Life of Iſidorus the Philoſopher, which by Gods aſſiſtance I will ere long ſet forth larger by half, than it is) does make Cyrillus the Author of Hypatia's murder. Damaſcius's Words are theſe: ἤδη γέν ποτε σωέβη τὸν ἐπισκοπεύοντα τὼν ἀντινεμβήνν αἵρεσιν κλεινὸν, περιόντα διὰ τὸ ὅλως τῆς ὑπατίας, and ſo on, which occur in Suidas. 'Tis a moſt elegant paſſage, which in favour to the ſtudious Reader, I will render into Engliſh, and annex it here, repeating Damaſcius's words a little higher. The Governours alſo of the City Alexandria, as ſoon as they came into that City, viſited her in the firſt place. Which has been uſually done at Athens alſo. For, though the thing it ſelf be loſt, yet the name of Philoſophy ſeems as yet magnificent and venerable to perſons who hold the principal place in the government of the publick. It happened therefore one time, that Cyrillus a Biſhop of the Chriſtian Religion, paſſing by Hypatia's houſe, ſaw a great company before her door, both of Men and Horſes; ſome of whom came, others went away, and others ſtayed. And when he had inquired what that multitude meant, and why ſo great a tumult was made, he was anſwered by his followers, That they then ſaluted Hypatia the Philoſophreſs, and that that was her houſe. Which when Cyrillus had been acquainted with, he was ſo galled with envy, that he forthwith contrived her murder, and that in the moſt nefarious manner. For when Hypatia went out of her houſe as ſhe was wont to do, many inhumane Ruffians, who fear neither the puniſhments of the Gods, nor the revenge of Men, aſſault and kill her; defiling their own country with a moſt horrid crime and diſgrace. The Emperor was highly incenſed thereat, and had revenged it, had not Ædeſius corrupted the Emperor's friends. The Emperor pardoned the Aſſaſſines. But he drew the revenge upon his own head, and on his own family: For his Nephew underwent the puniſhment. Thus far Damaſcius. Where by Nephew he means, as I ſuppoſe, Valentinianus the Son of Placidia, who was Aunt to Theodoſius Junior. Valeſ.

That the Jews, entring upon another War against the Christians, were punished.

SOme time after this, the Jews renewed their absurd and impious practises against the Christians, and were punish'd [again for them.] At a place named Inmestar, which is situate between Chalcis and Antioch of Syria, the Jews (as 'twas their usage) exhibited some Sports. During their Sports they perform'd many mad actions, excited thereto by their drunkenness; and in their Recreations reproach'd not only the Christians, but even Christ himself. And in derision to the Cross, and to them who put their trust in Him that was crucified, they attempted this villainous fact. Having seized a Christian Boy, they bound him to a Cross, and hung him up. At first they laugh'd at and jeer'd him: But becoming afterwards inraged, they scourged the Boy till he died. For this reason there hap ned a sharp conflict betwixt them and the Christians. And after the Emperors were acquainted with this fact, an Order was issued out to the Governours of the Province, to find out and punish the Authors thereof. Thus the Jews, who inhabited that place, were punish'd for the Wickedness they had committed in their Sports.

CHAP. XVII.

Concerning Paulus Bishop of the Novatianists, and concerning the Miracle done by him, when he was about to have baptized a Jewish Impostor.

AT the same time, Chrysanthus also Bishop of the Novatianists, having presided seven years over the Churches * of his own Sect, ended his life in the Consulate of Monaxius and Plintha, on the twenty sixth of August. He was succeeded in the Bishoprick by Paulus: who before had been a Teacher of Roman Eloquence: but afterwards bad adieu to the Roman Tongue, and betook himself to an Ascetick course of life: And having gather'd together a Monastery of Religious Men, he followed a way of living not unlike that led by the Monks in the Desart. For I found him to be really such a Person, as Evagrius says the Monks who live in the Solitudes ought to be. For he imitated them exactly in all things, in continued fasts, in speaking little, and in abstaining from eating Creatures that have life. Moreover, for the most part he abstain'd from Oyl and Wine. Besides, his care and solicitude about the Poor was eminent and extraordinory. He was very diligent in his visits to the impriſon'd; he interceded likewise for many Persons with the Judges, who readily hearkned to him on account of his eminent Piety. What need I be large in my relation concerning him? I will mention one action of his, highly worthy to be recorded in writing. A Jewish Impostor pretending himself converted to the Christian Religion, had been frequently baptized, and by that device had gather'd much money. When he had deceived many Sects [of the Christians] by this fraud: (for he had received Baptism from the Arians and Macedonians:) having no more Persons whom he might put tricks upon, at length he came to Paulus Bishop of the Novatianists; and affirming that he earnestly desired Baptism, requested he might obtain it from his hand. He approved of the Jews's desire; but said he would not give him Baptism, before he had been instructed in the Grounds and Principles of the Faith, and had exercised himself with fastings several days. The Jew therefore having contrary to his own mind, been compelled to fast, was so much the more urgent in his Intreaties for Baptism. Wherefore Paulus, because he would not offend him, now grown importunate, by any longer delays, makes provision for his Baptism. And having bought him a white Vestment, and order'd the * Font to be filled with Water, he brought the Jew to it with a design to baptize him. But † an invisible act of Divine Power caused the Water to vanish [on a sudden.] In regard the Bishop and those that were present, (having not the least suspicion of any such thing as had hapned) supposed the Water to have run out by the passage underneath, whereby it was usually let out; they filled the Font again, having with great accuracy stopt up its passages every where. And when the Jew was brought the second time to the Font, all the Water disappeared again. Then Paulus spake these words; Either you are an Impostor, O Man, or else, being ignorant, you have been baptized already. A great multitude of People therefore running together to see this Miracle, one of 'em knew the Jew, and was certain that it was the same person who had been baptiz'd before by Atticus the Bishop. This Miracle was perform'd by the hands of [Paulus] Bishop of the Novatianists.

How, after the Death of Isdigerdes the Persian King, the League between the Romans and Persians was broken, and a bloudy War hapned, wherein the Persians were worsted.

AFter the Death of Isdigerdes King of Persia, by whom the Christians in that Country were not persecuted in the least, his Son, by name Vararanes succeeded in that Kingdom; and being induced thereto by the Magi, he vexed the Christians severely, inflicting on them various Punishments and Persian Tortures. The Christians therefore in Persia, constrained thereto by necessity, fly to the Romans, entreating them not to neglect, and see them wholly destroyed. Atticus the Bishop receives the Suppliants kindly; and made it his business to assist them to the utmost of his power. Likewise, he acquainted the Emperor Theodosius with what had hapned. It fell out at the very same time, that the Romans were offended with the Persians upon another account: because the Persians would not restore the Miners of Gold, whom they had hired of the Romans; and in regard they had deprived the Roman Merchants of their † effects. To this occasion of difference, the flight of the Christians in Persia to the Romans made an accession. For the Persian King dispatch'd away an Embassie immediately, to demand the Fugatives. But the Romans would in no wiſe deliver up thoſe who had fled to them, not only becauſe they were deſirous of preſerving them as being Suppliants, but in regard likewiſe of their readineſs to do any thing in defence of the Chriſtian Religion. Wherefore they choſe rather to have a War with the Perſians, than permit the Chriſtians to be miſerably deſtroyed. Hereupon the League was broken, and a fierce War broke out, concerning which I judge it not inopportune to give a ſhort Narrative. The Roman Emperor ſent part of an Army firſt, which was commanded by Ardaburius. He made an irruption into Perſia through Armenia, and ruined one of the Perſian Provinces termed Azazene. Narſæus the Perſian King's General marched out to oppoſe him at the head of a great Perſian Army. And coming to an Engagement, was worſted, and fled. [Afterwards] he judged it advantagious to make a ſudden irruption through Meſopotamia into the Roman Territories, being unguarded, [thinking] by this means to be revenged on the Romans. But this Deſign of Narſæus's was not unknown to the General of the Romans. Having therefore in a ſhort time laid Azazene deſolate, he likewiſe marched into Meſopotamia. Wherefore Narſæus (notwithſtanding he was furniſhed with a numerous Army, yet) could not invade the Roman Provinces. But, coming to Niſibis, (which is a City ſituate in the Confines [of both Empires] and belongs to the Perſians,) he ſent a Meſſage from thence to Ardaburius, deſiring they might come to an agreement between themſelves about the management of the War, and that a place and day for an Engagement might be ſet. Ardaburius gave the Meſſengers this anſwer: Tell Narſæus [thus,] the Roman Emperors will not fight when you have a mind they ſhould. Moreover, the * Emperor perceiving that the Perſian muſter'd up the whole force of his Kingdom for the carrying on of this War, placed all his hopes of Victory in God, and beſides ſent vaſt ſupplies of Forces. Now, that the Emperor (in regard he put his whole confidence in God,) received benefit from him immediately, 'twas from hence evident. The Conſtantinopolitans being very anxious, and doubtful about the event of the War, the Angels of God appeared in Bithynia to ſome Perſons going to Conſtantinople about their private concerns, and bad them tell [the Conſtantinopolitans,] that they ſhould be of good courage, and pray to God, and be confident that the Romans would be Conquerors. For they ſaid, that they themſelves were ſent from God to be the Managers of the War. At the hearing hereof, the City was not only encouraged, but the Soldiers alſo became more bold and valiant. Whereas therefore (as I have ſaid,) the War had been removed from Armenia into Meſopotamia, the Romans ſhut up the Perſians in the City Niſibis, to which they laid ſiege. And having made wooden Towers, which moved upon Engines, they brought them to the Walls, wherewith they killed many of thoſe who fought from the Walls, and [of them] who ran to their aſſiſtance. Vararanes King of Perſia hearing that his Country Azazene was laid deſolate, and his Army beſieged within the City Niſibis, reſolved to go in perſon with all his Forces againſt the Romans: But, being afraid of the Roman Army, he called the Saracens to his aſſiſtance, who were then governed by Alamundarus, a valiant and warlike Man. He brought a numerous multitude of Saracens with him, and ſpake to the King of Perſia to be confident and couragious, he likewiſe promiſed, that he would quickly make the Romans his Priſoners, and deliver Antioch in Syria to him. But the event ſucceeded not according to his promiſe. For God poſſeſt the Saracens with a vain and irrational terror. Who ſuppoſing the Roman Forces to be falling upon them, became terrified, and not finding how they might make their eſcape, caſt themſelves armed as they were into the River Euphrates, wherein about an hundred thouſand Men were drown'd. Theſe things fell out after this manner. But the Romans who laid ſiege to Niſibis, being informed that the King of Perſia was bringing many Elephants along with him were terrified, and having burnt all their Engines which they had made uſe of in the Siege, (a) retreated into their own Country. But, what Engagements hapned afterwards; and how Areobindus, another Roman General, killed the valianteſt Perſon amongſt the Perſians in a ſingle Duel; and how Ardaburius deſtroyed ſeven valiant Perſian Commanders in an Ambuſcade; or after what manner (b) Vitianus another Roman General vanquiſhed the Remains of the Saracen Forces, I think fit to omit, leſt I ſhould ſeem to digreſs too far from my Subject.

MOreover, the Emperor Theodoſius was in a very ſhort time acquainted with the Actions [of his Forces.] After what manner the Emperor had ſo ſudden an account of what was done in places at ſo great a diſtance, I will relate. It was his good fortune to have a * Servant of a vigorous Mind and ſtrong Body, his name was Palladius. This Perſon could ride on Horſe-back at ſuch a rate, that in three days ſpace he could go to thoſe places which are the Boundaries of the Roman and Perſian Territories, and again in as many days return to Conſtantinople. The ſame Man paſſed through all other parts of the World with an incredible ſwiftneſs, whitherſoever the Emperor ſent him. Wherefore, an eloquent Perſon utter'd this Saying on a time concerning him: This Man by his ſwiftneſs makes the Roman Empire, which in it ſelf is large, ſeem to be little. Moreover, the King of the Perſians was amazed when he heard theſe things of this Man. But, let thus much be ſaid concerning Palladius.

CHAP. XX.

How the Persians had another severe Overthrow given them by the Romans.

THe Roman Emperor residing at Constantinople, and being informed of a Victory apparently given him (a) by God, was so good, that altho' his Forces had managed the War very fortunately, nevertheless he embraced a Peace. He sends Helion therefore (a person whom he had a mighty esteem for) with Orders to make up a Peace with the Persians. Helion arriving in Mesopatamia, [at that place] where the Romans had made a great Ditch for their own security, sends one Maximinus (an eloquent person, who was (b) Assessor to Ardaburius the General) Embassador about a Peace. When this Person was come to the Persian King, he acquaints him with his being sent about a Peace, not from the Roman Emperors, (for he affirmed that the Emperor as yet was wholly ignorant of that War: and when he knew of it, he would look upon it as contemptible:) but from his chief Commanders. When the Persian King was resolved readily to embrace the Embassy: (for his Army was in great distress, by reason it wanted provisions;) those Soldiers, who amongst the Persians are termed the Immortals, (their number is ten thousand [and they are] valiant Men,) came to the Emperor. and said, that a Peace was not to be admitted of before (c) they had made an attack upon the Romans, then careless and negligent. The King is perswaded by them, shuts up the Embassador in prison, and sends the Immortals to put their design upon the Romans in execution. Being come [to the place appointed,] they divided themselves into two parties, and took a resolution of surrounding part of the Romans Army. The Romans seeing but one party of the Persians, made provision to receive their attack. The other party was not seen by them: For they rusht forth to fight on a sudden. But when the Engagement was just beginning, the Army Roman under the command of (d) Procopius Master of the Milice (Divine Providence so ordering the matter,) appears from an eminence. Procopius seeing his Fellow-Soldiers in danger, attacks the Persians in the Rear; and so they who a little before had surrounded the Romans, were themselves encompassed. After the Romans had in a short time slain every man of these, they set upon those who issued forth upon them from the Ambuscade, every man of whom likewise they dispatch with their Darts. Thus, those termed the Immortals amongst the Persians, were all of them manifestly proved to be Mortals; Christ inflicting this punishment upon the Persians, because they had murder'd many pious persons that were his worshippers. The Persian King, inform'd of this overthrow, pretended himself wholly ignorant of the action: and having given admission to the Embassy, he spake to the Embassador in this manner: We embrace a Peace, not that We yield to the Romans: but We [do it to] gratifie You, because We have found You to be the prudenteſt Person of all the Romans. (e) Thus the War which had been undertaken upon the account of those Christians who lived in Persia, was concluded. Which thing happened in the Consulate of the Two Augusti, Honorius being the thirteenth, and Theodosius the tenth time Consul, on the fourth year of the three hundredth Olympiad. The persecution [which had been raised] against the Christians in Persia ceased at the same time also.

Honorius and Theod. Jun.

(a) The Florentine M.S. inserts two Words here, altogether necessary, after this manner: ἡ ὡς ἐναργῶς [ἐκ Θεοῦ] παρασχεθεῖσαν νίκην, a victory apparently given him [by God.] Which words (before I had gotten that Manuscript,) I had put in at this place, from Nicephorus, and Epiphanius Scholasticus's Version. Vales.

(b) ἀρδαβουρίου συνδιάδοχος. Christophorson has rendred it ill, Ardaburius the Commanders Colleague. Musculus has traslated it better, Assessour. Epiphanius Scholasticus renders it Councellor, which is the same. Concerning the Councellors or Assessors of Judges, as well Civil as Military, I have made many remarks in my Notes on Amm. Marcellinus; which 'tis unnecessary to repeat here. Further, this Maximinus seems to be the same Person, who was afterwards sent Embassador by the Emperor Theodosius to Attalas; as Priscus relates in his Excerpta Legationum: Where he attests, that he was nobly descended, and had been very useful to the Emperor in many Affairs. Vales.

(c) Instead of [αὐτοῖ] it must undoubtedly be [ἀυτοὶ they,] that is, the Immortals: So Christophorson and Sir Henry Savil read. Vales.

(d) Sidonius makes mention of this Procopius, in his Panegyrick of Anthemius Augustus; where he relates, that he was Son-in-law to Anthemius heretofore Consul and Præfectus Prætorio; who during Theodosius Junior's minority, had had the chief management of Affairs in the Empire. Vales.

(e) I doubt not but this place is thus to be restored: ὅτω μὲν οὖν καὶ διὰ τὰς ἐν Περσίδι χειστιανὰς γεγόμενος, ὁ πόλεμος καθεσάλη· ὃ γέγονεν ἐν ὑπατείᾳ δύο ἀυγούστων, Thus the war which had been undertaken upon the account of those Christians who liv'd in Persia, was concluded. Which thing [that is, which conclusion of the War] hapned in the Consulate of the two Augusti. So Epiphanius Scholasticus read, as 'tis apparent from his Version. For thus he renders it: Et hoc modo bellum propter Christianos exortum de Parthorum regione cessavit. Contigit autem Consulatu Honorii XIII. & Theodosii X. 'Tis certain, in this Consulate the Persian War was not waged, but concluded. For it had been begun on the foregoing year, when Eustathius and Agricola were Consuls, as I have remark'd before; see chap. 18. note (b). This is confirmed by Marcellinus Comes in his Chronicon, in these Words: Honorio XIII. & Theodosio X. Coss. Persæ cum Romanis pacem pepigere, in Honorius's thirteenth and Theodosius's tenth Consulate, the Persians made a Peace with the Romans. Vales.

CHAP. XXI.

MOreover, the good Action of Acacius Bishop of Amida, rendred him much more eminent at that time amongst all Men [than he had been before.] For, when the Roman Soldiers would by no means restore the Persian Captives (whom they had taken when they ruin'd (a) Azazene,) to the King of Persia; and the Captives, in number about seven thousand, were in the interim destroyed by famine; (which thing was the occasion of no small grief to the King of Persia) Acacius thought that business was in no wise to be then neglected. (b) Having [therefore] called together the Clergy under himself: Men [and Brethren,] said he, Our God stands not in need of Dishes or Cups: For he neither eats nor drinks, in regard he wants nothing. Whereas therefore the Church is possest of many Vessels of Gold and Silver by the Beneficence and Liberality of those who belong to it, 'tis agreeable that by a sale of these Vessels we should both (c) redeem the Captives from the Soldiers, and also provide them Food.

(a) So he has termed this Province before, at chap. 18. Theophanes in his Chronicon, calls it Arxanes, or, Arzanes; for so 'tis in some Copies. One of the five Provinces beyond Tigris was called Arzanene, as Amm. Marcellinus attests, Book 25. which is sometimes termed Arxanene, and Araxiane, and Araxene, as I have remarked at the aforesaid Book of Amm. Marcellinus. Vales.

(b) Instead of [συσκαλέσας δὲ τὺς ὑφ' ἀυτῷ κληεικὺς ἄνδρας, ἔφη. But having called together the Clergymen under himself, he said,] this place would be written more elegantly, thus [συσκαλέσας τὺς ὑφ' ἀυτῷ κληεικὺς· ἄνδρες, ἔφη, &c. Having [therefore called together the Clergy under himself: Men [and Brethren] said he, &c,] And so Epiphanius Scholasticus read, as 'tis apparent from his Version. Our Emendation is plainly confirmed also by Nicephorus. Vales.

(c) Ῥύσασθαι τὺς στρατιωτὰς τὺς αἰχμαλώτες. Christophorson renders it ill, to redeem the Captive Soldiers: for those who had been taken Prisoners by the Romans in Arzanene, were unarmed; most of them them being Boors, who inhabited that Country. Beſides, the Romans are termed Soldiers by way of Emphaſis, to diſtinguiſh them from the Barbarians, as I have noted at Amm. Marcellinus. So our Soirates calls the Romans, Soldiers, almoſt in the next words after theſe. Valeſ.

Honorius and Theod. Jun.

Having diſcours'd of theſe and many other ſuch like things as theſe to them, he order'd the veſſels to be melted down, and having paid the Soldiers a ranſom for the Captives, and fed the Captives [for ſome time,] he afterwards gave them money to bear their charges, and ſent them home to their King. This action of the admirable Acacius highly aſtoniſh'd the King of Perſia, becauſe the Romans made it their buſineſs to conquer their Enemies both ways, as well by War, as by Beneficence. And 'tis ſaid, that the Perſian King was very deſirous that Acacius ſhould come into his preſence, to the end he might enjoy a ſight of the Man; and that that was effected by the Emperor Theodoſius's order. When therefore God had given ſo eminent a Victory to the Romans, many Perſons who excelled for their eloquence, wrote * Panegyricks in praiſe of the Emperor, and recited them in publick. Moreover, the Emperor's Wife wrote a Poem in Heroick Verſe: for ſhe was a woman of a great eloquence. For, being the Daughter of (d) Leontius the Athenian Sophiſt, ſhe had been inſtructed by her Father, and cultivated with all manner of Literature. When the Emperor was about marrying of this Woman, Atticus the Biſhop made her a Chriſtian, and at her Baptiſm, inſtead of Athanaïs, named her Eudocia. Many perſons therefore, as I have ſaid, recited Panegyricks; ſome with a deſign to make themſelves taken notice of by the Emperor; others endeavouring to publiſh the powerfulneſs of their own eloquence; being altogether unwilling, that that Learning they had gotten by much labour, ſhould lie concealed.

* Or, Panegyrical Orations.

(d) This is the Leontius (if I miſtake not) whom Olympiodorus relates by his own care and induſtry to have been promoted to the Sophiſtick Chair at Athens; when as he himſelf as yet declined it; as Photius declares in his Bibliotheca. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXII.

Concerning the Excellencies, wherewith the Emperor Theodoſius Junior was endow'd.

BUt I, who am neither ſtudious about being taken notice of by the Emperor, nor deſirous of making a ſhew of eloquence, have taken a reſolution of ſetting forth thoſe Excellencies wherewith the Emperor is endow'd, ſincerely and without any Rhetorical flouriſhes. For, in regard his Vertues are ſo ſingularly uſeful, my ſentiment is, that to paſs them over in ſilence would be loſs to Poſterity, which would be defrauded of the knowledge thereof. In the firſt place therefore, although he was born and educated in the * Imperial Pallace, yet he contracted nothing of an Effeminacy or Stupidity from that Education. But was [always] ſo prudent, as to be reputed by thoſe who addreſſed to him, to have attained a knowledge and experience in moſt affairs. His patience in undergoing hardſhips was ſuch, that he could endure heat and cold couragiouſly; and would faſt frequently, eſpecially on thoſe days term'd Wedneſdays and Fridays. And this he did, out of an earneſt endeavour of obſerving the Rites of the Chriſtian Religion with an accuracy. He govern'd his Pallace ſo, that it differed not much from a Monaſtery. Wherefore he, (a) together with his Siſters, roſe early in the Morning, and recited alternative Hymns in praiſe of God. Moreover, he could ſay the Sacred Scriptures by heart. And with the Biſhops who conferred with him, he diſcourſed out of the Scriptures, as if he had been an Eccleſiaſtick of a long ſtanding. He was much more diligent in making a Collection of the Sacred Books, and of the Expoſitions which had been written thereon, than Ptolemæus Philadelphus had been heretofore. For Clemency and Humanity he excelled all Men by far. The Emperor Julianus, altho' he was a profeſt Philoſopher, yet could not moderate his rage and anger towards the Antiochians who had * derided him; but inflicted moſt acute tortures upon † Theodorus. But Theodoſius bad farewel to Ariſtotle's Syllogiſms, and exerciſed Philoſophy in deeds, getting the maſtery over Anger, Grief, and Pleaſure. He never revenged himſelf upon any one who had been injurious to him. Yea, no Man ever ſaw him angry. Being on a time asked by one with whom he was pleaſed to be familiar, why he never put to death any perſon who had injured him? his anſwer was, Would to God it were poſſible for me to reſtore to life thoſe that are dead! To another queſtioning him about the ſame thing, (b) 'Tis no great or difficult thing (ſaid he) for him that is a Man, to die: but 'tis God's property only by repentance to reſtore to life him that is once dead. Further, his practiſe of this Virtue was ſo conſtant and earneſt, that if any perſon had happened to commit a crime which deſerved a capital puniſhment, he was never led ſo far as the City-gates onwards on his way to the place of Execution, before a pardon was granted, whereby he was immediately recalled. When on a time he exhibited a Show of hunting Wild Beaſt Beaſts in the Amphitheatre at Conſtantinople, the people cried out, Let one of the boldeſt (c) Beſtiarii encounter the enraged Wild Beaſt.

Honorius and Theod. Jun.

(a) Inſtead of [αὐτὸς τοιγαροῦν ταῖς ἑαυτοῦ ἀδελφαῖς] it muſt be [ἀυλὲς τοιγαροῦν σὺν ταῖς ἑαυτοῦ ἀδελφαῖς, wherefore he, together with his Siſters;] as Nicephorus expreſſes it, Book 14. Chap. 3. The miſtake aroſe from hence, becauſe theſe Particles ἂν and σὺν are uſually confounded one with the other by Tranſcribers. Valeſ.

* See Socrat. Book 3. chap. 7.

† Book 3. chap. 19.

(b) Epiphanius Scholaſticus has rendred the whole place thus: Non eſt, inquit, magnum neque difficile hominem mori, quia neque Deo ſoli, ſemel mortuum ex pœnitentiâ ſuſcitare. It is not, ſaith he, a great nor difficult thing for a Man to die, becauſe neither [is it a great or difficult thing] to God alone, by repentance to raiſe a Man once dead. For you muſt underſtand [is it a great or difficult thing] to be uſed in common to both clauſes. Nicephorus Calliſtus has worded this paſſage thus: ἐδὲν ἔφη, καινὸν ἄνθρωπον ὄντα ἀποθνῄσκειν. Θεῷ δὲ ἂν εἴη μόνῳ, τὸν ἅπαξ θανόντα τῇ μετανοίᾳ ἀνακαλέσασθαι. Which words Langus has rendred thus: Nihil eſt novi, dixit, ſiquis homo quum ſit, è vitâ excedat: unius autem Dei eſſe, eum qui ſemel mortuus ſit, per pœnitentiam ad vitam revocare. It is no new thing, ſaid he, that he who is a Man ſhould depart out of this life: but 'tis God's property only, by Repentance to recal to life him who is once dead. But I like not Nicephorus's uſing τῇ μετανοίᾳ inſtead of ἐν μετανοίαις. For, the diſcourſe here is not concerning the life of the ſoul, but that of the body. Wherefore, I approve rather of Muſculus's Verſion, who has rendred it thus: Ex pœnitentiâ verò revocare eum qui ſemel mortuus eſt, non eſt niſi ſoli Deo poſſibile. But by repentance to recal him who is once dead, is a thing poſſible only to God. Notwithſtanding this Verſion pleaſed not Chriſtophorſon, becauſe it may ſeem to attribute repentance to God. But this expreſſion may be born with, in regard God in the ſacred Scriptures is now and then ſaid to repent himſelf of ſome fact. Valeſ.

(c) Scaliger in his Notes on the fourth Book of Manilius, and (after him) Salmaſius in his Notes on Capitolinus, pag. 258, have long ſince obſerved, that the Greeks called thoſe παραβόλους (which is the term here uſed,) who let themſelves out to fight with wild Beaſts. But I approve not of their confounding the Confectores with theſe παραβόλοι. For the Confectores were another ſort of Perſons, as I have remarked on Euſebius, (Book 4. chap. 15. note n.) who fought not with the wild Beaſts, but diſpatcht them at a diſtance. Valeſ. See Euſebius Pamphilius's Book concerning the Martyrs of Paleſtine, chap. 3. note (b).

To

Honorius and Theod. Jun.

To whom he gave this anſwer, You know not that We are wont to be Spectators at Shows with clemency and humanity. With which ſaying he inſtructed the People, to be in future delighted with Shows, wherein there was leſs of cruelty. Further, his Piety was ſuch, that he honoured all God's Prieſts; but moſt eſpecially thoſe whom he knew to be more eminent for Sanctity of life. 'Tis reported, that when the Biſhop of (d) Chebron had ended his life at Conſtantinople, he deſired to have his Hair-cloth-Caſſock*, which (although it was very foul and naſty) he wore inſtead of a Cloak, believing he ſhould thereby partake ſomething of the dead Biſhop's Sanctity. There hapning tempeſtuous weather one year, he was forced to exhibit the uſual and ſet Shows in the Cirque, in regard the people were extreamly earneſt for them. But when the Cirque was filled with Spectators, the Storm increaſed, and there was a vaſt fall of Snow; at which time the Emperor gave an evident demonſtration, how he was affected towards God; [for] he made proclamation by the Cryer to the People, in theſe words: 'Tis much better, that we ſhould omit the Show, and all joyn in prayer to God, that we may be preſerved unhurt from the imminent Storm. The Cryer had ſcarce made an end of proclaiming theſe words, when all the People began to ſupplicate God in the Cirque with the greateſt joy imaginable, and with a general conſent ſang Hymns to him: and the whole City became one Congregation. The Emperor himſelf went in the midſt [of the multitude] in a private habit, and began the Hymns: nor was he fruſtrated of his hope [at that time.] For the air returned to its former ſerenity; and inſtead of a ſcarcity of Bread-corn the Divine Benevolence beſtow'd a plentiful crop upon all Perſons. If at any time a War was raiſed, in imitation of David, he fled to God, knowing him to be the Diſpoſer of Wars; and by his prayers he managed them ſucceſsfully. I will here relate therefore, how, a litte after the Perſian War, (when the Emperor Honorius was dead, in the Conſulate of Aſclepiodotus and Marianus, (e) on the fifteenth of the month Auguſt) by putting his confidence in God, he vanquiſhed the Tyrant Johannes. For, 'tis my ſentiment, that the actions which hapned at that time are worthy to be recorded: becauſe what befel the Hebrews (who were led by Moſes) in their paſſage over the Red-Sea, the ſame [almoſt] hapned to the Emperor's Commanders, at ſuch time as he ſent them againſt that Tyrant. Which actions I will relate in ſhort, leaving the ampleneſs of them, which does require a peculiar work, [to be ſet forth at large] by others.

(d) This City, and the name of this Biſhop, are equally unknown to me. Valeſ.

* Σαγίον; all Tranſlators (whom I have ſeen) except Valeſius, renders it his Sack-cloth; the Greek term comprehends both ſignifications.

(e) Theophanes, in his Chronicon, ſays the ſame. But Olympiodorus diſſents; who ſays Honorius died on the twenty ſeventh of Auguſt. Valeſ.

* Or, bowed, or, inclined.

Theod. Jun.

HOnorius Auguſtus therefore being dead, the Emperor Theodoſius informed thereof, conceals it, and deceives the Populace [by feigning] ſometimes one thing, at others another. But he ſends his Military Forces ſecretly to Salonæ; which is a City of Dalmatia; to the end that if any † Rebellion ſhould happen in the weſtern parts, a force to reſiſt it might not be far off. Having made proviſion after this manner before-hand, he then publiſh'd the death of his † Uncle. But in the interim, (a) Johannes the chief of the Emperor's Notaries, unable to bear the ‖ greatneſs of his own preferment, ſeizes the Empire, and ſends an Embaſſage to the Emperor Theodoſius, requiring to be admitted Colleague in the Empire. Theodoſius impriſon'd his Embaſſadors, diſpatches away Ardaburius, Maſter of the Milice, who had done excellent ſervice in the Perſian War. He being arrived at Salonæ, ſail'd from thence to Aquileia, and had ill ſucceſs as he then thought; (but 'twas afterwards demonſtrated to be proſperous.) For, an unlucky wind blew, which drove him into the Tyrant's hands. Who having taken Ardaburius, hoped Theodoſius would be neceſſitated to elect and proclaim him Emperor, if he were deſirous of preſerving the life of his Maſter of the Milice. And the Emperor, when inform'd hereof, was really in an agony, as was alſo the Army which had been ſent againſt the Tyrant, leſt Ardaburius ſhould ſuffer any miſchief from the Tyrant. Moreover, Aſpar, Ardaburius's Son, when he underſtood that his Father was taken by the Tyrant, and knew that many Myriads of Barbarians were come to the Tyrant's aſſiſtance, knew not what courſe to take. But, the prayer of the Emperor, beloved by God, at that time prevailed again: For an Angel of God in the habit of a Shepherd, became a Guide to Aſpar and the Forces with him, and leads them through the Lake, which lies near to Ravenna. For in that City the Tyrant reſided, where he detained the * Maſter of the Milice Priſoner. No Perſon was ever known to have paſſed through this Lake. But God rendred that paſſable at that time, which before had been impaſſable. (b) When therefore they had paſſed the Waters of the Lake [as if it had been] over dry Ground, they found the Gates of the City open, and ſeized the Tyrant. At which time the moſt pious Emperor gave a demonſtration of his religious affection towards God. For whilſt he was exhibiting the Cirque-Sports, news was brought him that the Tyrant was deſtroy'd. Whereupon he ſpeaks to the People: Come, ſaid he, if you pleaſe, let us rather leave our Recreation, and go into the Church, and put up our Thankſgivings to God, in regard his Hand hath deſtroyed the Tyrant. Theſe were his words; and the Shows ceaſed inmmediately, and were neglected: And all Perſons went through the midſt of the Cirque, ſinging praiſes together with him with one conſent of mind and voice, and went into God's Church. And the whole City became one Congregation. Being come into the place of Prayer, they continued there all day.

CHAP. XXIV.

That, after the Slaughter of Johannes the Tyrant, Theodoſius the Emperor proclaimed Valentinianus (the Son of Conſtantius, and of his Aunt Placidia,) Emperor of Rome.

MOreover, after the Tyrant's death, the Emperor Theodoſius (a) became very ſolicitous, whom he ſhould proclaim Emperor of the Weſtern parts. He had a Couſin-German very young, by name Valentinianus, the Son of his Aunt Placidia. She was daughter to the Emperor Theodoſius the Great; and Siſter to the two Auguſti, Arcadius and Honorius. Valentinianus had a Father, by name Conſtantius, who having been proclaimed Emperor by Honorius, and reign'd with him a ſhort time, died ſoon after. This Couſin-German of his he created Cæſar, and ſent him into the Weſtern parts, committing the chief management of affairs to his Mother Placidia. Moreover, Theodoſius himſelf haſtned into Italy, that he might both proclaim his Couſin-German Emperor, and alſo (by being preſent there himſelf) inſtruct the Italians by his own prudent advice, not eaſily to yield ſubjection to Tyrants. Being gone as far as Theſſalonica, he was hindred from proceeding on his journey by a Sickneſs. Having therefore ſent the Imperial Diadem to his Couſin-German, by Helion the Patricius, he himſelf returned to the City Conſtantinople. But, I think this Narrative which I have given concerning theſe tranſactions, to be ſufficient

(a) The emendation of this place is owing to the Florentine M. S. wherein, inſtead of [ἔμφρων τις ἦν, was a prudent Perſon,] 'tis plainly written thus ἔμφορτις ἦν, became very ſolicitous.] Valeſ.

CHAP. XXV.

Concerning Atticus's Government of the Churches; and that he ordered Johannes's name to be written into the Dypticks of the Church; and that he foreknew his own death.

[IN the interim] Atticus the Biſhop in a wonderful manner enlarged the affairs of the Church; adminiſtring all things with a ſingular prudence, and by his Sermons inciting the People to Virtue. Perceiving that the Church was divided, in regard the * Johannitæ held ſeparate † Aſſemblies, he ordered, that mention ſhould be made of Johannes in the Prayers, according as it was uſual for other Biſhops who were dead, to be mention'd; on which account he hoped many would return to the Church. Moreover, he was ſo liberal, that he made proviſion not only for the Poor of his own Churches, but ſent money alſo to the neighbouring Cities towards the relief and comfort of the Neceſſitous. For he ſent three hundred Crowns to Calliopius a Presbyter of the Church of Nicæa, to whom he wrote this Letter.

Atticus to Calliopius, health in the Lord.

I Underſtand, that in your City there are an infinite company of Perſons oppreſſed with hunger, who ſtand in need of the compaſſion of pious Men. By terming them an infinite company, I mean a multitude, not an accurate and determinate number. In regard therefore I have received a ſum of Money from him who with a liberal hand giveth to good Stewards; and [whereas] it happens that ſome are oppreſſed with want, to the end that thoſe who have wherewithal might be tried, but do not give to the Indigent; take, (dear Friend!) theſe three hundred Crowns, and beſtow them as you ſhall think good: but give them to thoſe who are wholly aſhamed to beg, not to them that throughout their whole lives have declared their Belly to be their Trade. Moreover, when you give, have no reſpect to any Sect or Religion whatever in this particular act; mind this one thing only, to feed the hungry, but not to difference or diſtinguiſh thoſe who embrace not our Religion.

*See Book 6. chap. 18.

Theod. Jun. and Valentinianus.

After this manner Atticus took care even of the Indigent that were at a diſtance from him (a). Moreover, he made it his buſineſs to extirpate the Superſtitions of ſome Men. For having one time received information, that thoſe who ſeparated from the Novatianiſts on account of the Jewiſh Paſſover, had tranſlated the Body of Sabbatius from Rhodes, (for he had been baniſhed into that Iſland, where he ended his life) and buried it, and did uſually pray at his Grave: he ſent ſome Perſons by Night, to whom he gave order to [dig up] Sabbatius's Body, and * bury it in ſome other Sepulchre. But the Perſons who uſually went thither, when they found the Grave dug up, in future left off worſhipping that † place. Beſides, he was very elegant and happy in impoſing names [upon places.] A || Sea-port ſituate in the mouth of the Euxine-Sea (which had anciently been called * Pharmaceus, he named † Therapeia, leſt at his holding religious aſſemblies there, he ſhould call that place by an infamous name. Another place near adjacent to Conſtantinople he named || Argyropolis, for this reaſon. * Chryſopolis is an ancient Sea-port ſituate in the Head of the Boſphorus: many of the ancient Writers make mention of it, eſpecially Strabo, Nicolaus Damaſcenus, and the admirably eloquent Xenophon in his Sixth Book concerning the Expedition of Cyrus; and the ſame Author in his Firſt Book concerning the Grecian Affairs, ſpeaks to this effect concerning this City, [viz.] that Alcibiades, when he had built a Wall round it, ſet up a Toll therein, which conſiſted of a payment of the tenth peny. For thoſe who ſail out of Pontus were compelled to pay the tenth peny there. Atticus therefore perceiving this place, which was ſituate over againſt Chryſopolis, to be pleaſant and delightful, ſaid it was fit and agreeable it ſhould be termed Argyropolis. Theod. Jun. and Valentinianus.

Person, Bishop of the Novatianists there, he asked him, How many years have you been a Bishop? When he made answer [that he had been a Bishop] fifty years; You are happy, O Man, (said he) in regard you have been diligent about so good a Work for such a long time! He spake these words to the same Asclepiades, I do indeed commend Novatus, but the Novatianists I can in no wise approve of. Asclepiades amazed at this strange expression, replied, how can you say this, O Bishop? To whom Atticus made this answer; I commend Novatus, because he refused to communicate with those persons who had sacrificed: for I my self would have done the same. But I do not in any wise praise the Novatianists, in regard they exclude the Laïcks from Communion on account of very light and trivial Offences. To which Asclepiades made this return; there are, besides sacrificing, many other Sins unto death (as the Scriptures term them,) on account whereof (b) you not only exclude Ecclesiasticks, but we Laïcks also from Communion, leaving to God alone a power of pardoning them. Further, Atticus (c) foreknew even the time of his own death. For at his departure from Nicæa, he spake these words to Calliopius a Presbyter of that place: Hasten to Constantinople before Autumn, if you are desirous of seeing me again alive. For, if you delay, you will not find me living. Upon his saying whereof, he mistook not. For in the twenty first year of his Episcopate, on the tenth of October, he died, in Theodosius's eleventh, and Valentinianus Cæsar's first Consulate. Moreover, the Emperor Theodosius being then in his return from Thessalonica, was not at his Funeral. For Atticus was interred the day before the Emperor's Entry into Constantinople. Not long after Valentinianus Junior was (d) declared Augustus, about the twenty third of that same October.

Theod. Jun. and Valentinianus.

(d) The Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle understood this passage in Socrates amiss. For he thought, that Valentinianus Junior Placidia's Son, had been stiled Augustus on the 23d of October: but Socrates says not so; he relates only, that Valentinianus's having been Proclaimed Augustus was published at Constantinople on the twenty third of October. Which two things are vastly different. Sigonius (Book 11. De Occidentali Imperio) relates that Valentinianus was created Augustus at Ravenna on the Ides (that is, the fifteenth) of October, in Theodosius Augustus's eleventh and Valentinianus's own first Consulate. 'Tis certain, on the eighth of October in the same Consulate, Valentinianus was as yet but Cæsar, as we are informed from the 47th Law in the Theodosian Code de Episc. Eccles. & Clericis, dated at Aquileia. By which place Sigonius was chiefly induced, to place Valentinianus's being proclaimed Augustus on the Ides of October, and to relate it to have been made at Ravenna. For in regard it was published at Constantinople on the twenty fifth of that same month, it could not have been done later. Onufrius (in his Fasti) has followed Sigonius's opinion. Further, Marcellinus and Fordaines (in his Book De Successione Regnorum) do mention this Declaration to have been made at Ravenna: but Olympiodorus and Idatius (in his Chronicon) say 'twas done at Rome. Vales.

(b) Ὑμεῖς μὲν πρὸς τὸς καθ' εἱμαρμένην. The preposition πρὸς must be expunged; which neither Nicephorus, nor Epiphan. Scholasticus, nor the other Translators do acknowledge. Unless, instead of πρὸς, any one has a mind to substitute πῶς, and read thus; You in a certain manner exclude Ecclesiasticks. But, this place wants not difficulty. For, it may seem to be concluded from hence, that Ecclesiasticks in the Catholick Church, who had been excommunicated for more enormous Crimes, were cut off from the Church without all hope of pardon; but Laicks not so. Which may be thus explained. Laicks, who had been separated from Communion on account of publick Crimes, recoverd Peace and Communion again by the remedy of penitency, at least once. But to Ecclesiasticks who had been excommunicated, the door of penitency was shut. For they were not admitted to publick penitency. They continued therefore for ever excommunicated. For which reason Ecclesiasticks were very rarely excommunicated: but were either deposed, or suspended from their Office for some time, or at least reduced to a Laick-communion. But, the first Canon of the Neocæsarian Synod does gainsay this; wherein the Ecclesiasticks who had committed Fornication or Adultery, are driven from Communion, and brought to penitency. This passage may be explained otherwise also. For, from such time as Nectarius abolished the Penitentiary, all Laicks had a free power of communicating left them; nor was any one removed from Communion on account of a deadly Crime, except Ecclesiasticks only. Vales.

(c) Atticus did not only foreknow the day of his own death, but long before his death, he built himself a Sepulchre, as I am inform'd from an old Epigram; which because 'tis not yet extant in Print, I will here annex:

Παύλε σιλεντιαρίε εἰς τάφον ἀτθικῦ τινὸς κατασκάσαντος.

Ἀτθικὸς ἐς ξωὴν με παναγρέος ἐλπίδα μοίρης
Θυμῷ θαρσαλέῳ ζῶν, ἐλάχηνε τάφον.

Paulus Silentiarius's Composure on the Tomb of one Atticus.

Atticus, whilest he was living, (in whose mind a Fortitude not to be daunted shin'd,) Dug me his Grave, in common hope of Fate untractable and incompassionate.

Such were his Virtuous Actions, that Death's fear and Frightful Terrors, by him slighted were.
But by the Sun, to late posterity his Sun-like wisdom shall recorded be.

This Epigram is extant in Constantinus Cephalas's Anthologia, not yet Printed. 'Tis my sentiment, that Atticus Bishop of Constantinople is meant hereby. For I know no other Atticus, to whom this Elogy of Wisdom and Virtue can be agreeable. Notwithstanding, this is contradicted by Paulus Silentiarius's being inscribed the Author of this Epigram, who (as 'tis manifest from Agathias's Testimony,) flourished long after Atticus, in Justinian's times. Wherefore, either the Inscription of the Epigram, or our Conjecture, must of necessity be false. Vales.

CHAP. XXVI.

Concerning Sisinnius, Atticus's Successor in the Constantinopolitan Bishoprick.

After Atticus's death, a great contest happened about the Ordination of a Bishop, some desiring one person, others another. For, one party ('tis said) were earnest to have Philippus a Presbyter; another, Proclus; who was a Presbyter also. But the whole Body of the People with a general consent wished Sisinnius might be made [Bishop;] who was a Presbyter also himself: he had not been constituted *over any of the Churches within the City, but had been promoted to the Presbyterate in a Village belonging to Constantinople, the name whereof is Elæa; and 'tis situate over against the Imperial †City: in which Village the Festival of our Saviour's Ascension was from [an ancient] usage celebrated by the whole People in general. All the Laïcks were desirous to have this Man [made Bishop,] both because he was a Person singularly eminent for his Piety, and also more especially in regard his diligence in relieving the indigent, was earnest even beyond his power. The desire therefore of the Laïty prevailed: and Sinsinnius is ordained on the twenty eighth of February, in the following Consulate, which was Theodosius's twelfth and Valentinianus Junior Augustus's second. Afterwards, Philippus the Presbyter (because Sisinnius was prefer'd before him) was very bitter and large in his (a) Invectives against that Ordination, in that [voluminous work, termed the] Chriſtian Hiſtory, which he wrote; wherein he calumniates both the perſon ordain'd, and alſo thoſe who had ordain'd him; but more eſpecially the Laity. And his expreſſions are ſuch, that I am unwilling to record them; for I can in no wiſe approve of his raſhneſs, in having been ſo audacious, as to commit ſuch things to writing. But, I judge it not inopportune to ſay ſomething in ſhort concerning him.

CHAP. XXVII.

Concerning Philippus the Presbyter, who was born at Side.

Philippus was by Country a Sidenſian. Side is a City of Pamphylia, at which Troilus the Sophiſta had his original Extract; of his own relation to whom Philippus boaſted. Whilſt he was a Deacon, he had had frequent converſe with * Biſhop Johannes. He was a very laborious and painful Student, and had made a Collection of many Books, and thoſe of all ſorts. He imitated the Aſian Stile, and wrote many Books. [For, he confuted the Emperor Julian's Pieces, and compiled a Chriſtian Hiſtory, which he divided into ſix and thirty Books. Each Book contained many Tomes, in ſo much that in all they were near a thouſand. The † Contents of each Tome equall'd the Tome it ſelf in bigneſs. This work he entitled not an Eccleſiaſtick, but a Chriſtian Hiſtory. In it he heaped together variety of Learning, being deſirous to ſhew, that he was not unskilled in Philoſophick Literature. For which reaſon, he makes frequent mention therein of Geometrical, Aſtronomical, Arithmetical, and Muſical * Theorems. He alſo deſcribes Iſlands, Mountains, Trees, and ſeveral other things not very momentous. Upon which account he has made it a looſe work: and therefore hath (in my judgment) rendred it uſeleſs both to the Ignorant, and to the Learned alſo. For, the Ignorant are unable to inſpect the height and grandeur of his Stile. And thoſe that are well verſed in Learning nauſeate his inſipid repetition of words. But let every one paſs a judgment upon thoſe Books according to his own liking. I only ſay this, that the times wherein affairs have been tranſacted are confounded by him. For when he has mentioned the Times of the Emperor Theodoſius, he runs back to thoſe of Athanaſius the Biſhop. And this he does very frequently. Thus much concerning Philippus. 'Tis requiſite that we ſhould now declare what hapned in Siſinnius's Time.

CHAP. XXVIII.

That Siſinnius ordained Proclus Biſhop of Cyzicum: but the Inhabitants of that City would not admit him [to be their Biſhop.]

THE Biſhop of Cyzicum being dead, Siſinnius ordained Proclus Biſhop of that City. When therefore he was about going thither, the Inhabitants of Cyzicum prevent him, and ordain a perſon that was an Aſcetick, his name Dalmatius. And this they did in contempt to a (a) Law by which 'twas eſtabliſhed, that the Ordination of a Biſhop [there] ſhould not be made contrary to the Conſtantinopolitan Biſhop's mind. But they diſregarded this Law, as being [ſaid they] a perſonal Prerogative granted only to Atticus. Proclus therefore continued deſtitute indeed of the Precedency over his own Church, but he flouriſhed and grew famous for his Sermons [preach'd] in the Churches of Conſtantinople. But we ſhall ſpeak concerning this perſon in due place. Siſinnius having ſurvived his being made Biſhop not full out two years, ended his life in the Conſulate of Hierius and Ardaburius, on the twenty fourth of the month December. He was a perſon, for his temperance, good life, and love to the poor, highly eminent. As to his Temper, he was a perſon to whom acceſs might eaſily be had, and of a diſpoſition plain and without falſehood; therefore no lover of buſineſs. For which reaſon buſie men were offended at him; amongſt whom he had the character of a ſlothful perſon.

(a) What Law this was and by whom made 'tis uncertain. My Sentiment is, that 'twas an Imperial Law, whereby proviſion had been made, that the Inhabitants of Cyzicum ſhould not ordain themſelves a Biſhop contrary to the conſent of Atticus Biſhop of Conſtantinople. For if this had been a Sanction made in a Council of Biſhops, Socrates would have uſed the term Canon, rather than have called it a Law. After Atticus's death, the Inhabitants of Cyzicum diſregarded this Law. For they ſaid, that that priviledge had in an eſpecial manner been granted to Atticus, and belonged not to his Succeſſors. But, they were miſtaken. For long before Atticus, the Conſtaminopolitan Prelates had given Biſhops to the Inhabitants of Cyzicum. For, in Conſtantius's time, Eudoxius Biſhop of Conſtantinople ordained Eunomius Biſhop of Cyzicum. See Liberatus's Breviarium, chap. 7. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXIX.

That after Siſinnius's death, [the Emperors] ſent for Neſtorius from Antioch, and made him Biſhop of Conſtantinople; who quickly diſcover'd his own Temper and Diſpoſition.

AFter Siſinnius's death, the Emperors were pleas'd not to prefer any perſon of the Conſtantinopolitan Church to that See, becauſe they were men ſtudious of vain-glory: altho' many were very earneſt to have Philippus, others not fewer in number [ſtrove to get] Proclus, ordained. But they reſolved to ſend for a Forreigner from Antioch. For there was a man there, by name Neſtorius, born at the City Germanicia, who had a good voice, and a readineſs of expreſſion. Wherefore they determined to ſend for him, as being a fit perſon to teach the people. After an interval of three months therefore, Neſtorius is brought from Antioch: Who was cried up indeed for his temperance amongſt many perſons; but what a temper'd man he was as to other things, the more prudent diſcover'd from (a) his firſt Sermon. For, being ordained on the tenth of April, in the Conſulate of Felix and Taurus; addreſſing himſelf to the Emperor, he forthwith utter'd that famous expreſſion in the preſence of all the people. Give me (ſaid he,) O Emperor! the Earth cleared from Hereticks, and in recompence thereof I will give you Heaven. Aſſiſt me in deſtroying Hereticks, and I will aſſiſt you in vanquiſhing the Perſians. Although theſe words were extreamly pleaſing to ſome of the Vulgar, who had conceived an hatred againſt Hereticks; yet to thoſe

(a) Amongſt the Ancients it was wont to be very carefully obſerved, what the Biſhops (eſpecially the Prelates of the greater Churches) ſaid in their firſt Sermon to the People. For from that Sermon a conjecture was made of the Faith, Doctrine, and Temper, of every Biſhop. Wherefore they were wont to take particular notice of, and remember their ſayings. A remark of this nature Socrates has made before, at Book 2. chap. 43. concerning the firſt Sermon of Eudoxius Biſhop of Conſtantinople. And Theodoret and Epiphanius declare the ſame concerning Meletius Antiochenus's firſt Sermon to the people. Valeſ.

(who, as I have said, had skill in giving a conjecture of his sentiments from his expressions) neither the levity of his mind, nor his inclination to anger and violence joyn'd with his vainglorioufneſs were concealed: in regard he contained not himself during the ſmalleſt ſpace of time, but broke out into ſuch expreſſions as theſe; and (if I may uſe the Proverb) before he had taſted the Water of the City, ſhewed himſelf an inraged Perſecutor. On the fifth day therefore after his Ordination, he takes a reſolution to demoliſh the Arian's Oratory, in which they performed their Devotions ſecretly; whereby he drove thoſe Hereticks to a deſperation. For when they ſaw their place of Prayer pulling down, they threw fire into it and burnt it. Moreover, the fire ſpread further, and conſumed the adjacent buildings. Whereupon a tumult was raiſed all over the City, and the Arians made preparations to revenge themſelves. But God the keeper of the City, permitted not the miſchief to gather to an head. However, Neſtorius was in future termed an (b) Incendiary, not only by the Hereticks, but by thoſe alſo of his own Faith. For he deſiſted not, but framed intrigues againſt the Hereticks, and did his utmoſt to ſubvert the City. For he attempted to moleſt the Novatianiſts alſo, his envy ſpurring him on, becauſe Paulus Biſhop of the Novatianiſts was famous in all places for his piety. But the Emperors by their admonition repreſſed his fury. Now what miſchiefs he did to the Quartodecimani throughout Aſia, Lydia, and Caria, and how numerous the multitudes were that came to their deaths by his means at Miletum and Sardis in a tumult there raiſed, I think fit not to mention. But, what manner of puniſhment he underwent, as well for theſe [wickedneſſes,] as for his unbridled * tongue, I will declare hereafter baptized and diſmiſſed them. Being encouraged therefore [hereby,] they marched out (a) againſt the Hunni, and were not fruſtrated of their expectation: For the King of the Hunni (whoſe name was (b) Optar,) having burſt himſelf in the night by eating too much; the Burgundions fell upon the Hunni then deſtitute of a Commander in chief, and a few engaged very many, and conquered them. For the Burgundions being in number only three thouſand, deſtroyed about ten thouſand of the Hunni. And from that time the Nation of the Burgundions became zealous Profeſſors of Chriſtianity. About the ſame time, Barba Biſhop of the Arians died, in Theodoſius's thirteenth and Valentinianus's third Conſulate, on the twenty fourth of June, and Sabbatius is conſtituted Biſhop in his ſtead. But, let thus much be ſaid concerning theſe things.

(a) Inſtead of [χατ' ἀρχὰς τυραννων, againſt the Tyrants,] it muſt undoubtedly be [χατ' τῶν ὄυνων, againſt the Hunni;] For the Burgundions were oppreſſed by them, as Socrates atteſts. Valeſ.

(b) This perſon (as I ſuppoſe,) is Octar King of the Hunni; whom Jordanes (in his Hiſtory of the Goths, chap. 35.) relates to have been the Brother of Roa, and Mundiuchus Attila's Father. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXX.

After what manner the Burgundions embraced the Chriſtian Religion, in the Reign of Theodoſius Junior.

I Will now relate a thing worthy to be recorded, which hapned about this very time. There is a barbarous Nation, which has its habitation beyond the River Rhine, they are called the Burgundions. Theſe perſons lead a * quiet life. For they are almoſt all Carpenters; by which [trade] they earn wages, and get a livelihood. The Nation of the Hunni by making continual Inroads upon this people, depopulated their Country, and frequently deſtroyed many of them. The Burgundions therefore, reduced to a great ſtreight, fly for refuge to no man; but reſolved to commit themſelves to ſome God. And having ſeriouſly conſidered with themſelves, that the God of the Romans did vigorouſly aſſiſt and defend thoſe that feared him; by a general conſent they all came over to the Faith of Chriſt. Going therefore to one of the Cities of Gallia, they made a requeſt to the Biſhop, that they might receive Chriſtian Baptiſm. The Biſhop order'd them to faſt ſeven days, in which interval he inſtructed them in the grounds of Faith; and on the eighth day

CHAP. XXXI.

With what Miſeries the Macedoniani were afflicted by Neſtorius.

MOreover, Neſtorius behaved himſelf contrary to the uſage of the Church, (a) and cauſed others to imitate himſelf in ſuch things, as 'tis apparent from what hapned during his being Biſhop. For, one Antonius Biſhop of Germa a City in the Helleſpont, imitated Neſtorius's rage towards the Hereticks, and made it his buſineſs to perſecute the Macedoniani, taking the Patriarch's order as a pretext for his Apology. The Macedoniani for ſome time endured his vexatiouſneſs. But after Antonius began to diſquiet them more vehemently; being unable to undergo his moleſtation any longer, they [grew deſperate, and] brake out into a cruel madneſs; and having privately ſent ſome men who preferred what is pleaſant before that which is good, they murder him. The Macedoniani having perpetrated this villanous fact, Neſtorius took hold of what had been done as an occaſion of his own rage. And he perſwades the Emperors to deprive them of their Churches. As well thoſe Churches therefore which they had before the old walls of Conſtantinople, as them [they were poſſeſt of] in Cyzicum, were taken from them; as were likewiſe many others, which they had in the Villages of the Helleſpont. Some of them came over to the [Catholick] Church, and embraced the Homoöuſian Faith. But, as 'tis proverbially ſpoken, Drunkards never want Wine, nor contentious perſons ſtrife. It hapned therefore, that Neſtorius, who buſied himſelf in expelling other perſons, was himſelf turned out of the Church, for this reaſon [following.]

(a) In my own judgment, I have mended this place very happily. For, whereas there was no ſenſe in the common reading, (which is this, καὶ ἄλλως ἐν τοῖς τοιούτοις ἑαυτὸν μισεῖσθαι ἐποίει, and otherwiſe cauſed himſelf to be hated in ſuch things; by a very ſmall change I have mended the place thus, καὶ ἄλλους ἐν τοῖς τοιούτοις τοὺς ἀυτὸν μιμεῖσθαι ἐποίει, and cauſed others to imitate himſelf in ſuch things. Nor do I doubt but Socrates left it thus written. Otherwiſe, what he adds concerning Antonius Biſhop of Germa, would in no wiſe agree with that which goes before. At the very next Words, inſtead of [ὡς τὰ ὑπ' ἀυτῦ γενόμενα δείκνυσιν, as 'tis apparent from what hapned from him,] I read [ὡς τὰ ἐπ' ἀυτῦ γενόμενα δείκνυσιν, as 'tis apparent from what hapned during his being Biſhop.] Which Emendation ſeems to me altogether neceſſary. For, that which follows concerning Antonius the Biſhop, was in no wiſe done by Neſtorius. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXXII.

Concerning the Presbyter Anaſtaſius, by whom Neſtorius was perverted to Impiety.

ANaſtaſius the Presbyter, who had come from Antioch with Neſtorius, was his intimate Acquaintance. Neſtorius had an high eſteem for him, and made uſe of his advice in the management of buſineſs. This Anaſtaſius being preaching one time in the Church, utter'd theſe words, Let no man ſtile Mary * Theotocos; For Mary was a woman. But 'tis impoſſible for God to be born of a woman. The hearing hereof diſturbed many perſons, as well of the Clergy as Laity. For they had been heretofore taught to confeſs Chriſt to be God, and in no wiſe to ſeparate him as man from the Divinity on account of his Incarnation; whereto they were induced by the Apoſtle's words, who ſaith, Yea, though we have known Chriſt after the fleſh; yet now henceforth know we him no more. (a) And [again,] wherefore leaving the diſcourſe concerning Chriſt, let us preſs forwards to perfection. A diſturbance therefore having been raiſed in the Church (as I have ſaid) [about this matter;] Neſtorius endeavoured to confirm Anaſtaſius's expreſſion; (for he was unwilling, that the man for whom he had ſo great an eſteem, ſhould be reproved as having ſpoken blaſphemy;) and made frequent diſcourſes concerning it in the Church, in which he propoſed contentious queſtions concerning this thing, and every where rejected this term Theotocos. This queſtion therefore being entertained in one manner by ſome, and in another by others; on this account a diſſention aroſe in the Church. And being engaged in an encounter by night as it were, ſometimes they aſſerted theſe things, at others thoſe, affirming and in like manner denying one and the ſame thing. But Neſtorius was ſuppoſed by moſt men to entertain ſuch ſentiments, as to aſſert the Lord [Chriſt] to be a meer man, and to introduce the opinion of Paul of Samoſata and Photinus into the Church. Now, ſo great a controverſie and diſturbance was raiſed about this matter, that 'twas thought neceſſary a General Council [ſhould be convened.] But I my ſelf, after my reading the Books (b) publiſh'd by Neſtorius, found him to be an ignorant perſon. And I will declare the truth unfeignedly. For, his vices which I have ſpoken of already, I have not mention'd out of any hatred to him, nor will I, to gratifie any man, leſſen my account of the good which I found in him. Neſtorius ſeems not to me, to be a follower either of Paul of Samoſata's opinion, or of Photinus's, nor in the leaſt to aſſert the Lord [Chriſt] to be a meer man. But he was put into a fright by this term [Theotocos] only, as if it had been a Bugbear. And this befel him meerly by reaſon of his great Illiterateneſs. For being naturally endowed with eloquence, he was ſuppoſed to be a man of learning; but in reality was unlearned and ignorant. He likewiſe ſcorned to read the Books of ancient (c) Expoſitors. For being puft up with pride by reaſon of his ability to ſpeak well, he minded not reading the Ancients with any thing of accuracy; but thought himſelf better than any man elſe. To begin therefore from hence, he was wholly ignorant, that in the Catholick Epiſtle of St. John (to wit, in the ancient Copies thereof,) it was thus written; (d) every ſpirit which ſeparates Jeſus [from God] is not of God. For this ſentence has been expunged out of the ancient Copies by thoſe, whoſe deſire is to ſeparate the Divine Nature from the * Human Oeconomy. Wherefore, the ancient Expoſitors have made this very remark, to wit, that ſome perſons have depraved this Epiſtle, being † deſirous to ſeparate the Manhood of Chriſt from the Deity. For the Humanity is joyn'd to the Divinity. (e) Nor are they any more two, but one. The Ancients emboldened by this teſtimony, ſcrupled not to ſtile Mary Theotocos: For Euſebius Pamphilus (in his third Book concerning the Life of Conſtantine,) has theſe expreſs words. For * Emanuel endured to be born for us. And the place of his Nativity is amongſt the Hebrews termed Bethlehem. Upon which account the Empreſs Helena moſt dear to God, adorned the place, where the † God-bearing Virgin was delivered, with admirable Monuments, and illuſtrated that ſacred Cave with all manner of Ornaments. And Origen (in the firſt Tome of his [Comments] upon the Apoſtle's Epiſtle to the Romans,) expounding in what manner [Mary] may be termed Theotocos, handles that Queſtion largely. 'Tis apparent therefore, that Neſtorius was wholly ignorant in the Writings of the Ancients. For which reaſon, as I have ſaid, he oppoſes this only term [Theotocos.] For, that he

* That is, The Mother of God, or, the Virgin that bore God: A term that made a great diſturbance in the Chriſtian World, as the Reader will ſee hereafter.

(a) Nicephorus, when he wrote out this paſſage of Socrates, added the word [again,] ſhewing thereby, that the following words were taken out of St. Paul's Epiſtle. Indeed, the Words immediately preceding occur at 2 Cor. 5. 16; but whence theſe are quoted, I cannot yet find. Valeſ.

(b) Sir Henry Savill, had remarked at the margin of his Copy, that in his judgment, inſtead of [δοθεῖσιν propoſed,] it ſhould be [ἐκδοθεῖσιν, publiſhed.] And a little after, where the reading is [φυσικὸς γὰρ ἐυλαλὸς ὤν; for being a natural eloquent man] that Learned Knight had written in the margin fortè φυσικῶς, perhaps it ſhould be [φυσικῶς, naturally;] to which emendation we agree, as by our Verſion appears. For Nicephorus, who has extracted this paſſage out of Socrates, words it thus. Valeſ.

Theod. Jun. and Valentinianus.

(c) Inſtead of [ἑρμηνεύειν] it muſt undoubtedly be [ἑρμηνέων, or ἑρμηνευτῶν, Expoſitors,] though the ſame error be in Nicephorus alſo. But Socrates himſelf does a little after this, ſhew it ſhould be ἑρμηνέων: For, his Words are οἱ παλαιοὶ ἑρμηνεῖς, The Ancient Expoſitors. Valeſ.

(d) In the firſt Epiſt. of St. John chap. 4. verſ. 2, 3; the words in the Greek Copies now extant are theſe: Πᾶν πνεῦμα ὁ ὁμολογεῖ Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν ἐν σαρκὶ ἐληλυθότα, ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἔστι· καὶ πᾶν πνεῦμα ὃ μὴ ὁμολογεῖ τὸν Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν ἐν σαρκὶ ἐληλυθότα, ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ οὐκ ἔστιν. Every Spirit that confeſſeth that Jeſus Chriſt is come in the fleſh, is of God. And every Spirit that confeſſeth not that Jeſus Chriſt is come in the fleſh, is not of God. In the Latin Copies 'tis thus worded: Omnis ſpiritus qui confitetur Jeſum Chriſtum in carne veniſſe, ex Deo eſt: & omnis ſpiritus qui ſolvit Jeſum, ex Deo non eſt; every Spirit which confeſſes Jeſus Chriſt is come in the fleſh, is of God: and every Spirit which ſeparates Jeſus, is not of God. In that Greek Copy therefore, which the old Latine Tranſlator made uſe of, it was written thus: Πᾶν πνεῦμα ὁ λύει τὸν Ἰησοῦν, ἀπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ οὐκ ἔστιν, every Spirit which ſeparates Jeſus from God is not; as Socrates atteſts it to have been written in the ancient Copies. Notwithſtanding Socrates ſeems to have read, Πᾶν πνεῦμα ὃ λύει τὸν Ἰησοῦν ἀπὸ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ οὐκ ἔστιν; which words we have expreſt in our Verſion. For Socrates's following Words are, ὥς τινες ἐν βαρυηγήσαντες τὴν ἐπιστολὴν, &c. that ſome perſons have depraved [or, corrupted] this Epiſtle, being deſirous to ſeparate the Manhood of Chriſt from his Deity [or, Man from God.] In the Alexandrian Copy (the various readings whereof the Engliſh have given us,) this place in John is thus written; Καὶ πᾶν πνεῦμα ὁ μὴ ὁμολογεῖ τὸν Ἰησοῦν, ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ οὐκ ἔστιν, And every Spirit which confeſſes not Jeſus, is not of God. Which comes nearer to the vulgar reading. Valeſ.

* Or, Diſpenſation of Man.

† Or, to ſeparate Man from God.

(e) Socrates miſtakes here; and whileſt he reproves Neſtorius, falls into the Error of Eutyches, who though, that after the Union, there was not two, but only one nature in Chriſt. Unleſs we ſhould ſay, that Socrates ſpeaks concerning the Perſons, not the Natures. By this means Socrates might be excuſed, if his Words would admit of this ſenſe. 'Tis certain, ἀνθρωπότης, and ἄνθρωπος (concerning which terms theſe Words are ſpoken) do altogether ſignifie Natures, not Perſons. Valeſ.

* That is, God with us.

he asserts not Christ to be a meer man, as Photinus and Paul of Samosata did, we are evidently informed even from his own discourses which he hath publish'd. Wherein he does in no place destroy the Hypostasis of the Word of God; but every where professes him to have a proper, real and peculiar Person and Existence: nor does he deprive him of a subsistence, as did Photinus and Paul of Samosata. Which Tenet the Manichæans and Montanus's followers have been so audacious as to assert. That this was Nestorius's opinion, I my self have found, partly by reading his own works, and partly from the discourses of his Admirers. Further, this frigid and empty discourse of Nestorius has raised no small disturbance in the World.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Concerning the horrid Wickedness committed upon the Altar of the Great Church by the Fugitive Servants.

THese things having been transacted [after this manner,] there hapned a most detestable fact, perpetrated in the Church. For, the Servants of one of the Great Men, Fellows that were Barbarians, having by experience found their Master to be cruel, fled to the Church, and with their swords drawn leapt upon the Altar. Being intreated to go out, they could by no means be prevailed upon; but hindred the Divine Services. And holding their naked swords in their hands for [the space of] many days, they stood in a posture to make resistance against any one that approached them. Moreover, when they had killed one of the Ecclesiasticks, and wounded another, at last they slew themselves. Whereupon, one of those then present said, that the prophanation of the Church was no good sign, [in proof whereof] he added two Iambicks of a certain old Poet:

(a) For such Prognosticks happen in that while,
When horrid Crimes the Churches do defile.

(a) Nicephorus quotes these two Verses, thus:
Σημεῖα δὲ τὸ ταῦτα γίνεσθαι φιλεῖ,
Ὅταν τι ναοῖς ἐγκατασκήψῃ μύσος.
But the latter Verse would be written better thus:
Ὅταν τι μύσος ἐγκαθασκήψῃ ναοῖς. Vales.

Nor was he who spake these words, mistaken in his Sentiment: For (as it was conjectured,) a Division amongst the people, and his Deposition who had been the Occasioner of this Division, was hereby portended.

CHAP. XXXIV.

Concerning the former Synod at Ephesus convened against Nestorius.

FOr within a small interval of time, the Bishops in all places were by the Emperor's Edict order'd to meet together at Ephesus. Immediately after the Feast of Easter therefore, Nestorius went to Ephesus, accompanied with a great and promiscuous multitude, where he finds many Bishops met together. But Cyrillus [Bishop] of Alexandria made some delays, and came not till about Pentecost. On the fifth day after Pentecost, Juvenalis Bishop of Jerusalem atriv'd. Whilst Johannes [Bishop] of Antioch was slow in coming, the [Prelates] that were present began to debate the Question. And Cyrillus of Alexandria made some onsets [of dispute,] being desirous to disturb and terrifie Nestorius; for he had conceived an hatred against him. Moreover, when many asserted the Deity of Christ, Nestorius expresst himself thus, I cannot term him God, who was two months and three months old. And therefore I am clear from your bloud; nor will I in future come to you any more. Having said this, he afterwards held Conventions with the other Bishops, who were Followers of his Opinion. So that the persons present were divided into two Factions. Those of Cyrillus's party * staid in the Council, and cited in Nestorius. But he refused to come in, and defer'd his appearance till the arrival of Johannes [Bishop] of Antioch. Whereupon those of Cyrillus's party, (after they had several times read over Nestorius's Discourses about this Question, which he had made to the people; and from the reading thereof had given in their judgment, that he had constantly spoken blasphemy against the Son of God) deposed him. When this was done, (a) Nestorius's party made up another Synod apart by themselves, and depose Cyrillus, and together with him Memnon Bp. of Ephesus. Not long after these transactions, Johannes Bishop of Antioch arrived: and being informed of what had been done, was highly displeased with Cyrillus, as being the Occasioner of the disturbance which had hapned, in regard he had with so much rashness and precipitancy proceeded to the deposition of Nestorius. But Cyrillus, and together with him Juvenalis, to revenge themselves upon Johannes, depose him also. These affairs being after this manner confused and disturb'd, Nestorius perceiving this contention had arrived to such a height as to ruin communion, retracted, and termed Mary Theotocos, saying, Let Mary be styled Theotocos, and let all animosities cease. But tho' he made this retractation, yet no body admitted of it. For at this present he continues deposed, and lives in exile at Oasis. And this was the conclusion of the Synod held at that time. These things were done in the Consulate of Bassus and Antiochus, on the twenty eighth of June. But Johannes after his return to Antioch, assembled many Bishops, and deposed Cyrillus, who was then gone home to Alexandria. However, they laid aside their enmity soon after, came to a reconciliation, and restored one another to their Episcopal Chairs. But after Nestorius's deposition, a most violent disturbance seized the Churches of Constantinople: For the people were divided by reason of his frigid and empty babbling, as I have said already. But all the Clergy by a general consent Anathematiz'd him. (For so we Christians do usually term the sentence against a Blasphemer, when we propose it to publick view on a pillar as it were, and render it visible to all persons.)

Theod. Jun. and Valentinianus.

* Or, made up the Synod.

(a) Socrates mistakes at this place, in attributing that to Nestorius which was done by John Bp. of Antioch. Therefore Evagrius and (who has follow-ed him) Nicephorus do deservedly reprehend our Socrates. Now, the business, as we are informed from the Acts of the Ephesine Synod, was transacted in this manner. When Nestorius had been condemned and deposed by the holy Synod, and the Letters of Deposition had been sent to him, he sent forthwith a relation to the Emperor Theodosius, wherein he complained of his Adversaries violence, and that they would not expect the coming of the Eastern Bishops, who, 'twas said, would quickly be there. This relation was subscribed by ten Bishops of Nestorius's Party. On the fifth day after, comes John Bishop of Antioch, with the Eastern Bishops. Who having understood what had been done, assembled together the Bishops (as well as the Eastern Prelates whom he had brought with him, as those ten, which (as we have said) had subscribed Nestorius's Relation,) and deposed the Bishops Cyrillus and Memnon. At this Little Council of Johannes's, Nestorius himself was not present, because having been condemned by an Episcopal sentence, he had not been restored by the determination of a Synod. But the Bishops of his party, whom the sentence of the Synod had in no wise touch'd, were present.

preſent. Wherefore Socrates may be excuſed, if we ſay that theſe words [ὁς καὶ νεστόριον] do not denote Neſtorius himſelf, but the Biſhops who were of his party, and had ſubſcribed his Relation. But in the other particulars Socrates is not to be excuſed. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXXV.

How, after Neſtorius's Depoſition, when ſome were deſirous of placing Proclus in the Epiſcopal Chair, other Biſhops elected Maximianus Biſhop of Conſtantinople.

[AFter this] there was another debate about the Election of a Biſhop: And many were for chooſing Philippus, whom we have mention'd a little * before; but more † nominated Proclus. And the opinion of thoſe [who voted] for Proclus had carried it, had not ſome of the moſt powerful perſons hinder'd it, who ſaid 'twas forbidden by the Eccleſiaſtick Canon, that he who had been nominated Biſhop of any City, ſhould be tranſlated to another || See. This having been ſaid and believed, compelled the people to be quiet. After an interval therefore of four months from Neſtorius's Depoſition, a perſon by name Maximianus, is elected to the Biſhoprick: As to his courſe of life he was an Aſcetick; but had himſelf alſo been made one of the Presbyters. He had long before gotten the repute of a pious and holy perſon, becauſe at his own charge he had built Monuments, wherein Religious Perſons might be buried after their deceaſe. He was a man of mean accompliſhments in ſpeaking, and deſirous of leading a life void of buſineſs.

CHAP. XXXVI.

Inſtances, whereby this Writer does (as he ſuppoſes) evince, that a Tranſlation from one See to another is not prohibited.

BUt in regard ſome Perſons, by alledging the Eccleſiaſtical Canon, have hindred Proclus, who had then been nominated Biſhop of Cyzicum, from being ſeated [in the Epiſcopal Chair of Conſtantinople;] my deſire is to ſay ſomething briefly concerning this matter. Thoſe Perſons who undertook to ſpeak theſe things at that time, in my judgment ſpake not true; but either feign'd them out of an Odium [they had conceived] againſt Proclus, or elſe were wholly ignorant of the Canons, and of ſeveral other things of great uſe to, and frequently practiſed in the Churches. For, Euſebius Pamphilus, in the ſixth * Book of his Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, relates, that Alexander Biſhop of one of the Cities in Cappadocia, coming to Jeruſalem on account of Prayer, was detained by the Inhabitants of that City, and conſecrated Biſhop in the room of Narciſſus, and in future preſided over the Churches there as long as he lived. So indifferent a thing it was amongſt our Anceſtors, for a Biſhop to be tranſlated from one City to another, as often as neceſſity requir'd. And if it be requiſite to annex the Canon to this our Hiſtory, it will be demonſtrated in what a manner they have bely'd that Canon, [who have quoted it] in order to their hindring Proclus's Ordination. The (a) Canon therefore runs thus. If any perſon who has been ordained Biſhop of a Church, goes not to that Church over which he has been ordained [Biſhop,] not by reaſon of his own Faults, but either becauſe of the People's refuſal [of him,] or for any other neceſſary cauſe [not proceeding from himſelf;] this Perſon ſhall be partaker of the Honour and Miniſtration, provided he moleſts not the affairs of that Church wherein he ſhall celebrate Aſſemblies. But he ought to embrace whatever the Synod of the Province, (b) having had Cognizance of his Caſe, ſhall think good to determine. [Beveridge.] But Socrates is miſtaken, in thinking that the Biſhops relied upon this Canon, that they might exclude Proclus from the Conſtantinopolitan See. 'Tis true indeed, that Proclus was one of their number who are meant in the aforeſaid Canon. For after he had been ordained Biſhop of Cyzicum by Siſinnius Patriarch of Conſtantinople, he was not admitted by the Inhabitants of Cyzicum, as Socrates has related before. But the Biſhops who were againſt Proclus's Election, relied not upon this Canon, but quoted the twenty firſt Canon [which occurs at pag. 450. Tom. 1. Edit. Bever.] of the ſame Synod in confirmation of their own opinion; the Contents whereof are theſe: Ἐπίσκοπον ὑπὸ πολιτικῆς ἐτέρας εἰς ἑτέραν, &c. A Biſhop ought not in any wiſe to remove from one See to another, neither ruſhing into it wholly on his own accord, nor forcibly compell'd by the People, nor yet neceſſarily conſtrain'd by the Biſhops: but let him continue in that Church, which God has at firſt allotted to him, nor let him remove from thence, agreeable to the Priſtine determination made concerning this matter. Our Socrates is therefore miſtaken, who has put the eighteenth Canon of the Antiochian Synod, inſtead of the one and twentieth. He is out in this alſo, to wit, in ſuppoſing, that theſe Words in the cloſe of the eighteenth Canon [ἐνδέχεσθαι δὲ αὐτὸν, ὅπερ ἂν, &c.] do favour his own opinion. Thoſe Words we have rendred thus: Suſcipere autem debet quicquid Provinciæ Synodus de ejus negotio judicans conſtituerit, But he ought to embrace whatever a Synod of the Province, having had Cognizance of his Caſe, ſhall think good to determine. Socrates thought this to be the conſequence of theſe Words, viz. That if a Synod of the Province ſhould think fit to tranſlate the aforeſaid Biſhop to ſome other See, that Biſhop ought to obey that determination. But 'tis plain that he is out, in regard Tranſlations of Biſhops are expreſly forbidden in the twenty firſt Canon. Valeſ.

(a) This is the eighteenth Canon of the Synod at Antioch. [Socrates ſpeaks of this Synod at Book 2. chap. 8; and this very Canon occurs at p. 447. Tom. 1. Edit. Beveridge.]

(b) Κείνατα τὸ πρεσβύτερον δόξαν. Which Words Dionyſius Exiguus renders thus, Quod viſum fuerit judicando Decreverit, ſhall by judging Decree what ſhall ſeem good. The old Tranſlator alſo (whoſe Verſion was heretofore in Henricus Memmius's Library, and has lately been publiſhed at Paris) renders it after this manner: Sed ſpectare eum oportere, quouſque Provinciæ Synodus de eo quæ eis videntur ordinet, But he ought to expect, till ſuch time as a Synod of the Province ſhall determine concerning him what they think good. Where you may remark by the by, that the old Tranſlator in his Copy, read not the Word [τελεία, perfectly;] as neither did Socrates. The ſame Phraſe occurs above in the Appendix to the ſixth Book, where Johannes ſpeaks to the Biſhops thus. Τὸ πρεσβύτερον ὑμῖν καταξιώσας αὐτοὶ διαλαβόντες καὶ κείνατα δόξαν: Which we have thus rendred into Latin, Cauſam ad vos delatam perpendentes ipſi ac dijudicantes definite. But 'tis better to tranſlate it thus, quodcunque vobis viſum fuerit, &c. Valeſ. Our Engliſh Rendition of that place is this, Do you inquire into the Cauſe, and make ſuch a definitive determination as you ſhall think fit.

This is the Canon. Now, to make it evident, that many Biſhops have been tranſlated from ſome Cities to others, by reaſon of the Churches neceſſities now and then [intervening;] I will [here] annex the Names of ſuch [Biſhops] as have been tranſlated.

(c) Perigenes had been ordain'd Biſhop of Patræ. (c) Perigenes had been born and baptized at Corinth the Metropolis of Achaia: having afterwards been made a Clergy-man, he continued Presbyter of the ſame Church a long while with great Integrity. Afterwards when he had been promoted to the Biſhoprick of Patræ by the Biſhop of Corinth, and the Inhabitants of Patræ had refuſed to receive him, he was forced to return to Corinth. The Biſhop of which City dying not long after, the Corinthians requeſted he might be their Biſhop; which requeſt of theirs they made known to Bonifatius Biſhop of Rome. But Bonifatius would do nothing in that Affair, before he had received the Letters of Rufus Biſhop of Theſſalonica, who was deputed the Vicegerent of the Apoſtolick See throughout Achaia and Macedonia. He wrote therefore two Letters to him concerning this buſineſs, to which was annext the Corinthians Requeſt. Theſe Letters bore date in the Conſulate of Monaxius and Plintha. Afterwards, when Bonifatius had receiv'd Rufus's Letters, he approv'd of Perigenes's Election, and wrote a Letter to him and the Corinthians. I have Collected theſe things from two Letters of Bonifatius to Rufus, which Letters were lately publiſh'd at Rome by Lucas Holſtenius a Learned Perſon, and one that has deſerv'd well of Eccleſiaſtick Antiquity. Further, this Perigenes was preſent at the Epheſine Synod convened againſt Neſtorius. For in the Firſt Action thereof occur theſe Words, περιγένης κεκλημένου τῆς ἐκκλησίας, of Perigenes [Biſhop] of Corinth in Greece. Valeſ.

But

Theod. Jun. and Valentinianus.

But in regard the Inhabitants of the foresaid City refused to admit him, the Bishop of Rome ordered he should be constituted Bishop in the Metropolitan See of Corinth, the Bishop of that Church being dead. Over which Church Perigenes presided as long as he liv'd. Gregorius of Nazianzum was first of all Bishop of Sasimi one of the Cities in Cappadocia: Afterwards he was made [Bishop] of Nazianzum. Melitius had formerly presided over the Church in Sebastia, and afterwards he Govern'd that in Antioch. Alexander Bishop of Antioch translated Dositheus Bishop of Seleusia to Tarsus in Cilicia. (d) Reverentius [was removed] from Arci [a City] of Phœnice, and afterwards translated to Tyre. Johannes was translated from (e) Gordum [a City] of Lydia to (f) Proconnesus, and presided over the Church there. Palladius was translated from Helenopolis to Aspuna. Alexander was trasslated from Helenopolis to Adriani. (g) Theophilus was translated from Apemea [a City] of Asia, to Eudoxiopolis anciently termed (h) Salambria. Polycarpus was translated from Saxantapristi [a City] of * Mœsia, to Nicopolis of Thracia. Hierophilus was translated from Trapezopolis [a City] of Phrygia to Plotinopolis in Thracia. (i) Optimus was removed from Agdamia in Phrygia to Antioch [a City] of Pisidia. Silvanus was translated from Philippopolis in Thracia, to Troas. Let thus many be sufficient to have been named at present, who were removed from their own Cities to other [Sees.] But I judge it useful to speak something in short concerning Silvanus, who was translated from Philippopolis in Thracia to Troas.

(d) In the Sfortian M. S. this Person is call'd Reverentius. But in Nicephorus 'tis Reverentius, which is truer. Epiphan. Scholasticus terms him Reverentius also. In the fourth book of the Jus Græco Romanum, chap. De Translationibus Episcoporum, he is corruptly stiled Revenus. Vales.

* Or, Mysia.

(e) Nicephorus makes Gordum a City of Lycia, not Lydia: but all other [Writers] assign it to Lydia. Further, this Johannes Bishop of Proconnesus was present at the Ephesine Synod, as 'tis recorded in the first Action of that Council. Vales.

(f) In the Florentine Manuscript 'tis Proconnesus. In Nicephorus, in the Jus Græco-Romanum, and in the Acts of the Ephesine Council, 'tis written Proiconnesus. The Author of the Etymologicon in the word περικόννησος) defends both readings. And deduces the original of this name (which has the Letter (i) added) from hence, either because this Illand furnishes the other Illands with marmour, περίκα, that is Gratis, freely, or for nothing; or else from the Word περίξ, which signifies Hinnuleum, a little Hind. But Dionysius Athenienſis (in his Book [entitled] κτίσεις, which he wrote concerning the building of Cities,) says 'twas call'd Proconesus from the multitude of Harts there, which they term περόκας. Others will have its name derived from a Vessel which the Greeks call περόκην, because when the Milesii at first brought a Colony thither, they were met by a Virgin carrying such a Vessel. Vales. In Robert Stephens's Edit. 'tis termed Preconesus.

(g) In the fourth Book of the Jus Græco-Romanum, pag. 93; he is termed Theosebius. And so he is called in the Tripartite History (which Epiphan. Scholasticus translated;) and in Ivo Carnotensis (in Prologo Decreti.) But Nicephorus terms him Philippus, which I wonder at. Vales.

(h) From the Florentine and Sfortian Manuscripts, and from Nicephorus and Epiphan. Scholasticus, instead of Salabria, we have made it Salambria. 'Tis a City of Thracia, which the Greeks heretofore termed Selymbria, as Strabo and Stephanus do attest: But afterwards 'twas called Salambria. So in the Itinerarium Burdigalense: Mansio Salamembria [is mentioned which was] 44 Miles distant from Constantinople. Vales.

(i) This is the Optimus Bishop of Antioch in Pisidia, of whom the Emperor Theodosius makes mention in the third Law of the Theodosian Code, de Fide catholicâ; to whom (together with Amphilochius of Iconium,) the Charge and Administration of the Churches of Asia is commited. Vales.

CHAP. XXXVII.

Concerning Silvanus, who was translated from Philippopolis to Troas.

Silvanus had formerly been a Rhetorician [in the School of] Troïlus the Sophista. But in regard he proposed to himself an accuracy in the profession of the Christian Religion as his chief design, and exercised himself in the severities of an Ascetick life, [on account hereof] he refused to (a) wear the Rhetoricians Pallium. But afterwards Atticus the Bishop (b) laid hold of him, and ordained him Bishop of Philippopolis. After he had lived three years in Thracia, and found himself unable to endure the cold (for he had a very thin, lean, and infirm body;) he entreated Atticus, that he would ordain another in his stead, affirming that he refused to live in Thracia upon no other account, than because of the cold. Another person therefore having for this very reason been ordain'd in his room, Silvanus continued at Constantinople, and with a most exquisite diligence followed an Ascetick course of life. He was so great a stranger to delicateness and fineness, that he would frequently appear in publick amongst so numerous a concourse of people as were in that populous City, shod only with Sandals made of (c) Spartum. After some interval of time the Bishop of the Church

(a) Τείβωνα φορεῖν. Christophorson has rendred it ill, thus, Pallium Philosophicum, the Philosophic Pallium, adding a word of his own, to wit, Philosophic. But Socrates speaks not concerning the Philosophic Pallium, but concerning that of the Rhetoricians. For he says, that Silvanus had before been a Rhetorician, that is, an Advocate out of Troïlus the Sophist's School: but afterwards left off his Pallium, and embraced a Monastick life. Concerning the Rhetoricians Pallium, see what we have remarked before at Book 7. chap. 12. Note (c.) To which may be added this passage out of Theophylactus Simocatta's Menodia, which he spoke in praise of the Emperor Mauricius, after Phaucas's death: ἀνακειρίθωσαν οἱ λόγοι τῷ κρότων, τὴν εὐφημίαν αἱ μῶσαι. Τὸ λιτὸν ἀθῆναι τριβώνιον. Which words Theophylactus himself cites in the Eighth Book of his History, chap. 12. Whence it may gathered, that the Rhetoricians Pallium was white, not red, or scarlet coloured, as we have noted before from Cyrillus and Basilius Grammaticus. Gregorius Nazianzenus speaks also concerning the Rhetoricians Pallium, in his twentieth Oration concerning the praises of Basilius, pag. 328. Edit. Paris, 1609. where Billius (by the same mistake) has rendred it Pallia Philosophica, the Philosophic Palliums. Vales.

(b) I agree not with Christophorson, who has rendred this place so, as if Atticus had sent for Silvanus to come to him. What need was there of sending for him, who was present at Constantinople, to wit, a Rhetorician in the School of Troïlus the Sophist, who taught Rhetorick at Constantinople. The word συλλαβεῖν signifies something more, to wit, to lay hold of, and use force toward any person. By this term therefore Socrates shews, that Silvanus was against his own will, and with a reluctancy, made Bishop of Philippopolis by Atticus. Philippopolis is the Metropolis of that Country, strictly and properly called Thracia. You must know further, that the Ordination of the Metropolitanes of Thracia, belonged then to the Bishop of Constantinople. For the Patriarchs by a certain singular priviledge ordained Metropolitanes, as I have observed at large in my Dissertation on the sixth Canon of the Nicene Council. [The Learned Reader will meet with this Dissertation of Valesius's at pag. 188. of his Notes on Socrates and Sozomen, Edit. Paris, 1668.] Hence 'tis, that the same Atticus, Patriarch of Constantinople, ordained the said Silvanus Bishop of Troas, upon the request of the Inhabitants of that City. For Alexandria Troas [or, Alexander's Troas,] was the Metropolis of Phrygia. This is in express words established by the twenty eighth Canon of the Chalcedon Council, [which occurs at Tom. 1. pag. 145. Edit. Beveredg.] which treats concerning the priviledges of the Constantinopolitane See: to wit, that the Metropolitanes only of the Thracian, Pontick, and Asian Diœceses, should be ordained by the most holy Constantinopolitane See: the Decrees being (as usually) first made by the common consent of the Clergy and Laity, and directed to the Patriarch of Constantinople. For thus the aforesaid Canon does determine, ψηφισμάτων συμφώνων κατὰ τὸ ἔθος γινομένων καὶ ἐπ' αὐτὸν ἀναφερομένων, The Decrees made as usually, being agreed upon and transmitted to him. The Canon means the Decree of Request, such a one as the Corinthians sent to Bonifatius, desiring they might have Perigenes for their Bishop; as we have observed before at Chap. 36, Note (c.) Vales.

(c) Ἀπὸ χορτίνων σανδαλίων. Christophorson renders it, Sandaliis indutus fœno confectis, shod with Sandals made of Hay. Epibanius Scholasticus (who is followed by Langus, Nicephorus's Translator, Book 14. Chap. 39.) translates it soleas de sparto, Sandals of Spartum.

Spartum is a kind of Shrub like our Broom, of which they made Bonds to tie their Vines, Ropes for Ships, and (as it ſeems) Sandals alſo. Such Sandals as theſe were thoſe termed Carbatinæ; concerning which ſee Julius Pollux Onamaſt. Book 7. chap. 22, Heſychius (in the word καρβατίνη, ſays they were mean ſhoes worn by the Peaſants; and expounds that term thus, μόνον τὸν πόδημα, a ſhoe with one ſole.

of Troas departed this life. On which account the Inhabitants of Troas came [to Conſtantinople] to deſire a Biſhop. Whilſt Atticus was conſidering whom he ſhould ordain, it happned that Silvanus came to give him a viſit. As ſoon as Atticus ſaw him, he (d) laid aſide his care [about that affair] immediately, and ſpoke to Silvanus [on this wiſe,] You have no further excuſe for your avoiding the Care and Government of [this] Church. For Troas is not a cold place. Behold, God has provided you a convenient place for the infirmneſs of your Body. Delay not therefore, Brother, but go to Troas. Wherefore Silvanus removed to that City: where he did a Miracle, which I will now relate. A vaſt Ship for carrying of burthens, made for the conveyance of great pillars, (ſuch a veſſel they term Plate;) had been newly built on the ſhore of Troas. This Veſſel was to be launched. But tho' many ropes [were faſtned to the Ship,] and a great number of perſons [did their utmoſt] to hale it [Seaward,] yet it was not in any wiſe to be moved. After this had been done for many days, then they thought that a Devil detain'd the Veſſel. Wherefore, they went to Biſhop Silvanus, and entreated him to make a Prayer in that place. For they believed, that by that means only the Ship was to be drawn into the Sea. But he entertaining modeſt thoughts of himſelf, ſtiled himſelf a Sinner, and ſaid, That was a work to be done by ſome righteous perſon, not by him. When they continued their ſuit with a greater earneſtneſs, he went to the ſhore: Where after he had pray'd, he * took hold of one of the ropes, and bad them ſet cloſe to the buſineſs. And when they had haled the Ship on a little, ſhe ran ſwiftly into the Sea. This Miracle perform'd by Silvanus's hands, ſtirred up thoſe of that Province to piety. But Silvanus was a good Man as to other things alſo: For perceiving that the Eccleſiaſticks made a gain of their Contentions who were engag'd in Suits at Law, he would never make any one of the Clergy a Judge: but receiv'd the Libels of the Litigants himſelf, and called one of the faithful Laicks to him, whom he knew to be a lover of juſtice; to whom he committed the hearing of the cauſe, [by which means] he (e) freed the Litigants from contentiouſneſs. For theſe reaſons Silvanus got himſelf a great name amongſt all Men. Thus much concerning Silvanus, which altho' declared by way of digreſſion, (yet in my judgment) the mention hereof * is not unuſeful. But let us return to that place, from whence we have digreſſed. After Maximianus therefore was ordain'd Biſhop of [Conſtantinople] in the Conſulate of Baſſus and Antiochus, about the twenty fifth of October, the affairs of the Church were in a ſedate and quiet poſture.

* This Iſland is now termed Candia.

ABout the ſame time, many of the Jews [who dwelt in Crete, turn'd Chriſtians, on account of this calamitous accident. A certain Jew, who was an Impoſtor, feign'd himſelf to be Moſes; and affirm'd himſelf to have been ſent from Heaven, that he might (a) lead out the Jews who inhabited that Iſland, and conduct them through the Sea. For he was (as he ſaid) the ſame perſon who preſerved the Iſraelites heretofore [by leading them] through the Red-Sea. For the ſpace of one whole year therefore he travelled about to all the Cities of that Iſland, and perſuaded the Jews who inhabited therein, to believe theſe things. And he exhorted them to leave their money and poſſeſſions: for he promiſed, that he would lead them through a dry Sea into the Land of Promiſe. They, deceived by ſuch hopes as theſe, neglected all employments; and moreover deſpiſed the things they poſſeſſed, permitting any perſons they met with to take them. When the day was come which had been ſet by this Jewiſh Impoſtor, he himſelf went before, and they all followed with their Wives and little Children. He leads them therefore to a Promontory which * ran out into the Sea, and order'd them to caſt themſelves from thence into the Ocean. They who came firſt to the precipice, did ſo, and loſt their lives immediately, part of them being daſh'd [in pieces] againſt the rocks, and part drowned in the waters: And many more of them had periſh'd, had not ſome Fiſhermen and Merchants (who were Chriſtians,) by the diſpoſal of Divine Providence hapned to be preſent. Theſe perſons drew out and ſaved ſome of them who were almoſt choaked with the waters; who having been in ſo imminent danger, were then ſenſible of their own madneſs. They kept the others alſo from caſting themſelves into the Sea, by telling them that thoſe were deſtroyed who had thrown themſelves in firſt. The Jews therefore, having at length underſtood the Impoſture, blamed their own indiſcretion in believing. But when they endeavoured to [ſeize] the † Pſeudo-Moſes and kill him, they could not apprehend him: For he diſappear'd [on a ſudden;] and this made moſt men ſuſpect that he was a deſtructive Devil, who had cloathed himſelf with an human ſhape, that he might deſtroy their Nation in that Country. By reaſon of this calamitous accident, many of the Jews then in Crete, bade adieu to Judaiſm, and ‖ embraced the Faith of the Chriſtian Religion.

(a) In ſome Copies the reading is [ἐκλάβη] at which word Epiphanius Scholaſticus and Nicephorus with good reaſon were diſpleaſed; and therefore both of them omitted it. In my judgment it ſhould be [ἐκβάλῃ, might lead out.] Valeſ.

Concerning the Fire which hapned in the Church of the Novatianiſts.

NOt long after this time, Paulus Biſhop of the Novatianiſts gat the repute of a perſon truly beloved by God, and indeed rendred [his own reputation] far greater than what it had been before. For, there hapned a moſt furious rious fire [at Constantinople,] such a one as had never † been known before. For a great part of the City was destroyed by this Fire: In so much that the (a) greatest Granaries, and that termed the (b) Achillean Bath, were burnt down. At length the Fire, consuming [all things in its way,] approach'd the Novatianists Church, which stands near Pelargus.

† Or, happened.

(a) Τὰ μέγιστα τῶν θείων. In Nicephorus 'tis ὡρείων with an aspirate. And Langus translates it Barns, or Granaries. Musculus renders it Maxima ædificia, the greatest Edifices. Christophorson, fortissima munimenta, the strongest Fortresses. I had rather follow Langus. For ὠρεῖον is a barbarou Greek Word, which signifies a Barn or Granary; as Meursius has long since observed in his Glossary. In the Kings Copy I found it written ὀρεῖον at this place. Further, there were five publick Barns or Granaries at Constantinople; to wit, four in the fifth Ward. Vales.

(b) In the Alexandrian Chronicle (pag. 728. Edit. Monach. 1615,) the Words are these: On Theodosius Augustus's fourteenth Consulate which he bore with Maximus, there arose a great fire from the Neorium, which burnt down the Granaries and the Achillean Bath, in the month Loös, &c. Epiphanius Scholasticus renders it, Thermas quæ vocantur Achilleæ, that termed the Achillean Bath. Which Rendition is confirmed by Marcellinus Comes in his Chronicon, (pag. 26. Edit. Paris, 1619;) at the Consulate of Maximus and Paterius, which was the year of Christ 443. His Coss. (says he) Thermarum quæ Achilleæ dicuntur, Encœnia facta, in their Consulate, that termed the Achillean Bath was [after it had been rebuilt] dedicated. And the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicon affirms the same (pag. 730. Edit. ut prius,) in these Words ἐπὶ τούτων τῶν ὑπάτων, &c. In the same Persons [that is, Maximus's and Paterius's] Consulate, the publick Bath termed Achilles was dedicated, in the month Audunæus, before the third of the Ides of January. The Achillean Bath therefore (after it had been consumed by fire, in the fourteenth Consulate of Theodosius which he bore with Maximus, on the year of Christ 433,) was rebuilt and dedicated on the tenth Year after. Vales.

When therefore Paulus the Bishop saw his Church in danger, he rush'd into it [and ran] as far as the Altar, where he * commended the Preservation of the Church and the things therein to God; nor did he omit the pouring forth his Prayers both for the City and for the Church. † And God heard his Prayer, as 'twas demonstrated by the event. For tho' the Fire brake into the Church through all the Doors and Windows, yet it did no harm. It wholly consumed many adjacent Edifices on every side of it: but you might have seen the Church it self in the midst of the whole Fire, triumphing over its raging Flames. And when this Fire had continued two whole days and as many nights, it was wholly extinguished, after it had burnt down a great part of the City. But the Church appear'd entire and untouch'd. And (which is more to be admired) there was not the least * appearance of Smoak to be seen on its Timber or Walls. This hapned about the sixteenth of August, in Theodosius's fourteenth Consulate which he bore with Maximus. Since which time the Novatianists do celebrate [the Memory of] their Church its having been preserved, every year about the sixteenth of August; on which day they put up their Thanksgivings to God: And all Persons in a manner, not only Christians but very many Pagans also, since that time honour that place, by reason of the Miracle which hapned therein; and have a veneration for it as being truly holy. But thus far concerning these things.

CHAP. XL.

That Proclus succeeded Maximianus the Bishop.

Maximianus having quietly govern'd the Churches two years and five months, died in the Consulate of Areobindus and Aspar, on the twelfth of April. That day hapned to fall on the Week of Fasts, [to wit] the Week which immediately precedes the Feast of Easter: and it was the * fifth day of that Week. At which time the Emperor Theodosius made a prudent provision for this affair. For lest a debate should arise again about the Election of a Bishop, which might raise a disturbance in the Church; he delay'd not, but whilst Maximianus's Body lay as yet unburied, ordered the Bishops that were present [in the City] to place Proclus in the Episcopal Chair. For the Letters of Cælestinus Bishop of Rome, wherein he approved of (a) this [Election,] were then come; which Letters he had sent to Cyrillus [Bishop] of Alexandria, to Johannes [Bishop] of Antioch, and to (b) Rufus [Bishop] of Thessalonica; informing them, that nothing hindred him (who had been nominated and actually was Bishop of one City) from being translated to another. Therefore after Proclus was placed in the Episcopal Chair, he made a Funeral for the Body of Maximianus. But we have now an opportunity of speaking something in short concerning Proclus.

Theod. Jun. and Valentinianus.

* That is, Thursday in the Passion Week.

(a) Instead of [τοῦτο] I read [τότε,] as did Sir Henry Savill and Christophorson. Moreover I agree with Baronius, who (at the year of Christ 434,) has truly remarked, that these Letters of Cælestine Bishop of Rome were not written on this year, but two years before; to wit, when (after Nestorius's Deposition,) they were busie about Electing a Bishop of Constantinople. 'Tis certain on this year (when Areobindus and Aspar were Consuls) Cælestine was dead, and Xystus had succeeded him in the Bishoprick of Rome. Vales.

(b) Valesius has told us before (at note (c.) on chap. 36,) that Rufus Bishop of Thessalonica was deputed the Vice-gerent of the Apostolick See [that is, Rome] throughout Achaia and Macedonia. He adds here, that he had the same Vice-gerency throughout Illyricum, as the Epistles of Innocentius and Bonifatius Bishops of Rome do declare, which are to be seen in Lucas Holstenius's Roman Collection. For (continues Valesius) the Bishops of Thessalonica had that priviledge from the times of Pope Damasus, as we learn from the same Collection. Balsamo (in his Comments on the Synod in Trullo, pag. 359 Edit. Paris, 1620.) affirms, that the Bishops of Thessalonica were heretofore the Legates of the Roman Bishop; and that the Bishop of Rome has a power of constituting Legates in the Constantinopolitane Patriarchate; but denies that he has a power of ordaining Bishops; wherein Balsamo is much mistaken. For these Provinces, which then when Balsamo wrote, were under the Constantinopolitane Prelate, had heretofore been under the Bishop of Rome. Further, the Nicene Synod has determined, that the ancient usages should be observed. Thus far Valesius. But, as you see, he gives no reason to confute what Balsamo has said, to wit, that the Bishop of Rome has no power to ordain Bishops within the Constantinopolitane Patriarchate. And therefore I will (and so may the Reader too, if he pleases) suspend my belief, till some reasons are assigned. This passage in Balsamo (here quoted by Valesius) occurs in Dr. Beveredge's Synod. Tom. I, p. 154. See the Learned Doctor's Notes, pag. 126.

CHAP. XLI.

Concerning Proclus the Bishop, what manner of Man he was.

Proclus was from his younger years a Reader, he frequented the Schools, and imployed his time in [the study of] Rhetorick. Being come to Man's estate, he was for the most part conversant with Atticus the Bishop, and had been his Notary. When he had made a great Proficiency, Atticus promoted him to the Diaconate. Having been preferr'd to the Presbyterate, Sisinnius (as I have said * before) ordained him Bishop of Cyzicum. These things had hapned long before this. But 'twas at this time that he obtained the Chair of the Constantinopolitane Church. He was a Person endowed with as good a Disposition and Morals, as was any Man whatsoever. For having been educated under Atticus, he studiously imitated all that was good in him. (a) But he exercised a patience far greater than Atticus. For he, * now and then, shew'd himself terrible to Hereticks. But Proclus was calm and mild to all persons: (b) in regard he foresaw that they might be brought [to embrace the true Faith] by this means, rather than by force. For being resolv'd to vex and disquiet no Heresie whatever, he preserv'd the Dignity and Honour of his Mildness and Manfuetude intire and unviolated, and [as if he had been some pledge] restored it to the Church. In which particular thing he imitated the Emperor Theodosius. For 'twas his fix'd and unalterable determination, not to make use of his Imperial Power and Authority against Criminals: And Proclus's resolution was, not to value any ones entertaining such Sentiments concerning God, as were different from those embraced by himself.

* Ἐν καιρῷ, upon occasion.

(a) In Rob. Stephens's Edition, the reading is, πλὼν δὲ ἀνεξικακίαν πλέον ἦν ἐκεῖνος ἐξήσκησεν, But he exercised a patience far greater than he [Atticus] had. The word [ἐξήσκησεν, had] is wanting in the Sfortian MS. Wherefore I doubt not but Socrates left it written thus, πλὼ δὲ ἀνεξικακίαν πλέον ἢ ἐκεῖνος ἐξήσκησε, But he exercised a patience far greater than Atticus. Which Emendation is confirmed by Epiphan. Scholasticus and Nicephorus, for Nicephorus (Book 14. ch. 38.) words it thus; ἀνεξικακος δὲ καὶ πλέον ἢπερ ἐκεῖνοι, Moreover, he was far more patient than they, [that is, than John Chrysostome and Atticus.] And Epiphan. Scholast. renders it thus: Sed in isto patientia potior apparebat, but in him a better [or more desirable] patience appear'd. Vales.

(b) We read [τούτῳ δὴ, in regard —— by this means;] before which words we have put a Colon. Vales.

CHAP. XLII.

That this Writer spends many words in praise of the Emperor Theodosius Junior's Probity.

ON account hereof therefore, Proclus was highly commended by the Emperor. For * He himself also was like to such as were true Prelates; nor did he any wise approve of those, who were desirous of persecuting others. Yea, I can speak it with confidence, that for meekness he excelled all those who were true and genuine Ecclesiasticks. (a) And what is recorded of Moses in the Book of Numbers *; Now the Man Moses was very meek, above all the men which were upon the face of the earth; the same may be now said of the Emperor Theodosius, to wit, that he is very meek, above all the Men which are upon the face of the Earth. For by reason of this his meekness, God hath subdued his Enemies under him, without military Engagements, as hath been demonstrated by his † Victory over the Tyrant † Johannes, and [shall be made evident] from the Destruction of the || Barbarians, which succeeded that soon after. For what manner of assistances have been given by God to Just Men heretofore, such like have even in our times been bestow'd on the most Pious Emperor, by the God of the Universe. Nor do I write this out of flattery, but I will give a Narrative of Affairs (which all Men have been throughly acquainted with,) as they truly are.

* That is, Theodosius.

(a) The discourse will be more graceful and Emphatical, if we add a Particle thus, καὶ καθάπερ, &c. And what is recorded, &c. and so make this the beginning of a period. Thus Nicephorus reads it. Vales.

CHAP. XLIII.

How great Calamities those Barbarians underwent who had been the Tyrant Johannes's Auxiliaries.

Theod. Jun. and Valentinianus.

FOr after the Slaughter of the Tyrant, those Barbarians whom he had called to his assistance against the Romans, made preparations to over-run [and ruin] the Roman * Provinces. When the Emperor heard of it, according as his usage was, he committed the care of this affair to God: and having been earnest in Prayers, not long after obtain'd what he desired. Further, it will be advantagious, to hear what [Calamities] befel the Barbarians. Their Commander in chief, whose name was (a) Rougas, is killed by a clap of Thunder. Then follow'd a Plague, which destroy'd most of the Men under his command. Nor was this only sufficient; but Fire also descended from Heaven, and consumed many of those who remained. And this put the Barbarians into the greatest terror imaginable, not so much because they had dared to take up Arms against the valiant Nation of the Romans; as in regard they found them assisted by a powerful God. Moreover, Proclus the Bishop preach'd a Sermon at that time in the Church, wherein he applied a Procephy [taken] out of Ezechiel to the deliverance effected by God at that juncture; [for which discourse] he was greatly admired. The Prophecy runs thus: And thou son of man, propheſie against (b) Prince Gog, Rhos, Misoch and Thobell. For I will judge him with death, and with bloud, and with an overflowing rain, and with stones of hail. And I will rain Fire and Brimstone upon him, and upon all those with him, and upon many Nations [which are] with him. And I will be magnified and glorified, and I will be known in the eyes of many Nations. And they shall know that I am the Lord. On account thereof therefore, as I have said, Proclus was much admired. But on the Emperor, because of his meekness, many other [Blessings] were conferred by Divine Providence. Amongst which this was one, [which I will now relate.]

* Πράγματα, affairs.

(a) In Priscus's History of the Goths, the King of the Hunni is termed Rouas, who was succeeded by Attalas. In Jordanes he is call'd Roäs, the Brother of Octar and Mundiuchus, the Uncle of Attalas. Langus, Nicephorus's Translator, calls him Roïlas, for what reason I know not: For in Nicephorus 'tis Rougas, as well as here in Socrates. Vales.

(b) See Ezech. 38. ver. 2, 22, & 23. In the Septuagint Version, at v. 2. the words are ἄρχοντα ῥὼς Prince Rhos. But the term ῥὼς is wanting in the vulgar Translation, instead whereof Hieronymus has rendred it thus, Principem capitis Mosoch, Prince of the chief of Mosoch. Wherefore, what Langus remarks here concerning the Russi, is in my Judgment foreign to this place. Vales. In the Hebrew, the Words of this Text are נְשִׂיא רֹאשׁ מֶשֶׁךְ which in the margin of our English Version is render'd exactly, thus, Prince of the chief of Meshech. Socrates quotes this whole Text out of Ezechiel, in the Words of the Septuagint Version, and we have translated them accordingly. The difference between the Greek Version and Original Hebrew at this Text is great. Our English Translators (as they generally do, so here) follow the Hebrew.

That the Emperor Valentinianus Junior married Eudoxia the Daughter of Theodosius.

Theod. Jun. and Valentinianus. Emperor Theodosius had given his consent, and both the Augusti (after they had deliberated about celebrating the marriage at some place on the Frontiers of both Empires,) had resolved each to make a journey half way, and do it at Thessalonica: Valentinianus sends Theodosius intimation by Letter, that he should not give himself that trouble: for, that he would come in person to Constantinople. Having therefore secured the Western parts [with a sufficient guard,] he comes to Constantinople on account of the marriage. Which having been celebrated in the Consulate of (a) Isidorus and Senator, he took his Wife, and returned into the western parts. Such a felicity as this befel the Emperor at that time.

(a) These persons were Consuls on the year of Christ 436.

But Prosper, Marcellinus Comes in his Chronicon, and the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle, disagree from Socrates. For those Authors relate, that this marriage was celebrated on the year following, whereon Aëtius bore his second Consulate with Sigisvultus, in the month of November. The same is confirmed by Jordanes in his Book de successione Regnorum; where, after he has spoken concerning the Whoredom committed by Honoria with her Procurator Eugenius, which was done in the Consulate of Areobindus and Aspar, on the year of Christ 434. He adds these words; Posthæc tertio anno Valentinianus, &c. On the third year after this the Emperor Valentinianus comes from Rome to Constantinople, in order to his marrying Eudoxia daughter to the Emperor Theodosius: and having given all Illyria as a Gratuity to his Father-in law, after the Celebration of the Marriage, he returned with his Wife to his own Kingdoms. Cassiodorus Senator attests the same concerning the Donation of the Western Illyricum (Book 11. variarum, Epist. 1. pag. 684. Edit. Aurel. Allobrog. 1622.) in these words: Placidiam mundi opinione celebratam, avorum [or, principum, or, aliquorum, as 'tis in some Copies,] Prosapia gloriosam purpurato filio studuisse percepimus; cujus dum remisse administrat Imperium, indecenter cognoscitur imminutum. Nurum denique sibi amissione Illyrici comparavit, factaque est conjunctio regnantis, divisio dolenda provinciis. Vales.

CHAP. XLV.

That Proclus the Bishop perswaded the Emperor to translate the Body of Johannes from the place of his Exile [where he had been buried,] to Constantinople, and to deposite it in the Church of The Apostles.

* He means those termed the Johannitæ. See Book 6. ch. 18. † Or, by prudence.

NOt long after this time, Proclus the Bishop reduc'd * those [to the Church] who had made a separation [from it] on account of Bishop Johannes's deposition; having mitigated their disgust by a † prudent expedient. What that was, we must now relate. After he had perswaded the Emperor [to give his consent thereto,] he brought the body of Johannes, which had been buried at Comani, to Constantinople, on the thirty fifth year after his deposition. And when he had carried it through the City publickly, in great pomp and state, he deposited it with much honour and solemnity in that termed the Church of The Apostles. Those persons therefore who had made a separation on Johannes's account, were by this means prevailed upon, and became united to the Church. And this hapned in the sixteenth Consulate of the Emperor Theodosius, about the twenty seventh of January. But I cannot forbear wondring here, how [it came to pass,] that Envy should assail and corrode Origen after he was dead, and yet spare Johannes. For Origen was excommunicated by Theophilus about two hundred years after his death. But Johannes was admitted to communion by Proclus, on the thirty fifth year after he died. So great was the difference between Proclus's disposition, and that of Theophilus. But prudent Men are not ignorant, (a) in what manner these things have been, and daily are, done. Theod. Jun. and Valentinianus.

(a) By these words Socrates does plainly discover his Opinion. For he would say, that these things are usually done through envy, or out of favour. For because Origen was condemned by Theophilus, so many years after his death; that Socrates ascribes to Theophilus's envy towards Origen himself, or against those termed the Long Monks. And whereas John Chrysostome was brought back with honour into his own Country, on the thirty fifth year after his death; that Socrates attributes to the love and benevolence of Proclus and the people of Constantinople. But I am not of Socrates's opinion: For although in affairs of this nature, the affections of Men have some effect; yet Divine Justice and Providence, whereby the Church is governed, does always over-rule. Origen therefore was condemned for his heterodox Opinions; and John Chrysostome, being consecrated for his Integrity of Life and Doctrine, continues in the Church to this very day. Valesius.

CHAP. XLVI.

Concerning the Death of Paulus Bishop of the Novatianists, and concerning Marcianus who was his Successor.

SOme little time after the removal of Johannes's body, died Paulus also, Bishop of the Novatianists, in the same Consulate, about the twenty first day of July: Who at his own Funeral reduced all the disagreeing Heresies into one Church in a manner: For they all accompanied his body to the * Grave with singing of Psalms: because whilst he lived, all [Sects] loved him exceedingly for his † Sanctity of life. But because the same Paulus performed a memorable action just before his death, I judge it useful to insert it into this History, for their advantage who shall peruse this Work. For, that during his sickness he observ'd his usual Ascetick [discipline as to his] diet, and transgressed not in the least [the rules] thereof; and, that he never omitted performing the [usual] prayers with a fervency; [all this] I think fit to leave unmention'd; lest by spending time in giving a narrative hereof, I should obscure that memorable and most useful action (as I have said) which he performed. What that is, must now be declared. Being near dying, he sent for all the Presbyters belonging to the Churches under him, to whom he expresst himself thus: Take care about electing a Bishop [over your selves] whilst I am alive; lest afterwards your Churches be disturbed. When they made answer, that the election of a Bishop was not to be left to them: for in regard [said they] some of us have one Sentiment, others another, we shall never nominate the same person: But we wish, that you your self would name that Man whom you desire [to be your Successor.] To which Paulus made this return: Deliver me then this Profession of yours in writing [to wit,] that you will elect him whom I shall appoint to be chosen. When they had done that, and confirmed it by their subscriptions, (a) he sat on his bed, and (without discovering it to those who were present, wrote Marcianus's name in the paper. This Person had been promoted to the Presbyterate, and likewise had been instructed in an Ascetick course of life under Paulus: but was then gone to travel. After this he sealed up the the Paper himſelf, and cauſed the chief of the Presbyters to ſeal it up alſo, and then deliver'd it to one Marcus, (who was Biſhop of the Novatianiſts in Scythia, but had at that time made a journey to Conſtantinople;) to whom he ſpake theſe words: If God ſhall permit me to continue much longer in this life, reſtore this * Depoſitum to me [now] committed to your truſt to be kept ſafely. But, if it ſhall pleaſe him to remove me out of this World, in this Paper you will find whom I have elected to be my Succeſſor in the Biſhoprick. When he had ſpoken theſe words, he died. On the third day therefore after his death, when they had unſealed the Paper in the preſence of a great multitude, and found Marcianus's name therein, they all cried out that he was a worthy and fit Perſon. And without delay they diſpatch'd away ſome Meſſengers who might ſeize him. They took him by a pious fraud at his Reſidence in Tiberiopolis [a City] of Phrygia; from whence they brought him along with them, and about the twenty firſt (b) of the ſame Month ordained, and placed him in the Epiſcopal Chair. But enough concerning theſe things.

That the Emperor Theodoſius ſent his Wife Eudocia to Jeruſalem.

MOreover, the Emperor Theodoſius offer'd up his Thankſgivings to God for the Benefits which he had conferr'd upon him. And this he performed, by honouring Chriſt with ſingular and eminent Honours. He likewiſe ſent his Wife Eudocia to Jeruſalem (a) For ſhe had obliged her ſelf alſo to a performance of this Vow, if ſhe might ſee her Daughter married. But the Empreſs herſelf alſo * beautified the Churches at Jeruſalem, and all thoſe in the Eaſtern Cities, with various Ornaments, both when ſhe went thither, and likewiſe at her return.

(a) Inſtead of [ᾧ χ̀ αὐτὴ ταύτην ἐυχὴν, &c. For he had obliged himſelf to a performance, &c.] I doubt not but it ſhould be [ᾧ χ̀ αὐτὴ, for ſhe had obliged her ſelf;] that is, Eudocia. Thus Epiphan. Scholaſticus read, as appears from his Verſion; which is thus, Hoc enim & ipſa votum habuerat, ſi filiam videret nuptam, For ſhe her ſelf alſo had [made] this vow, if ſhe might ſee her Daughter married. Valeſ.

CHAP. XLVIII.

Concerning Thalaſſius Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia.

ABout that very time, to wit, in Theodoſius's ſeventeenth Conſulate, Proclus the Biſhop attempted a wonderful thing, the like to which has not been performed by any of the Ancient Biſhops. For Firmus Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia being dead, the Cæſareans came [to Conſtantinople,] and requeſted they might have a Biſhop. And whileſt Proclus was conſidering whom he ſhould prefer to that See, it hapned that all the Senators came to the Church on the Sabbath, to give him a viſit, amongſt whom was (a) Thalaſſius alſo, a perſonage who had born a Præfecture over the Provinces and Cities of Illyricum. But [though] (as it was reported) he had been the Perſon pitch'd upon who was about to have the Government of the Eaſtern parts committed to his care by the Emperor; [yet] Proclus laid his Hands on him, and inſtead of his being conſtituted a Præfectus Prætorio, made him Biſhop of Cæſarea. Thus ſucceſsful and proſperous were the Affairs of the Church. But I will here cloſe my Hiſtory, with my Prayers [to God,] that the Churches in all places, the Cities, and Provinces may live in peace. For, as long as peace flouriſhes, thoſe that are deſirous to do it, will have no ſubject for their writing an Hiſtory. For we our ſelves (who have perform'd what you enjoyn'd us in Seven Books, O Sacred Man of God, Theodorus!) ſhould have wanted matter for this our Hiſtory, if the Lovers of Seditions and Tumults would have been quiet. This Seventh Book contains [an account of Affairs tranſacted during] the ſpace of two and thirty years. The whole Hiſtory, which is comprized in Seven Books, contains the ſpace of an hundred and forty years. It begins from the firſt year of the two hundredth ſeventy firſt Olympiad, wherein Conſtantine was proclaimed Emperor; and ends at the ſecond year of the three hundredth and fifth Olympiad, whereon the Emperor Theodoſius bore his ſeventeenth Conſulate.

(a) This is the Thalaſſius, or Thalaſſus, Præfectus Prætorio of Illyricum, to whom The one Law (Tit. 6. Legum Novellarum Theodoſii Junioris) was directed, which is dated at Conſtantinople, on the third of the Ides of Auguſt, in Theodoſius's ſeventeenth Conſulate which he bore with Feſtus. After this Day therefore, on this very Year, Thalaſſius was made Biſhop of Cæſarea by Proclus.

Which action of Proclus's Socrates does not without cauſe wonder at, as new, and not practiſed by former Biſhops. Nectarius indeed, when he was Prætor of Conſtantinople, had been created Biſhop of that City. But, the Emperor's conſent had been firſt obtain'd, as Socrates has told us before. But here Proclus, meerly by his own impulſe, laid his Hands on a Præfectus Prætorio, who by the Emperor had been deſign'd to the Government of the Oriental Præfecture. Notwithſtanding, it is to be underſtood, that the Emperor's conſent was afterwards obtained, who approved of what Proclus had done. But, in promoting inferior Magiſtrates to Eccleſiaſtick Degrees, the Prince's conſent was in no wiſe neceſſary. For the Præfectus Prætorio's approbation was ſufficient, under whoſe diſpoſe the Preſidents of Provinces were. We have an eminent inſtance hereof in the Life of St. Germanus Altiſſiodorenſis, which was written by Conſtantius Preſbyter. Which Germanus being Preſident of a Province, and Amator Biſhop of Altiſſiodorum [a City in France, now call'd Auxerre] having a mind to appoint him his Succeſſor; Amator procur'd the conſent of Julius, Præfectus Prætorio of the Gallia's, before he attempted to do that; as 'tis related in Book 1. chap. 3. concerning the Life of St. Germanus. Further, this Thalaſſius Biſhop of Cæſarea was preſent at the falſe Synod at Epheſus [convened] againſt Flavianus, as we are inform'd from the Acts of the ſaid Synod, which are recorded in the firſt Action of the Chalcedon Council. OF

THE ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY

EVAGRIUS SCHOLASTICUS Epiphanienſis.

Evagrius Scholaſticus was by Nation a Syrian, as was alſo † Theodoret: Born at Epipania (which was a City of Syria Secunda;) as he himſelf has declared in the Title of his own Work. Thererefore I wonder at Gerardus Voſſius, who (in his Book de Hiſtoricis Græcis, pag. 498,) relates that Evagrius was born at Antioch. But Evagrius himſelf, (both in the Title of his Hiſtory, and alſo in his Third Book, Chap. 34,) does expreſsly atteſt that he was born at Epiphania. For, ſpeaking there concerning Coſmas Biſhop of Epiphania, his Words are theſe; Κοσμᾶς τὴν ἡμέτεραν ἐπισκοπὴν Ἐπιφάνειαν, ἣ τὸν ὀρόντην συνοικον ἔχει, &c. Coſmas Biſhop of our Epiphania, in the Vicinage whereof runs the [River] Orontes, &c. Beſides, Photius (in his Bibliotheca, chap. 29,] affirms that Evagrius was born in Epiphania, a City of Syria-Cœle. But, which is ſtrange, Nicephorus Calliſtus does in two places term our Evagrius (not Epiphanienſis, but) Ἐπιφανῆ, that is Illuſtrious. For, in Nicephorus's Firſt Book, chap. 1. the words are theſe; ὅθεν ἡμῖν Εὐάγριος ὁ Ἐπιφανὴς, &c. Moreover, Evagrius the Illuſtrious, &c. And, in Book 16. Chap. 31; Nicephorus quoting a paſſage of Evagrius, out of his Third Book, Chap. 34. (which paſſage I have juſt now mentioned) expreſſes himſelf thus, οἷα δὲ καὶ Εὐάγριος ὁ Ἐπιφανὴς περὶ σεβήρου ἱστόρησεν, Moreover, in like manner as Evagrius the Illuſtrious has related concerning Severus. But my Sentiment is, that Tranſcribers have miſtook at both thoſe places, and have written Ἐπιφανὴς [Illuſtrious] inſtead of Ἐπιφανεύς [Epiphanienſis.] Doubtleſs, Nicephorus might have been evidently inform'd, from Evagrius's own Words which he there produces, (which we have alſo quoted above,) that Evagrius had been born at Epiphania. Further, Evagrius was born in the Reign of Juſtinianus Auguſtus, on the Year of Our Lord 536, or 537, as I have demonſtrated from Evagrius's own Teſtimony, in my † Notes on Book 4. Chap. 29. of his Hiſtory. On the Year of Chriſt 540, his Parents committed him to the care of a School-Maſter, that he might learn the Letters. At which time (when Thomas Biſhop of Apamia had given notice to the Neighbouring Cities, that on a ſet Day he ſhould ſhow the enlivening Wood of the Croſs, which was kept at Apamia;) Evagrius was lead to that City by his Parents, and with his own Eyes ſaw that Miracle, which was then perform'd in the Church; as himſelf atteſts

† He was Biſhop of Cyrus; and ſet about writing an Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory (which Valeſius has publiſh'd with the other Greek Hiſtorians of the Church) towards the latter end of Theodoſius Junior's Reign, at the ſame time that Socrates and Sozomen wrote theirs. He beganwhere they did, (to wit, from thoſe times whereat Euſebius cloſed his Hiſtory;) and ended with them; viz. at the latter end of Theodoſius Junior's Empire. 'Tis more than probable, that he wrote after Socrates and Sozomen. For (1) all the Ancients were of this Opinion. (2) He that reads his Hiſtory, will find it nothing elſe but a Supplement of Socrates and Sozomen their Hiſtories. (3) Theodoret himſelf, in the firſt Chapter of the firſt Book of his Hiſtory, ſays theſe Words: τῆς Ἐκκλησιαστικῆς Ἱστείας τὰ λειπόμενα συγγράψαι πρόσομαι, I will attempt to commit to writing the Remains of Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory. (4) Laſtly, He publiſhed his Hiſtory after the Year of Chriſt 448. (as Valeſius demonſtrates in his Preface before his Hiſtory;) whereas Socrates and Sozomen had finiſhed their Hiſtories on the Seventeenth Conſulate of Theodoſius Jun. that is, in the Year of Chriſt 439. He is moſt particular in his Account of the Affairs of the Eaſtern Church, in regard he liv'd there. His Books of Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory are but five in number (as he himſelf intimates at the cloſe of his fifth Book;) wherein he comprehends the Affairs tranſacted in the Church, during the ſpace of 105 Years.

† See Evagrius's Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory, Book 4. chap. 29. Note (f.)

teſts in his Fourth Book, Chap. 26. Now, this hapned on the Year of Chriſt 540; when the Perſians, having made an irruption into Syria, had burnt Antioch: which was done in Juſtinus Junior's Conſulate, as we are informed by Marcellinus Comes, and Marius in his Chronicon. Two years after this, when † The Lues Inguinaria began to rage in the Eaſt, Evagrius was as yet under a School-Maſter, learning the Letters, and was ſeiz'd by that Peſtilence, as he himſelf atteſts, Book 4. chap 29. Having afterwards left the Schools of the Grammarians, he betook himſelf to the Study of Rhetorick. And when he had made a great proficiency in that Art, he was regiſtred * amongſt the company of Advocates. Whence he got the Appellation of Scholaſticus: which term ſignifies a Lawyer, as Macarius informs us in his fifteenth Homily, in theſe Words: † He that deſires to have a knowledge in Forenſian Caſes, goes and learns the Notes [Letters, or, Abbreviatures.] And when he has been the firſt there, he goes to the School of the Romans, where he is the laſt of all. Again, when he comes to be the firſt there, he goes away to the School of the Pragmatici [or, Practicants] where he is again the laſt of all, and Arcarius [or, Novice.] Then, when he is made a Scholaſticus, he is Novice, and the laſt of all the Lawyers. Again, when he comes to be the firſt there, then he is made a Preſident [or Governour of a Province.] And when he is made a Governour, He takes to himſelf an Aſſiſtant [Councellor] or Aſſeſſor. In Macarius's Greek Text, I have mended it thus, ὁ θέλων μαθεῖν πραγμάτα, he that deſires to have a knowledge in Forenſian Caſes; not as 'tis in the common reading, ὁ θέλων μαθεῖν γράμματα, he that deſires to have a knowledge in Letters. Further, in what City Evagrius practiſed the Law, 'tis uncertain. Notwithſtanding, my conjecture is, that he pleaded Cauſes at Antioch: in which City there were three Fora [that is Courts of Judicature] or Tribunals; and as many Schools of Advocates, as I have obſerv'd from Libanius, in my Notes on Evagrius, Book 1. * chap. 18. 'Tis certain, he could not be an Advocate at Epiphania, (which, as we have declared already, was the place of his Nativity;) in regard that City had no Judiciary Forum, but brought its Cauſes to Apamia, in which City the Conſularis of Syria Secunda held a Court of Judicature. But, for my believing Evagrius to have been an Advocate at Antioch, rather than at Apamia, this is my chief Reaſon; becauſe he was moſtly converſant in that City, where he married a Wife alſo, and begat Sons of her. He married a Daughter likewiſe in that City, as himſelf atteſts in his Fourth Book, chap. 29. And after ſhe, together with her Son, had ended her Life by the Peſtilential diſeaſe, on the 10*th* year of Mauricius; Evagrius, depriv'd of his Wife and Children, remarried, and took to Wife a young Virgin in that City, as he relates *B.6. ch.*8. Where he atteſts alſo, that the whole City kept holiday on that account, and celebrated a publick Feſtivity, * both in Pompous Shows, and alſo about his marriage-bed. Whence 'tis by the way apparent, how great his authority was at Antioch. Moreover, he wrote his Hiſtory at Antioch, as may be Collected from the twentieth * chapter of his Firſt Book. Where ſpeaking concerning the Empreſs Eudocia's Jeruſalem-journey, he ſays, ſhe came to Antioch: ἡ χρόνοις ὕστερον ὅτε τὴν ἀγίαν ἐπεφοίτα Χριστοῦ τοῦ Θεοῦ ἡμῶν πόλιν, ἐνταῦθα πε γίνεται, that is, a long time afterwards, in her journey which ſhe made to the Holy City of Chriſt our God, ſhe [Eudocia] comes hither, (to wit, to Antioch.) Evagrius therefore liv'd at Antioch when he wrote this Hiſtory. Hence 'tis that Evagrius is ſo diligent in recounting the Works and Publick Edifices of the City Antioch; as may be ſeen in his Firſt Book, chap. 18, and in his Third Book, chap. 28. At which places he does not obſcurely intimate, that he liv'd at Antioch, whileſt he wrote theſe things. Hence 'tis alſo, that he mentions with ſo much care and diligence, the Earth quakes, wherewith Antioch was now and then ſhaken: and that in the Notation of the times he always makes uſe of the Antiochian Years. Laſtly, this may be Collected from the ſeventh chapter of his Sixth Book, where he relates, that Gregorius Patriarch of Antioch (having been accuſed of Inceſt, before Johannes, Comes of the Eaſt, by a Silver-ſmith,) appealed to the Emperor, and to a Synod. And when he went to Conſtantinople, in order to the proſecution of his his Cauſe before the Emperor and Synod, he took Evagrius along with him, as his Aſſeſſor and Councellor, that he might make uſe of his advice. By which Words Evagrius does plainly enough declare himſelf to have been an Advocate and a Lawyer. For Aſſeſſors were wont to be taken out of their Body, as well by the Civil as Military Magiſtrates. Nor was Evagrius Councellor to Gregorius in this criminal Affair only, but in other Cauſes alſo. For in regard Gregorius was Patriarch of the Oriential Church, and * could not but have the Examination of many Cauſes every Day, he muſt neceſſarily ſtand in need of ſome Aſſeſſor, who might ſuggeſt to him the Forms of Right and of the Laws. Indeed, Evagrius's Words do fully declare what I have ſaid. For he ſaith; † Περὶ τούτων μοὶ ἓν ἐμοῦ παρεδρεύοντος καὶ παρόντος γε αὐτῷ, κατὰ τὴν βασιλέως ἔφοδον, τῶν ἀπολογίαν ὑφέξων, Having me therefore his Aſſeſſor and Companion, he went to the Emperor's [City, Conſtantinople,] in order to the making his defence againſt theſe [Accuſations.] But let the Studious determine concerning this Matter, according to their own arbitrement. 'Tis ſufficient for me, to have propoſed my Conjecture to the Readers. Further, the ſame Gregorius made uſe of Evagrius's Judgment, not only in Judiciary proceedings, but in writing Letters alſo, and Relations, which he now and then ſent to the Emperor; in his Sermons likewiſe and Orations; as Evagrius atteſts at the * cloſe of his Hiſtory. Which † Volume when Evagrius had publiſhed, not not without the consent of Gregorius the Patriarch, in the Reign of Tiberius Constantinus; he had the Dignity of a Quæstorius bestow'd upon him by the same Emperor. And not long after, when he had made an Oration concerning the Praises of Mauricius Augustus, on account of the Birth of the most noble Child Theodosius, he receiv'd the Codicills of a Præfecture from the same Mauricius; as he himself attests at the close of his History. Evagrius's Words there are thus translated by Christophorson: Pro quibus duos honoris gradus consecuti sumus: Quæsturam à Tiberio Constantino, & munus Tabularum servandarum, in quibus Præfectorum nomina inscribebantur, à Mauricio Tiberio: For which we have obtained two Degrees of Honour: A Quæsture of Tiberius Constantinus, and the Office of keeping the Tables, wherein the Names of the Præfects were inscribed, of Mauricius Tiberius. Which ill Rendition deceived Gerardus Vossius and Philippus Labbæus. For Vossius (in his * Book de Historicis Græcis,) treading in Christophorson's steps, says thus: Pro duobus autem hisce Libris ait gemino se honore esse affectum. Nam à Tiberio Constantino Quæsturâ fuisse ornatum: Sed à Mauricio consecutum esse, ut Tabulis publicis præesset: Now, for these two Books, he says, he had a double Honour conferred on himself. For he was honoured [as he saith] with a Quæsture by Tiberius Constantinus: And, that he obtained of Mauricius, the having the charge of the publick Tables. But Philippus Labbæus (in his Dissertation de Scriptoribus Ecclesiasticis,) hath † interpolated Christophorson's Version after this manner: Seque duos honoris gradus ait consecutum: & primùm à Tiberio Constantino ad Quæsturam evectum; tum à Mauricio munus adeptum servandarum Tabularum, in quibus non tàm nomina, quàm ipsa Præfectorum acta inscribebantur: And he says that he himself obtained two Degrees of Honour: And in the first place, that he was preferred to a Quæsture by Tiberius Constantinus; and secondly, That he procured of Mauricius the Office of keeping the publick Tables, wherein not only the Names, but the Acts of the Præfects were inscrib'd. Musculus has done much better, who hath render'd the Passage in Evagrius thus: Quarum etiam Gratiâ duas dignitates sumus consecuti: à Tiberio Constantino Quæstoratum largiente, Mauricio verò Tiberio Literas Hyparchicas mittente, on account of which [Volume of Relations, Letters, &c.] we have obtained two Dignities: [one] from Tiberius Constantinus, who gave us a Quæstorate; and [another] from Mauricius Tiberius, who sent us his Hyparchicall Letters. He would have said, The Codicills of a Præfecture, which the Latines term * Letters also, as I have long since observ'd in my Notes on Ammianus Marcellinus. Hence 'tis, that in the Title of his History, Evagrius terms himself ἀπὸ ἐπάρχων, [one] of the Ex-Præfects, because he had been rewarded with the Codicills of an honorary Præfecture by the Emperour. After this, the same Evagrius published Six Books of Ecclesiastick History, beginning from those times wherein Theodoret and Socrates had closed their Histories; that is, from the Ephesine Synod, wherein Nestorius was condemned and deposed: to wit, from the Year of Christ 431. And he has continued his History to the twelfth Year of the Emperor Mauricius, which was the Year of our Lord 594. In his Third Book, at Chap. 33, speaking concerning Severus Bishop of Antioch, he says that at such time as he wrote these Things it was the Six hundredth forty first year of the Antiochians. In regard therefore the Antiochian-Hera precedes that of our Saviour's Nativity forty eight Years; if from the number 641 we substract 48 Years, it will be the Year of Christ 594. The same may also be Collected from Book 4. Chap. 29. where Evagrius writes, that whilest he penned this History, that Plague in the Groyne, which had almost wholly destroy'd the whole World, had already rag'd two and fifty Years. Now, this Plague began to rage two Years after Antioch had been taken by the Persians, that is, in the Year of Christ 542. To which number of Years if you add 52, it will be made the Year of Christ 594. Further, Evagrius's diligence is chiefly to be commended, because, undertaking to write an Ecclesiastick History, he made a Collection of whatever was pertinent to that Subject, out of the best Writers, to wit, Priscus, Johannes, Zacharias, Eustathius, and Procopius [who were all] Rhetoricians. His Style likewise is not to be found fault with. For it has as a Beauty and Elegancy; as Photius does also attest. But the chief thing commendable in Evagrius is, that of all the Greek Writers of Ecclesiastick History, he is the only Person, who has kept the Doctrine of the true Faith intire and undefiled; as (after Photius) Baronius has observ'd in his Annals. Notwithstanding, he deserves Reproof for this, viz. because he has not used so much diligence in searching out the Monuments of Ecclesiastick Antiquity, as in reading Profane Writers. Indeed, almost the whole Sixth Book is spent in a Narrative of the Persian War. Besides, his Style in many places is Redundant and Luxuriant, as Photius has truly remark'd in his Bibliotheca. An Instance of which superfluity of Expression you have in Book 1. Chap. 2. where he speaks concerning Nestorius after this manner: Ἡ θεομαχῶσα γλῶσσα, τὸ καϊάφα δεύτερον συνέδριον, &c. that Tongue full of Hostility against God, that second Sanhedrim of Caiphas, &c. and, in Book 2. Chap. 3. where he describes S^t Euphemia's Church, which was at Chalcedon: The same redundancy of Style, the Studious Reader will of himself easily observe, in many other places.

Moreover, R. Stephens was the first Person that Printed Evagrius's History in Greek, from one only Manuscript Copy belonging to the Kings Library, which Manuscript is very new, and not extraordinary good. For in many places 'tis defective and imperfect. But we have mended and perfected Evagrius's History in so many places, from two Manuscript Copies of the best note, that it may seem now to have been first publish'd. The first of the Copies was the Florent. Manuscript, [taken] out of S^t Laurence's Library, which the most famous Michael Erminius compared with the Geneva Edition, and sent me the Various Readings written out with his own Hand. On which account I profess my self very much obliged to him. This Manuscript is the best and ancientest of all the Copies of Evagrius. For 'tis written in Parchment, [and was transcribed] about five hundred Years since more or less, as I have been inform'd by one that saw it, viz. Emericus Bigotius, an excellent Scholar, and a Person who has deserved well of Learning: By whose Favour and Intervention I receiv'd the fore-mention'd Various Readings, sent by the most famous Michael Erminius. In the same Florentine Manuscript, some not unlearned Scholia were written in the Margin, which we have put into our Annotations, in their due places. But, the Reader is to take notice, that in this Florentine Manuscript is contain'd Socrates Scholasticus's History also, the various Readings whereof the same Erminius sent me long since, written out with his own Hand; as I have attested above four Years since, in that Preface I prefixt before my Edition of Socrates and Sozomen. The second Manuscript Copy was taken out of the Library of that most Illustrious Prelate Dionysius Tellerius, Arch-Bishop of Rheims: This is no very ancient Copy; but 'tis a good One, and transcrib'd by the Hand of a Learned Man. This Copy was of great use to us in many places, as we have now and then shewn in our Annotations.

THE FIRST BOOK OF THE Ecclesiastical History OF EVAGRIUS SCHOLASTICUS Epiphanensis, And [one] of the EX-PRÆFECTS.

The Writers Preface [wherein he declares] on what account he betook himself to the Writing of this present History.

EUSEBIUS Surnamed PAMPHILUS, a Person both eminently Eloquent as to other things, and so powerful in his Writings also, that by his Perswasives he might be able (if not to render them (a) perfectly Orthodox, yet) to prevail upon his Readers so far as to embrace our [Sentiments:] Eusebius surnamed Pamphilus [I say,] Sozomen, Theodoret, and Socrates, in the best and most accurate manner have set forth in Writing, both the Advent of [our] Compassionate God amongst us, and his Ascent into the Heavens; and also those things which the Divine Apostles, and other Martyrs have couragiously performed in their Combats [in defence of the Faith;] Moreover, whatever else hath been transacted by those of our Religion, whether praise-worthy, or otherwise, till some (b) part of the Emperor Theodosius's Reign. But, in regard no Person hath hitherto given an orderly Narrative of the Transactions that hapned afterwards, which [notwithstanding] are not much inferior to them; I have resolved (though I am but little versed in such things,) to undertake this Work, and to compile an History of those Affairs; being very confident, that by his assistance, who infused Wisdom into Fishermen, and made the Tongue of a Brute utter an articulate Voice; I shall raise Affairs already buried in Oblivion, give Life to them by my Discourse, and render them immortal by an [eternal] Commemoration: to the end that every one of my Readers may know, what [has been done,] when, where, how, against whom, and by whom Affairs have been transacted, until our own times: And [to the end that] nothing worthy to be remembred, may lie concealed by a remiss and dissolute Sloth, and (which is its next Neighbour,) Oblivion. Divine Assistance therefore being my Guide, I will begin, where the Authors I have already mentioned, closed their History.

(a) I like not Christophorson's Version, who has rendred Ἀλαν ἀκειδεῖς, Perfectè Christianos, perfectly Christians. I would rather render it perfectly Orthodox. For the followers of true opinions are properly termed ἀκειδεῖς. Photius (in his Bibliotheca) speaks thus concerning Socrates Scholasticus, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐν τοῖς δόγμασιν ὑ λίαν ἐστὶν ἀκειδής. Moreover in his Sentiments he is not very Orthodox. The meaning of this place therefore, is this: Eusebius (although he be very fit to perswade his Readers to embrace the Christian Religion, yet) is not able to make them very accurate in the Doctrine of the Christian Faith, in regard he himself seems to have inclined towards the opinion of the Arians. For, this was the Sentiment of many Persons concerning Eusebius Pamphilus; whom I have sufficiently answered, in the Preface I have written to the same Eusebius's Ecclesiastick History. Vales.

(b) The Word [μέρος, part] is wanting in the Kings, in the Florentine, and in the Tellerian M. SS. nor is it in Robert Stephens's Edition. The Geneva-Printers were the first that put in this Word, from Christophorson's Copy, the Various Readings whereof are extant at the end of the Cologn-Edition. Christophorson has expressed this Word in his Version. For thus he renders it: Ad aliquam partem Regni Theodosii, to some part of Theodosius's Reign. But it seems more elegant to me, to suppress, rather than add this Word. If a Word must be added, I had rather add χρόνου, time. Vales.

CHAP. I.

That, after the Destruction of the impious Julian, when the Heresies had been a little quieted, * the Devil afterwards disturbed the Faith again.

* Or, the wicked Devil.

WHen the impiety of Julian had now been drowned in the blood of the Martyrs, and Arius's madness bound in the Fetters made at Nicæa; and when Eunomius and Macedonius, (a) driven away by the Holy Spirit [as it were

(a) Ἐκβαθέντων, Christophorson and Sir Henry Savil have mended it thus, ἐκβιαθέντων, compelled, or, rejected by force. But, that reading it much better, which the Florentine and Tellerian MSS. give us, to wit, ἐκβεβαθέντων, driven away —— as it were by an impetuous wind. 'Tis a Metaphor taken from Shipwrack'd Persons who are driven away by the violence of a Storm. Evagrius compares the Holy Spirit to a wind, by the force whereof Eunomius and Macedonius being driven away, were at length Shipwrack'd at Constantinople, to wit, condemn'd in the Constantinopolitan Synods. Vales.

by an impetuous wind,] had been ſhipwrack'd about the Boſphorus, and at the ſacred City Conſtantinople: when the Holy Church having laid aſide her late filth, and recovering *her priſtine beauty and gracefulneſs, was cloathed † in a veſture of gold wrought about with divers colours, and made fit for her Lover and [Celeſtial] Bridegroom: the Devil, Virtue's enemy, unable to bear this, raiſes a new and ‖ unuſual kind of war againſt us; contemning the worſhip of Idols, which now lay trampled under foot, and abandoning Arius's ſervile madneſs. He was indeed afraid of making an attack againſt [our] Faith, [openly] as an enemy, in regard it was fortified by ſo many and ſuch eminent Holy Fathers; and [becauſe] he had loſt many of his Forces in the Siege thereof. But he atttempts this buſineſs in ſuch a method [rather] as thieves make uſe of, by inventing certain Queſtions and Anſwers, whereby he in a new manner *perverted the erroneous to Judaiſm; the Wretch being inſenſible that he ſhould be foil'd † even this way. For, that one (b) term, which before he had made the ſharpeſt reſiſtance againſt, he now admires and embraces: rejoycing mightily (tho' he could not wholly *vanquiſh us, yet) that he was able to adulterate even but one word. Having therefore many times (c) wound up himſelf within his own malice, he (d) invented the change of one letter, which might indeed †lead to one and the ſame ſenſe, but notwithſtanding would ſeparate the underſtanding from the tongue; leſt with both they ſhould confeſs and glorifie God in a concordant and agreeable manner. Further, in what manner each of theſe things was perform'd, and what concluſion they had, I will declare in their due places and times. Whereto I will likewiſe add whatever elſe I could find worthy to be related, altho' it may ſeem foreign to my ſubject; [reſolving] (e) to cloſe my Hiſtory where it ſhall ſeem good to the compaſſionate and propitious Deity.

† See the Septuagint Verſion, at Pſalm 45. verſ. 9.

‖ Or, monſtrous.

* Or, reduced.

†Or, even frombence.

(b) He means the term Homöouſios, [that is, Co eſſential.] For the malignant Devil made his chiefeſt reſiſtance againſt this word, in regard it was the Beeſom as it were of all Hereſies, and the firmeſt fortreſs of the true Faith. Valeſ.

* Or, remove.

* Or, draw.

(c) Ἰλυσπῶμενος; a term uſed to denote the manner how a ſerpent moves; which is incomparably well expreſt by Virgil, in theſe words,

——— Sinuatque immenſa volumine terga,
And he winds up his vaſt Back in a Roll, or, Volume.

(d) Inſtead of [ἐπέχνωσε] I had rather make it [ἐτέχνασε;] as it is in the Tellerian MS. Further, 'tis very intricate, what word Evagrius ſhould mean here. The term Homoiöuſios, [that is, of like ſubſtance, or, eſſence] might indeed be meant. But, becauſe in this word there is an addition (rather than a change) of one Letter, [to wit, of the Letter I;] therefore the Præpoſitions [ἐξ, and ἐν,] that is, [of, and in] are rather to be meant: which Præpoſitions raiſed great Stirs and Commotions in the Church, on account of the Eutychian Hereſie; ſome affirming that Chriſt was to be adored, [as ſubſiſting] of two natures, others, [as ſubſiſting] in two natures. Valeſ.

(e) This place wants not difficulty. Muſculus renders it thus: Ubi abſolutam hanc hiſtoriam benigno Deo commendavero, Where I ſhall have commended this compleated Hiſtory to the benign God. But this rendition is not to be born with: Therefore Chriſtophorſon has tranſlated it otherwiſe, to wit, after this manner: Ibique finem ſcribendi faciam, ubi Deo clementi ac propitio viſum fuerit, And there I will make an end of writing, where it ſhall ſeem good to the mild and propitious God. But, neither does this tranſlation fully ſatisfie me: For, firſt, Evagrius ſays not, ἀποθησόμεθα, in the future tenſe, but ἀποτιθέμεθα, in the preſent tenſe. Secondly, I do not remember that I ever read this phraſe [ἀποτίθεσθαι τῷ ἱστορίᾳ] in ſuch a ſenſe as to import, to finiſh an Hiſtory. Ἀποτίθεσθαι ſignifies properly recondere, to lay up: whence ἀποθήκη imports a repoſitory, or, ſtore-cellar for Wines. It ſignifies alſo to lay on the ground, or, depoſite in a monument. Heſychius in his Lexicon renders ἀπόθετος by ὁ κείμενος, he who lieth. The ſame Heſychius ſays ἀποτίθεσθαι does ſignifie ἐκτίθεσθαι, to expoſe, or, ſet forth. Which ſignification is contrary to the former. For, to hide, and to ſet forth, or, promulge, are contrary the one to the other. I had rather therefore render this paſſage of Evagrius thus, Hiſtoriam editurus, quando clementi placuerit Deo, [and] ſhall put forth my Hiſtory, when it ſhall pleaſe the gracious God. Notwithſtanding, if any one ſhall prefer Chriſtophorſon's Verſion, I will not much reſiſt it. 'Tis certain, Evagrius (in the ſeventh Chapter of his firſt Book) uſes theſe words, τὸν βίον ἀπέθετο, ſo as to ſignifie, he ended his life. Nevertheleſs, in the thirteenth Chapter of this Book, Evagrius uſes this word in this ſenſe, viz. to relate, or, ſet forth. For thus he ſays, γέγραφε δὲ καὶ λογίως ἀπέθετο καὶ θεοδώρητος, &c. Moreover, Theodoret alſo wrote, and elegantly ſet forth, [or, related,] &c. And in the 11th Chapter of this Book, ἀπετέθη is uſed in the ſame ſenſe, inſtead of ἐξετέθη, he ſet forth. Alſo in the beginning of his ſecond Book, Evagrius uſes ἀποθώμεθα, inſtead of ἀνθώμεθα, we will ſet forth. Valeſ.

CHAP. II.

How Neſtorius was detected by his Diſciple Anaſtaſius, who in his Sermon, term'd the Holy Mother of God, not * Theotocos, but † Chriſtotocos: for which reaſon [Neſtorius] was pronounced an Heretick.

* That is, the Woman who bore God.

† That is, the Woman who bore Chriſt.

FOr as much as Neſtorius (that tongue full of hoſtility againſt God, that ſecond Sanhedrim of Caïphas; that ſhop of blaſphemy, wherein Chriſt is again (a) bargain'd for, and ſold; his natures being divided and torn in ſunder, of whom not one bone had been broken on the very Croſs it ſelf, according as it is written; nor had his woven-coat in any wiſe been rent by the murderers of God) has rejected and abandon'd the term Theotocos, ([a word] long ſince framed by many of the [moſt] approv'd Fathers by [the inſpiration of] the Holy Spirit:) and, inſtead thereof, has coin'd and form'd [the term] Chriſtotocos, an adulterate coin [as it were,] ſtamp'd by himſelf: and has refilled the Church with innumerable wars, making an inundation of civil blood therein: I ſhall not, I ſuppoſe, want matter agreeable and fit for the compoſure of an Hiſtory, nor [ſhall I deſpair] of bringing it to a concluſion, if (by the cooperation of Chriſt, who is God above all) I ſhall begin from the blaſphemy of the impious Neſtorius. Now, the war of the Churches had its original from hence. [There was] one (b) Anaſtaſius a Presbyter, (a perſon of a very unſound opinion, an ardent lover of Neſtorius and his Jewiſh ſentiments) who had accompanied Neſtorius in the journey he made in order to [his entring upon] the Biſhoprick [of Conſtantinople.] In which journey (having had a conference with Theodorus at Mopſueſtia, and heard his opinions,) in quâ Chriſtus denuò trucidatur & divenditur, inſtruxit; who furniſhed up a ſhop of Blaſphemy, wherein Chriſt is again killed and ſold. Neither of them have rendred it well: For, neither is this expreſſion [to be called to judgment] agreeable to a ſhop; nor is there any ſuch Greek word as συμφωνεῖται. I wonder at Sir Henry Savil, who ſet this moſt ridiculous emendation of Chriſtophorſon's, at the margin of his Copy. It ſhould have been rendred thus, That ſhop of Blaſphemy, wherein Chriſt is again bargain'd for, and ſold at a price. For σύμφωνω ſignifies properly, I make a bargain; and σύμφωνον is a bargain, or, agreement; as it is in the old Gloſſes. Which term occurs frequently in the Books of the Greek Lawyers. Valeſ.

(a) Συμφωνεῖται. 'Tis ſtrange that both Tranſlators have err'd in their Verſions of this place. For, Muſculus renders it thus: officinæ blaſphemiæ, in quâ rurſus adjudicium vocatur & venditur Chriſtus, That ſhop of blaſphemy, wherein Chriſt is again called to judgment, and ſold. Chriſtophorſon tranſlates it after this manner: Qui blaſphemiæ officinam, in quâ Chriſtus denuò trucidatur & divenditur, inſtruxit; who furniſhed up a ſhop of Blaſphemy, wherein Chriſt is again killed and ſold.

(b) This Anaſtaſius was Syncellus to Neſtorius Biſhop of Conſtantinople. Which is atteſted by Theophanes in his Chronicon, and by Anaſtaſius Bibliothecarius. For the Patriarchs had their Syncelli (that is, thoſe that kept in the ſame Cell with them, or thoſe that dwelt with them) whom they choſe out of the Order of Presbyters. So, in the Epiſtle of the Conſtantinopolitan Synod to Hormiſda Biſhop of Rome, about the Election of Epiphanius Patriarch of Conſtantinople: which Epiſtle Baronius records at the year of Chriſt 520. Amongſt the Legates ſent from the Synod, is named Heraclianus Presbyter of the Greater Church, and Co-habitator, [that is, the perſon who dwelt with him] to Epiphanius the Patriarch. Epiphanius himſelf alſo had formerly been Presbyter and Syncellus to John, Patriarch of Conſtantinople, as Dioſcorus atteſts in his Epiſtle to Pope Hormiſda. Laſtly, John had alſo been Presbyter and Syncellus to Timothy, Patriarch of Conſtantinople; as Victor Tunonenſis informs us in his Chronicon, in theſe words: Agapeto V. C. Coſ. Timotheus C. P. Epiſcopus, Obtrectator Synodi Chalcedonenſis, quinto die Aprilis occubuit, & Johannes Cappadox in cellâ propriâ atque Presbytero Epiſcopatum tradidit; [on my peril, mend it thus, & Johanni Cappadoci Syncello proprio atque Presbytero Presbytero Episcopatum tradidit; there is nothing more certain than this emendation:] that is, in the Consulate of the most famous Agapetus Timothy Bishop of Constantinople, the Reviler of the Chalcedon Synod died on the first of April, and delivered the Bishoprick to John the Cappadocian, his own Syncellus and Presbyter. The Syncelli were chosen also out of the Order of Deacons. So, in the third Action of the Chalcedon Synod, one Agorastius a Deacon, is term'd Syncellus to Dioscorus Bishop of Alexandria. Lastly, in Eunodius there is a Precept extant, whereby all Bishops are order'd to have their Cellulani, [that is, Chamber-fellows, or Persons that were to keep in the same Cell with them.] Which Precept runs thus: Nullum ergo sacerdotem antiquis & modernis legibus obsequentem, &c. Our Will is, that no Priest who is obedient to the ancient and modern Laws, and none of the Levites shall reside in any place without a Person well approved of. And if the slenderness of any Person's Estate shall not permit him to have a Companion, he himself shall become Cell-fellow to another. The Patriarchs therefore were not the only Persons who had their Syncelli. 'Tis certain, Stephanus is recorded to have been Syncellus to Syncleticus Bishop of Tarsus, by Ephremius, in Photius. Vales. See Meursius's Glossary, in the word Σύγκελλος.

was perverted from piety, as (c) Theodulus has related, treating hereof in one of his Epistles. [This Anastasius,] in a Sermon he preach'd to the people that lov'd Christ, in the Church of Constantinople, was so audacious as openly and plainly to speak [these words;] Let no person term Mary Theoticos; for Mary was a woman: but, 'tis impossible for God to be born of a woman. The people that loved Christ being highly offended at the hearing hereof, and [supposing,] not without reason, that this expression open'd a way to blasphemy; Nestorius, the Author of this blasphemy, did not only not curb [Anastasius,] nor undertake the patronage of such Sentiments as were orthodox and true: but also, openly and manifestly added strength to what Anastasius had said, and pertinaciously maintain'd disputes about these [points.] And sometimes he would insert and intermix his own opinions; and by belching forth the poyson of his own mind, attempted to teach such [doctrines] as were far more blasphemous. In so much that, to his own destruction, he utter'd these words, I cannot term him God, who was two months and three months old; as 'tis plainly related by Socrates in his account hereof, and [in the Acts] of the former Ephesine Synod.

(c) I have found no mention of this Theodulus any where else. For, whereas Nicephorus names him at Book 14. ch. 32. that mention of him is borrowed from our Evagrius. Notwithstanding, this person seems to have been that Theodulus a Presbyter in Cœle-Syria, who in the reign of Zeno Augustus wrote many things; as 'tis attested by Gennadius Massilienſis, and by Marcellinus Comes, in his Chronicon. Vales.

CHAP. III.

What Cyrillus the Great wrote to Nestorius, and how the third Synod at Ephesus was convened, to which Johannes [Bishop] of Antioch and Theodoret came late.

WHich [assertions] when Cyrillus Bishop of Alexandria, [a Prelate] of famous memory, had reproved by his own Letters; and Nestorius had defended them in his answers thereto; (a) nor could be prevail'd upon, either by those [Letters] written [to him] by Cyrillus, or them [sent him] by Celestinus Bishop of the Senior Rome; but fearlessly vomited forth his own poyson against the whole Church: [Cyrillus,] (for which he had just cause,) made his request to Theodosius Junior, who at that time sway'd the Scepter of the Eastern Empire, that by his order the first Synod at Ephesus might be convened. The (b) Imperial Letters [therefore] were dispatch'd away, both to Cyrillus, and also to the [Bishops that] presided over the Holy Churches in all places. [Theodosius] appointed the day of the Synod's Convention to be on the *day of the Holy Pentecost; whereon the life-giving Spirit [of God] descended (c) upon us. Nestorius, in regard Ephesus is not far distant from Constantinople, came thither first. Also Cyrillus and the [Bishops] about him arriv'd before the day appointed. But Johannes Bishop of Antioch, together with the [Bishops] about him, was absent at the set day; not willingly, ((d) as it seems to many persons, from the Apology he made [in excuse for his not coming at the time appointed;]) but because he could not gather together the Bishops of his Province sooner. For the Cities [belonging to] the Bishops [under him,] are twelve days journey distant from that City (heretofore called Antioch, but now) term'd Theopolis, to a man that is an expedite and nimble Traveller; but, to others [who are not so good at travelling] they are more [than twelve days journey distant.] And Ephesus is at least thirty days journey distant from Antioch. Wherefore [Johannes] affirmed, that he could in no wise meet at the appointed day, [if he should set out] when the Bishops, whom he had about him, had celebrated that termed the (e) New Sunday within their own Sees.

* In the year of Christ 431. see Dr. Beveredge's Annot. in Can. Concil. Epbes p. 103.

(a) We have perfected this place from the incomparable Florentine MS. by adding some words, which had been unhappily omitted by Transcribers. For, whereas in Robert Stephens's Edition, this clause is worded thus; καὶ οὐδὲ τοῖς Κυείλῳ, οὐδὲ τοῖς Καλεστίνῳ τῆς πρεσβυτέρας ῥώμης ἐπισκόποις ἐπείθετο: we have alter'd it after this manner: καὶ οὐδὲ τοῖς Κυείλῳ, οὐδὲ τοῖς Κελεστίνῳ τῷ τῆς πρεσβυτέρας ῥώμης ἐπισκόπῳ γεγραφέσιν ἐπείθετο; nor could be prevailed upon, either by those [Letters] written [to him] by Cyrillus, or them [sent him] by Celestinus Bishop of the Senior Rome. Which I therefore thought good to give an Advertisement of, that the Readers might know, that we have neither added nor diminished any thing, except by the authority of that most incomparable Manuscript. Besides, the Tellerian Manuscript agrees with the Florentine Copy. Vales.

(b) There is extant an Epistle of Theodosius Junior's, which they commonly called Sacra. For so Theodosius himself terms it, in his Epistle to the Ephesine Synod. In the Latine Version of this Epistle the title is worded thus: Sacra Imperatoria, missa Alexandriam ad Cyrillum Episcopum & Episcopos Metropolitanos ejus Regionis. But the Greek words have a different import; they run thus: Θεῖον γράμμα ἀπεσταλὲν ἐν ἀλεξανδρείᾳ κυείλῳ ἐπισκόπῳ, καὶ τοῖς κατὰ χώραν τῆς μητροπόλεων ἐπισκόποις; that is, the Sacred Letters sent to Alexandria to Cyrillus, and to the Metropolitane Bishops every where: for κατὰ χώραν has the same import with καθ' ἑκάστην χώραν, in every Region. And this is confirm'd by Theodosius himself in the same Epistle, where he says, that by the same Copy he wrote πρὸς τοὺς ἁπανταχοῦ τῆς μητροπόλεων ἐπισκόπους, to the Bishops of Metropolis's every where. But instead hereof, our Evagrius words it thus: γραμμάτων Βασιλικῶν, &c. The Imperial Letters [therefore] were dispatch'd away, both to Cyrillus, and also to the [Bishops that] presided over the Holy Churches in all places. Vales.

(c) The term [ἡμῖν, upon us] displeased Nicephorus. Therefore instead thereof he substituted these words [τοῖς ἱεροῖς ἀποστόλοις, on the holy Apostles.] But, this emendation was needless: for the term [ἡ ἵν, upon us] is at this place put for the Church of God, which at that time resided in the Apostles. Indeed, the Holy Spirit had descended on Mary before, at such time as she conceived the Son of God: and afterwards upon Christ, when he had been baptized in Jordan. Which happened to them by a special priviledge. But the Holy Spirit descended first on the day of Pentecost upon the Church of God by the Apostles; for the Apostles deliver'd the same Spirit (which they then receiv'd,) afterwards to their Successors, by imposition of Hands. Vales.

(d) Ὡς πολλοῖς ἀπολογήμενος δοκεῖ. Nicephorus, instead of the word [δοκεῖ, as it seems] uses [ἔλεγε, he said.] But Christophorson read thus; ὡς πολλοῖς ἀπολογεμένοις δοκεῖ. For he renders this place after this manner: Johannes Præsul Antiochiæ, &c. John Bishop of Antioch, together with his [Bishops,] was absent at the day appointed; not willingly indeed, as it seems to many persons, who have a mind to defend this fact of his. Notwithstanding, I cannot approve of this emendation; altho' Sir Henry Savil hath set it at the margin of his Copy. Musculus renders this place thus: Verùm præter animi sui sententiam, sicut & multis moram illam excusans, ostendit, But contrary to his own mind, as he has also demonstrated to many persons, in his excusing that delay. But I am of opinion, that no alteration is to be made here, and do render the place thus: But Johannes Bishop of Antioch, together with the [Bishops] about him, was absent at the set day; not willingly, as it seems to many persons from the Apology he made, &c. doubtless, there can no other sense of these words. Vales.

(e) The Greeks heretofore termed the first Sunday after Easter νέαν, or, καινὴν κυριακὴν, the New Sunday. So Gregorius Nazianzenus calls it in his nineteenth Oration, which he spake at the Funeral of his own Father Gregorius. There is extant an Oration of the same Gregorius's (to wit, his 43 Oration) upon this New Sunday: in which Oration he gives a reason, why this day should be called New Sunday. Further, the Synod in Trullo Can. 66, terms this Sunday (which we now commonly call Dominicam in Albis, the Sunday in the Albs,) καινὴν κυριακὴν, New Sunday. Vales. Mr. Smith (in his Account of the Greek Church, Church, pag. 32. Edit. Lond. 1680.) tells us, that the Greeks do ſtill term this Sunday, καινὴν & νέαν, the New Sunday: and that 'tis alſo called κυριακὴ διανεωτιμος. Meurſius ſays it ſhould be κυριακὴ διανεωτισιμος, that is, regenerating, or, renewing Sunday. See Meurſius's Gloſſary, in the word διανεωτισιμος.

CHAP. IV.

How Neſtorius was depoſed by the Synod, before the arrival of [the Biſhop of] Antioch.

WHen therefore fifteen days were paſt beyond the day prefixt, the Biſhops who had been called together for that reaſon (ſuppoſing that the Eaſtern [Biſhops] would not come at all, or if they did, that much time would be ſpent before they could be got together) [meet together in one place] (a) the divine Cyrillus adminiſtring, and the place of Cæleſtinus, who (as it has been ſaid) governed the Biſhoprick of the Elder Rome: they ſummon in Neſtorius therefore, entreating him that he would give in his anſwer to [the accuſations] brought againſt him: Who on the day before promiſed to come, if there ſhould be an occaſion for it; but [afterwards] neglected to fulfil his promiſe; and having been thrice call'd, after that he appear'd not; [whereupon] the Biſhops convened undertook the examination [of the matter.] And when Memnon Biſhop of Epheſus had reckon'd up the days which had paſſed after the ſet day, (they were in number ſixteen days;) and when the Letters of the divine Cyrillus, which had been written by him to Neſtorius, and alſo Neſtorius's [Letters] to Cyrillus had been read; moreover, when that ſacred Letter of the famous Cæleſtinus, which he ſent to the ſame Neſtorius, had been annexed: Further, when Theodotus Biſhop of Ancyra, and Acacius who preſided over the * See of Melitina, had declared thoſe blaſphemous Expreſſions, which Neſtorius had manifeſtly and openly belch'd forth at Epheſus: [laſtly,] when many ſayings of the holy and moſt approved Fathers, who have expounded the right and ſincere Faith, had been joyn'd together; and alſo, when the various Blaſphemies fooliſhly and madly utter'd by the impious Neſtorius, had been reduced into an Order: [I ſay, after all theſe things had been done] the Holy Synod pronounced ſentence [againſt Neſtorius] in theſe expreſs words: Moreover, in regard the moſt Reverend Neſtorius would neither obey our Summons, nor admit the moſt Holy and moſt Religious Biſhops ſent by Us, We have been forced to proceed to an examination of his impious expreſſions. And having found, both from his Letters and Writings which have been recited, and alſo from his own words which he hath lately ſpoken in this Metropolis, [which expreſſions of his] have been confirm'd [by the teſtimony of many perſons,] that his Sentiments and Doctrines are impious; being neceſſarily induced thereto, both by the [authority of the] Canons, and alſo by the Letter of our moſt Holy Father and Fellow-Miniſter Cæleſtinus Biſhop of the Roman Church, after many tears we have proceeded to [the pronunciation of] this ſad ſentence. Therefore, Our Lord Jeſus Chriſt, who has been blaſphemed by him, hath determined by this preſent Holy Synod, that the ſame Neſtorius is * diveſted of the Epiſcopal Dignity, and [excluded from] all manner of Sacerdotal Convention.

(a) Here, and in Robert Stephens's Edit. this paſſage is worded thus: Κυρίλλῳ τῷ θεοσεβεῖ διέποντος, καὶ τὸν κελεσίνου τόπον, τῷ ἐπισκοπὴν, ὡς ἔφημεν, τῆς πρεσβυτέρας ῥώμης φυλαττούσης; The Divine Cyrillus adminiſtring, &c. In which clauſe (as the Learned Doctor Barrow remarks, in his Treat. of the Pope's Suprem. pag. 289;) a word ſeemeth to have fallen out. Zonaras (on the 1 Can. Synod. Epheſ. Tom. 1. Edit. Bever. pag. 100.) expreſſes this paſſage more plainly, in theſe words: Περιστάντος τοὺς Ὀρθοδόξων πατέρων τὸν ἐν ἁγίοις κυρίλλου Πάπα ἀλεξανδρείας, ἐπέχοντος δὲ καὶ τὸν τόπον κελεσίνου, The Holy Cyril Pope of Alexandria preſiding over the Orthodox Fathers, and alſo holding the place of Celeſtine. And Photius thus: τὸ ῥώμης κελεσίνου ἐπλήρου τοὺς καθέδραν καὶ πρόσωπον, [Cyril] ſupplied the ſeat and the perſon of Celeſtine [Biſhop] of Rome. From which Authors 'tis plain, that Cyrillus had the diſpoſal of Celeſtine's ſingle ſuffrage, and that Pope's legal concurrence with him in his Actings in that Synod: But Cyrillus had no Authoritative Precedency from Celeſtine, becauſe the Pope could by no delegation impart that, himſelf having no title thereto, warranted by any Law, or by any Precedent; that depended on the will of the Emperors, who diſpoſed of it according as they ſaw reaſon. A notable inſtance whereof we meet with in the next Epheſine Synod (which in deſign was a General Synod, legally convened, though by ſome miſcarriages it proved abortive;) mentioned by our Evagrius in the 10th Chapter of this Book: where, tho' Julius, (or rather Julianus) Pope Leo's Legate was preſent; yet by the Emperor's Order (ſee the words of his Letter, Syn. Chalced. Act. 1. p. 59.) Dioſcorus Biſhop of Alexandria preſided. Nicephorus (Book 14. Chap. 34.) tells us, That in regard Celeſtine Biſhop of Rome could not be preſent at this Synod, by reaſon of the dangers of ſuch a voyage, he made Cyrillus his Deputy: and that from this time Cyrillus and the ſucceeding Biſhops of Alexandria challenged the name of Pope, &c. Doubtleſs Nicephorus is miſtaken herein. For, Dionyſius Alexandrinus (in his third Epiſt. to Philemon, part of which is quoted by Euſebius, Eccleſ. Hiſt. Book 7. c. 7.) mentioning Heraclas, his Predeceſſor in the Alexandrian See, ſays theſe words concerning him: τοῦτον ἐγὼ τὸν κανόνα καὶ τὸν τύπον παρὰ τοῦ μακαρίτου πάπα ἡμῶν ἡρακλᾶ παρέλαβον, I received this Rule and Canon from Heraclas our Bleſſed Pope. And Athanaſius (in his ſecond Apologetick, Tom. 1. pag. 786, Edit. Paris, 1627.) has recorded an Epiſtle written to him from Iſchyras, which has this title, Ἀθανασίῳ μακαρίτῳ πάπα, To Athanaſius the Bleſſed Pope. Therefore theſe words of Nicephorus's are (as Valeſius ſays truly in his Note here) inepta & falſiſſima, fooliſh and moſt untrue. And, that other remark of Valeſius's here, which he makes from the former part of the now cited paſſage in Nicephorus (to wit, that as well Nicephorus, as thoſe from whom he borrowed this, doubted not but the Biſhop of Rome was the Sovereign Judge of all the Churches;) is queſtionleſs no leſs fooliſh and falſe. 'Tis indeed true, that the Biſhops of Rome have ſome Centuries ſince claim'd an Authority not only of preſiding in, but alſo of indicting and convening General Councils. But, how unjuſt this Claim is, as well in reſpect of Right, as Practice, will be evident to him, who with attention and conſideration ſhall peruſe theſe Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtorians. Look back to what Socrates ſays in the Froeme to his fifth Book: σωνεχῶς καὶ τοὺς Βασιλεῖς (ſays he) τῇ ἱστορίᾳ συμπλέκομεν, &c. We do continually include the Emperors in this our Hiſtory, becauſe from ſuch time as they began to embrace the Chriſtian Religion, the affairs of the Church have depended on them; and the greateſt Synods have been, and at this preſent are convened by their determination and appointment. But, for a moſt full and compleat ſatisfaction in theſe points, viz. concerning the Biſhop of Rome's Sovereign Power to indict and preſide in General Councils: I refer the Reader to the Learned Dr. Barrow's Treatiſe of the Pope's Supremacy, pag. 274, &c.

CHAP. V.

That Johannes [Biſhop] of Antioch, coming [to Epheſus] after five days, depoſes Cyrillus [Biſhop] of Alexandria, and Memnon [Biſhop] of Epheſus; whom the Synod pronounced innocent ſoon after, and depoſed Johannes and his Party. And how, by [the interpoſition of] the Emperor Theodoſius, Cyrillus and Johannes were reconciled, and confirm'd Neſtorius's Depoſition.

AFter this moſt legal and juſt Sentence, Johannes [Biſhop] of Antioch comes to Epheſus, together with the Prelates about him, arriving [there] five days after [Neſtorius's] Depoſition. And having convened * thoſe [Biſhops] of his Party, depoſes Cyrillus and Memnon. But when Cyrillus and Memnon had preſented Libels to that Synod which had been convened with them, (although † Socrates, through ignorance, has related [this matter] otherwiſe,) Johannes is ſummoned to give an account of that Depo-

Depoſition which he had made. Who not appearing after he had been thrice call'd, Cyrillus and Memnon are abſolv'd from their Depoſition: but Johannes and the [Biſhops] of his party are ſeparated from holy Communion, and from all ſacerdotal Authority. [Further] Theodoſius at firſt approv'd not of Neſtorius's Depoſition; but having afterwards been inform'd of his Blaſphemy, when he had written very pious Letters to the Biſhops, Cyrillus and Johannes, they come to a mutual Agreement, and confirm'd Neſtorius's Depoſition.

CHAP VI.

Concerning Paulus [Biſhop] of Emiſa's journey to Alexandria, and Cyrillus's commendation [of Johannes] on account of [his] Letter.

WHen Paulus Biſhop of Emiſa was arriv'd at Alexandria, and had made a diſcourſe, which is ſtill extant, in the Church concerning this matter. At which time alſo Cyrillus, having highly commended Johannes's Letter, wrote word for word thus: † Let the Heavens rejoice, and the Earth be glad. For the partition-wall is demoliſhed, that which caused grief and ſadneſs is ceaſed, and the occaſion of all manner of diſſention is taken away; in regard Chriſt the Saviour of us all, has * reſtored peace to his own Churches; and the moſt Religious Emperors, and moſt dear to God, have invited us thereto. Who having been the moſt incomparable Emulators of their Anceſtors piety, do preſerve the true Faith firm and unſhaken in their own Minds: and they take an exquiſite care of the Holy Churches, to the end they may obtain both a far-ſpread and immortal Glory, and alſo render their Empire moſt highly renowned. To whom even the Lord of Hoſts himſelf diſtributes good things with a * plentiful hand, gives them [power] to vanquiſh their Adverſaries, and freely beſtows Victory [on them.] (a) For he cannot lie who has ſaid, As I live, ſaith the Lord, I will glorifie them who glorifie me. When therefore my Lord and moſt Religious Brother and Fellow-Miniſter Paulus was come to Alexandria, we were filled with joy, and that moſt deſervedly, in regard ſo great a Perſon [was come to be] an Interceſſor, and was willing (b) to undergo Labours above [humane] ſtrength: That he might vanquiſh the Envy of the Devil, unite Diviſions, and by removing Offences on both ſides, crown both Our and Your Churches with Concord and Peace. And after the interpoſition of ſome words, [he adds:] Moreover, that this diſſention of the Church was altogether frivolous and (c) inexcuſable, we have been now fully ſatisfied, ſince my Lord the moſt Religious Biſhop Paulus has brought a Paper which contains an irreprehenſible Confeſſion of Faith; and has affirmed, that it was written by Your Sanctity, and by the moſt Religious Biſhops there. Now, the Confeſſion runs thus, and 'tis inſerted in the very ſame words into this our Epiſtle. But concerning Theotocos, and ſo forth. When We had read theſe (d) Your ſacred words, and perceived, that We Our Selves embraced the ſame Sentiments; (For, there is one Lord, one Faith, one Baptiſm;) We glorified God the Saviour of all Men, rejoycing mutually, becauſe as well Your, as Our Churches, do profeſs a Faith which is agreeable, both to the divinely inſpired Scriptures, and alſo to the Tradition of our Holy Fathers. Theſe things may be known by him who is deſirous of having an accurate account of thoſe affairs tranſacted at that time.

†This letter of Cyrillus to Johannes occurs entire in Binius, Tom. 2. pag. 594. Edit. Paris. 1636.

†Or, rich.

(a) In the incomparable Florent. MS. I found it written [διαψεύσωνται, cannot lie] which is the truer reading. In the Acts of the Epheſine Synod, where this Epiſtle is recorded. (See Binius, as before, p. 595.) it is [διαψεύσωται, will not lie.] But the reading of the Florent. MS. is confirm'd by Nicephorus and the Tellerian MS. Valeſ. In Robert Stephens, the reading here is, διεψεύσατο, hath not lied.

(b) Τοῖς ὑπὲρ δύναμιν πόνοις περισομιλῆν. Chriſtophorſon has rendred this place very ill, thus, Et graviores quàm vires ferebant, ſuſcepit in concionando labores; And in Preaching has undertaken far greater pains than his ſtrength would bear. Muſculus tranſlates it thus: Et laboribus vires excedentibus collocutionem ſuſcepiſſet, And with labours exceeding his ſtrength had undertaken a conference. Neither of them has rendred it well. Περισομιλῆν πόνοις, imports, to endure or undergo labours. So, ὁμιλῆν τύχαις, ſignifies, to bear the viciſſitudes of fortune. Plutarch (in Marius,) ſpeaking concerning Jugurtha, ſays theſe words, ὥστω τὶς ἦν ποικίλος ἀνὴρ τύχαις ὁμιλῆσαι, that is, ſo various was that Perſon as to his Diſpoſition, [which was fitted] to bear the changes of fortune. Moreover, theſe words [ὑπὲρ δύναμιν, above ſtrength] may be underſtood two ways: For we may either underſtand ἀνθρωπίνην, humane, (which we have done;) or elſe ἰδίαν, his own. Muſculus and Chriſtophorſon have embraced the latter ſenſe; as did he alſo, who rendred the Acts of the Epheſine Council into Latin. Valeſ.

(c) Here, and in the Acts of the Epheſine Council, the reading is ἀνεύφορος, inexcuſable, or, inopportune. But, in the Tellerian MS. I found it written, ἐν ἐυάρμοσος, and incongruous. Valeſ.

(d) In the Acts of the Epheſine Council, and in Nicephorus, inſtead of [ἡμῶν, our] it is [ὑμῶν, your;] which doubtleſs is the truer reading, Valeſ.

CHAP. VII.

What the impious Neſtorius writes concerning his own ſufferings; and how his Tongue having at laſt been eaten out with worms, he ended his life at Oäſis.

BUT after what manner Neſtorius was baniſh'd, or what befel him after that, or in what manner he departed out of this life, and what rewards he receiv'd on account of his Blaſphemy; [theſe particulars] have not been related by the Writers of Hiſtory. All which had been forgotten, and had been wholly loſt and ſwallowed by [length of] time, nor had been ſo much as heard of; had not I accidentally met with a Book of Neſtorius's, which contains a Narrative of theſe things. This Father of blaſphemy therefore, Neſtorius, (who has not raiſed his building on that foundation which was laid, but hath built [his houſe] on the ſand, and [therefore] it has ſoon faln down, according to our Lord's parable;) making an Apology (which was his deſire,) in defence of his own blaſphemy, (a) againſt thoſe who had accuſed him, (becauſe he had introduced ſome innovation contrary to what was fitting, and had not rightly requeſted that a Synod ſhould be convened at Epheſus;) amongſt other things writes [to this effect:] that he, wholly compelled thereto by neceſſity, had betaken himſelf * to [the defence of] this part, in regard the Holy Church was divided, ſome affirming that Mary was to be term'd † Anthropotocos, others, ‖ Theotocos. That therefore (as he ſays) he might not offend in one of theſe two, [viz.] (b) leſt he ſhould either joyn things mortal with thoſe that are immortal, or elſe leſt (by betaking himſelf to the other ſide) he might be deprived of that other party [who defended the term Theotocos:] he invented the word Chriſtotocos.

(a) Πρὸς τὺς ἐγκαλέσαντας. In the incomparable Florentine MS. I found it written [πρὸς τὺς ἐγκαλέσαντας ὁι, againſt thoſe who had accuſed him;] which is doubtleſs the truer reading: ὁι has the ſame import with αὐτῷ, him. Valeſ.

* Ἐς τῆτο τάξεως.

† That is, [the Virgin] who bore man.

‖ She who bore God.

(b) The meaning of this place is very obſcure; it is in my judgment, thus to be explained: After that Sermon of Anaſtaſius the Presbyter, who was Neſtorius's Syncellus, (See Chap. 2. Note b.) there aroſe a great diſſention in the Conſtantinopolitan Church;

Church: in regard ſome affirm'd, that Mary was to be termed Theotocos; others Anthropotocos. And when the Sedition increaſed daily, Neſtorius, deſirous to appeaſe it, invented a certain middle term, viz. that Mary ſhould in future be termed Chriſtotocos, the Virgin who bore Chriſt: leſt, if he ſhould term her Theotocos, he might ſeem to joyn things mortal with thoſe that are immortal: (which thing he [that is, Neſtorius] look'd upon to be impious:) or leſt, if he had embraced the term Anthropotocos, the other party (to wit, thoſe who defended the term Theotocos,) ſhould have revolted from him, and held their Aſſemblies apart. This is the meaning of this place; which neither Muſculus nor Chriſtophorſon underſtood. Therefore, inſtead of [ἢ ἀθάνα]α συμπλεκουδ́ων,] it muſt be [ἢ τὰ ὄντα, ϗ ἀθάνα]α συμπλεκομέ́νων.] In the Tellerian MS. I found this reading, ἢ ἀθα: ἀτω συμπλεκομέ́νω. Valeſ.

He intimates further, that at firſt the Emperor Theodoſius, out of that affection he bore towards him, confirm'd not the [ſentence of] * depoſition pronounc'd againſt him: but afterwards, that when ſome Biſhops (c) of both parties had been ſent from the City Epheſus to Theodoſius; (d) and when he alſo himſelf requeſted it, he was permitted to return to his own Monaſtery; which is ſcituate before the Gates of that City, now called Theopolis*, and is not expreſsly named [there] by Neſtorius. But, they ſay, (e) it is now termed Euprepius's [Monaſtery,] which, as we aſſuredly know, ſtands before the [City] Theopolis, diſtant from thence not more than two furlongs. Moreover, the ſame Neſtorius ſays, that having reſided there during the ſpace of four years, he had all imaginable honour conferred upon him, and enjoy'd all manner of reverence and reſpect: but that afterwards, by the Edict of [the Emperor] Theodoſius, he was baniſhed into that place called Oäſis. But he has concealed that which is the principal thing. For, during his reſidence (f) there, he in no wiſe deſiſted from his own blaſphemy. In ſo much that Johannes Biſhop of Antioch gave [the Emperor] an account thereof, and Neſtorius was condemned to perpetual Baniſhment. (g) He wrote alſo another Book, compoſed in the manner of a Dialogue, to a certain Egyptian as it were, concerning his baniſhment into Oäſis; wherein he ſpeaks more at large concerning theſe things. But, what puniſhments he underwent on account of the Blaſphemies * coyn'd by him (not being able to lie conceal'd from [God's] all-ſeeing Eye,) may be known from other Letters, ſent by him to the Governour of Thebäis. For, in thoſe [Letters] you may find, after what manner (in regard he had not yet undergone condign (h) puniſhment,) the judgment of God ſeized him, and involv'd him in (i) captivity, a calamity of all [afflictions] the moſt miſerable. But, in as much as he was to endure greater puniſhments, he was let go by the Blemmyæ, amongſt whom he had been a Captive. And removing from place to place about the utmoſt borders of Thebäis, by the Edicts of Theodoſius, who had determin'd that he ſhould return; and being daſh'd againſt the earth, he ended his days agreeable to his own forepaſt life: [like] a ſecond Arius, declaring and * foreſhewing by his calamitous death what rewards are appointed for [thoſe who utter] blaſphemy againſt Chriſt. For both thoſe † Perſons blaſphemed Chriſt in a like manner; Arius, by terming him a Creature; and Neſtorius, by thinking him to be a Man. To * whom (becauſe he complains, that the Acts at Epheſus were not rightly compoſed [and made up,] but were framed by fraud and an illegal artifice of Cyrillus's;) I would willingly ſay [thus much:] Why (ſince Theodoſius was his favourer,) was he baniſh'd, and, without obtaining the leaſt commiſeration, condemned to ſo many Exiles, and concluded his life after ſuch a manner as this? Or why (if the ſentence [pronounced] againſt him by Cyrillus, and the other Prelates about him, were not divine,) both of them being now numbred amongſt thoſe departed [and dead], (at which time, as it has been ſaid by one of the Heathen Sages, (k) that which appears not any more in ſight [or, that which ſurvives not any longer] is honoured with a Benevolence that hath no enemy;) has he himſelf been condemned as a Blaſphemer and an Enemy of God; but Cyrillus is praiſed and extolled [by all Perſons,] as having been a loud [and eminent] Preacher, and a great Defender of Orthodox Sentiments? but leſt we ſhould be accuſed for writing what is falſe, come on, let us bring forth Neſtorius himſelf into the midſt, giving a relation concerning theſe very things.

* Or, ejection.

(c) Ἔρῤῥ ν τε καϰεῖθεν; that is, of both parties, as well Catholicks, as Neſtorians. Muſculus has render'd it ill, thus, ultro citroque, to and fro. Valeſ.

(d) Inſtead of [ἀυτῶ τε ἀυτῶ δηθέντ⟨ς,] the reading in the Florentine and Tellerian MSS. is [ἀυτῶ τε αὖ δηθέντος, and when he alſo himſelf requeſted it.] Valeſ.

*That is, Antioch. See chap. 3.

(e) From the Florent. and Tellerian MS. I have mended this place thus: νῦν τὸ ἐυπρεπίυ πεῤῥσαγορεύεϑαι, it is now termed Euprepius's [Monaſtery:] the reading before was very fooliſh, thus, νύ⟨ϑισα. Valeſ.

(f) To wit, in the aforeſaid Monaſtery, which was called Euprepius's Monaſtery. Valeſ.

(g) I like neither Chriſtophorſon's not Muſculus's Verſion of this place. The latter of whom renders it thus: Scripſit autem & alium librum more dialectico, velut ad Egyptium quendam de exilio ſuo compoſitum. But he wrote another Book alſo in a Logical manner, to a certain Egyptian as it were, compoſed concerning his own Exile. And Chriſtophorſon tranſlates it thus: Scripſit præterea Neſtorius alium Libellum acutè & ſubtiliter, &c. Moreover, Neſtorius wrote another little Book, acutely and ſubtilly, &c. What need was there of acuteneſs and Logical ſubtilty in a little Book, wherein Neſtorius treated concerning his own baniſhment into Oäſis! Therefore I judge it better to render theſe Words, [διαλεκτικῶς συγκείμενον] thus [compoſed in the manner of a Dialogue.] And thus Nicephorus expounded theſe Words of Evagrius. For inſtead thereof, he makes uſe of the Word διαλογικώτερον, more by way of Dialogue Which term Langus renders, diſertius, more eloquently: As if Nicephorus had ſaid, λογικώτερον. Valeſ.

(h) In Nicephorus, (book 14. chap. 36.) inſtead of ὑπεξελεύσεως, torture; the reading is truer, thus, ἐπεξελεύσεως, puniſhment. And ſo I found it written in the Tellerian MS. Valeſ.

(i) I have mended this place from the incomparable Florentine Manuſcripts; wherein the reading is thus [αἰχμαλοσία τῆ πάντων ἐλεεινοτάτη συμφορᾷ, Captivity; a calamity of all [afflictions] the moſt miſerable; than, which emendation, there is nothing more certain. The reading in Nicephorus is the ſame alſo. Valeſ. In Robert Stephens's Edition, 'tis thus worded: αἰχμαλάσας τῆ πάντων ἐλεεινοτάτη συμφορᾷ. Valeſ.

* Or, ratifying, or, confirming.

† That is, Arius and Neſtorius.

* That is, to Neſtorius.

(k) Tranſlators, in regard they had perſuaded themſelves, that the word ἐμποδὼν does always ſignifie an hindrance; have fallen into various Errors. For Langus renders it thus: Et ambo vos jam ex vitâ hâc exceſſiſtis, &c. And both of you have now made your departure out of this life: at which time, as one of the Heathen Sages has ſaid, nothing hinders, but that every Perſon may be honoured by a free benevolence of Men, no Adverſary intervening. And Chriſtophorſon has tranſlated it after this manner: Quando, ut ſapienti inter Gentiles ſcriptori placet, &c. At which time, as it pleaſes a prudent Writer amongſt the Heathens, every one is uſually honoured with a firm and concordant benevolence of all Men, provided there be nothing which may lawfully be an impediment. But, the term ἐμποδὼν does not always ſignifie an Impediment, or Hindrance. For, the Ancients, as well Rhetoricians as Philoſophers, uſed ἐμποδὼν in ſuch a Senſe as to ſignifie the ſame with ἐν ποσὶ to be in ſight, or, appear openly; as Suidas, Harpocration, and the Author of the Ethymologicon do inform us. But, the Latter Writers, and eſpecially Hierocles the Philoſopher, have uſed that Word to ſignifie an Impediment or Hindrance. Therefore Muſculus has rendred this Paſſage in Evagrius beſt of all, thus: Quando ſicut quidam exterorum Philoſophorum dixit, quod non eſt amplius ſuperſtes, ſine ullius invidiâ & contradictione cum benevolentiâ honoratur; When, as one of the foreign Philoſophers has ſaid, that which ſurvives not any longer, is honoured with benevolence, without the Envy and Contradiction of any one. Further, in the Margin of the Tellerian Manuſcript, there is ſet at this place, τυκυδίδυ, that is, this Sentence is taken out of Thucidides. 'Tis extant in Thucidides's ſecond Book, pag. 128. Edit. Francofurt. 1594; in the Funeral Oration which Pericles made. Valeſ.

Recite

Recite to me therefore [O Neſtorius!] ſome paſſages in the expreſs words of your own Letter, which you wrote to the Governour of Thebaïs. Becauſe of ſome [Controverſies] lately agitated at Epheſus concerning the moſt Holy Religion; by an Imperial Order we inhabit Oäſis otherwiſe [called] Ibis. And after the interpoſition of ſome Words, he adds: But after the aforeſaid [Oäſis] was totally deſtroyed by (l) a Barbarick Captivity, and by fire, and ſword; and we were diſmiſſed by the Barbarians, who on a ſuddain, how I know not, * were moved with a compaſſion towards us, and after they had terrified us with menacing Declarations, that we ſhould immediately go out of that Country, in regard the Mazices would ſuddenly take poſſeſſion of it after them; we are come to Thebaïs together with the remainder of the Captives, whom the Barbarians (out of commiſeration) brought to us, for what intent I know not. Moreover, they have been every one permitted to go whither they deſired: but we by coming publickly to Panapolis, * do exhibit our ſelves. For we were afraid, leſt any one, † by taking an occaſion from our Captivity, ſhould either frame an accuſation of flight againſt us, or elſe [form] a forged invention of ſome other fault. For malice is productive of all manner of calumnies. Wherefore, We beſeech Your * Magnificence, to take care (according to that proviſion the Laws have made,) of our Captivity, and not to deliver a Captive, who is ſubject to miſchief, to the evil Arts of Men; leſt all Generations ſhould from hence forth cry out, That 'tis better to be the Barbarians Captive, than to fly for refuge to the Roman Empire. Then, having added an Oath, he made his requeſt [to the Governour] thus: [That You would pleaſe] to give the Emperor an account of our Remove from Oäſis * hither, which hapned from our being diſmiſſed by the Barbarians: that ſo, whatever determination ſhall be well pleaſing to God, may now at length be made concerning us. [Alſo, out of] the ſame Neſtorius's ſecond Letter to the ſaid Governor: Whether You will account this preſent Letter from Us to Your Magnificence, as [written] from a Friend, or as an admonition from a Father to a Son, hear, I beſeech you, with patience the Narration [contained] therein concerning many [Matters,] written from us, wherein We have been as brief as poſſibly could be. Oäſis otherwiſe [termed] Ibis, having been ſeveral ways ruin'd of late, by an incurſion made into it by a multitude of the (m) Nomades.

(l) Inſtead of [χὴ βαρβαεικῆς αἰχμαλόσεως] the reading as it ſeems, ſhould be [διὰ βαρβαεικῆς αἰχμαλοσίας, by a Barbarick Captivity.] In the Florentine and Tellerian M. SS. and in Nicephorus, 'tis αἰχμαλοσίᾳ, by Captivity. Valeſ.

* Or, recovered a Compaſſion, &c.

* That is, To Panopolis.

(m) In that Letter of Neſtorius's mentioned before, the people who ruined Oäſis are termed Blemmyæ. Wherefore, Nomades ought here to be taken for an Adjective. Notwithſtanding, it may be the proper name of a Nation of Barbarians. 'Tis certain, the Nubæ, neighbours to the Blemmyæ, (who made frequent incurſions into the Country of Oäſis, as Procopius informs us, in Book 1. Perſic.) were termed Nomades alſo, or Numides; which is atteſted by Stephanus.——But ſome one will object, if Neſtorius ſpeaks here concerning one and the ſame Captivity of Oäſis, how can that ſtand, which he ſays in the beginning of this Epiſtle, in theſe words: Ὀάσεως τὴς ἴδιας ἐκ πολλῶν πρώην ἀφανισθείσης. For, the incurſion of the Blemmyæ into Oäſis (in which Neſtorius had been taken Captive by the Barbarians, and was preſently diſmiſſed,) had hapned but a little while before, as he himſelf atteſts. But, the incurſion of the Nomades had hapned long before; as 'tis apparent from Neſtorius's words in this laſt Epiſtle, which were juſt now cited. To all this I anſwer, that theſe words ἐκ πολλῶν πρώην, do not ſignifie long ſince, as Langus, Muſculus and Chriſtophorſon thought. For, the Adverb πρώην, ſignifies lately, as every body knows. Doubtleſs, this incurſion had hapned a little before Neſtorius wrote theſe things. Therefore, ἐκ πολλῶν ought to be referred to the word ἀφανισθείσης. So that, 'tis the ſame as if he ſhould have ſaid, Oäſis having been ſeveral ways ruin'd of late: to wit, by fire, ſlaughters, and a Barbarick Captivity; as Neſtorius has ſaid above. Valeſ.

And after ſome words. Theſe things having happened thus, (by what impulſe, or on what occaſion Your Magnificence was moved thereto, I know not;) we have been ſent by Barbarian Soldiers from Panopolis, to Elephantina,] a Town] ſituate in the Borders of the Province Thebaïs; towards which we have been dragg'd by the forementioned military aſſiſtance. And when we had been tired by our travelling more than half that Journey, we again met with an Order of your Magnanimity by word of mouth, [whereby we were commanded] to return to Panopolis. Having therefore been wearied with the Miſeries (n) of this ſo long a Journey, our Body being infirm and aged, and our Hand and Side tired, we came again to Panopolis, in a manner breathing forth our Soul. And whilſt we were as yet cruciated with the Calamities and Miſchiefs of [our] Pains, another Order written by Your Magnanimity * came in great haſt, whereby we were convey'd again from Panopolis to a place adjoyning thereto. (o) When we ſuppoſed, that we ſhould ſtop here, and were in expectation of the moſt Victorious Emperours determination concerning us; on a ſudden another [Decree] was again drawn up againſt us, without any Commiſeration, in order to another, [to wit,] a fourth Baniſhment. And after ſome few Words, [he continues.] But, I beſeech you, let what has been done be ſufficient, and [may it be enough] (p) to have Decreed ſo many Baniſhments againſt one Body: And, (q) after the Relations [which have been ſent to their Imperial Majeſties] by Your Magnificence, permit, I humbly beſeech you, that an accurate account [of our condition] may be made known to our moſt Victorious Emperors, even by us alſo, by whom that ought [to be done.] Theſe are our Advices, as to a Son from a Father.

(n) The reading here, is, τὴς σὴς ὁδοιπορείας, of this your journey: and 'tis the ſame in Nicephorus. Notwithſtanding, I doubt not but it ſhould be, τὴς τόσης ὁδοιπορείας, of this ſo long a journey. And ſo Chriſtophorſon and Sir Hen. Savil read it. Valeſ.

* Or, came flying

(o) Inſtead of [ταῦτα ςήσεσθαι καθ' ἡμῶν λογιζομένων, when we ſuppoſed theſe things againſt us would ſtop] I think it ſhould be thus: ἐνὶ ταῦτα ςήσεσθαι ἡμῶν λογιζομένων, when we ſuppoſed we ſhould ſtop here. Thus Muſculus ſeems to have read, who renders it in this manner: Et cùm illic hæſuros nos arbitraremur, And when we thought we ſhould ſtop there. Valeſ.

(p) Inſtead of [χὴ τὸ τοσαύτας,] it muſt be χὴ τῷ τοσαύτας. For, the word [ἀρκέσθητι] which preceded immediately, is underſtood. In the Tellerian M. S. the particle [τὸ] is wanting. Valeſ.

(q) Tranſlators ſaw nothing at this place; who by a ſmall fault were induced into a great error. Inſtead of [ἀνεχθεῖσι] it muſt undoubtedly be [ἀνενεθχεῖσι] Preſidents of Provinces were heretofore wont to give the Emperor an Account of all things which hapned with them. The doing whereof was termed ἀναφέρειν, and the Relation it ſelf ἀναφορὰ, as I have noted on Amm. Marcellinus. Concerning theſe Relations of Preſidents, Severianus ſpeaks, in his firſt Oration in Hexaëmeron; the paſſage whereof I will annex here, becauſe the Tranſlator underſtood it not: ὥσπερ γὰ, ἀδελφοὶ, οἱ ἀπο τὴς ἀναφορῶν ἀρχοντες τῷ βασιλεῖ πάντα μηνύουσιν. ὅτω χὴ οἱ ἄγγελοι τῷ θεῷ, &c. For, Brethren, as the Preſidents by [ſending] Relations, make known all things [that are tranſacted with them] to the Emperor: ſo alſo the Angels, &c. The Tranſlator renders it, the Maſters of the Libels and Suggeſtions; which rendition is ill. For ἄρχοντες in Chryſoſtome and the other writers of that age, are nothing elſe but Preſidents or Governours of Provinces. And ἀναφορὰ imports nothing elſe but Relation or Narrative. Wherefore, in Severianus, it muſt be written thus; ὥσπερ γὰ διὰ τὴς ἀναφορῶν οἱ ἄρχοντες, &c. Valeſ.

But if you be angry now, as you have been heretofore, do what you think good; ſince * no reaſon is powerful enough to ſway your mind. After this manner [Neſtorius] in his Letters ſtrikes and leaps, with his Fiſts and Feet,

How, after Neſtorius, Maximianus, and after him Proclus, then Flavianus, were made [Biſhops of Conſtantinople.]

AFter that deſtructive Peſt Neſtorius, Maximianus ſucceeded in the Epiſcopate of the famous [City] Conſtantinople; under whom the Church of God enjoy'd all imaginable peace and tranquility. When he was taken from amongſt Men, Proclus enters upon the Government of that See, who had heretofore been ordain'd Biſhop of Cyzicum. And after he was gone the common way † of mankind, Flavianus ſucceeded in that Chair.

CHAP. IX.

Concerning the unfortunate Eutyches, and how he was depoſed by Flavianus [Biſhop] of Conſtantinople; and concerning the ſecond (to wit, that thieviſh) Synod at Epheſus.

IN † his times, the controverſie about the impious Eutyches was ſtarted; a particular Synod having been convened (a) at Conſtantinople: [to which Synod] Euſebius Biſhop of Dorylæum (who was the firſt perſon that had [heretofore] refuted Neſtorius's Blaſphemy, being until then but a Rhetorician) preſented Libels. Therefore, when Eutyches, after he had been ſummon'd [to the Synod,] came not: And at his appearing [afterwards] had been convicted of having ſaid theſe words: I confeſs, that our Lord † had two natures before the union: But, after the union, I confeſs, but one nature: (He aſſerted alſo, that the Body of our Lord was not of the ſame ſubſtance with our Bodies.) [After this, I ſay,] he is depoſed. But when he had preſented a ſupplicatory Libel to Theodoſius, * pretending that the Acts of thoſe convened [in that Synod] had been falſified by Flavianus; in the firſt place a Synod of [the Biſhops] that were near Neighbours to Conſtantinople was aſſembled. In which (b) ſome of the Magiſtrates alſo being preſent therein) Flavianus is judged. And when this Synod had confirmed the Acts, as being true; a ſecond Synod is convened at Epheſus.

† That is, Flavianus's.

(a) Inſtead of [χτ τῦ κωνσανλινυ] it muſt undoubtedly be [χτ τὴν κωνσανλινυ, at Conſtantinople; which is the reading in the Telleian MS. and in Nicephorus, Book 14. chap. 47. where Langus renders it thus: Flavianus Synodo Provinciali apud Conſtantinopolim coactâ, &c. Flavianus, a Provincial Synod having been convened at Conſtantinople, &c. Whom Chriſtophorſon has follow'd. Notwithſtanding, I had rather render it a particular Synod, as Muſculus does. Indeed, that Synod conſiſted only of thoſe Biſhops, who at that time hapned to make their abode at Conſtantinople, on account of ſome Eccleſiaſtick affairs: Which Prelates they commonly termed ἐνδημοῦντας ἐπισκόπους, Biſhops that made their reſidence for ſome time only in the City. The Acts of this Conſtantinopolitan Synod under Flavianus, are related in the Firſt Action of the Chalcedon Council; where theſe words occur [ſee Binius, Tom. 3. pag. 80.] συναχθέισης τῆς ἁγίας καὶ μεγάλης συνόδυ τῆς ἐνδημούσης ἐν τῇ προειρημένῃ μεγαλοπόλει, &c. The Holy and Great Synod having been convened [conſiſting of ſuch Prelates as] reſided for ſome time in the forenamed Great City, &c. If any one be deſirous of knowing the names of thoſe Biſhops then convened, they occur in the firſt Action of the Chalcedon Synod. Valeſ. See Binius, Tom. 3. pag. 125. Edit. Pariſ. 1636.

The Actions* of this ſecond Conſtantinopolitan Synod under Flavianus are extant, recorded in the firſt Action of the Chalcedon Council. See Binius. Tom. 3. pag 129. Edit. ut prius. Where Florentius the moſt magnificent Patricius, Mamas the Comes and Proximus, [that is, Clerk] of the Deſk of Libels and Sacred Cognitions, and Macedonius the Tribune and Notary, are ſaid to have been preſent at this Synod. Valeſ.

CHAP. X.

What was tranſacted by Dioſcorus and Chryſaphius [at] the * abſurd Synod at Epheſus.

* Παράλογον συνόδιον, unexpected, or abſurd Synod. Valeſius renders it, the illegitimate Synod: Curterius terms it, the mad Synod.

AT this Synod Dioſcorus, Succeſſor to Cyrillus in the See of Alexandria, was appointed to preſide: (a) Which thing was effected by the artifice of (b) Chryſaphius (a perſon of great intereſt in the Imperial Pallace at that time,) out of [his] hatred to Flavianus. There met [at this Synod] at Epheſus, Juvenalis Biſhop of Jeruſalem, (c) who had been at the former Epheſine Synod, together with many other Prieſts [whom he had] about him. Together with theſe met Domnus, Johannes's Succeſſor in the Antiochian See: alſo Biſhop (d) Julius, who filled the place of Leo Bp. of the Seniour Rome. Flavianus likewiſe was preſent with them, together with the Biſhops about him:

(a) In Robert Stephens's Edition, the reading was [τῶ τεχνάσανλϖ χρυσαφίυ] but Chriſtophorſon and Sir H. Savil, by tranſpoſing the words, have mended it thus, τεχνάσανλϖ τῶ χρυσαφίυ. I doubt not but Evagrius wrote thus: τῶτο τεχνάσανλος χρυσαφίυ. Which thing [that is, Dioſcorus's Precedency in that Synod] was effected by the artifice of Chryſaphius. Further, Chriſtophorſon tranſlates and points this whole paſſage, in this manner: Hujus concilii Dioſcorus, qui in Alexandriæ Epiſcopatum poſt Cyrillum ſucceſſit, quò odium in Flavianum incenderetur, præſes deſignatus fuit. Chryſaphius enim hanc rem callidè molitus fuerat. Of this Council Dioſcorus, who ſucceeded Cyrillus in the Epiſcopate of Alexandria, to the end that the hatred againſt Flavianus might be inflamed, was appointed Preſident. For Chryſaphius had craftily attempted this thing. But Muſculus's opinion ſeems far better to me, who before theſe words πρὸς ἔχθρας φλαυιανῶ, places a ſubdiſtinction. For he renders it thus: Præſidebat autem ei Synodo Dioſcorus poſt Cyrillum Alexandrinus Epiſcopus; id quod ita odio Flaviani inſtituerat Chryſaphius, &c. At that Synod preſided Dioſcorus Biſhop of Alexandria after Cyrillus; which thing Chryſaphius had ſo order'd out of [his] hatred to Flavianus, &c. Inſtead of theſe words [πρὸς ἔχθρας, (or ἔχθραν, as Sir Henry Savil mends it) out of [his] hatred;] Nicephorus has theſe, διὰ ἔχθραν ἰὼν φλαυιανῶ, by reaſon of his hatred reſiſting [or, breaking out againſt] Flavianus. Valeſ.

(b) At the margin of the Florentine Manuſcript, this Scholion is ſet: Δεῖ τὸν δυσσεβῆ χρυσαφίυ σημείωσαι ὡς ἀεὶ οἱ κοιτωνικοὶ εὐνοῦχοι τὰς ὀρθοδόξυς ἀρχιερεῖς ἐκακώσαν; That is, Note concerning the impious Chryſaphius, that the Eunuchs of the Bed-chamber have always done miſchief to the Orthodox Arch-Biſhops. Of which thing we have an eminent inſtance in Euſebius, chief [Eunuch] of the Bed-chamber, who in Conſtantius's Reign perſecuted Athanaſius, and the other Catholick Prelates. Valeſ.

(c) Τῶ καὶ πρότερον ἐν ἐφέσῳ χωμῶν. Chriſtophorſon underſtood theſe words amiſs; as if Evagrius had ſaid, that Juvenalis had formerly been Biſhop of Epheſus. But Evagrius does not ſay ſo; but only, that Juvenalis Biſhop of Jeruſalem had been heretofore at Epheſus, to wit, in the former Epheſine Synod, wherein Neſtorius had been condemn'd. Valeſ.

(d) The reading in Nicephorus is the ſame; but 'tis corrupt, inſtead of Julianus. For ſo it is truly written in the Acts of the ſecond Epheſine Synod, which are recorded in the firſt Action of the Chalcedon Council; Poſt conſulatum Zenonis & Poſthumiani V V. C C. Die ſexto Idus Auguſti, &c. After the Conſulate of the moſt famous Perſonages Zeno and Poſthumianus, on the ſixth of the Ides of Auguſt, in the third Indiction, a Synod is convened in the Metropolis Epheſus, by the command of the moſt Religious and moſt Chriſtian Emperors; and the moſt Reverend rend and moſt Holy Biſhops, Dioſcorus of Alexandria, and Biſhop Julianus (who was the Deputy of the moſt Holy and moſt Bleſſed Leo, Biſhop of the Roman Church) ſate in the Holy Church, which is call'd [Saint] Mary's. Baronius, at the year of Chriſt 449, relates from Marianus's Chronicon, that this Julianus was Biſhop of Puteoli. Notwithſtanding as it is now extant in Marianus Scotus's Chronicon, the Biſhop of Puteoli is not called Julianus but Julius, who was ſent with Hilarus the Deacon by Pope Leo, to the ſecond Epheſine Synod. But, in the Subſcriptions of the Biſhops who Subſcrib'd to this ſecond Epheſine Synod, (which Subſcriptions are Recorded in the firſt Action of the Chalcedon Council, pag. 141.) he is term'd Julianus the Biſhop. For theſe are the Words there: Julianus Epiſcopus, tenens locum ſanctiſſimi Epiſcopi Romanæ Eccleſiæ, interpretante ſe Florentio Epiſcopo Lydiæ, dixit, &c. From which Words it ſeems to be concluded, that this Julianus, who was preſent at the ſecond Epheſine Synod, was Julianus Biſhop of Cöe; who two Years after was preſent at the Chalcedon Council, and held there alſo the Place of Leo Biſhop of Rome, as it frequently occurs, recorded in the Acts of the Chalcedon Synod.——— Obſerve here Baronius's Inconſtancy; who when he had written at the Year of Chriſt 449, that that Julianus (who was Legate of the Apoſtolick See at the ſecond Epheſine Synod) was Biſhop of Puteoli; afterwards (at the Year of Chriſt 451. Chap. 78.) makes him Biſhop of Cöe. Valeſ.

(e) Theodoſius having given an Order to Elpidius in theſe expreſs words: Let thoſe [Prelates] who before have been the Judges of Eutyches the moſt Religious * Archimandrite, be preſent and ſilent: but let them in no wiſe take the place of Judges, but expect the common † Sentence of all the moſt Holy Fathers; in regard thoſe things which have been judged by them, are now under ſcrutiny. In this Synod Eutyches is reſtored (his Sentence of Depoſition being revok'd) by Dioſcorus and thoſe about him; * as the Contents of the Acts thereof do ſhew. And Flavianus, and Euſebius Biſhop of Dorylæum, are condemned and depoſed. At the ſame Synod, Ibas Biſhop of the Edeſſeni is excommunicated; and (f) Daniel Biſhop of Carræ is depoſed: as is alſo (g) Irenæus of Tyre, and Aqualinus of Byblus. Moreover, ſome things were tranſacted [there] on the account of (h) Sophronius Biſhop of Conſtantina.

(e) The ſacred Commonitory (or, Letters Mandatory,) of the Emperor Theodoſius to Elpidius, Comes of the Sacred Conſiſtory, and to Eulogius the Tribune and Prætorian Notary, is extant in the Acts of the Epheſine Conventicle [or, little Council] which are recorded in the firſt Action of the Chalcedon Synod, pag. 46, where theſe words here related by Evagrius do occur. Valeſ.

* Or, as 'tis contained in the Acts.

(f) A little before the ſecond Epheſine Synod, Ibas [Biſhop] of Edeſſa, and Daniel Biſhop of Carræ had been accuſed before the Emperor Theodoſius by their own Clergy. The Emperor gave order, that cognizance of their Cauſe ſhould be taken in a Synod at Berytus, in the preſence of Damaſcius, Tribune and Prætorian Notary. The Acts of this Council [at Berytus] are extant, recorded in the tenth Action of the Chalcedon Synod, (See Binius. Tom. 3. pag. 377.) which begin thus: Poſt Conſulatum Flavii Zenonis & Poſthumiani, &c. After the Conſulate of the moſt famous Perſonages Flavius Zeno and Poſthumianus, on the Calends of September, in the ſecond Indiction, &c. I doubt not but it ſhould be written, Conſulatu Zenonis & Poſthumiani, In the Conſulate of Zeno and Poſthumianus. Otherwiſe, this Synod would have hapned after the Epheſine little Council, which was convened after the Conſulate of Zeno and Poſthumianus, in the Month of Auguſt. Now, the Berytian Synod cannot be placed after that Epheſine Synod, in regard mention is made therein of Flavianus Biſhop of Conſtantinople, and of Domnus of Antioch: Both which, 'tis manifeſt, were depoſed in the ſecond Epheſine Synod. Add hereto the Teſtimony of Liberatus the Deacon, who relates in his Breviarium, that this Berytian Synod was convened before Eutyches had framed his Hereſie. Valeſ.

(g) Long before the ſecond Epheſine Synod, Irenæus had been driven from his Biſhoprick, by an Edict of the Emperor Theodoſius; and Photius had been put into his See. 'Tis certain, Photius preſided at the Berytian Synod, which had been convened on the Year before the ſecond Epheſine Synod. But, becauſe Irenæus had been ejected by the Emperor's Order, not by the Determination of a Synod, therefore he was depoſed in the ſecond Epheſine Synod. Valeſ.

(h) 'Tis ſtrange, how much Tranſlators have erred in the Verſion of this place: For Langus, Nicephorus's Tranſlator, renders it thus: Decrevit hæc Synodus quoque de Sophronio quædam, &c. This Synod alſo decreed ſome things concerning Sophronius, who had come at that time to Conſtantinople, on account of ſeeing that City. Chriſtophorſon tranſlates it in this manner: Nonnulla ibidem acta fuere contra Sophronium Epiſcopum Conſtantinopolitanum, Some things were acted there againſt Sophronius Biſhop of Conſtantinople. But he ought to have ſaid Biſhop of Conſtantina. For Sophronius was Biſhop of Conſtantina, as 'tis apparent from the ſecond Antiochian Synod under Domnus, which is inſerted in the 14th Action of the Chalcedon Synod. The ſame Sophronius was afterwards preſent at the Chalcedon Synod, as 'tis recorded in the Acts of that Synod. Now, Conſtantina is a City of Phœnice. Valeſ.

* Theodoret Biſhop of Cyrus was depoſed alſo by them, as was likewiſe Domnus [Biſhop] of Antioch. (i) What became of that Prelate afterwards, I cannot find. When theſe things had been tranſacted in this manner, the ſecond Synod at Epheſus was diſſolved.

* This was he who wrote the five Books of Eccleſiaſtick Hiſtory.

(i) In the place of Domnus Biſhop of Antioch Maximus was ſubrogated, as Liberatus informs us in his Breviarium: Who was afterwards confirm'd in his Biſhoprick by Pope Leo, as we read in the Tenth Action of the Chalcedon Council. Notwithſtanding, the ſame Maximus appointed Domnus, as long as he liv'd, a certain Allowance out of the Revenue of his Church, that being content with his Maintenance, he might in future be quiet: Which thing was approved of by the other Patriarchs in the Chalcedon Council, as may be ſeen in the fore-cited Action. Valeſ.

BUT, let * none of the Heathens deride us, becauſe the latter [Biſhops] depoſe the former, and always find out ſome new thing [which they add] to the Faith. For we making Reſearches after the ineffable Love of God [towards Men] which is paſt finding out, and being deſirous to honour and extol it in the higheſt manner, do betake our ſelves to this or that [Opinion.] Nor was any one of thoſe, who invented Hereſies amongſt the Chriſtians, ſo weak, that he would † deſignedly blaſpheme; nor has [any ſuch Perſon] fallen into an Error, with a deſire to diſhonour the Deity: but 'twas rather his Suppoſition, that if he ſhould aſſert this Opinion, he ſhould ſpeak better than * thoſe who went before him. both their own and their Anceſtors Opinions. For they invent Gods upon Gods, and chooſe and name them from their own perturbations of Mind; to the end that by taking to themſelves ſuch Gods, they may procure pardon for their own luſts and debaucheries. So forſooth, he who amongſt them [is accounted] the ſupream Father of Men and Gods, having metamorpohz'd himſelf into a Bird, laſciviouſly ſnatch't up the Phrygian Boy; and as the reward of his uncleanneſs, gave him his Cup (b), permitting him to begin to drink an inviting Cup to himſelf, that ſo both of 'em might in common ſwallow down their ſhame together with their Nectar. The ſame [Jupiter defiled himſelf] with infinite other Impieties, which have been interdicted even amonſt the vileſt of Men. And having changed himſelf into all the ſhapes of irrational Creatures, (he himſelf being of all the moſt brutiſh) is made an Androgynus*, and (c) bears a Child not in his belly, but on his thigh, to the end that theſe things contrary to nature might be done by him. At which birth Bacchus [is brought forth,] who was himſelf an Androgynus alſo, and brought a reproach upon both Sexes: he was the Prince of drunkenneſs, of ſotiſhneſs cauſed by fulneſs of Wine, of Surfeits and Debauches proceeding from ſo profuſe drinking, and of all the diſtempers riſing therefrom. To this (d) Ægiochus, this loud Thunderer, they aſcribe this (e) as ſome brave and great [Action,] they term him Parricide (a Villany judg'd by all Men to be of the greateſt magnitude) becauſe he drove Saturn, who had unfortunately begat him, out of his Kingdom. What [Tranſactions] of Theodoſius's Reign, manifeſt and evident to the Eyes of all Men.

(b) Τῷ φιλοπσίαν προπίνειν ἐπιτρέψας. He means (I ſuppoſe) that Story, which we are told concerning Ganymed Son of Tros K. of Troas (which was one part of Phrygia.) This Boy, Jupiter having turn'd himſelf into an Eagle, ſnatch't up, and admitted him his Cup-bearer, in the room of Hebe, whom he had diſplaced; and makes him his Catamite.

* A Perſon that is both male and female.

(c) The Story is this. Semele, 'tis ſaid, being great with child by Jupiter (to whom that God had ſworn to give whatever ſhe ſhould ask of him) was by Juno's craft put upon making this requeſt to him; viz. That he would lie one night with her in the ſame manner he uſed to lie with Juno. The God-lover granted her deſire; and Semele is burnt up with Thunder: but the Boy was taken out of her womb, and put upon Jove's thigh; of whom he was deliver'd (in ſuch manner as Women are) at the due time. On which account Bacchus (who was the Child thus brought forth) had the name of Bimater, one that had two Mothers.

(d) 'Tis an Epithet given to Jupiter, either (1) becauſe he wore the ſacred Ægis, [that is, Breſt-plate,] or (2) becauſe he was the raiſer of Storms, or rather (3) in regard he wore the Skin of the Goat Amalthæa, which had been his Nurſe. See Servius upon Virgil's 8th Æneid. Col. 1320. Edit. Baſil. 1586.

In what manner the Emperor Theodoſius [proſecuted and] expell'd the Hereſie of Neſtorius.

THe ſame Emperor wrote a moſt pious Conſtitution, extant in the Firſt Book of that termed Juſtinian's Code, which is in number The Third of the Firſt Title. In which [Conſtitution, Theodoſius] incited thereto by God, has with all Suffrages (as 'tis proverbially ſaid) condemn'd * him, for whom he had heretofore had a ſingular Affection (as Neſtorius himſelf has related;) † and has denounced an Anathema againſt him, recorded in theſe expreſs words: Moreover, We decree, That thoſe who ‖ emulate the impious Faith of Neſtorius, or follow his deteſtable Doctrine, (if they be Biſhops, or Eccleſiaſticks) ſhall be ejected out of the Holy Churches: But if they be Laick, they ſhall be Anathematized. The ſame Emperor made other Laws on account of our Religion, which do ſufficiently demonſtrate the Ardency of his Zeal.

Concerning Saint Symeon the † Stylite.

† Or, who dwelt in [or, upon] a pillar.

IN theſe times, Symeones, [a perſon] of an holy (a) and moſt celebrated memory, flouriſh'd and was * eminent: he was the firſt perſon that inſtituted the Station upon a pillar, the circumference of whoſe manſion was ſcarce two cubits; at which time Domnus preſided over the Church of Antioch: Who when he was come to Symeones, and had admired his ſtation and manner of life, was deſirous of ſome more ſecret [converſe with him.] Both of them therefore met together, (b) and having conſecrated the immaculate Body [of Chriſt,] they gave one another the Vivifick Communion. This Perſon in the fleſh emulated the converſe of the celeſtial powers, withdrew himſelf from affairs upon Earth, and putting a force upon nature, which tends downward, purſued things ſublime. And having plac'd himſelf in the midſt, [as it were] between Heaven and things upon Earth, he converſed with

* Or, conſpicuous.

(a) Καὶ πάνυ ἀοσίμου μνήμης. Sir H. Savil in his copy makes it one word, thus, παναοσίμου. But I had rather write it πανααοσίμου; for ſo Grecians do uſually ſpeak; as when they ſay πανεύφημον moſt eminently laudable, παναγὲς moſt holy, and the like. Our Evagrius ſpeaking hereafter concerning Gregorius Biſhop of Antioch, gives him this Elogy, Γρηγορίου τοῦ παναοσίμου, the moſt celebrated Gregorius. Valeſ.

(b) Heretofore the Presbyters celebrated the Church-Service together with the Biſhop, and receiv'd the Euchariſt from his hand. So in the tenth Action of the Chalcedon Council, Baſſianus Biſhop of Epheſus, in his Supplicatory Libel to Marſianus the Emperor, amongſt other things ſays theſe words: Τῇ δὲ ἑξῆς ἡμέρᾳ λειτουργήσαντες πάντες ὁμοῦ, &c. Having on the day after, all of us perform'd the Publick-Service together, &c. And, at a great diſtance from that place, the ſame Baſſianus ſays, pag. 303. ἑτέρου πρεσβυτέρου μοῦ, &c. Stephanus my Presbyter was with me four years; he perform'd the Publick-Service with me, communicated with me, and receiv'd the Communion from me, as from his Biſhop. The ſame uſage alſo was heretofore practiſed in the Roman Church, to wit, that the Presbyters ſhould every day celebrate the Publick-Service together with the Biſhop of Rome, and receive the Communion from his hand. But on Sundays, when the Presbyters were neceſſitated to perform the Publick-Service apart in their own Titles, [Pariſhes, or, Cures,] on account of the People committed to their charge; they receiv'd the Lord's Body ſent by the Acolythi from the Biſhop of Rome; that they might not ſeem to be ſeparated from the Communion of their own Biſhop, eſpecially on that day; as Pope Innocent informs us in his Epiſtle to Decentius. God,

God, and together with the Angels glorified him: offering to God from the earth his supplications for men, and procuring from heaven the supernal benevolence upon men. This persons * Miracles have been written by one that was an eye-witness of what he did. Theodoret also Bishop of Cyrus † has recorded them very eloquently. [c But] we have found, that they have been most especially defective in this [following passage,] which to this day is preserved amongst those of the Holy Solitude, and from which very persons, we have received it. When therefore Symeones, that Angel upon earth, that Citizen in the flesh of the Jerusalem which is above, had instituted this new, and [hitherto] unknown way of living to men; the Inhabitants of the Holy Desert send a messenger to him, whom they ordered to enquire [of Symeones,] what this new and strange course of life was, and why he left that way which had been troden and worn by the Saints, and proceeded in another new one, [hitherto] wholly unknown to men? And [they bade the messenger tell him] that they commanded him to come down, and go on in the way of the Elect Fathers. Now, if he should shew himself [d] ready [and willing] to come down, their order was, that he should be permitted to follow his own [way.] For by his obedience [they said] it would be manifest, that by the direction of God he had undertaken this troublesome and afflictive way of living. But if he refused, and would be the servant of his own will, nor would with a readiness forthwith obey their admonition, ['twas their order] that he should be pulled down by force. When therefore the messenger was come to him, and had acquainted him with the command of the Fathers, and Symeon had forthwith put down one of his feet, resolving to fulfil the Order of the Fathers; [the messenger who had been sent to him] permitted him to proceed on in his own way; and spake these words [to him:] Be strong, and behave thy self like a man: thy station is of God. This truly memorable action [of Symeon's] which I have related here, is omitted by those who have written concerning him. [Further,] this person was in so high a manner influenced by the power of divine grace, that when the Emperour Theodosius had issued out an Order, that the Synagogues of the Jews inhabiting Antioch (which had been taken from them by the Christians,) should be restored to them again; he wrote to the Emperour with so much freedom and confidence, and reproved him so smartly, (revering [God] only his own King,) that the Emperour Theodosius revok'd his own Orders, fulfilled all things in favour of the Christians, removed the Præfectus Prætorio, who had suggested these things to him, from his Government, and entreated the most [e] Holy and Aereal Martyr in [these] express words, That he would put up his supplications and prayers for him, and impart to him his own blessing. Moreover, Symeon spent six and fifty years in this afflictive and austere course of life. In the first Monastery, wherein he had been imbued with the precepts of a divine life, [he spent] nine years; and seven and fourty in that place called * The Mandra: during ten years [of which time] he performed his combat in a certain narrow place; [he dwelt] seven years in the shorter pillars, and thirty years upon a pillar of fourty cubits long. His most sacred body, after his departure out of this life, in the succeeding times was brought to Antioch, [to wit,] when Leo sway'd the Imperial Scepter, and Martyrius presided over the Church of Antioch; at which time also Ardaburius Master of the Oriental Milice, came to Symeon's Mandra, accompanied with those Military Forces he had about him, and with other multitudes; and guarded the most precious dead body of the blessed Symeones, to the end that the neighbouring Cities might not meet together and steal it. His most holy body therefore is convey'd to Antioch, very great Miracles having been performed even by the way. The Emperour Leo desired it might be given to him by the Antiochians. But the Inhabitants of Antioch, presented a supplicatory Libel to him, wherein were contained these words: In regard we have no wall to our City, ([f] For 'tis fallen by reason of the wrath [of God:]) we have brought [hither] the most Holy Body that it may be to us instead of a wall and a Fortification. By which words the Emperour Leo was prevailed upon, granted their request, and permitted them [to enjoy] the Holy Body. Many of this person's [Reliques] have been preserved until our times. Even I my self have seen his holy Head, (several Ecclesiasticks being then present,) at such time as the most celebrated Gregorius was Bishop of Antioch; when Philippicus requested, that the precious Reliques of the Saints might be sent to him, in order to the guarding and defending the Oriental Milice. And, which is to be wondred at, the hair of his Head was not faln off; but is preserved perfect and entire, as if he were yet alive, and conversant amongst men. The skin also of his forehead was wrinkled indeed, and become hard; but 'tis as yet preserved whole, as are also most of his teeth, [g] excepting so many of them as have by force been taken away by the hands of faithful persons. [Which teeth of his] do by their * form declare, what, how great and eminent a man of God this Symeones was. There lies likewise at his head, a chain made of iron which he wore about his neck; with which his much-renowned Body, worn out by austerities, hath shar'd the honours [given] by God.

c This place has been several ways corrected by Learned men, to wit, by Christophorson, and Curterius, or rather by those from whose Copies they transcribed these emendations. For some, after the word ἀξιαλειποτ ς, add the verb εἰσίν. Others read ἀξιαλέλοιπεν, and understand that concerning Theodoret only. But I suppose this place is to be restored thus: ἐν ᾧ τὰ μάλιστα παρελοιπότας καθειλήφαμεν, ὃ μέχρι νῦν σωζόμενον ἀξιᾷ τῆς ἁγίας ἐρήμου παρ' αὐτῶν παρειλήφαμεν. And so I have rendred it: nor do I doubt but Evagrius wrote it thus. Vales.

d In the incomparable Florentine MS. I found these words, written at the Margin; πνθμαπκῆ ὡς ἀληθῶς ἐν τῷ χειρῷ ἦ ἐξ πατέρων περὶ τοῦ μεγάλου Συμεῶνος κείσις: that is, The judgment of the Fathers concerning the Great Symeon [was] truly spiritual in Christ. Vales.

f After this clause, Nicephorus adds these words; σεισμὸς μέγας γεγονὼς, a great earthquake having happened. Vales.

g Οἱ μὴ ὅσοι. Christophorson & Sr Henry Savil have mended this place thus; [ὅσοι μὴ χερσὶν, as many as have not by force, &c.] But the place may be mended by a smaller change, thus: εἰ μὴ ὅσοι, &c. excepting so many of them as, &c. Instead of these words, Nicephorus uses, πλὴν ὅσοι; which is more elegant. Vales.

* Διὰ τὸ σχῆμα, by [their] figure, form, or shape: Valesius renders it, by their greatness.

For that dear and friendly Iron deſerted not Symeones, even when dead. I would have given [h] a particular account of this Perſon's performances, (which would yield no ſmall advantage, both to my ſelf relating them, and alſo to thoſe who ſhould read them;) were it not, that Theodoret ([i] as I have ſaid before) hath declared them more at large.

h Inſtead of [ὅπως τὸ καθ' ἕκαστον] I had rather it ſhould be [ὃ τὸ καθ' ἕκαστον, a particular account of this Perſon's, &c.] Which emendation ſeems to me to be altogether neceſſary; although Nicephorus defends the common reading. Chriſtophorſon ſeems to have read according as I have ſaid. Valeſ.

i Ὡς ἔφθω εἰπών. I am of the ſame mind with Sir Henry Savil, who in the margin of his Copy has mended it thus; ὡς ἔφθω εἰπών, as I have ſaid before. The ſame fault is corrected before in this Chapter, where the Synagogues are ſpoken of, which the Antiochians had heretofore taken away from the Jews. And ſo it is plainly written in the Tellerian Manuſcript. Valeſ.

CHAP. XIV.

Concerning the Star which appears frequently in the Piazza about the Pillar of Saint Symeon, which this Writer and others have ſeen: and concerning the ſame Saint's Head.

BUt come on, I will inſert another thing alſo into this Hiſtory, which I my ſelf ſaw. I had a great deſire to ſee the Church of this holy Perſon. It is about three hundred furlongs diſtant from * Theopolis, ſituate on the very top of an hill. Thoſe who live thereabouts call it [a] The Mandra; the moſt holy [Symeones,] I ſuppoſe left this name to the place of his Aſcetick exerciſes. The riſing of the hill extends to the length of twenty furlongs. The fabrick of the Temple repreſents the form of a Croſs, beautify'd with Portico's of four ſides, [b] Oppoſite to thoſe Portico's are placed Pillars, curiouſly framed of poliſh'd ſtone, whereon the Roof is gracefully rais'd to an heighth.

a Inſtead of [μανδείαν, The Mandria] in the Tellerian MS. and Nicephorus, it is μάνδραν, The Mandra. For ſo Evagrius himſelf terms it twice, in the foregoing Chapter. But what Evagrius adds, to wit, that Saint Symeones gave that Name to that place wherein he had exerciſed himſelf in the ſtudies in a more auſtere Philoſophy, is to be further inquired into. Evagrius's words are theſe: τῆς ἀσκήσεως δίμαι τὸ παναγὲς συμεῶν τὴν θεσπηγείαν τῷ χώρῳ καταλιπόν. Chriſtophorſon and Sir Henry Savil mend it thus, καλαλιπόνς: wherein they are greatly miſtaken. They perceived not that Evagrius is wont ſometimes to tranſpoſe words. This place therefore in Evagrius is thus to be conſtrued: τὸ παναγὲς τὸν θεσπηγείαν καλαλιπόν τῷ χώρῳ τῆς ἀσκήσεως, The moſt holy [Symeones,] I ſuppoſe, left, &c. So Nicephorus underſtood this place in Evagrius. For thus he words it: μάνδραν μὲν ὡς εἴρηται, &c. The Inhabitants call the place of his Aſcetick exerciſes The Mandra, as has been ſaid; the Holy [Symeon] having given it that name. Yet, any one may conjecture, that that name was given to that place after Symeon's death, when many Monks flock'd thither, and had built a Monaſtery there. For Mandra ſignifies a Monaſtery, being a Metaphor taken from Hovel's, wherein Sheep or Goats are foddered; which are called Mandræ. Hence the Abbots of Monaſteries are termed Archimandritæ, as may be ſeen in the Chalcedon Council, and in the Novels of the Emperours. Theodorus Lector ſpeaks concerning this Monaſtery of Symeon, in book 1. Collectan; where he ſays, Δανιὴλ ὁ θαυμάσιος, &c. The Admirable Daniel, who came out of Symeon's Mandra, went upon the Pillar at Anaplum. Symeon Metaphraſtes does likewiſe mention this Monaſtery in his Life of Daniel the Stylite, chap. 7. at which place Metaphraſtes ſhews that this Monaſtery was built whilſt Symeon was living. Concerning which, neither Theodoret, nor Evagrius, ſpeak one word. But, I will not hide this, viz. that in the Tellerian M. S. the reading at this place is, καλαλιπούσης Valeſ.

b Παραπεπήχασι ὑπὸ ταῖς στοαῖς. Chriſtophorſon renders this place thus: Porticibus vero columnæ adjunctæ ſunt, To the Portico's are adjoyned Pillars. Nor is Muſculus's Verſion much different; who tranſlates it thus: Inſunt autem porticibus columnæ, There are in the portico's pillars. But the Greek term Παραπεπήχασι ſeems to import ſomething more. Evagrius makes uſe of the ſame word in book 4. chap. 31. where he deſcribes the Church of Saint Sophia. The place there is thus worded: ἐν δεξιῷ ὃ καὶ καλὰ τὸ ὀνώνυμον κίονες αὐτοῖς παραπεπήχασι. Which paſſage I have rendred after this manner: In dextro autem ac ſiniſtro latere, ex adverſo fornicum poſitæ ſunt columnæ, On the right hand and on the left, oppoſite to the Arches are placed Pillars. Doubtleſs, this word παραπήχασι, does either ſignify that which I have ſaid [to wit, to place over againſt, or oppoſite,] or elſe juxta ponere, to place near. Langus, Nicephorus's Tranſlatour, renders theſe words of Evagrius, which we have placed at the beginning of this Note, after this manner; Juxta porticus hæ ex ſaxo poliſto columnæ decentiſſime conſtructæ ſunt, near theſe portico's there are pillars of poliſh'd ſtone moſt gracefully built. Valeſ.

c In the midſt, there is an open Court, wrought with a great deal of art: in which [Court] ſtands the Pillar forty cubits long, wherein that incarnate Angel upon earth led a celeſtial life. In the Roof of the ſaid Portico's, there are [d] Clatri, (ſome term them Windows;) [e] verging both towards the foremention'd open Court, and alſo towards the Portico's. At the left ſide therefore of the Pillar, I my ſelf [f] together with the whole multitude there gathered together, (the Countrymen being dancing about the Pillar,) have ſeen in the Window a Star of a vaſt magnitude, running all over the Window and glittering, not once, nor twice, nor thrice, but often: which [Star] vaniſh'd frequently, and appear'd again on a ſudden.

c Chriſtophorſon underſtood this place much amiſs. For thus he has rendred it: Verſùs medium Templum, atrium eſt ſub dio, towards the middle of the Church there is an open court. Evagrius

d Κλειθείδια. Langus and Chriſtophorſon have tranſlated it Cancellos, Lattiſes; which I can by no means approve of. For κιγκλίδες ſignify Cancelli. I would therefore rather render it Clatri. In the Old Gloſſes Clatri are thus deſcribed; κανόνες, οἱ ἐν τοῖς δυείοιν ὀβελίσκοι, Squares, (that is, Croſs-bars, or Lattiſed-bars) or Bars that are in windows. But in the other Gloſſes, Clatrare is expounded κλείειν, claudere, to ſhut. The Original therefore of the Greek and Latine word is the ſame. Valeſ.

e I am of the ſame opinion with Chriſtophorſon and Sir Henry Savil, who inſtead of ἀποκεινόμενα, anſwering, mended it thus; ἀποκλινόμενα, verging, or declining. Notwithſtanding, Nicephorus defends the common reading, to wit, ἀποκεινόμενα anſwering. Moreover, Nicephorus adds ſome words, which are not at this day extant in our Evagrius. The paſſage is thus worded in Nicephorus: ἄφ' ἧς αὐταῖς δὴ τῆ σταῖς καὶ τὸ ῥηθὲν θεωμένιον ὑπαιθρον ἀποκείνεται, καὶ χώραν δίδωσι τοῖς ἡσημένοις ἐκλὸς ὁρᾶν ἀπὸ τῆς ἔσωθεν καὶ ἔκ πάλιν ἀπὸ τῆς ἔξοθεν. Which place in Nicephorus Langus renders thus: ——— Porticibus ipſis & ſubdiali quæ dicta eſt aulæ reſpondentes, locumq; volentibus dantes, ut ex ipſo templo extra, & rursùm ab exteriori templi parte in templum proſpicere poſſint; Which [clatri] are anſwerable both to the Portico's themſelves, and alſo to the ſaid open Court, and afford a place to thoſe that are deſirous of looking out, from within the Church; and again, of looking into the Church, from its outward part. Whence Nicephorus had this, I know not; unleſs it were from Symeon Metaphraſtes, who had written the Life of Symeones the Stylite. Nicephorus does indeed atteſt, that he himſelf had read Metaphraſtes's Life of Symeones. And 'tis not likely, that Nicephorus ſhould have added this of his own head. Now, for what reaſon theſe words were added, I have as to me it ſeemeth apprehended; To wit, Metaphraſtes (or, if you will, Nicephorus himſelf,) thought that the Women, who were in no wiſe ſuffered to go into that ſacred Edifice, beheld that Star, here mentioned, from theſe Windows. But, he is much miſtaken, as we ſhall declare by and by. Valeſ.

f Muſculus renders this paſſage thus; Cum univerſo collecto illic agreſtium circa columnam ſaltantium populo, Together with the whole multitude [or people] of the Countrymen there gathered together dancing round the Pillar. Whom Chriſtophorſon has followed; having expunged the comma, which is placed after the word [together.] But this rendition is not to be born with. For the Countrymen were not the only Perſons then in the Church of Saint Symeon, when this Star was ſeen by Evagrius. But many Citizens were there alſo at that time, of which number Evagrius was one. Beſides, the People which Evagrius ſays were there gathered together at that time, were in the Portico at the left hand of the Pillar. But, the Ruſticks were in the Atrium, [or open Court,] dancing about the Pillar. Valeſ.

But

But this happens only on those days, observed in memory of that most holy Person [Symeon.] There are those who say, (nor are we to disbelieve the Miracle, both because of their credibility who affirm it, and by reason of other things which we our selves have beheld:) that they have seen even [g] his very Person flying up and down this way and that way, with his long beard, and his head covered with a * Tiara, as it was wont to be. The men who come to this place, have free liberty to enter in, and go round the Pillar many times together with their beasts that carry burdens. But a most exquisite care is taken, (for what reason I cannot say,) that no woman should go into the Church. Therefore, they stand without [the Church,] at the Porch, and behold the Miracle. For [h] one of the [Church] Gates is placed exactly opposite to the glittering Star.

[g] Αὐτὸ δὴ τὸ σῶμα τοῦτο. In Nicephor. the reading is πέφυκεν, which I think to be right est. In the Tellerian MS. I found it written σεσωσμένον, the accent being changed. Vales.

* A round ornament, worn by Princes and Priests on their heads; it was heretofore the dress of the Persian women.

[h] Ἡ μία τῆς θυρῶν. Instead of the word [θυρῶν, Gates,] Nicephorus made it [θυρίδων, Windows] which was ill done, as I have remarked above at Note (e.) For, the women could not see through the window, in regard they [the women] were in the Porch, but the windows were placed in the very top of the Portico's, into which the women were forbid to come. Johannes Langus therefore, having followed our Evagrius, has upon a good account corrected Nicephorus. For, thus he renders it; Mulieres quoque, sed extra templum ad postes stantes, miraculum hoc spectant. Janua enim una ex adverso stellæ fulgentis locata est. Women also, but they stand without the Church at the gate, do behold this Miracle. For one of the gates is placed over against the shining Star. Vales.

judgments upon what they see, are not [byassed] either by affection or hatred. They perswade him therefore, [b] to be a partaker of the salutary Regeneration, and to take the Sacerdotal yoak upon him, [c] although he had not as yet embraced the Doctrine of the Resurrection, * nor would be induced to believe that Article: they having most truly conjectured, that these [Sentiments] would follow these Persons other virtues, [in regard] the divine grace would permit [him] to have nothing imperfect. Nor was their expectation frustrated. For, what and how great a Person he proved, is sufficiently attested by the Epistles which he wrote with much Elegancy and Learning after his [undertaking] the Sacerdotal Function, by the [d] Oration he spoke to [the Emperour] Theodosius himself, and by those other useful Works of his that are extant.

[b] Or, to count himself worthy of the salutary Regeneration; that is, Baptism, as far as may be collected from these and the following words. Evagrius seems to have thought, that Synesius was baptized and promoted to the Episcopal dignity at one and the same time. And yet, that this is false, Petavius proves by many Arguments, in his Notes upon Synesius, pag. 2 and 3. Notwithstanding, Evagrius is followed by Photius in his Bibliotheca, and by Nicephorus book 14. chap. 55. Although Nicephorus says not that Synesius had been baptized and ordained at one and the same time; but, that when Theophilus had prevailed with him to receive Christian-baptism, afterwards he endeavoured to perswade him to enter upon the Episcopal Function. See Nicephorus's words, at the book and chapter now cited. Vales.

* Or, nor would think so.

[c] Many Persons, I perceive, have perswaded themselves, that when Synesius was elected Bishop by the Inhabitants of Ptolemais, he wholly disbelieved the Resurrection of Bodies. Notwithstanding, that this is not true, Synesius himself attests in his 105th Epistle, which he wrote to his brother Euoptius, who was then at Alexandria. In that Letter, he gives reasons why he could not undertake the Bishoprick offered to him. ——— One of which is, The Resurrection of Bodies. His Sentiment concerning which point, he declares in these words; τῷ καθωμιλημένῳ ἀνάστασιν ἱερόν τι καὶ ἀπόῤῥητον ἡγοῦμαι, καὶ πολλοῦ δέω ταῖς τῶν πολλῶν ὑπολήψεσιν ὁμολογῆσαι, That much spoken of Resurrection I account a Sacred and Mystical thing, and am far from assenting to the opinions of the Vulgar. Synesius therefore did not wholly deny the Resurrection of the dead; but expounded it agreeable to the Platonicks, and to Origen. Baronius (at the Year of Christ 410,) thinks, that whatever is said by Synesius in this Epistle, is not spoken seriously, but feignedly and dissemblingly, that he might decline the burthen of a Bishoprick. But Petavius has deservedly found fault with this opinion of Baronius. For he says, that 'tis much more likely, that Synesius wrote these things to his brother in a manner agreeable to what he then thought. But, that having been afterwards instructed by Theophilus and other Prelates, before he was made a Bishop, he embraced a true opinion concerning the Resurrection. Lucas Holstenius has at large examined this Question, in a peculiar Dissertation, which in favour to the Studious, we have set forth at the close of our Annotations. [The Learned Reader will meet with this Dissertation, de Synesio & de fugâ Episcopatûs, at the Close of the third Vol. of the Ecclesiastick Historians set forth by Valesius, at pag 202 of Valesius's Notes.] In the interim, the Reader is to be advertised, that there is a Mistake in the Contents of this Chapter, and in Photius's Bibliotheca, where Synesius is termed Bishop of Cyrenæ. Synesius was indeed by Country a Cyrenæan. But he was Bishop of Ptolemaïs, which is a City in Cyrenaïca. Vales.

[d] He means the Oration de Regno. Which notwithstanding was not spoken to Theodosius Junior, but to Arcadius in the Year of Christ 400, that is, ten Years before Synesius had undertaken the Bishoprick; as Dionysius Petavius has rightly observed in his Notes at that Oration of Synesius. CHAP. XV.

Concerning Saint Isidorus Peluſiota, and Synesius Bishop of Cyrenæ.

During the same [Theodosius's] Reign flourished Isidorus also, * whose glory (to use a Poetick Expression,) is far spread, a Person celebrated amongst all men, both for his Actions and Eloquence. This man † macerated his Body with Labours in such a manner, and fatned his Soul with sublime and divine doctrines to so high a degree, that he lived an Angelick life upon earth, and was always the living ‖ Monument both of a Monastick life, [a] and also of a Contemplation upon God. He wrote many other [pieces] filled [with passages] of manifold utility; he wrote also to the celebrated Cyrillus, from which [Letters] 'tis evidently demonstrated, that he flourished in the same times with the divine [Cyrillus.] But because 'tis my endeavour to adorn * this History as much as 'tis possible, come on, let Synesius [Bishop] of Cyrenæ come forth, that he may beautify our History † with the eminency of his own Name. This Synesius was accomplished with all other [Arts and Sciences;] but * excelled in Philosophy to so high a degree, that he was the Admiration of those Christians, who in passing their

[a] Nicephorus (book 14. chap. 53. where he transcribes this passage of Evagrius) words it thus; τῆς ἐς θεὸν θεωρίας, of a contemplation upon God. The same Reading I found in the Tellerian MS. It may also be mended thus; τῆς ἐνθέου θεωρίας, of a divine contemplation. [In Robert Stephen's Edition, the Reading here is, τῆ ἐς ἐνθεωρίαν.] Further, there is an illustrious Elogy of this Isidorus Peluſiota, extant in Ephremius Bishop of Antioch in his Epistle to Zenobius Scholasticus, which Photius records in his Bibliotheca. Where he says, That he was by birth an Alexandrian, and venerable amongst the Archbishops themselves, Ἀλεξανδρεὺς ὢν ἔτυχε καὶ τοῦ κύρους καὶ τῆς ἀρχιερωσύνης αἰνίττομαι. Vales.

a Evagrius does frequently quote the History of this Johannes the Rhetorician in his following books. For instance, in chap. 12 of his second book, in chap. 10. and 28. of his third book, and in the fifth chapter of his fourth book. But he is a far different Person from

CHAP. XVI.

How the Divine Ignatius, having been removed from Rome, was deposited at Antioch.

At the same time also, as 'tis recorded by [a] Johannes the Rhetorician and others, the Divine Ignatius (after he had obtained, agreeable to his desire, the bellies of wild beasts for his Tomb, in the Amphitheatre at Rome; that Johannes, of whom Evagrius makes mention at the close of the last chapter of his fifth book. For, this Johannes, last mentioned, had written an History of affairs from the latter end of Justinian's Reign, unto the Reign of Mauritius, as Evagrius does there attest. (See Evagrius book 5 chap. 24.) But the former Johannes had recorded the affairs transacted in the Reign of Theodosius Junior, Leo, and Zeno, as may be concluded from those passages, which Evagrius has taken out of that Johannes. And he had closed his History at the Destruction of Antioch, which happened on the ninth Year of Justinus Senior, as Evagrius relates. Further, that Johannes which I have mentioned in the second place at the beginning of this Note, was born at Epiphania. For Evagrius (in the fore-cited place, viz. book 5. chap. 24.) terms him his fellow-Citizen and Kinsman. Now, Evagrius was by original extract an Epiphanian, as I have shown in My Account of his Life and Ecclesiastick History. But, the Johannes Rhetor, whom Evagrius mentions in this chapter, (if I may have leave to conjecture,) seems to me to have been an Antiochian. For, whatever passages our Evagrius cites out of him, belongs to the City of Antioch. I have been more large in my Annotation on these thing, for this reason, that I might correct the Mistake of Johannes Vossius, who in his Comment de Historicis Græcis, has confounded these two Johannes's, one with the other. Vales.

and after his stronger bones which were left [undevoured,] had been conveyed to Antioch, [and deposited] in that place termed the [b] Cœmitery; many years after [all this, I say,]) is removed: the All-good God having instilled it into the mind of Theodosius, to bestow greater honours upon that [c] Theophorus, and to dedicate a Temple (which the Inhabitants termed The [d] Tychæum,) heretofore consecrated to Dæmons, to that Valiant Conquerour and Martyr.

[b] The obscurity and ill punctation of this place, led Nicephorus in the first place, and after him Christopherson, into a Mistake. The obscurity of this passage arose from hence, because our Evagrius, according to his usage, includes too many words in one and the same period, which were to have been divided into more periods. Therefore, after the word [Cœmitery] a distinction is to be placed, which neither Nicephorus nor Christopherson saw. Nicephorus thought, that the Reliques of Ignatius were brought from Rome to Constantinople in the times of Theodosius Junior, and having been carried to Antioch by the same Emperour's order, had been deposited there in the Cœmitery. Which is most notoriously false. For, long before Theodosius Junior's Reign, the Reliques of the Martyr Ignatius had been deposited in the Cœmitery of the City Antioch, as Saint Jerome does expressly attest in his book de Scriptor. Ecclesiast. where these are his words concerning Ignatius. Reliquæ corporis ejus Antiochiæ jacent extra portam Daphniticam in Cœmiterio, The Remains of his body lie at Antioch, without the Daphnitick gate in the Cœmitery. Theodosius Junior therefore translated not the Reliques of Ignatius from Rome to Constantinople, and after that to Antioch; but he ordered them to be removed out of the Cœmitery which was without the City of Antioch, and carried into the City. Thus, 'tis certain, Musculus understood this passage in Evagrius, as appears from his Version. For he has rendred it thus; Tunc & divinus Ignatius, posteaquàm sicuti voluerat, &c. Then also the divine Ignatius, after (according as he had desired) he had obtained the bellies of wild beasts instead of a sepulchre, in the Roman Ampitheatre, and his bones as being the stronger [parts of him] had been left by the beasts, were carried to Antioch, and buried in the Cœmitery, a long time after) is removed by Theodosius, &c. Musculus seems to have expunged the Article ἀ, that the whole place might be construed after this manner; ἐπειδὴ τάφων ἐχόντως ἀπεκομίσθη, &c. Which I very much approve of. Vales.

[c] Τὸν Θεοφόρον. This seems to have been the Sur-name of the Blessed Ignatius. Which is concluded from hence, because we read this Title prefixt before all his Epistles, Ἰγνάτιος ὁ καὶ Θεοφόρος, Ignatius who also [is termed] Theophorus. In the Martyrdom of the Blessed Ignatius, Archbishop Usher has set forth, Ignatius stiles himself Theophorus in the presence of the Emperour Trajan. And, being asked, who Theophorus was, he answers; He who bears Christ in his breast. Vales. See Socrat. Eccles. Histor. book 6. chap. 8. note (a.)

[d] The Heathens attributed to all Cities their Genii, to whom they built Temples, which in Greek were termed τυχαῖα or τυχεῖα; as I have remarked at Eusebius Pamphilus's book concerning the Martyrs of Palestine, chap. 11. note (q.) The Temple of the publick Genius of the City of Antioch is mentioned by Amm. Marcellinus book 23. pag. 238; which Julian in his Misopog. terms τὸ τῆς τύχης ἱερόν. Vales.

That therefore which had heretofore been the Temple of the publick Genius, is made a pure Church, and holy Temple [dedicated] to Ignatius; his sacred Reliques having with great pomp been conveyed into the City on a Chariot, and deposited in that Temple. On which account, a solemn Festival and a [day of] publick joy is celebrated [yearly] even till our times; which [Festival] has been rendred more magnificent by Gregorius Bishop [of that place.] These things were done here, [because] from that time God would honour the pious memories of [his] Saints. For, the impious and destructive Julian, that Tyrant, hateful to God, (in regard Apollo Daphnæus, * who made use of [e] Castalia for a voice and † an Oracle, could not give any answer to the Emperour consulting his Oracle, because the holy * Babylas, his near neighbour, had quite stopped up his mouth:) against his will, and forc'd thereto by stripes [as it were,] honoured the Saint with a removal: (at which time a spacious Church was erected to him before the City, which [structure] continues standing at this day:) to the intent that the Dæmons might in future freely perform their own [business,] according as ('tis reported) they had before-hand promised Julian. This affair therefore was by the dispensation of God our Saviour ordered in this manner, to the end that the power of those who had suffered Martyrdom might be made manifest, and that the sacred Reliques of the holy Martyr, removed into an undefiled place, might be honoured with a most beautiful Church.

* Or, who had Castalia, &c.

[e] He means the Castalian Fountain. Concerning which Am. Marcellinus, Gregorius Nazianz. and others have related many things. Gregorius's words in his second Invective against Julian (Tom. 1. pa. 127. Ed. Paris. 1609) are these: πάλιν ἡ κασταλία ἐσίγησεν, καὶ σιγᾷ καὶ ὕδωρ ἐστὶν ἃ μανθάνομεν, ἀλλὰ γελῶμεν· πάλιν ἀνδριὰς ἄφωνος ὁ Ἀπόλλων· πάλιν ἡ δάφνη φυτόν, &c. Castalia hath been silenced again, and is silent, and it is water not uttering Oracles, but exciting laughter. Apollo [is become] a dumb statue again. Daphne [is] a tree again, &c. At which words of Gregorius, see (if you please) what the Scholiast Nonnus has remarked, chap. 21. I should not have taken notice of this, had I not perceived that neither of the Translatours had seen it. Vales. Nonnus's Scholion (which Valesius here referrs his Reader to,) is this: Castalia fons erat in Antiochia, Castalia was a fountain in Antioch, at which Apollo is by the Antients reported to sit, and to give forth Oracles at the water. And when any persons came thither on account of consulting the Oracle, that water (as 'tis reported) sent forth gentle blasts and puffs of wind; and then the Priests, who were about the Fountain, declared those things which the will of the Dæmon had brought forth.

† Or, wonder.

IN these very times, that much-talk't-of War was raised, by Attila King of the Scythæ. Which War Priscus the Rhetorician has written with much accuracy and eloquence, relating [to us] in a singular neatness and elegancy of stile, how * he undertook an Expedition against the Eastern and Western parts [of the Empire,] how many and how great Cities he took and reduced to a subjection to himself, and [lastly] after the performance of what great [Actions] he departed out of this life. Whilst the same Theodosius swayed the [Imperial] Scepter, a most terrible and horrid [a] Earthquake, which exceeded all others that had been before, happened almost throughout the whole World. In so much that many Towers belonging to the Imperial City [Constantinople] fell down flat, and that called the Long-wall of Cherronesus fell likewise; the Earth also was rent in sunder, and many Villages sank down into it: Moreover, many and almost innumerable calamitous Accidents

* Attila.

[a] This Earthquake happened on the year of Christ 447 in the Consulate of Ardabures and Callepius; as Marcell. reports in his Chronicon, and the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle doe relate. Marcellinus's words are these: Ingenti terræmotu per loca varia imminente, plurimi urbis Augustæ muri recenti adhuc reædificatione constructi, cum quinquaginta septem turribus corruerunt: An exceeding great Earthquake being imminent through several places, a vast part of the walls [or, most of the walls] of the Imperial City which had been but very lately rebuilt, fell down, together with fifty seven Towers. Which words I have annexed for this reason, that I might shew that Evagrius's words here have been misunderstood by Translatours; who rendred these words [ἀνὰ τὸ βασιλίδα] thus [in Palatio, in the Palace;] when as they ought to have rendred them, in the Imperial City. By which name Evagrius usually calls Constantinople. Vales.

dents hapned both at Land and Sea. For, some Fountains were wholly dryed up; and in other places abundance of water gushed forth, where there had been none before. Trees, of themselves vastly rooted, were thrown up into the air [b]together with their roots. And many heaps of earth were on a sudden made up into mountains. The Sea threw forth dead fishes [upon its shore,] and many Islands therein were swallowed up. Ships making their Voyages at Sea, were seen upon dry ground, the waters having receded [and left them.] Many places in Bithynia, in the Hellespont, and in both The Phrygias, were sorely damnified. This calamity raged over the whole earth for some time; notwithstanding, it continued not with that vehemency wherewith it began: but abated by small degrees, till such time as it wholly ceased.

[b] Σὺν τοῖς σφίσι ῥίζαις. The Rules of Grammar do require, that we should write σὺν ταῖς σφῶν ῥίζαις, together with their roots. In the Tellerian MS. the reading is σὺν ταῖς. A little before, where the reading is διαχύναι τὴν γῆν, the earth was dissipated; the same Manuscript has it written thus: διασύναι τὴν γῆν, the earth was separated, or, rent in sunder. Vales.

CHAP. XVIII.

Concerning the [publick] Buildings in Antioch, and who they were that erected them.

[a] Instead of [τὴν ἡμετέραν θρησκείαν διαπρέποντες;] it must, I think, be [τῇ ἡμετέρᾳ θρησκείᾳ διαπρέποντες, Personages eminent for, &c. For, this reading is required by the Rules of Grammar. Vales.

IN these very times [of Theodosius's Reign,] Memnonius, Zoïlus, and Callistus, [a] Personages eminent for [their profession of] our Religion, were sent by Theodosius to be [b] Governours of Antioch. Memnonius, with much of beauty and accuracy raises from the very ground that [Æ-difice] which by us also is termed the Psephium, leaving an open Atrium [or, Court] in the middle. Zoïlus [built] the Royal Porticus, which [is placed] [c] at the South-side of Rufinus [his Porticus;] and retains his name even to our age, although the buildings have [frequently] been altered on account of various calamitous accidents. Moreover, Callistus has raised a most magnificent and splendid structure (which as well the Ancients as those of our Age, have termed Callistus's Porticus,) before * that Palace which is made the Court of Judicature, directly oppoſite to the Forum, in which there is a most beautiful house, the [d] Prætorium of the Masters of the Milice. After these persons, Anatolius being sent Master of the Milice into the East, built that termed Anatolius's Porticus, and beautified it with matter of all sorts. These [Remarks] (though they are foreign to our design in hand, yet) [will not seem] unhandsome and contemptible to lovers of Learning.

* Or, those buildings which are made, &c.

[b] That is, to be Consulares of Syria. For, the Consularis of Syria governed the City Antioch, and the other Cities of Syria-Cœle. Further, take heed of supposing, that these three men (to wit, Memnonius, Zoïlus and Callistus) were sent at one and the same time by Theodosius, to preside over the Antiochian Jurisdiction. For this was not the usage of the Romans. We ought therefore to understand, that each of them had been sent at several times, one after the other, by Theodosius. You must know further, that 'twas usual for the Consulares of Syria, that they might ingratiate themselves with the Antiochians, to erect some publick structure. Libanius informs us hereof (in his Antiochic. pag. 370. Tom 2. Edit. Paris. 1627.) in these words: ὃ δὴ θαυμαστὸν, εἰ τοῖς μὲν ἄλλοις κρείττω τὴν ἄλλων, &c. 'Tis no wonder therefore, if that [City] which excells the rest in other things, which, after she has vanquished other [Cities] in the study and exercise of wisdom, has [out-done] even herself, should render those who come to be her Governours, her Lovers. The beginning, middle, and close of each of which persons Government, is this, to make some addition to the City. The same Libanius a little before in the same page, says there were three Tribunals in the City Antioch, and as many Scholes of Advocates, to wit, equal to the number of the Tribunals, [or Judicatories.] The first Tribunal seems to have belonged to the Præfectus Prætorio of the East, whose residence was at Antioch. The second was the Tribunal of the Comes of the East. The third was the Jurisdiction of the Consularis of Syria Cœle. Libanius's words are these: ἀνὰ δὲ τῆς ἐν τοῖς πολλοῖς παιδείας, τρεῖς χορὶ ῥητόρων, ἰσάριθμοι τοῖς δικαστηρίοις ἀγείρονται: which passage is to be rendred thus: For, besides the Erudition which is in the Decuriones, three Scholes [or, Quires] of Advocates are [there] assembled, equal in number to the Judicatories. Vales.

[c] The reading in Robert Stephens's Edition, and here is this [πρὸς τὸ νότιον τῆς ῥοφίνε πλευρᾶς, at the Southern part of Rophinus's side.] The Geneva-Printers, from Christophorson's Copy, have set it forth thus: τῆς τῦ παλατίε ῥυφίνε πλευρᾶς, at the [Southern] side of Ruphinus's Palace. Sir Henry Savil also, in his Copy which I have by me, has expunged the word Rufinus, and in stead thereof has substituted these [τῦ παλατίε ὄροφον, the Roof of the Palace.] And thus Christophorson read, as 'tis apparent from his Version. For he has rendred it thus: Qui ad Australe latus tecti palatii, quod Rufini nomen obtinet, spectat; which looks towards the southern side of the Roof of the Palace, which bears the name of Rufinus. But in regard these words [τῦ παλατίε] or [τῦ παλατίε ὄροφον] occur not, either in the Kings, or in the Florentine, or Tellerian M.SS. in my judgment, they ought deservedly to be expunged. Vales. Valesius has rendred this passage thus: quæ ad meridianum latus porticus Rufini sita; which we have expresst in our English Version. The import of the Greek, if rendred word for word, is this, at the Southern part of Rophinus's side.

[d] Τῶν στρατηγῶν τὸ καταγώγιον. Musculus renders it, Mansionem ducum, the Mansion of the Duces, or, chief Military Commanders. Christophorson's Version is not much different; for he renders it thus: è regione fori in quo pulcherima domus est quam præfecti præsidiorum incolere solent; Over against the Forum wherein there is a most beautiful house, in which the Præfects of the Milice [or, of the Military Forces,] do usually dwell. But, by στρατηγὸς in this place, in my judgment, must be understood, (not the Military Commanders in chief, or, Masters of the Milice but) the Magistrates or Duumviri, who in Greek were termed στρατηγοὶ, as I have already remarked in my notes on Am. Marcellinus, and Eusebius; [See Euseb. Eccles. Hist. book 7. chap. 11. note (p.) and book 8. chap. 11. note (c.)] Now, why I suppose this word is rather thus to be taken here, this is the reason, because that house is said to have been in the Forum, over against the Palace wherein was the Court of Judicature. Moreover, such a house as this seems to be more agreeable to a Municipal Magistrate, than to a Rector of the Milice. Besides, these houses were in Greek termed στρατήγια. Such a one was the Strategium at Constantinople, as I have noted at the first Book of Socrates, [chap. 16. note (d.)] Although the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle, in The Transactions of the Emperour Severus, brings another reason of this word. But now, having examined the business more attentively; by στρατηγὸς I understand here the Masters of the Milice throughout the East, who had a splendid Prætorium in the Forum of the City Antioch. Theophanes mentions this Prætorium, in his Chronicon, pag. 147. ἀνήφθη γὰρ τὸ πῦρ ἀπὸ τῦ μαρτυρίε τῦ ἁγίε στεφάνε, καὶ ἕως τῦ πραιτωρίε τῦ στρατηλάτε ἐφθασεν; For the fire was kindled from the Church of Saint Stephen, and burnt [or, went] as far as the Prætorium of the Master of the Milice. Vales.

Concerning the several Wars, which hapned both in Italy, and Persia, during the Reign of Theodosius.

* During the times of the same Theodosius, frequent Rebellions hapned in Europe, whilest Valentinianus was Emperour of Rome. Which Theodosius repressed, by sending great Forces both by Land and Sea, [which made up] [a] as well a Foot Army, as a Naval strength. Moreover, he vanquished the Persians (* who were grown insolent, Isdigerdes, Father to Varanes, being then their King, King, or as † Socrates's Sentiment is, during the Reign of Varanes himself:) in such a manner, that on their request to him by their Embassadours, he gratified them with a Peace, which [b] lasted until the twelfth year of Anastasius's Reign. These transactions have been related by other Writers; and are also very handsomely reduced into an Epitome, by Eustathius the Syrian of Epiphania, who has likewise written The Siege of Amida. At the same time, as 'tis said, the Poets [c] Claudianus and [d] Cyrus flourished. Further, this Cyrus arrived at the heighest Chair of the Præfects, which [grand Officer] our Ancestours termed The Præfectus Prætorio [or Præfect of the Court.] He was also Master of the Western Milice, at which time Carthage was taken by the Vandals, those Barbarians being [then] governed by Genserichus.

[b] Here it must be διήκεσε; not διήκησε, as it is in Robert Stephens's Edit. Valesius.

[c] This is the Claudian, whose excellent Verses are at this day extant. But, a twofold difficulty occurrs at this place: (1) How a Latine Poet should come to be mentioned here by Evagrius? (2) Why he is placed by the same Evagrius on the times of Theodosius Junior, when as That Claudian, whose verses we now have, flourished in the Reigns of Arcadius and Honorius, as His writings inform us? The answer to the first Question is easie. For Claudian wrote not only Latine, but Greek Poems also. On which account, in the Old Epigram which was inscribed on the Basis of his Statue, he is said to have had the soul of Virgil and Homer also, transfused into him. He began to write a Latine Poem first in the year of Christ 395, whereon Olybrius and Probinus were Consuls. He wrote an Elegant Poem on their Consulate, which is still extant. When this attempt had succeeded happily to Claudian, it encouraged him to the writing of Latine verses afterwards; whereas he had published only Greek Poems before, as himself attests in his Elegy to Probinus, in these words:

Romanos bibimus primùm Te Consule fontes,
Et Latiæ cessit Graja Thalia togæ.

Incipiensque tuis à facibus omina ceti,
Fataque debebo posteriora Tibi.

'Tis certain, Claudian was by Nation a Grecian, born at the City Alexandria, as Suidas informs us at the word κλαυδιανός. Claudian himself also attests the same, in his Poem to Hadrianus Præfectus Prætorio, (who was himself also an Alexandrian.) For he writes thus concerning Alexander the Macedonian;

Conditor hic patriæ. Sic hostibus ille pepercit.

And in the close of the same Poem, he has these words:

Sæviet in miseros cognata potentia cives.
Audiat hæc commune solum, longéque carinis
Nota Pharos, &c. Valesius.

[d] The Poet Cyrus was by Nation an Ægyptian, born at the Town Panopolis. Who having on account of his poetick faculty been highly acceptable to Eudocia Augusta, wife to Theodosius Junior, (for this woman was φιλοεπὴς, a Great lover of verses:) is promoted by the Emperour Theodosius to the Præfecture of the Prætorium, and to That of the City. He was also Ex-Consul, and Patricius, as Suidas relates. But afterwards, when the Empress Eudocia, on account of some unknown reasons, had left the Palace, and was gone to the City Jerusalem; Cyrus, deprived of his power, is made Bishop of Cotyæum a City of Phrygia, or rather of Smyrna, as the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle and Theophanes do inform us. He lived till the times of Leo Augustus, as Suidas attests. Theophylact (in the 8th book of his History, chap. 8.) makes mention of this Cyrus the Consul and Poet; where he says, that the Church of the God-bearing Virgin at Constantinople, was built by him, in the times of Theodosius Augustus. Valesius.

CHAP. XX.

Concerning the Empress Eudocia, and her daughter Eudoxia; and how [Eudocia] came to Antioch, and [went] to Jerusalem.

[MOreover,] this Theodosius married Eudocia, (after she had received salutary Baptism; by original extract an Athenian, [a Woman] eloquent and beautiful;) by the mediation of Pulcheria Augusta his sister. By her Theodosius had a daughter, [by name] Eudoxia, whom, when she afterwards came to be marriageable, the Emperour Valentinianus married, having [on that account] gone from the Elder Rome and arrived at Constantinople. [a] But,] a long time after this, [Eudocia] in her journey which she made to the Holy City of Christ our God, [b] comes hither: this manner: ἡ δὲ χρόνοις ὕςερον, But a long time after this, she;] that is, Eudocia. For, unless you add this particle; what follows will be meant concerning Eudoxia, Eudocia's daughter; of whom Evagrius has spoken just before. But, the adding of this particle [δὲ, But] shews that the discourse is not now concerning Eudoxia, but her Mother Eudocia. Valesius.

[a] A particle is to be added here, after

[b] Εὐδαίμονα γίνεται. Musculus and Christophorson understood this place very erroneously. For, they supposed that by the word εὐδαίμονα the City of Jerusalem was meant; when as the City Antioch is to be understood. For Evagrius wrote his History at Antioch, in which City he had fixt the Mansion of his own fortunes, as we have shown in our account of his Life and Ecclesiastick History. Moreover, Nicephorus fell into the same mistake with Musculus and Christophorson. For in his 14th book, chap. 50. where he writes out this passage of Evagrius, he understands the word [εὐδαίμονα] of the City Jerusalem. But, 'twas easie to have perceived from Evagrius's following words, that these words could not have been meant of the City Jerusalem. For Jerusalem was not a Colony of Greeks, but rather of Jews, and after that, of Romans. Nor did Ulpianus, Libanius, and the other writers here mentioned by Evagrius, write concerning the City Jerusalem. Nor, lastly, could the Empress Eudocia, who by original extract was an Athenian, speak to the Citizens of Jerusalem in this verse, Ὑμετέρης γενεῆς τε καὶ αἵματος εὔχομαι εἶναι.

I boast that I am of Your Stock and Blood.

'Tis certain, the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle does say, that Eudocia made an Oration to the Antiochians out of a Golden Chariot, Valesius.

And having made an Oration in publick to the people here, she closed her Speech with this Verse:

I boast that I am of Your Stock and Blood.

(Intimating thereby the Colonies which had been sent hither out of Greece. If any one be desirous of having an exact account of these [Colonies,] [c] Strabo the Geographer, Phlegon, Diodorus Siculus, Arrianus, and [d] Pisander the Poet, have written concerning them with great accu-

[c] That place in Strabo, which Evagrius points to here, is extant in his 16th book; page. 750. Edit. Paris. Valesius.

[d] There were two Pisanders, Poets. The one a Rhodian, who wrote the Poem Heraclea in two books, which treates concerning Hercules's Actions. Some make this Pisander ancienter than Hesiod. Others place him on the thirty third Olympiad, as Suidas relates. The other Pisander was a Lycaönia, born at Larindi a Town of Lycaönia, son of the Poet Nestor. Suidas says he flourish'd in the Reign of Alexander son of Mammea. He wrote six books in Heroïck Verse, ἡρωϊκῶν θεογαμιῶν, concerning the marriages of the Heroes and Goddesses, which were stuft with all manner of History, as Suidas attests. Zosimus mentions this work in his fifth Book: where he speaks concerning the building of the City Hemona: ὡς ὁ ποιητὴς ἱςορεῖ πείσανδρος, ὁ τὴν κατὰ ἡρωϊκῶν θεογαμιῶν ὁπτεσφῆ πᾶσαν, ὡς εἰπεῖν, ἱςορίαν συνειλοχώς: which words of Zosimus, Leunclavius translates in this manner; Sicuti Pisander Poeta memoriæ prodidit, qui heroicarum divinarumque nuptiarum titulo totam hanc propemodùm historiam complexus est, As Pisander the Poet has recorded, who under the Title of Heroick and Divine marriages, has in a manner comprized this whole History. This is not the meaning of Zosimus's words. For Zosimus says, that Pisander the Poet, in that Poem of his concerning the mariages of the Heroes and Goddesses, has in a manner comprehended all History. Suidas does likewise attest the same; whose words concerning Pisander are these: ἔγραψεν ἱςορίαν ποικίλην δι' ἐπῶν. ἣν ὁπτεσφῶς ἡρωϊκῶν θεογαμιῶν ἐν βιβλίοις ἕξ, he wrote a various History in verses; which he intituled, concerning the marriages of the Heroes and Goddesses, in six books. In this work therefore, Pisander had written concerning Triptolemus the Argive, and concerning Iö, who were the first that built Antioch, a City of Syria. Further, this work seems to have been comprehended in sixteen books, and not in six, as 'tis erroneously extant in Suidas. For Stephanus in his book de Urbibus, cites the tenth, and fourteenth book of Pisander. Valesius.

racy: as have also [e] Ulpianus, [f] Libanius, and [g] Julianus, [all] most incomparable Sophistæ.) On which account, the Antiochians at that time honoured her with a Statue artificially made of Brass, which Statue continues standing at this day. By her perswasion, Theodosius made a very great addition to [this] City, extending its wall as far as the Gate which leads to the Suburbs of Daphne; as may be seen by those who are desirous of it. For even in this our age [the foundation of] the old wall is visible, its remains leading them by the hand as 'twere, who have a mind to view it. Notwithstanding, there are those who affirm, that the Elder Theodosius enlarged the wall; and bestowed two hundred pound weight of Gold upon [h] Valens's Bath, part whereof had been consumed by fire.

[e] This is Ulpianus the Antiochian Sophist, who taught Rhetorick first at Emesa, and afterwards at Antioch, in the Reign of Constantine, as Suidas attests. Eunapius mentions him in the Life of Proæresius the Sophist.

This person therefore, amongst the other Orations which (as Suidas relates,) he wrote, had composed a peculiar Oration in praise of his own Country, wherein he spake concerning the Colonies at several times brought into it. Vales.

[f] Libanius the Antiochian Sophist wrote an Oration, with this Title, Antiochius, which is still extant, published in the Second Tome of his Works. Nor is it to be doubted, but Evagrius means this Oration at this place. Further, in the said Oration, Libanius with great accuracy recounts all the Greek Colonies, which at several times had been brought to Antioch. Amongst these he reckons also those Athenians, whom Seleucus, after the destruction of the City Antigonia, had brought to Antioch. Vales.

[g] Who this Julianus the Sophist should be, I have not yet found. There was one Julianus a Cappadocian, the most eminent of all the Sophists of his own time, who taught Rhetorick at Athens. Concerning whom Eunapius relates many passages, in his book de Vitis Sophistarum. Suidas says he flourisht in the times of Constantine the Great. But whereas he says, that he was Contemporary with Callinicus the Sophist, therein he contradicts himself; in regard Callinicus the Sophist lived in the Reign of Philippus and Gallienus. I am apt to think therefore, that there were two Julianus's Sophists at Athens. The former of whom lived in the same times with Callinicus the Sophist. But the other flourisht in the Reign of Constantine the Great.

[h] Amm. Marcellinus mentions this Bath in his 31 book, near the beginning: his words are these; Vocesque Præconum audiebantur assiduè, mandantium congeri ligna ad Valentini Lavacri succensionem, studio ipsius principis conditi. And the voices of the Cryers were heard continually, ordering wood to be heaped together in order to the burning of Valens's Bath, built by the endeavour of that Prince. Vales.

CHAP. XXI.

That Eudocia did [many] good actions about Jerusalem; and concerning the different Life and Conversation of the Monks in Palestine.

FRom this City therefore, Eudocia[a] went twice to Jerusalem. On what account [she did this,] ‖ or what her primary design (as they say) was, must be left to Historians; who notwithstanding, in my jugdment, seem not to declare the truth.

[a] The reading in Robert Stephens is [διαφιλνεῖται, went.] Nicephorus read [δὶς ἀφιλνεῖται, went twice.] For (book 14. chap. 50.) he words it thus: καὶ δὶς δὲ λόγος ἔχει ταύτῃ ὁπὶ τῶν ἱεροσολύμων ἀφίκεσθαι, And 'tis reported that she went twice to Jerusalem. Which reading Christophorson has followed, as 'tis apparent from his Version. For he renders this place thus: Eudocia vero Constantinopoli Hierosolymam bis profecta est, But Eudocia went twice from Constantinople to Jerusalem. And thus I found it expresly written in the Tellerian Manuscript. Eudocia's former journey to Jerusalem hapned on the sixteenth Consulate of Theodosius which he bore with Faustus, on the year of Christ 438, as Baronius has rightly observed from Socrates and Marcellinus's Chronicon. On the year following, she returned from Jerusalem to Constantinople, carrying along with her the Reliques of Saint Stephen as Marcellinus relates in his Chronicon. But, Writers are not agreed, on what year her second Jerusalem-journey hapned. Baronius places it in the Reign of Marcianus Augustus. But I do maintain, that this second journey was undertaken by Eudocia Augusta long before Marcianus's Empire, whilest Theodosius survived. For Marcellinus in his Chronicon (at the XVIII. Consulate of Theodosius Augustus which he bore with Albinus, which was the year of Christ 443) writes thus: Severum Presbyterum & Joannem diaconum Eudociæ Reginæ, &c. Saturninus the Comes of the Domesticks, being sent by the Emperour Theodosius, kills Severus the Presbyter and Joannes the Deacon of Eudocia Augusta, who were ministring at the City Ælia. Eudocia, by what grudge [or grief] incited thereto I know not, killed Saturninus forthwith: and being immediately deprived of her Royal servants, by the command of the Emperour her Husband, he stay'd to die at the City Ælia. The same is confirmed by the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle. For he relates, that in the same Consulate Paulinus the Master of the Offices was slain by the Emperour Theodosius's order: and therefore, that Eudocia being aggrieved (for she knew that Paulinus had been slain on her account;) requested of the Emperour Theodosius, that a liberty might be allowed her of going to Jerusalem. Notwithstanding Marcellinus in his Chronicon places Paulinus's slaughter on the year of Christ 440, Valentinianus being then the fifth time Consul with Anatolius. Therefore, if Eudocia went the second time to Jerusalem on account of Paulinus's slaughter, according to Marcellinus's opinion, that hapned on the year of Christ 440. Further, concerning Saturninus the Comes (whom Eudocia Augusta ordered to be slain at Jerusalem,) there is a passage extant in the History of Priscus Rhetor, pag. 54; which I will annex here: Καὶ πρὸς τοῦτο ἐπένευσε βασιλεὺς, καὶ σατορνίλῳ πρεσβύτῃ, καὶ ἡδὺ κοσμικῷ, δυνατέρᾳ εἰρήνῃ σώσειν. Τὸν δὲ σατορνίλον ἀνῃρήκει ἀδυναίς ἢ καὶ εὐδοκία. ἀμφοτέροις γὰρ ἐκαλεῖτο τοῖς ὀνόμασιν.

But after her arrival at Christ's holy City, she performed many things in honour of God [our] Saviour. For she built * religious Monasteries, and those they term the [b] Lauræ.

* Or, pure.

[b] A Laura differs from a Monastery, because a Laura consists of many Cells far disjoyned one from another. But a Monastery is inclosed within one wall. And in a Laura the Hermites [or, Anachoretes] lived: but in a Monastery the Monks lived together. Cyrillus Scythopolitanus informs us hereof, in his Life of Euthymius, in these words; Te autem oportet venire ad meam Lauram, &c. But it behoves you to come to my Laura, and to pull down the Cells of the Brethren to the very foundations. But [you must] build a Monastery there, where you have built my Cœmetery. For it pleases God, that the place should not be a Laura, but a Monastery rather. The same Cyrillus, in the Life of Saint Saba, does frequently declare the same difference between a Laura and a Monastery. Our Evagrius also at this place observes the same difference between the Phrontisteria [Monasteries] and the Lauræ. For in the Phrontisteria (says he,) the Monks lived in flocks, [or, companies,] made use of a common table, and performed the diurnal and nocturnal prayers together. But, in the Lauræ, the Anachoretes lived separately, shut up in small Cells. Vales.

In which, the way of living is different: but [there] conversation * is directed to one and the same scope of piety. For some live in companies, and are desirous of none of those things which depress [the soul of man] to the earth. For they have no Gold. But why do I mention Gold, when as not one of them has either a † garment of his own, or any thing of food [properly belonging to himself?] For, that * garment or short coat, wherewith one is cloathed now, is by and by put on by another: so that, one's garment seems to belong to all of them, and all of them to have a right in the use of one's garment. A common table is spread for them, not covered with dainty provisions, nor with any other meats; but furnished only with herbs and pulse, of which they are supplied with such a quantity only, as is sufficient to keep them alive. They pour forth their common prayers to God all day and all night long, afflicting and † wearying themselves with labours in such a manner, that they seem to look like some dead persons with graves [c] above the earth. They frequently perform those termed the [d] Fasts of Superposition, continuing their fasts during the space of two, or three whole days. There are some of them who fast five days, and more, and [after that] with much adoe take necessary food.

* Or, Terminates in one and the same pious design.

† Ἰσως ἐσθῆς.

* Short cloak.

† Or, pressing.

[c] I am of the same mind with Christophorson, who (instead of [ὑπὸ γῆν, under the earth]) read [ὑπὲρ γῆν, above the earth;] which latter reading Nicephorus (book 14 chap. 50.) has followed. Besides, the word [δοκεῖ, seem] was wanting here; which we have put in from the Florentine MS. In the Tellerian MS. I found it written, ὑπὲρ γῆν, above the earth. Vales.

[d] Τὰς καλυμμὰς ὑποθέσεις. Musculus and Christophorson have rendred this place very ill. Nicephorus has explained it well in this manner:

manner: ἔτοι δὲ πολλάκις καὶ δύο καὶ τρεῖς ὑπερδέχονται καὶ ἡμερῶν. εἰσὶ δὲ οἳ καὶ πεμπ[άσιοι καὶ] πλεῖόν τινος διαλείποντες ἄσιτοι: that is, theſe perſons frequently extend their faſts to the length of two and three days. There are thoſe [of them] who for five days and more, continue without taſting of meat. Dionyſius Petavius alſo, in the fifth chapter of his Miſcellaneous Exercitations againſt Salmaſius, has rightly expounded this place of our Evagrius; to wit, concerning Superpoſition, which was the moſt exquiſite ſort of faſt among the Chriſtians. But, whereas Petavius conjectures, that inſtead of ὑπερθέσεις, it ſhould be written here ὑπερθέσεις; in this I cannot aſſent to him, in regard this emendation recedes too far from the footſteps of the vulgar reading. Indeed, at this place I would rather make it ὑπερθεσίμους. But, you muſt underſtand [ἡμέρας, days] or [νηστείας, faſts.] The Latines have termed it Superpoſitionem, Superpoſition; inſtead of Jejunium, faſt: as may be ſeen in the Eliberitane Council, and in the Pœnitential Canons. See what we have remarked at the fifth Book of Euſeb. Eccleſ. Hiſtor. chap. 24, note (m.) In the incomparable Tellerian MS. I found it written ὑπερθεσίμους, as I had conjectured. Valeſ.

Again, others enter upon a contrary Courſe of life, ſhutting themſelves up alone in very ſmall houſes which have ſuch a breadth, and ſuch an heighth, as that they cannot ſtand upright in them, nor yet with conveniency lie down; [thus] † Heb 11. 38. they continue with patience † in Dens and Caves of the earth, according to the Apoſtle's expreſſion. Other ſome live together with the Beaſts, and make their prayers to God in ſome Coverts of the Earth which are paſt finding out. Moreover, another way of living has been found out by them, which tranſcends * all the degrees of fortitude and ſufferance. For, penetrating into a Deſert ſcorched [with the Sun,] as well men as women, and covering thoſe parts only which modeſty forbids to be named, they expoſe the reſt of their bodies naked to the ſharpeſt and moſt intenſe colds and heats of the air, equally deſpiſing heats and colds. They wholly reject that food which men uſually eat; and feed upon the ground (on which account they are termed [c] Boſci,) whence they take no more than ſufficeth to keep them alive. So that, in time they become like unto beaſts, and the ſhape of their [bodies] is depraved and altered, and the Sentiments of their minds in future becomes diſagreeable to thoſe of other men: whom when they ſee, they run from; and being purſued, thy either [make their eſcape] by the ſwiftneſs of their feet, or [f] get into ſome impaſſable places in the ground to hide themſelves. Moreover, I will relate another thing, which I had almoſt forgot, although it is the principal thing of all. There are ſome perſons amongſt them, though but very few, [g] who, after they are arrived at a freedom from perturbations of mind by [a continued exerciſe of] virtue, return to the world, and ſhewing themſelves to be mad in the midſt of crowds of men, they thus trample upon vain glory, which Coat (according to wiſe Plato,) the ſoul does uſually put off laſt.

* Or, all manner of, &c.

[c] Βοσκὸς; that is, Pabulatores, Feeders upon the ground. Sozomen (book 6. chap. 33.) relates, that ſome Monks in Meſopotamia were called by this named becauſe they were the firſt who found out this ſtricter ſort of abſtinence. Valeſ.

[f] Inſtead of [ποιέζονται] the reading in the Florent. MS. is truer; which is this, πειέζονται get into. Beſides, inſtead of ἑαυτοῦ, it muſt be made ἑαυτοῖς. Valeſ.

[g] I have reſtored this place partly from the Florent. and partly from the Tellerian MSS. after this manner: ὅτι ἐπὰν διὰ τῆς ἀρετῆς τὸ ἀπαθὲς ἔτι) τύχωσιν, who, after they are arrived at the freedom from Perturbations of mind by [a continued exerciſe of] Virtue. In the Florent. MS. the reading is [εὐπαθὲς, obnoxious to injuries:] but in the Tellerian MS. and in Nicephorus 'tis [ἀπαθὲς, free from perturbations of mind] A little after this, inſtead of [φερόφρες, turning themſelves about,] it muſt undoubtedly be mended thus [φερέφρες, mad;] which is the reading in Nicephorus. Valeſ. In Robert Stephens's Edition, this whole paſſage is thus worded and pointed: ὅτι ἐπὰν δὴ τῆς ἀρετῆς τὸ εὐπαθὲς ἔτι) τύχωσιν, ἐς κόσμον ἐπανίασι ἐν μάσις τοῖς δοξύδοις. Καὶ φερόφρες, &c. Which I cannot make ſenſe of.

* Or, ſtudied, or deviſed.

Further, they have * learned to eat with ſuch undiſturbedneſs as to their paſſions and affections, that, [h] if need ſo requires, [they eat] with Victuallers and Retailers of Proviſion, without blushing either at the place, or the perſon, or at any thing elſe. They often frequent the publick Baths alſo, and for the moſt part converſe with and bath themſelves in the company of Women; having vanquiſhed their paſſions to ſuch a degree, that they * put a force upon nature her ſelf, and are not to be [i] inclined to [what is proper to] their own nature, either by the ſight, or touch, or even the very embracing of a woman. But with men, they are men, and with women they are women; it being their deſire to partake of both Sexes, and not to be of one.

rendred this place thus: Adeo etiam ſine delectatione cibum capiunt, &c. They alſo take their meat ſo much without delight, and exerciſe ſo auſtere a diſcipline in that thing, that if neceſſity compells them to go into a Victualling-houſe, or a Brothel-houſe, they neither avoid the place, &c. Chriſtophorſon, no doubt following Nicephorus's expoſition, who (book 14. chap. 6.) has rendred Evagrius's words thus: ἀπαθῶς ἔνθεν ἐσθίουσες, κἂν ἐν καπηλείῳ ἢ μαιεωτείῳ εἰ τοῦτο δέηοι δρᾶν, &c. They eat without affection and commotion of mind, although [it be] in a Victualling-houſe, or baudy houſe, if there be a neceſſity of doing this. But I have reſtored this place from the incomparable Florent. MS. in this manner: κἂν ἐπὶ καπήλοις ἢ παλιγκαπήλοις δέηοι, if need ſo requires [they eat] with Victuallers or Retailers of Proviſion. What a παλιγκάπηλος was, and how he differed from a κάπηλος, I think every body knows. How much a κάπηλος differs from a Merchant; ſo much a παλιγκάπηλος differed from a κάπηλος. The old Gloſſes render παλιγκάπηλον in Latine dardanarium, one that buys proviſions to ſell them again. Valeſ.

[i] The conjecture of Learned men diſpleaſes me not; who inſtead of [μηδὲ ἀποχειδῶνται, &c. and will not anſwer to, &c.] have mended it thus, μηδὲ ἀποκλιδῶνται, and are not to be inclined to, &c. Which latter reading Chriſtophorſon has followed, as 'tis apparent from his Verſion. Notwithſtanding, Nicephorus has retained the vulgar reading to wit, that firſt mentioned. Valeſ.

To ſpeak briefly therefore, in this incomparable and divine way of living, virtue enacts laws contrary to nature, having eſtabliſhed Sanctions of her own, to wit, not to impart to any of them a ſatiety of thoſe things [which are] neceſſary [for life.] But * their Law commands them to be hungry, and thirſty, and to cover the body ſo far only, as neceſſity † requireth. And, their way of living is ſo equally and exactly poized and balanced, that when they tend diametrically oppoſite, they are not in the leaſt ſenſible of any alteration [of things,] although the diſtance between them be vaſt. For, things contrary are in ſuch a manner mixed in them, (the divine grace joyning things not to be mixt, and again ſeparating them;) that life and death, (which two are contraries, both in nature, and in the things themſelves,) dwell together in them. For where [there occurs] paſſion or perturbation, it behoves them to be dead and buried. But when 'tis [the time of] prayer to God, then [they muſt be] Robuſt in body, Vivid and Vigorous, although they are grown decrepid with age. Moreover, [k] both Sorts of life are ſo complicated and conjoyned in them, that although they have indeed wholly put off the fleſh, [yet] they live ſtill, and converſe with the living, adminiſtring medicines to bodies, offering up the deſires of ſuppliants to God, and [laſtly] performing all other things agreeably to their former life; [l] excepting only that they do not want neceſſaries, nor are limited to any place; but they hear all, and converſe with all.

* That is, the Monaſtick Law.

[k] Joannes Langus expounds theſe words concerning the preſent and future life. For he has rendred the place of his Nicephorus in this manner: Vitam utramque illi, &c. They do ſo complicate and conjoyn both lives, to wit, the future, &c. But in my judgment by theſe words [both ſorts of life] the Secular, and Monaſtick life are to be underſtood: which is, plainly confirmed by Evagrius's following words. For he ſays, πάντα ἄλλα ὁμοίως τῇ πρώτῃ βιοτῇ διαπραττόμενοι, and performing all other things agreeable to their former life. Valeſ.

[l] The reading of this place is truer in Nicephorus, thus πλὴν ὅσῳ μὴ τῆς ἀναγκαίων ἐνδείας ἔτι) καὶ τόπῳ περιορίζωσι, excepting only that they do not want neceſſaries, nor are limited to any place. Valeſ.

There

There are amongst them frequent and unwearied bendings of the knees, and [after them] [m] Laborious ſtations; Deſire being the only recreation of their Age, and of their voluntary infirmity. They are a kind of Champions without fleſh, Wreſtlers without blood; who inſtead of a ſplendid banquet and delicious dainties, have a faſt, and, in place of a full-furniſh'd Table, nothing (as near as 'tis poſſible) that they may taſt of. Whenſoever a ſtranger comes to them, though it be in the morning, yet they receive him with a ſingular hoſpitality, and friendly invitation to eat and drink; having found out another ſort of faſting, to wit, to eat even againſt their will. So that this thing ſtrikes [all men] with an aſtoniſhment, that (whereas they want [n] ſo many [neceſſaries] for ſufficient food, yet) they are contented with ſo very few: being enemies to their own wills and nature, but ſlaves [o] to the deſires of their neighbours; that in all things the ſweets of the fleſh might be expelled, and the ſoul might have the Government, prudently chuſing and conſerving what is beſt and moſt acceptable to God. Bleſſed perſons, in reſpect of the life they lead here; but much more bleſſed on account of their tranſlation to that other, after which they pant continually, haſtning to ſee [p] him whom they love.

[m] Inſtead of αὐμπόνοι, Laborious, I think it ſhould be ἀνίσχνοι, intent, or continued. For I have found, that theſe two words are frequently confounded in Manuſcript Copies. Valeſ.

[n] Inſtead of [πόσων ἐς τέρψιν, &c.] I doubt not but it ſhould be πόσων. Valeſ.

[o] We owe the amendment of this place to the Florent. MS. in which Copy, inſtead of [τῆς ἧσσ' πάλαι θελήμασιν] it is plainly written thus, τῆς ἧσσ πάλας θελήμασι, to the deſires of their neighbours. Sir Henry Savil had drawn a line under this place, ſignifying thereby, that there was a fault here. But he ſaw not how it was to be mended. Nicephorus alſo retains the vulgar reading. Valeſ.

[p] Τὸν ποθούμενον αὐτῆς. The reading in the Tellerian MS. pleaſes me better; which is [τὸ ποθούμενον αὐτοῖς, the thing deſired by them;] this to me ſeems more elegant. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXII.

What [Structures] the Empreſs Eudocia built in Paleſtine, and concerning the Church of the Proto-Martyr Stephen, within which ſhe was piouſly buried: moreover, concerning the Death of the Emperour Theodoſius.

WHen therefore the Wife of Theodoſius had converſed with many ſuch perſons as theſe, and had built many Monaſteries, like unto them which I have mentioned; and moreover, had repaired the Walls of Jeruſalem [and made them] much better; ſhe erected a vaſt Church, eminent for its * ſplendidneſs and beauty, [in honour] of Stephen the firſt of the Deacons and Martyrs, about the diſtance of one furlong from Jeruſalem. In which Church ſhe was depoſited, after her departure to an immortal life. Further, Theodoſius [having ended his life] ſometime after theſe things, or, as ſome will have it, before Eudocia; and changed the Empire (which had been Governed by him eight and thirty years,) [for an eternal life:] the moſt incomparable Marcianus aſſumes the Roman Empire. The Actions therefore, which were perform'd by Him during his Ruling the Eaſtern Empire, ſhall moſt plainly be ſet forth † in the following Book, provided divine aſſiſtance will furniſh us with its own favour and benevolence.

CHAP. I.

Concerning the Emperour Marcianus, and what ſigns preceded, * declaring he ſhould be Emperour.

* Or, declaring his Empire.

WHAT was tranſacted during the Times of Theodoſius [Junior,] we have comprehended in our Firſt †‡ Book. Come on, we will now bring Marcianus forth, that famous Emperour of the Romans; and in the firſt place we will relate, who and whence he was, and in what manner * he arrived at the Roman Empire: and then we will declare the affairs tranſacted by him, in their proper places [and times.] Marcianus therefore, as 'tis related by many others, and alſo by [a] Priſcus the Rhetorician, by orginal Extract was a Thracian, the Son of a Military man. * Deſiring to follow his Father's courſe of life, he went to Philippopolis, [hoping] he might there be enrolled in the Companies of the Milice. As he was going thither, he ſees the body of a man newly ſlain, which lay thrown upon the ground. Near to which he made a ſtand, (for he was eminent in reſpect of his other [endowments,] but moſt eſpecially, on account of his humanity and compaſſion:) lamented what had hapned, and for a ſufficient while deſiſted from proceeding on his journey, being deſirous to perform what was fitting [to be done to the dead body.] When ſome perſons had ſeen this, they gave the Magiſtrates of Philippopolis an account of it. Who having apprehended Marcianus, interrogated him concerning the Murder of the Man. When therefore conjectures and probabilities prevailed more than truth it ſelf, and than the tongue of the perſon accuſed denying the Murder; and when [Marcianus] was about to undergo the puniſhment of a Murderer; divine aſſiſtance on a ſudden diſcovered the perſon that had committed the Murder. Who having been puniſh'd for that fact with the loſs of his head, [thereby] * preſerved the head of Marcianus. Being thus unexpectedly ſaved, he goes to one of the Companies of the Milice in that place, [b] it being his deſire to enter himſelf a Souldier therein. They admired the Man, and conjecturing upon good grounds that he would in future become a great perſon and one of extraordinary worth, they received him moſt willingly, and enrolled him amongſt themſelves, not laſt of all, as the Military Law directs; but, in the place of a Souldier newly dead, whoſe name was Auguſtus, they regiſtred Marcianus (who was likewiſe called Auguſtus,) in the Muſter-Roll. Thus [Marcianus by] his own name was beforehand in poſſeſſion of the denomination of our Emperours, who at ſuch time as they put on their Purple [aſſume] the Appellation of Auguſti. As if the name had refuſed to abide with him without the dignity; and again, as if the dignity could have required no other name for its being majeſtically adorned. So that, his Proper, and his Appellative name was the ſame; both his Dignity, and likewiſe his Appellation, being declar'd by one and the ſame denomination. Moreover, another accident hapned, from which it might be conjectured, that Marcianus would come to be Emperour. For, having had a Mili-

[a] Inſtead of [Patriſcus] it muſt be Priſcus, which is the reading in the Tellerian MS. and in Nicephorus, Book 15. This is the Priſcus, out of whoſe Books of Hiſtory we have the Excerptæ Legationes. Valeſ.

[b] Ἐν αὐτῷ παρεγγέλλοντος βουλόμενος. Muſculus has rendred it well, thus, Ut in eo militiæ nomen daret, That he might liſt, [or, enter] himſelf a Souldier therein. Not that the term παρεγγέλλω does exactly import the ſame with nomen dare, to liſt, or, enter or, enroll: For, παρεγγέλλω does properly ſignify, to deſire and to ſue for. So Dionyſ. Halicarnaſſæus, about the cloſe of his 11*th Book*, uſes this Phraſe, παρεγγέλλειν τῷ ἀρχῆν, to ſue for an Office. But, Appian uſually words it thus, παρεγγέλλειν εἰς τῷ ἀρχήν. And ſo does the Old Author in Suidas, in the word παρεγγέλλονίας. Now, Candidates, when they ſued for an Office, were wont nomen ſuum profiteri, to tell their name and be enrolled. Johannes Langus renders it, Militare Sacramentum dicere, to ſay the Military Oath. Which Verſion I diſprove of. For παρεγγελία is the album militare, the Muſter-Roll, wherein the names of all the Souldiers were regiſtred. Vegetius, Book 2. Chap. 5. terms it Matriculam, the Liſt of Souldiers. Evagrius uſes παρεγγελία in this ſenſe, hereafter in this Chapter; μαρκιανὸν τὸν ϗ αὔγυστον ἐς τῷ παρεγγελίαν ἐγγεγράφασιν, they regiſtred Marcianus (who was likewiſe called Auguſtus) in the Muſter-Roll. Further, the names of the Souldiers were inſerted into the Muſter-Roll, before they had ſaid the Oath; as Vegetius atteſts in the fore quoted place. Candidus Iſaurus makes uſe of the ſame term, in his firſt book Hiſtor. where his words concerning Leo are theſe: ὃς ἦν ἐκ δακίας μὲν τῆς ἐν ἰλλυρίοις ϛρατιώτας παρεγγελὰς τάξεσι, who was of that Dacia in Illyricum, having been regiſtred in a Military Company. tary Command under Aspar [in the War] against the Vandals, it hapned that Marcianus, together with many others, was taken Prisoner, (Aspar having been very much worsted by the Vandals;) and brought into a Field with the other Captives; it being Geisericbus's desire to see the Prisoners. After they were gather'd together, Geisericbus being seated in an high room, pleased himself with viewing the multitude of those taken Prisoners. And in regard much time was spent [there, the Prisoners] did what each of them had a mind to: (For Geisericbus had given order, that those who guarded the Captives, should loose them from their bonds.) Some of them therefore did one thing, others another. But Marcianus laid himself down on the ground, and slept in the Sun, which was hot and more scorching than usual at that season of the year. [In which very interim] an Eagle came down from on high in the Air, and raising her self by a flight with her face perpendicularly opposite to the Sun, made a shadow like a Cloud over Marcianus, whereby she refreshed and cooled him. Geisericbus wondring hereat, with great foresight conjectured at what would happen; and when he had sent for Marcianus, he caused him to be dismissed from his Captivity, having first bound him in great Oaths, that after his coming to the Empire, he should inviolably keep his faith to the Vandals, and not move his Arms against them. Which ingagement, as [c] Procopius relates, Marcianus did in reality keep and perform. But leaving this digression, let us return to our Subject. Marcianus was pious towards God, just as to what related to his Subjects: accounting these true riches (not which were hoarded up, or brought together from the Collections of Tribute; but them only) which might supply the wants of the indigent, and render their Estates who possest much, secure and safe. He was formidable, not for his punishing, but because ['twas feared] he was about to punish. On these accounts therefore he obtained the Empire, [which fell to him] not by an hereditary Right, but [was] the reward of his vertue; as well the Senate, as all other persons of what degrees and orders soever, conferring the Imperial dignity upon him by a general suffrage, to which they were perswaded by Pulcheria. Whom, in regard she was Augusta, Marcianus married; but knew her not as a Wife, she continuing a Virgin till her death. And these things were done, before Valentinianus Emperour of Rome had confirmed this Election by his own consent. Notwithstanding, by reason of [Marcianus's] Virtue, he afterwards made it authentick. Further, it was Marcianus's desire, that [one] Worship might in common be exhibited to God by all persons, (those tongues, which had been confused through impiety, being again piously united;) and that the Deity might be praised with one and the same * Doxology.

[c] The words of Procopius, which Evagrius points to here, were heretofore extant in the first book of his Vandalicks. But now they are wanting in the Augustane Edition, at pag. 96. For there is a defect in the Greek Text there, after these words ὥσε δέρας ἀχ- δόμενοι. Vales.

* Or, Glorification.

CHAP. II.

Concerning the Synod at Chalcedon, and what was the Occasion of its being convened.

WHilest therefore the Emperour's mind was taken up with these desires, there came to him, both the * Responsales of Leo Bishop of the Elder Rome, affirming that Dioscorus in the second Ephesine Synod, had not admitted of Leo's Letter, wherein was contained † the Doctrine of the true Faith: and also those persons who had been injured by the same Dioscorus, intreating that their Cause might be judged in a Synod of Bishops. But above all Eusebius, who had been Bishop of Dorylæum, was most importunately urgent, saying, that by the treacherous contrivances of Chrysaphius Theodosius's [a] Protector, he and Flavianus had been deposed, because, to Chrysaphius demanding Gold for Flavianus's own Ordination, Flavianus (to shame him) [b] had sent the sacred Vessels; and because Chrysaphius agreed with Eutyches in his erroneous and false Opinions. Eusebius said moreover, that Flavianus had been beaten, and kickt, and in a miserable manner murdered by Dioscorus.

* Διακονήμενοι τοῖς ἀποκρίσεσι, those persons that were employed in the answers, &c.

† Or, the determination of Orthodoxy.

[a] Ὑπατοῦ, that is, The defender of the Emperour's person, or, his Protectour, Chrysaphius is thus termed by Priscus Rhetor, in his Excerpt. Legationum. The Authour of the Alexandrian Chronicle calls him Spatharius, which we may render Esquire of the Emperour's body. He is termed Spatharius also in Gestis de nomine Acacii, which Jacobus Sirmondus hath set forth. Vales.

[b] Theophanes in his Chronicon relates that Theodosius Junior, who then made his Residence at Chalcedon, by the impulse of Chrysaphius commanded Flavianus, (newly ordained Bishop of Constantinople,) that for his Ordination he should send him the Eulogiæ, [that is, the Loaves of Benediction, or, pieces of the Blessed bread. See Socrat. Book 7. Chap. 12. Note (b;) and also Meursius's Glossary, at the word εὐλογίαι] And when Flavianus had sent white loaves, in the name of a Benediction, Chrysaphius made answer, that the Emperour demanded golden Eulogiæ. In answer to which Flavianus wrote back, that he had no money which he could send, unless instead of money he should present him with the sacred Vessels of the Church. And this thing, as Theophanes says, raised a deadly grudge between Chrysaphius and Flavianus. Vales.

For these reasons, a Synod is convened at Chalcedon, Couriers and Expresses being sent, and the Bishops in all places called together * by the most pious Emperour's Letters, first at Nicæa: (in so much that, Leo Bishop of Rome, writing to them concerning those persons he had sent to supply his own place, to wit, Paschasinus, Lucentius, and the rest, inscribed [his Letters thus,] To those convened at Nicæa:) but afterwards at Chalcedon in the Country of the Bithynians. [c] Zacharias Rhetor, in favour to Nestorius, does indeed [d] affirm that he was sent for out of Exile [to this Council.] But, that this was not so, may be conjectured from hence, that the Synod does every where Anathematize Nestorius. The same is also expressly attested by Eustathius Bishop of Berytus (in his Letter to Johannes a Bishop, and to another Johannes a Presbyter, concerning the matters agitated in the Synod,) in these very words: Those persons meeting again, who demanded Nestorius's Reliques, cried out against the Synod, [in this sort:] For what reason are Holy Men Anathematiz'd? In so much that the Emperour, being highly incensed, commanded his Guards by force to drive them a far off. How therefore Nestorius could have been called [to this Council,] who was dead long before, I cannot tell.

* Or, by pious Letters.

[c] Zacharias Rhetor wrote an Ecclesiastick History from the beginning of the Emperour Marcianus's Reign (as it may be conjectured from this place,) until the Reign of Anastasius. But, he wrote not with sincerity and moderation (as an History ought to be written,) but was corrupted with favour and hatred, that is, ἐμπαθῶς, with affection and partiality, as Evagrius says. Evagrius attests the same concerning him, in Book 3. Chap. 7. And in Chap. 18. of his third Book, he accuses the same Zacharias of negligence. Vales.

[d] In the Florentine MS. the reading of this place is more entire thus, ἐκ τῆς ἐξορίας μεταπεμπτὸν γινέσθαι φησί. And we have rendred it accordingly. Vales. In Robert Stephens Edition, the words [ἐκ τῆς ἐξορίας, out of Exile] are wanting.

CHAP. III.

A description of the Great Martyr Euphemia's Church, which is in [the City] Chalcedon: and a Narrative of the Miracles perform'd therein.

[THE Fathers] therefore are assembled in the sacred Church of the Martyr Euphemia. This Church stands in Chalcedon, a City belonging to the Province of the Bithynians. It is distant from the Bosphorus not more than two furlongs, [situate] in a most pleasant place, on an * eminence which rises easily and by degrees: in so much that, those who go up into the Church of the Martyr, are insensible of Labour in their walk; but being got within the Temple, on a sudden they appear at a vast height. Whence casting down their eyes as 'twere from a Watch-Tower, they have a prospect of all the Fields beneath, extended into a level and even Plain, clothed in green with grass, waving with standing corn, and beautified with the sight of all sorts of trees: [they see] woody mountains also, [the trees whereon] bend and then raise [their tops] finely to an heighth. Moreover, [they have a prospect of] several Seas, some of which [seem] * purple-colour'd by reason of their serenity, and do sweetly and mildly play with the Shoars; to wit, where the places are calm: but others are rough and boysterous with surges, by the very reciprocal motion of their waves forcing ashoar, † and mix'd with little stones, Sea-weed, and the lightest sort of shell-fish, and then drawing them back again. Moreover, the Church it self stands right over against Constantinople. So that, the Temple is [not a little] adorn'd with the prospect of so great a City. The Church consists of three most spacious Structures. The first is an Open Court, beautified with a large ‖ Atrium, and with Pillars on every side. After this there is another Structure, for breadth, and length, and pillars, [a] almost alike; differing only in this, that it has a Roof laid over it. In the Northern side whereof at the rising Sun, there is a round Edifice built in form of a [b] Tholus, set round within with Pillars most artificially framed, which are alike as to their matter, and equal in bigness. [c] Over these [Pillars,] there is an * Hyperon raised to a vast heighth, under the same Roof: so that, even in this Room also, they that desire it, may both supplicate the Martyr, and also be present at the sacred Mysteries.

* Or, hill.

* Τῇ γαλήνῃ πορφυρώμενα; which words Valesius renders thus: Serenitate renidentia, shining, or glistering by reason of their calmness.

† Κάλυκας; it signifies shells, or, sand full of little stones.

‖ Court, or, Courtyard.

[a] I have mended this place from the Florentine MS. after this manner; μιχθὲν παραπλήσι⊖, almost alike. Nevertheless, Nicephorus has followed the vulgar reading, which is μιχθὲς παραπλήσιως. In the Tellerian MS. I found it written μιχθὲὰ παραπλήσι⊖. Vales.

[b] Ἐς δόλον, that is, in form of a Cupolo, or Cuppolo; as the Italians now term it. Harpocration (in the word δόλ⊖) tells us, that the place where the Prytanes (who were a sort of Magistrates amongst the Athenians) eat, was termed Tholotus; ὑπ' ἐνίων δὲ (continues he) σκιὰς, διὰ τὸ ὅπως ὠκοδομῆθαι αὐτὴν στρογγύλον παρόμοιον δολίᾳ, but by some 'tis termed σκιὰς, (that is, an Arbour) because 'tis built round, in that form, like an hat with an high round crown.

[c] 'Tis strange that Translatours should not have perceived the fault of this place: for what can the sense be of these words; Sub his columnis tabulatum est sublime, &c. Under these Pillars there is an high Chamber, &c. according as Christophorson has rendred it? Instead of [ὑπὸ τούτοις, under these] it must undoubtedly be ἐπὶ τούτοις, over these; which is the reading in Nicephorus; his words are these: ἐφ' οἷς ὑπῆρών τι, &c. which Langus renders thus: Super quibus porticus sublimis eâdem sub Testudine constructa est, Over which [Pillars] there is an high Gallery built under the same Roof. Vales. * Or, Upper Room.

But within the Tholos, towards the East, [a] there is a magnificent Tomb, where lie the most holy Reliques of the Martyr, deposited in an oblong Chest (some term it [b] The Macra,) most curiously made of silver. The Miracles which are at certain times performed by the holy Martyr, are manifestly known to all Christians. For, frequently in their sleep she appears, either to the Bishops during their several times of presidency over that City, or else to some persons (otherwise eminent for [piety of] life,) who come to her [Church,] and orders them [c] to make their Vintage in the Temple. After this hath been made known, both to the Emperours, to the Patriarch, and also to the City; as well those who sway the Imperial Scepter, as the Pontiffs, Magistrates, and the rest of the whole multitude of the people, go immediately to the Church, with a desire to partake of the Mysteries. In the sight of all these persons therefore, the Bishop of Constantinople, together with the Priests about him, goes into the sacred Edifice, where the holy Body I have mentioned is deposited. [d] There is a little hole in the Chest, on its left side, which is shut up and made fast by small doors. Through this hole they let down a long iron rod, after they have fastned a sponge to it, as far as the most holy Reliques; and when they have turned the sponge about, they draw the iron rod up to them, [the sponge at the end whereof is] full of bloud, and bloudy clotters. Which when the people behold, immediately they adore and glorifie God.

[a] Ἐναφεστὼς δὲ σηκός. Langus and Christophorson render it Sacrarium, a Vestry, or little Chappel. Musculus translates it adytum, a secret place in a Church to which few have access. Which I approve not of. I have rather rendred it tumulum, a Tomb, or Monument. For that is the import of the term σηκὸς, as Hesychius and Suidas do attest. But, by a Tomb, or Monument, I mean a place fenced in with Barrs made lattise-wise, in the midst whereof was that silver Chest wherein the Reliques of the holy Martyr Euphemia were deposited. For, that it was so, is apparent from Evagrius's following words. Vales.

[b] Instead of μακρὰν Macra, I think it should be ἀρκὰν, The Ark. Truly, I do not see what sense there can be in the vulgar reading; in regard μακρὰ and ὀπωπικὴς signifie the same; nor is it a proper name, but an adjective. 'Tis better therefore to read ἀρκὰν, the Ark. Some persons, says Evagrius, term the Martyr's Chest, Arcam, the Ark. For so the Latines term it. The Old Glosses render σορὸς, arca funebris, an Ark, or Chest, for the dead. Vales.

[c] Κατὰ τὸ πέμπτον τρυσᾶν. Translatours understood not this place. Musculus and Christophorson made it τρυφᾶν. For Musculus renders it thus: Ut circa templum ad honorem ejus jucundentur præcipit, and orders them that in honour of her they should be merry about the Temple. And Christophorson translates it thus: Jubet ut in ipso Templo festum deliciis, & epiparis epulis celebrent, she orders that in the very Church they should celebrate a feast with dainties and sumptuous banquets. But, Evagrius's following words do altogether refute this emendation. For, he adds not one word at this place, which may in any wise belong to luxury or delicious food. Nicephorus has indeed retained the vulgar reading: but has explained it ill, thus: ἀφθόνως δὴ θαυμάτων τρυφᾶν ἐπεκελεύετο: that is, as Langus has rendred it, Ut miraculorum talium fructum perciperent, est cohortata, she exhorteth them, that they should freely partake of the fruit of such miracles. But Nicephorus added these words of his own head; nor has he comprehended Evagrius's meaning; in regard Evagrius speaks not here of more miracles, but of one only miracle, to wit, the bloud flowing out of the Tomb of the holy Martyr. I have followed the ordinary reading, and have explained this place in the simple and obvious sense concerning the making of a Vintage. Which agrees exactly with Evagrius's following words. For the bloud, which in a most plentiful manner was press'd out of the blessed Martyr's reliques, was not unlike Wine, which is squeezed out of press'd Grapes. Besides, the Festival day of the holy Euphemia fell on the time of Vintage, to wit, on the sixteenth of September, as we are informed from the Greek Menology. Vales.

[d] I am of the same opinion with Learned men, who instead of [ἔστι δὲ, But moreover] have long since altered the reading, and made it ἔστι δὲ, There is, &c. Which emendation is confirmed by the Tellerian Manuscript, and by Nicephorus. Further, Langus renders κλειθρίδιον (which is the term here used,) fenestellam, a little window: Christophorson translates it transennam, a Loup, or, Casement. I (as Musculus has done,) had rather render it foramen, an hole. For Sozomen terms it thus, Book 9. Chap. 2. where I have made more Remarks concerning such little windows as these, which were made in the Capsæ [Chests wherein were laid the Reliques] of the Martyrs. Vales.

[Further,]

[Further,] so great a plenty [of blood] is extracted out thence, that both the pious Emperours, and also all the Priests [there] convened, moreover the whole multitude which flock together at that place, in a most plentiful manner to partake of it, and likewise send it over the whole World, to the Faithful that are desirous of it. And the congealed blood lasts [so as it is] for ever, nor is the most holy blood in any wise changed into any other colour. * These miracles are performed, not at any determinate period of time, but according as the Life of the Bishop, and the gravity of his Morals shall † deserve. For, 'tis reported, that when ever a Person of probity, and one eminent for his Virtues, does govern [that Church,] this miracle is performed, and that most frequently: but when there is no such Prelate, such divine signs as these do rarely happen. But I will relate another [miracle,] which no time or season ‖ interrupts: nor does it make any difference between the Faithful and the Infidels; but 'tis alike * shewn to all Persons. When any Person comes into that place, wherein the precious Chest is, which contains most of the holy Reliques, † he smells a fragrant scent, which transcends all the usual savours [smelt] by men. For, this scent is neither like that ‖ which arises from Meadows, nor like that sent forth by any the most fragrant things; nor is it such a one as is made by Perfumers: but 'tis a certain strange and most excellent scent, [b] which of it self demonstrates the [virtues and] power of those things that produce it.

*Or, which things are magnificently celebrated.
†Or, require.
‖Or, cuts in sunder.
*Or, exposed, or, obvious.
†Or, he is fill'd with.
‖Or, which is gathered.
[b] The term [λειψανων, Reliques] is wanting in the Kings, the Florentine, and Tellerian Manuscripts, and likewise in Robert Stephens's Edition. Nor have the Geneva Printers done well, who from Christophorson's Books put this word in here, whereas it is in no wise necessary at this place; nor is it confirmed by the testimony of any written Copy. For, those various Readings which are produced from Christophorson's Books, are for the most part nothing else but the conjectures of Learned Men. This whole passage therefore ought to be written as 'tis read in the Tellerian and Florentine Manuscripts; to wit, thus: ἐξ αὐτῆς φερουσα των ἀναθυμιων τὴν δυναμιν, which of it self demonstrates the [virtues and] power of those things that produce it. And so Nicephorus read: for he has expresst this place of Evagrius thus: τεκμηριουσα τὴ ἀναθυμιῳ τὴν δυναμιν, which gives an indication of the power of that thing which produceth it.

CHAP. VI.

Concerning those things which were agitated and established in the Synod; and how Dioscorus [Bishop] of Alexandria was deposed; but, Theodoret, Ibas, and some others were restored.

IN this place, the Synod I have mentioned is convened, the Bishops Paschasinus and Lucentius, and Bonifacius the Presbyter, administring (as I have said,) the place of Leo Pont ff of the Elder Rome: Anatolius presiding over the Constantinopolitan [Church;] and Dioscorus being Bishop of [the Church of] the Alexandrians. Maximus [Bishop] of Antioch, and Juvenalis of Jerusalem [were there also.] Together with whom were present those Prelates whom they had about them; and also those Personages who held the principal places in the eminent Senate [of Constantinople.] To whom they who filled Leo's place, said, that Dioscorus ought not to sit together with them in the Council. For this they [affirmed] was given them in charge by their Bishop Leo, and unless it were observed, they would remove out of the Church. And when [those] of the Senate asked, what were the matters objected against Dioscorus; they returned answer, that he ought to render an account of his own judgment, who, contrary to what was fitting and just, had accepted the Person of the Judge. After which words, when Dioscorus by the Senates Decree had come forth into a place in the midst; Eusebius made his Request, that the Supplicatory Libel, which he had presented to the Emperour, might be recited; which Request he worded thus: I have been injured by Dioscorus; the Faith hath been injured; Flavianus the Bishop hath been murdered, and together with me unjustly deposed by him: do you give order, that my Supplicatory Libel may be read. Which thing when [the Judges] had discoursed of, the Libel was permitted to be read, the contents whereof were these.

[a] To the Lovers of Christ, our most religious and most pious Emperours, Flavius Valentinianus, and Marcianus, always Augusti; From Eusebius the meanest Bishop of Dorylæum, who speaks in defence of himself, of the Orthodox Faith, and of Flavianus of blessed memory who was Bishop of Constantinople. [a] This whole Preface, as far as these words, always Augusti, is wanting in the King, and Florentine, and Tellerian Manuscripts. Christophorson was the first that put in these words, from the Acts of the Chalcedon Council; notwithstanding, they seem not at all necessary at this place. Vales. The said Preface is wanting in Stephens's Edition; where also, instead of περὶ Δοσεβίυ, by Eusebius, the Reading is [περὶ Δοσεβίυ, concerning Eusebius.]

[b] Instead of [τῖς ἱερωσύνλω τελῶσι, to those who perform the Priesthood,] it must without doubt be written [τῖς εἰς ἱερωσύνλω τελῶσι, to those who are reckoned amongst the Ecclesiasticks;] as the Reading is in the first Action of the Chalcedon Council, where this Supplicatory Libel of Bishop Eusebius to the Emperour Marcianus is recorded. Vales.

[c] Instead of [θεραπεύεϛ, is worshipped] I doubt not but Evagrius wrote, θεραπεύεσε, you worship. 'Tis certain in the first Action of the Chalcedon Council, the Reading is θεραπεύονσες, worshipping. Which though it be corrupt, nevertheless confirms our Emendation. Vales.

ſmall and trivial, which he hath audaciouſly attempted, both againſt the Faith of Chriſt, and againſt Us, We fall at the feet of your [Imperial] Majeſty, and humbly beſeech You, to order the ſaid moſt Religious Biſhop Dioſcorus, to give in his anſwer to what is objected againſt him by us: to wit, by having the Monuments of the Acts, which he has made againſt us, read before an holy Synod. From which [Acts] we are able to demonſtrate, that he is eſtranged from the Orthodox Faith, hath confirmed an Hereſy full of Impiety, hath unjuſtly depoſed us, and in a moſt grievous and injurious manner oppreſſed us: You ſending your divine and adorable Mandate to the Holy and Oecumenical Synod of Biſhops moſt dear to God, to the end that it may hear the cauſe between us and the fore-mentioned Dioſcorus, and bring to the knowledge of Your Piety all that is tranſacted, * according to that which ſhall pleaſe Your Immortal Height. And if we ſhall obtain this, we will pour forth inceſſant prayers for your eternal Empire, moſt divine Emperours! After this, by the joynt deſire of Dioſcorus and Euſebius, the Acts of the ſecond Epheſine Synod were publickly recited. The particular declaration whereof, (it being † comprehended in many words, and contained ‖ within the Acts of the Chalcedon Council;) leaſt I ſhould ſeem verboſe to thoſe who haſten towards a [knowledge of] the concluſion of Tranſactions, I have ſubjoyned to this Second Book of my Hiſtory; giving thoſe Perſons who are deſirous of an exact and particular knowledge of all matters, a liberty of reading theſe things, and of having an accurate account of all tranſactions imprinted on their minds. [In the interim] I will curſorily mention the more principal and momentous matters: to wit, that Dioſcorus was * convicted, becauſe he had not admitted of the Letter of Leo Biſhop of the Elder Rome; and becauſe he had effected the depoſition of Flavianus Biſhop of New Rome, within the ſpace of one day; and becauſe he had gotten the Biſhops who were convened, to ſubſcribe [their Names] in a paper not written on, as if therein had been contained Flavianus's Depoſition. Whereupon, thoſe Perſons who were of the Senate, made this Decree. [d] We perceive that a more exact ſcrutiny concerning the Orthodox and Catholick Faith ought to be made to morrow, when [e] the Synod will be more compleat and full. But, in regard Flavianus of pious Memory, and the moſt Religious Biſhop Euſebius (from a ſearch made into the Acts and Decrees, and alſo from their teſtimony by word of mouth who preſided in the Synod then convened; who have confeſſed that they have erred, and depoſed them without cauſe, when he had in no wiſe erred in the Faith:) have, as 'tis evidently known, been unjuſtly depoſed: it appears to us (agreeable to that which is acceptable to God,) to be juſt, (provided it ſhall pleaſe our moſt Divine and moſt pious Lord,) that Dioſcorus the moſt Religious Biſhop of Alexandria, Juvenalis the moſt Religious Biſhop of Jeruſalem, Thalaſſius the moſt Religious Biſhop of Cæſarea in Cappadocia, Euſebius the moſt religious Biſhop of [f] Ancyra, Euſtathius the moſt Religious Biſhop of Berytus, and Baſilius the moſt Religious Biſhop of Seleucia in Iſauria, which [Prelates] had power, and preſided over the then Synod, ſhould lie under the very ſame puniſhment, being by [the Sentence of] the ſacred Synod according to the Canons * removed from the Epiſcopal dignity: all things which have been conſequently done being made known † to his moſt ſacred Imperial Majeſty. After this, Libels having been given in on the ſecond day againſt Dioſcorus, on account of [various] crimes, and concerning money [forcibly by him taken,] when Dioſcorus, being twice and thrice called, appeared not, by reaſon of [ſeveral] excuſes which he alledged; they who filled the place of Leo Biſhop of the Elder Rome, ‖ made this declaration in theſe expreſs words.

[g] What Dioſcorus who hath been Biſhop of the great City Alexandria, has audaciouſly attempted againſt the order of the Canons, and the Eccleſiaſtick Conſtitution; hath been made manifeſt, but by thoſe things which have already been inquired into at the Firſt Seſſion, and alſo from what hath been done this day. For this Perſon, (to omit many other things,) making uſe of his own authority, uncanonically admitted to Communion Eutyches, (a Man that embraces the ſame Sentiments with himſelf, who had been canonically depoſed by his own Biſhop of holy Memory, we mean our Father and Biſhop Flavianus; ) before * his ſitting [in the Synod] at Epheſus, together with the Biſhops beloved by God. Now, the Apoſtolick Sea hath granted a pardon to thoſe [Prelates,] for what hath been involuntarily done there by them. Who alſo to this preſent continue of the ſame opinion with the moſt holy Archbiſhop Leo, and with all the holy and Oecumenical Synod. On which account, he hath received them to his own Communion, as being aſſerters of the ſame Faith with himſelf. But † this Man till this very time hath not deſiſted from boaſting of theſe things, on account whereof he ought rather to mourn, and lay himſelf proſtrate on the earth. Beſides, be permitted not the Letter of the Bleſſed Pope Leo, to be read, (which had been written by him to Flavianus of holy Memory;) and this [he did] notwithſtanding he was ſeveral times entreated by thoſe Perſons who had brought the Letter, to ſuffer it to be read; and notwithſtanding he had promiſed with an Oath that it ſhould be read.

[d] This is the Sentence, which the moſt magnificent Judges who were preſent at the Chalcedon Council, pronounc'd after an hearing of the Cauſe: which Sentence is recorded in the very ſame words, in the firſt Action of the Chalcedon Council, pag. 152. Edit. Bin. Notwithſtanding, 'tis a wonder to me, that Chriſtophorſon had not ſeen this, who has confuſed and diſturbed all things at this place in ſuch a manner, that you can extract nothing of ſound ſenſe from his Verſion. That which diſturbed him, was this ſeeing the Secular Magiſtrates in a Council of Biſhops, and their pronouncing ſentence as Judges. But Chriſtophorſon ought to have conſidered, that thoſe Magiſtrates concerned not themſelves in the Cauſe of the Faith, but left the Biſhops a free right and power of determining concerning that matter. Indeed, at ſuch time as the Rule of Faith was drawn up by the Biſhops convened at Chalcedon, theſe very Magiſtrates, who before had often moved the Council that that might be done, would not be be preſent at the Seſſion of Biſhops. But in the buſineſs between Euſebius Biſhop of Dorylæum and Dioſcorus of Alexandria, in which affair nothing was treated of concerning the Faith, but concerning violence, fraud, and other crimes. In this buſineſs, I ſay, the Secular Magiſtrates had a right to pronounce ſentence. Which nevertheleſs was not a definitive ſentence, but an Interlocution only, as 'tis apparent from the Acts of the Council. Valeſ.

The not reading of this Letter [h] has filled the most Holy Churches over the whole World with scandals and detriment. Nevertheless, although such things as these have been audaciously attempted by him, yet it was our design, to have vouchsafed him something of compassion [i] in relation to his former impious Fact, as also to the rest of the Bishops beloved by God, although they had not the same authority [k] of judging that he was invested with. But in regard he has out-done his former iniquity by his * latter facts, (for he has audaciously pronounced an Excommunication against the most Holy and most Pious Leo Archbishop of Rome the Great: And moreover, (when Libels stuft with Crimes were presented to the Holy and Great Synod against him,) having been canonically called once, twice, and thrice, by the Bishops beloved of God, he obeyed not, to wit, being prickt by his own Conscience; [Lastly,] he has illegally received [to Communion] those, who had justly been deposed by several Synods: [on these various accounts we say] he himself has pronounced sentence against himself, having many ways trampled under foot the Ecclesiastick Rules. Wherefore, the most holy and most Blessed Leo Archbishop of the Great and the Elder Rome, by Us and the present Synod, together with the thrice Blessed and most eminent Apostle Peter, who is the † Rock and Basis of the Catholick Church, and the foundation of the Orthodox Faith, hath divested him of the Episcopal dignity, and * *hath removed him from [the performance of] every Sacerdotal Office. For, whereas the Legates of the Apostolick See do here speak to the Synod, they would not use the Imperative; because it seems more arrogant. They made use therefore of the Future Tense, as being the softer and more modest Mode of Expression. Notwithstanding, The old Translatour of the Chalcedon Council has rendred it in the Imperative Mood. In Nicephorus, book 15. chap. 30. the reading is ψηφίσωσι. Vales. In Robert Stephen's Edition, and in the Greek Text here, the reading is ψηφίζῃ, doth Decree; which perhaps is the truer reading.

These things having been confirmed by the Synod, and some other business done, those [Prelates] who had been deposed with Dioscorus by the entreaty of the Synod and the Emperours assent, obtained their Restoration. And some other things have been added to what was done before, they promulged a definition of the Faith, contained in these expres words.

[m] Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, when he confirmed the knowledge of the Faith to his Disciples, said, * My peace I give unto you, my peace I leave with you: to the end that no person should differ from his neighbour in the † Dogmata of Piety, but that the Preaching of the Truth might be equally demonstrated to all. After these words, when they had recited the Nicene Creed, and also [that * Creed] of the hundred and fifty Holy Fathers, they have added these words: That wise and salutary Creed of the Divine Grace, was indeed sufficient for the knowledge and confirmation of Piety. For, it delivers a perfect and entire Doctrine, concerning the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit; and it expresses and confirms the Incarnation of our Lord to those who receive it with Faith. But, in regard the [n] Enemies of Truth attempt to reject and abrogate the Preaching [thereof] by their own Heresies; and have * coyned vain and new Terms;) some daring to corrupt the Mystery of our Lord's Dispensation which [was made] upon our account, and denying the Term Theotocos [which is attributed] to the Virgin: and others introducing a confusion and mixture, foolishly imagining the Nature of the Flesh and of the Deity to be one, and monstrously feigning the Divine Nature of the Only Begotten to be by confusion passible:) therefore, this present, Holy, Great, and Oecumenical Synod, being desirous to * preclude all their [ways of] fraud invented against the Truth, and to vindicate that † Doctrine which from the beginning [has continued] unshaken; hath determined, that in the first place, the || Faith of the three hundred and eighteen Holy Fathers ought to remain and be preserved unattempted and inviolate: and upon their account who * impugne the Holy Spirit, this [Synod] confirms that Doctrine concerning the Substance of the Holy Spirit, which was afterwards delivered by the hundred and fifty Fathers convened in the Imperial City [Constantinople:] which Doctrine they promulged to all Persons, not as if they added any thing which had been wanting before, but that they might declare their own Sentiment concerning the Holy Spirit, against those who attempted to abrogate and abolish his Dominion and Power: but, upon their account who dare corrupt the Mystery of the Oeconomy, and [o] do rave [so] impudently [as to assert] him who was born of the holy Virgin Mary to be a meer Man; [this Synod] has admitted and approved of the Synodical Letters of the Blessed Cyrillus, who was Pastour of the Church of the Alexandrians; [which Letters Cyrillus sent] to Nestorius, and to the Eastern [Bishops,] and they are sufficient, both to confute Nestorius's madness, and also to explain the salutary Creed, in favour to such Persons as out of a pious zeal are desirous of attaining a true notion thereof. To which Letters, in confirmation of such Sentiments as are right and true, [this Synod] has deservedly annext the Epistle of the most Blessed and most Holy Archbishop Leo, President of the Great and Elder Rome, which he wrote to Archbishop Flavianus of Holy Memory, in order to the subversion of Eutyches's madness; [p] which Letter agrees with the Confession of Great Peter, *and is a certain common Pillar against those who embrace ill Sentiments. CHAP. V.

Concerning the Sedition which happened at Alexandria, on account of Proterius's Ordination; likewiſe [concerning what hapned] at Jeruſalem.

AFter theſe things, Dioſcorus * was baniſhed to Gangra [a City] in Paphlagonia; and by common Vote of the Synod, Proterius obtains the Biſhoprick of Alexandria. After he had taken poſſeſſion of his own See, a great and moſt inſufferable Tumult aroſe, the populace fluctuating [and being divided] into different opinions. For ſome demanded Dioſcorus, as it uſually happens in ſuch caſes: Others adhered pertinaciouſly to Proterius. So that thence aroſe many and thoſe deplorable calamities. 'Tis certain Priſcus the Rhetorician does relate [in his Hiſtory] that at that time he came [a] out of the Province of Thebais to Alexandria, and ſaw the People making an Attack againſt the Magiſtrates. And, that when the Souldiers would have put a ſtop to the Tumult, the People threw ſtones at them, and made them run; that after this the Souldiers took refuge in that which heretofore had been [b] Serapis's Temple, where the People beſieged them, and burnt them alive. That, the Emperour having notice hereof, ſent two thouſand new raiſed Souldiers thither: who having the opportunity of a fair wind, made ſo proſperous a Voyage, that they arrived at the great City Alexandria on the ſixth day [after they had been ſhip'd.] That after this, when the Souldiers moſt filthily abuſed the Wives and Daughters of the Alexandrians, facts far more horrid and nefarious than the former, were perpetrated. And that at laſt, the People meeting together in the Circus, entreated [c] Florus, who was then Commander of the Milice [throughout Egypt,] came at that time to Alexandria. But, the Province of Thebais was not governed by a Præfect, but by a Preſident; as we are informed from the Notitia Imperii Romani. Beſides, Priſcus Rhetor ſays not, that the Governour of the Province of Thebais, but that he himſelf came then to Alexandria. Priſcus had indeed been long converſant in the Province Thebais, with Maximinus the Commander, whoſe Councellour and Aſſeſſour he was, when he waged war againſt the Nubæ and Blemmyæ, as himſelf informs us in his Excerpt. Legationum. In the Tellerian Manuſcript, I found this place written thus; φθῆναι ἐς δὶ ἀλεξανδρεῖ τ Θηβαίων ἐπαρχίας, came by Alexandria from the Province of Thebais. But I ſhould rather write it thus, φθῆναι ἐς τ ἀλεξάνδρειαν ἐκ τῆς, &c. came to Alexandria out of the Province of Thebais. Valeſ. In Robert Stephens the reading here is, φθῆναι πλωικαῦτα τῳ ἀλεξάνδρειαν τῶν Θηβαίων ἐπαρχίαν.

* Or, was condemned to dwell at, &c.

[a] I have reſtored this place from the Florentine Manuſcr. to which agrees Nicephorus, book 15. chap. 8. Chriſtophorſon had mended very ill, thus; φθῆναι πλωικαῦτα τῳ ἀλεξάνδρειαν τῶν Θηβαίων ἐπαρχον, that the Præfect of Thebais

[b] Nicephorus has added ſome paſſages here concerning Serapis's Temple, which are ſufficiently profound, and which I remember not to have read any where elſe. Therefore I conjecture, that Nicephorus wrote theſe paſſages out of Priſcus Rhetor's Hiſtory, which then was extant entire. Valeſ. See Nicephorus's Eccleſ. Hiſtor. book 15. chap. 8.

[c] Of this Florus (who was Præfectus Auguſtalis, and alſo Dux of Egypt,) Jordanes has made mention in his book De Succeſſione Regnorum, where he writes thus concerning the Emperour Marcianus: Nobades Blemmyeſque Æthiopia prolapſos, &c. He appeaſed the Nobades and the Blemmyes, (who had fallen down from Æthiopia,) by Florus Procurator of the City of Alexandria, and drove them from the Territories of the Romans. This Florus had ſucceeded Theodorus the Auguſtalis, as we are informed from Liberatus's Breviarium, chap. 14. Under whom Proterius is ordained Biſhop, and that Sedition (which Evagrius deſcribes here,) was raiſed at Alexandria, in the year of Chriſt 452. On account of which Sedition, when as the publick [allowance of] bread-corn, (which was wont to be delivered out to the Alexandrians,) the Baths alſo, and Shows, by the Emperour's order had been taken from the Inhabitants of Alexandria; the multitude met together in the Cirque, and entreated Florus the Præfectus Auguſtalis, who was come to Alexandria a little before this, that theſe things might be reſtored to them. Therefore, this hapned on the year of Chriſt 453. Valeſ.

and also Præfect of Alexandria, that he would restore to them the [d] allowance of Bread-corn (which he had taken from them,) and the Baths and the Shows, and whatever else they were deprived of on account of the Sedition which had been raised amongst them. And that Florus, by [e] his perswasion, went into the Assembly of the people, and promised to perform all this, and so the Sedition was appeased and vanished by little and little. Nor, were affairs at the Solitude near Jerusalem, in a sedate posture. For some of the Monks, who had been present at the Synod, and had imbibed Sentiments contrary to those Constitutions there established, came into Palestine: and complained that the Faith was betrayed, made it their business to inflame and disturb * all the Monks. And in regard Juvenalis had recovered his own See, and, being by the Seditious compelled to retract and Anathematize his own opinion, had made a journey to the Imperial City; those who embraced Sentiments contrary to the Chalcedon Synod, (as I have said above,) met together, [f] and in the [Church of the] Holy Resurrection ordained Theodosius Bishop, the same person who had raised great disturbances in the Synod at Chalcedon, and who had given then the first account of that Synod. Concerning which Theodosius, the Monks in Palestine, when they afterwards wrote to [g] Alcison, gave this account: viz. that having [h] by his own Bishop been detected of [the commission of] impious Facts, he had been expelled out of his own Monastery; that going afterwards to Alexandria, [i] he had made an attempt upon Dioscorus, and that after he had been lacerated with many stripes as a Seditious person, he was set upon a Camel, in such manner as Malefactours [are usually served,] and carried all over the City. [k] To this person came [the Inhabitants of] many Cities in the Palestines, and procured Bishops to be ordained over themselves by him. Amongst which number was one Petrus, by birth an Hiberian, who was entrusted with the government of the Bishoprick of that Town called Majuma, which is hard by the City of the Gazites. When Marcianus had receiv'd information of those things, in the first place he commands Theodosius to be brought to Court to him. Then he sends Juvenalis, to rectifie what had been done; whom he ordered to turn out all those who had been ordained by Theodosius. After the arrival of Juvenalis therefore, many wicked and horrid Facts were perpetrated; as well the one Faction as the other proceeding to the Commission of whatever their fury suggested to them. For the envious Devil, hated by God, had so mischievously contrived and misinterpreted the [l] change of one Letter, that notwithstanding the [m] pronouncing of the one of these [Letters] doth therewithal wholly infer the other, yet 'tis thought by most persons, that there is a vast difference between them, that the meanings of both are diametrically opposite each to the other, and that they do mutually destroy one another. For, he that confesses Christ IN TWO Natures, does plainly affirm him [to subsist] OF TWO Natures; because, whilest he confesses Christ both in the Deity and in the Humanity, he asserts him to consist [n] of the Deity and of the Humanity. I am very confident also, that Evagrius wrote it thus. But, Transcribers of books are wont frequently to mistake in these two præpositions, as 'tis known to those persons who have read over Manuscript copies. Vales.

[a] Τῷ τῆς οἰκουμένης ἡγεμόνι. To the Citizens of Alexandria, as well as to those of Rome and Constantinople, Loaves of bread were every day delivered out; as we are informed from the fourteenth book of the Theodosian Code, Tit. De Frumento Alexandrino. But who had been the Beginner of this thing, 'tis uncertain. Diocletian was the first [Emperour] who bestowed the Panis Castrensis [the Camp-bread] upon the Alexandrians, as the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle relates at Constantinus Cæsar's and Maximianus Jovius Cæsar's fourth Consulate; τούτῳ τῷ ἔτει (says he) ὁ κατὰ σιτηρεσίου ἄρτος ἐν ἀλεξανδρείᾳ ὑπὸ Διοκλητιανοῦ ἐδωρήθη, on this year the Panis Castrensis was given at Alexandria by Diocletian. Which passage occurrs in the very same words in the Chronological Excerptions set forth by Scaliger at the end of Eusebius's Chronicon. Procopius (in his Anecdot. pag. 119.) says this Bread-corn was allowed by Diocletian to the poor only of the City Alexandria. Which when the Citizens of that City had in after times divided amongst themselves, they then transmitted it to their posterity. Procopius's words are these: Διοκλητιανὸς ῥωμαίων γενόμενος αὐτοκράτωρ σίτου μέγα τι χρῆμα δίδοσθαι παρὰ τοῦ δήμου τοῦ ἀλεξανδρέων τοῖς δεομένοις ἀνὰ πᾶν ἔτος διώρισε. ταῦτα ὁ δῆμος πρωτάδε διαδικασάμενοι ἐν σφίσιν αὐτοῖς, ἐς ἀπογόνους τοὺς μέχρι δεῦρο παρέπεμψαν; Diocletian having been made Emperour of the Romans, Decreed, that a vast quantity of Bread-corn should every year be given by the people to the indigent Alexandrians. The people having at that time quarrelled amongst their own selves about this, [Bread-corn,] transmitted it to their descendants even to this day. In which words of Procopius's there is a very great fault, which Nicolaus Alemannus (a person otherwise of incomparable Learning) perceived not. For instead of these words [παρὰ τοῦ δήμου, by the people,] it must undoubtedly be [παρὰ τοῦ δημοσίου, out of the publick stock of Corn laid up for the Emperours use.] And, a little after, instead of these words, [ταῦτα ὁ δῆμος πρωτάδε διαδικασάμενοι ἐν σφίσιν αὐτοῖς, the people having at that time quarrelled amongst themselves about this Bread-corn;] it must be thus [ταῦτα ὁ δῆμος πρωτάδε ἰδίᾳ δωσάμενοι ἐν σφίσιν αὐτοῖς, the people having at that time privately given this [Bread corn] amongst their own selves.] Than which emendation there is nothing more certain. Further, long before Diocletian, to wit, in the times of Dionysius Alexandrinus, the Omogerontes of the City Alexandria received Bread-corn out of the publick stock, as Dionysius Alexandrinus informs us in his Epistle to Hierax the Bishop; which Letter Eusebius records Eccles. Hist. book 7. chap. 21; where see note (e.) Therefore Diocletianus augmented, rather than began, this distribution of Bread corn at Alexandria. Vales.

* Τὸ μοναστικόν, the whole society of Monks.

[b] Instead of Aclison, it must without doubt be Alcison; as the reading is in Nicephorus. These Letters of the Monks of Palestine to Alcison, are recorded by Evagrius, book 3. chap. 31. At which place we will say more concerning Alcison. Vales.

[c] Ὡς καὶ τὸ δεύτερον ὑπομνήσοντα. Sir Henry Savil had made this remark at the side of his Copy, fortè παρὰ, perhaps it should be παρὰ, that is, by. So, 'tis certain, Christophorson and Musculus read; and so we have rendred it.

[d] Translatours understood not this place, as 'tis apparent from their Versions. For they thought that the word [αὐτῆς, his] was to be referred to Florus; when as it ought to be referred to Priscus Rhetor, out of whose History Evagrius has transcribed all these passages. For, Priscus Rhetor, in regard he was then conversant at Alexandria, gave Florus this advice, that he should go to the Cirque; in which place the Alexandrian populace were gathered together, and with great out-cries required Florus to come thither. Vales.

[e] Christophorson has rendred this place ill, after this manner: In sancto die festo Resurrectionis, Theodosium designant Episcopum, on the Holy Festival day of the Resurrection, they chose Theodosius Bishop. Musculus renders it righter, thus, ordinarunt in Ecclesiâ Sanctæ Resurrectionis, Theodosium illum, &c. in the Church of the Holy Resurrection, they ordained that Theodosius, &c. Concerning this Church of the Holy Resurrection I have made several remarks in my Notes on Eusebius's Life of Constantine. [See Valesius's Letter to a friend, De Anastasi & Martyrio Hierosolymitano, which Letter he has published at pag. 304. of his notes on Eusebius.] But, concerning this Theodosius, who invaded the See of Jerusalem, consult Baronius at the year of Christ 452. Vales.

[f] Ἐπιλάβεσθαι τῆς διοσκόρου, he had received Dioscorus. Sir Henry Savil had made a remark at the margin of his Copy, that perhaps the reading should be [ἐπιλάβεσθαι, he had laid hands upon,] which reading displeases me not. Nevertheless, I had rather write it thus, ἐπιβάλεσθαι τῷ διοσκόρῳ. Which reading I have followed in my Version. Nor does Nicephorus (book 15. chap. 9.) seem to have read otherwise, who has expresst this passage in Evagrius thus, καὶ ὅτι τῆς ἀλεξάνδρου διαφορᾶς διοσκόρῳ κατέστη, and had been an enemy to Dioscorus at Alexandria. But Musculus and Christophorson saw nothing in the rendition of this place. Vales.

[g] Πρὸς ὃν πολλὰς δὴ ἐν παλαισίνῃ πόλεων ἀφικνεῖσθαι. I have corrected this place by the Florentine Manuscript, in which Copy 'tis read thus: πρὸς ὃν πολλαὶ τῶν ἐν παλαισίναις πόλεων ἀφικνεῖσθαι, To this person came [the Inhabitants of] many Cities in the Palestines. It had been so agreed between the Bishops of Antioch and Jerusalem in the Synod of Chalcedon, that the Three Palestines should be under the disposition of the Bishop of Jerusalem. Vales.

[h] Evagrius means the Præpositions ἐν and ἐκ, [that is, in and of,] which differ one from the other in one Letter. The Catholicks confess'd Christ in two Natures. The Hereticks asserted, that he consisted of two Natures, but, which had grown together and were become one Nature. For, after the Union of the Word, they affirmed, the Nature of Christ was one. Vales.

[i] I am of the same opinion with the Learned, who instead of [ἐπιφωνήσεως,] have mended it thus, ἐκφωνήσεως, the pronouncing; which is the same with the reading in Nicephorus. And so Christophorson read; who notwithstanding, in the rendition of this place, has in no wise expres'd Evagrius's meaning. In the Tellerian Manuscript, I found it written ἐκφωνήσεως, the pronouncing. Vales.

[k] Ὁμολογῶν ἐκ θεότητος. The term ὁμολογῶν, [confessing] is to be expunged, in regard 'tis superfluous. It occurrs not in Nicephorus, and Sir Henry Savil, in his Copy, had drawn a line under it. Vales.

Again, he that affirms [Chriſt to ſubſiſt] of tow Natures, the ſame perſon by a neceſſary conſequence does confeſs [him] in two Natures; becauſe, by his affirming Chriſt [to ſubſiſt] of the Deity and of the Humanity, he acknowledges him to conſiſt in the Deity and in the Humanity: the fleſh being neither converted into the Deity, nor the Deity * changed into the fleſh, of which [two Natures there is] an ineffable Union. So that, by this expreſſion OF TWO, may at the ſame time commodiouſly be underſtood this alſo IN TWO, and by this expreſſion IN TWO [may alſo be meant] OF TWO, the one [expreſſion] being † not different from the other. For as much as, ‖ according to a copious uſe of ſpeaking, the Whole is known not only [to conſiſt] of, but in its parts. Yet nevertheleſs, men think theſe [expreſſions] to be in ſuch a manner ſeparated and disjoyned the one from the other, ([which Sentiments they are induced to give entertainment to] either from a certain uſage * about their thinking concerning God, or elſe from their being prepoſſeſſed [with a perſwaſion of mind] to have it ſo;) that they contemn [the undergoing of] all ſorts of death, rather than they will give their aſſent to the truth. And from hence aroſe thoſe [miſchiefs] which I have mentioned. In this poſture were theſe matters.

CHAP. VI.

Concerning the Drought which hapned, and the Famine and the Peſtilence: and how in ſome places the Earth in a wonderful manner brought forth fruits of its own accord.

ABout the ſame times, here hapned * a great Drought in both the Phrygia's, in both the Galatia's, in Cappadocia, and in Cilicia; in ſo much that a ſcarcity of neceſſaries [followed,] and men made uſe of unwholeſome and deſtructive food. Whence hapned a Peſtilence alſo. For, becauſe of their change of dyet, they fell ſick, and their bodies ſwelling by reaſon of the exceſſive inflammation, they loſt their eyes: they were troubled with a Cough at the ſame time alſo, and [uſually] dyed on the third day. For the Peſtilence, no cure could then be found out. But divine providence, the preſerver of all things, beſtowed on them that were left alive, a remedy againſt the Famine. For in that barren year, food was ſhowered down out of the air, which they termed Manna, in the ſame manner as ['twas heretofore ſhowered down] on the Iſraelites. But, on the year following, the good-natured [Earth] brought forth ripe fruits on its own accord. Moreover, [this calamity] deſtroyed the Country of the Paleſtinians, and innumerable other Provinces; [theſe * two] miſchiefs ſpreading themſelves over the whole earth.

* Or, a ſcarcity of ſhowers of rain.

CHAP. VII.

Concerning the Murder of Valentinianus, and the taking of Rome; and concerning thoſe other Emperours who governed Rome [after Valentinianus's death.]

WHileſt theſe things * were tranſacted in the Eaſtern parts, Aetius † is in a miſerable manner murdered at the Elder Rome. Valentinianus alſo Emperour of the Weſtern parts, and together with him Heraclius, [is ſlain] by ſome of Aetius's Guards; the Plot againſt them being framed by Maximus (who afterwards poſſeſt himſelf of the Empire,) becauſe Valentinianus had abuſed Maximus's wife, having by force debauch'd her. Further, this Maximus, by making uſe of all manner of violence, compelled Eudoxia (who had been Valentinianus's wife,) to be married to himſelf. She, deſervedly accounting this fact to be contumelious, and the higheſt indignity, took a reſolution to caſt every Dye (as the ſaying is,) [to the end ſhe might be revenged] both for what had been done in relation to [the aſſaſſination of] her husband, and alſo for the reproach which had been brought upon her own Liberty. For, a woman is fierce, and of an anger * implacable, if (when ſhe uſes her utmoſt endeavour to preſerve it inviolate,) her chaſtity be forcibly taken from her, and eſpecially by him who hath been her husband's Aſſaſſine. She ſends therefore into † Africa, to Gizerichus, and having forthwith preſented him with many Gifts, and by her Declaration put him into a good hope of what was behind, ſhe prevails with him to make a ſudden and unexpected Invaſion upon the Roman Empire, promiſing ſhe would betray all to him. Which having in this manner been performed, Rome is taken. But Gizerichus, in regard he was a Barbarian and of a diſpoſition inconſtant and mutable, kept not * his promiſe even with her: but having burnt the City, and made plunder of all [its riches,] he took Eudoxia together with her two daughters, marched back, went away, and returned into Africa. The elder of Eudoxia's daughters, by name Eudocia, he married to his own ſon † Hunericus. But the younger, (her name was Placidia,) together with her mother Eudoxia, he ſent ſome time after to * Byzantium, attended with an Imperial Train and a Guard, to the end he might pacifie Marcianus. For he had highly incenſed him, both becauſe Rome had been burnt, and alſo in regard the Imperial Princeſſes had been ſo contumeliouſly uſed. Moreover, Placidia is match'd by Marcianus's order, Olybrius having married her; who was look'd upon to be the eminenteſt perſonage amongſt the [Roman] Senatours, and after the taking of Rome had betaken himſelf to Conſtantinople. Further, after Maximus, [a] Avitus reigned over the Romans eight months.

* Conſtantinople.

[a] After Valentinianus Placidus's death, and after the murder of Maximus, Avitus was proclaimed Emperour, firſt at Toulouſe, and then at Orleans, in Valentinianus's eight Conſulate [which he bore] with Anthemius, in the year of Chriſt 455, on the ſixth of the Ides of July as 'tis recorded in the Old Chronicon, which Cuſpinianus firſt publiſhed in his Faſti. On the year following, the ſame Avitus was Conſul, as 'tis related in the Faſti which Jacobus Sirmondus has publiſh'd under the name of Idatius: and on the ſame year he was depoſed at Placentia, as Marius and Caſſiodorus inform us in their Faſti, as likewiſe that Old Chronographer put forth by Cuſpinianus. But, on what day, and in what month Avitus reſigned the Empire, I do not find declared by by the Ancients. Indeed, Sigonius (in his fourteenth book de Occidentali Imperio,) writes, that Avitus resigned the Empire on the sixteenth of the Calends of June. But Sigonius quotes no Author of this thing. The words of Cuspinianus's Old Chronographer are these: Joanne & Varane Coss. captus est Imp. Avitus, &c. In the Consulate of Joannes and Varanes, the Emperour Avitus is taken at Placentia by Ricimeres master of the Milice. And his Patritius Messianus is slain, on the sixteenth of the Calends of June. From this place therefore Sigonius, induced thereto by conjectures, thought that Avitus had put off his purple, and that Messianus had been slain, on one and the same day; although the Old Chronographer affirms not that. For, that sixteenth of the Calends of June is referred to the murder of Messianus, not to Avitus's deposition. 'Tis certain, if what Evagrius relates here be true, (viz. that Avitus reigned eight months,) his deposition must necessarily fall on the month of March in the year 456. Idatius, in his Chronicon, seems to attribute three years Reign to Avitus. For, his words are these: Avitus tertio anno posteaquam à Gallis & à Gotthis factus fuerat Imperator, caret Imperio, Gotthorum promisso destitutus auxilio, caret & vitâ. Avitus on the third year after he had been made Emperour by the Galli and the Gotthi, wants his Empire, being disappointed of the promised assistance of the Gotthi, is deprived of his life also. But, in the Manuscript Copy, which Jacobus Sirmondus made use of, this place is read thus: Tertio anno, Avitus septimo mense posteaquam à Gallis & à Gotthis factus fuerat Imperator, &c. On the third year, Avitus on the seventh month after he had been made Emperour by the Galli and Gotthi, &c. Jacobus Sirmondus, perceiving that these two were inconsistent, omitted these two words [septimo mense, on the seventh month] in his Edition; but he had done better, if he had expunged these two [tertio anno, on the third year] For Avitus did not reign three years, but seven or eight months only, which months were part of two Consulates. For which reason 'tis affirmed by some Writers, that he reigned two years. Cedrenus, 'tis certain, writes thus in his Chronicon. Vales.

[b] Musculus and Christophorson read λοιμῷ, by the Pestilence. Which reading is in my judgment truer than the other, to wit, λιμῷ, by Famine. For, 'tis not probable, that Avitus (who after he had resigned the Empire, was made Bishop of Placentia, as Victor Tunonensis, and Marius in his Chronicon, do relate;) should have dyed by Famine. Notwithstanding, Nicephorus has retained the Vulgar reading. Vales. In Robert Stephens the reading is [λιμῷ, Famine.]

He having ended his life by the [b] Pestilence, [c] Majorianus held the Empire two years. After Majorianus had been treacherously slain by Ricimeres, Master of the Milice, Severus possest the Empire three years.

[c] Majorianus [or Majorinus] governed the Roman Empire four years and as many months, as the Old Chronographer publish'd by Cuspinianus informs us; to whom agree Idatius and Marcellinus in his Chronicon. Severus, who succeeded him, reigned almost the same space of years, as the same writers relate. But these things hapned after the death of the Emperour Marcianus, during Leo Augustus's government of the Eastern Empire. Vales.

CHAP. VIII.

Concerning the death of Marcianus, and the Empire of Leo. And how, the Hereticks of Alexandria slew Proterius, and gave that Arch-Bishoprick to Timotheus Ælurus.

[a] Evagrius is out. Marcianus Augustus

MOreover, [a] during Severus's Governing the Romans, Marcianus changed his Kingdom, and departed to a better Inheritance, when he had Governed the Empire [b] seven years only, dyed in the Consulate of Constantinus and Rufus, on the year of Christ 457, in the month February. Majorianus was proclaimed Emperour at Ravenna in the same year, on the Calends of April, that is, almost two months after Marcianus's death. To whom succeeded Severus, on the year of Christ 461, in the Consulate of Severinus and Degalaïfus, almost five years after the Emperour Marcianus's death. Further, this Severus was by another name termed Serpentius, as Theophanes informs us in his Chronicon, pag. 97. in these words, καὶ ἐπικλῆθη σερπέντιος ὁ καὶ σεβῆρος. And Severus, called also Serpentius, was Proclaimed For so it must be read, as the most Learned Franciscus Combefisius has rightly conjectured. 'Tis certain, in the Alexandrian Chronicle he is so termed. For, on the fifteenth Indiction, Leo Augustus is put Consul the second time with Serpentius. Now, 'tis manifestly known, that on this year Severus Augustus was Consul with Leo. For so Cassiodorus relates in his Fasti, and also the Old Author publish'd by Cuspinianus. Vales.

[b] Marcianus reigned six years and as many months, as Marcellinus relates, and Victor Tunonensis in his Chronicon. He began his Reign in the year of Christ 450, on the eighth of the Calends of September on the fifth Feria, as 'tis recorded in the Alexandrian Chronicle. And he dyed on the year of Christ 457. about the close of the month January, as Theodorus Lector informs us, with whom agrees the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle. For this Author says, that Leo, who succeeded Marcianus, was proclaimed in the month Peritius on the seventh of the Ides of February. So Marcianus reigned six years, five months and some few days. Vales.

having left amongst all men a [c] truly royal Monument. The Alexandrians, informed of his death, with much more animosity and a greater heat of mind, renewed their rage against Proterius. For, the multitude is a thing with the greatest ease imaginable blown up in a rage, and which snatches hold of the most trivial occasions as fuel for Tumults. But above all other, the [populace] of Alexandria [are of this humour, which City] abounds with a numerous multitude made up mostly of an obscure and [d] promiscuous company of Foreigners, which by an unexpected and unaccountable boldness and precipitancy, [e] breaks out into violence and rage. 'Tis therefore for certain reported, that any one there who [makes complaint] [f] of the breaking any thing of small value [which he carries,] may incite the City to a popular Tumult, and may lead and carry [the multitude] whither, and against whom he pleases. For the most part also they are delighted with jests and sports, as [g] Herodotus relates concerning Amasis. And this is the humour of the Alexandrians. Nevertheless, as to other things, they are not such a sort of persons, as that any one may despise them.

[c] Nicephorus has interlined this place after this manner: χὴ μνημεῖον πᾶσιν ἀνθρώποις τὴν βασιλείαν καταλελοιπώς, and having left his Empire a monument to all men. Christophorson followed the same sense, as 'tis apparent from his rendition. For he translates it thus: Exemplari verè Regio omnibus ad intuendum relicto, A truly Royal Exemplar being left [by him] to the view of all persons. Musculus has rendred it in this manner; Et memoriam sui verè Imperialem apud cunctos mortales reliquisset, And had left a truly Imperial memory of his own self amongst all mortals. But Evagrius does not say this, but, that a monument manifestly Royal was left by Marcianus amongst all men. Now, that monument can be nothing else, than either his own life religiously spent, or rather the Chalcedon Synod, which he had ordered to be convened, to take away the dissentions of the Church, and whereat he himself, agreeable to the Example of Constantine the Great, would be present. In regard therefore, that Synod had been convened and perfected by his labour and diligence, it may deservedly be stiled the Work and Monument of the Emperour Marcianus. Vales.

[d] Συσκιάσας. In the Florentine MS. the reading is, συσκιάδω. Notwithstanding, the Rules of Grammar require that we should write σύσκιωσι, as Sir Henry Savil had remarked at the margin of his Copy. Suidas in his Lexicon explains συσκιάδων ἀνθρώπων by these terms, συμμίκτων, ἐπιλύδων, παρεισάκτων, promiscuous, extraneous persons, such as are brought in unawares. ——— Nicephorus has explained this word elegantly thus: μυείῳ πλήθει καὶ ὅθεν δήποτε ἥκοντι, a numerous multitude, and which comes from any place whatever. Vales.

[e] Τὰς ὁρμὰς γαυρώμενον. Something seems to be wanting here, which may perhaps be supplyed, by adding a Præposition, thus, κατὰ τὰς ὁρμὰς γαυρώμενον, breaks out into violence and rage. Vales.

[f] In the incomparable Florentine and Tellerian MSS. this place is written thus: τὸ σφοδρὸν καταῤῥήξαντι. Nicephorus has explained this place excellently well, in this manner: καὶ φασὶν εὖ ἔχειν βουλομένῳ παντὶ τὸ σφοδρὸν αὐτῶν ποιησαμένῳ δᾶτον εἰς στάσιν ἀναθαρσύνειν τὸν δῆμον, And they say, that every one who will make use of an obvious [light, or trivial] occasion, may quickly enrage the people [and intice them] to a Sedition. Christophorson read καταῤῥῆξαντι. For he renders it thus: Aiunt plebeium quemque modò ipse voluerit principium dare, &c. They say that every ordinary fellow, provided he be willing to give the Onset, may inflame that City [and exite it] to a popular and civil Sedition. But I approve not of this emendation. For, what shall become of these words, τὸ σφοδρόν? I embrace therefore the reading in the Florent. and Tellerian MSS. viz. τὸ σφοδρὸν καταῤῥῆξαντι; and render the whole passage thus: 'Tis therefore for certain reported, that any one there who [makes complaint] of the breaking any thing of small value [to wit, a glass vessel, pot, or any such like thing, which he carries,] may incite the City to a popular Tumult. Pollio (in Æmilianus) confirms the same, where he speaks thus concerning the Egyptians in general: Et hoc familiare est populo Ægyptiorum, &c. And this is usual with the Egyptians, that, like furious and madmen, upon any trivial occasions they may be induced [to involve] the Publick in the greatest dangers. On account of their being past by unsaluted, by reason of their not having a place allowed them in the Baths, because their flesh and pot-herbs may have been taken from them, on account of their servile shooes, and other such like occasions as these, they have by Sedition often arrived at the highest peril of the Republick. Vales.

[g] The passage in Herodotus, which Evagrius points at here, occurrs in B. 2. of his History, pag. 157. Edit. Paul: Stephens, 1618. Vales.

The

The Alexandrians therefore obſerving the time, when Dionyſius Commander of the Milice made his Reſidence in the Upper Egypt, make choice of one Timotheus, ſurnamed Ælurus, to aſcend the Archi-Epiſcopal-Chair; a perſon who heretofore had followed a Monaſtick Life, but afterwards was enrolled amongſt the number of the Presbyters of the Alexandrian Church. When they had led his perſon to the Great Church, called [h] Cæſar's, they ordain him their Biſhop, whileſt Proterius was as yet living, and perſonally officiating in his Epiſcopal Function. Euſebius Biſhop of Peluſium, and Peter of Iberia [Biſhop] of the little Town Majuma, were preſent at the Ordination; as he who wrote Peter's Life, has told us, in his account of theſe tranſactions. Which writer affirms that Proterius was not murdered by the people, but by one of the Souldiers. Further, after Dionyſius had made his return to the City [Alexandria] with the greateſt celerity imaginable, (to which he had been urged by the nefarious facts there perpetrated,) and was uſing his endeavours to extinguiſh the kindled fire of the Sedition; ſome of the Alexandrians, incited thereto by Timotheus, (as the Contents of the Letter written to Leo [the Emperour] do declare,) murder Proterius by running their ſwords through his bowels, when he attempted to get away, and had fled as far as the moſt Holy Baptiſtery. And after they had tied a rope about him, [they hung him up] at that place termed The Tetrapylum, and ſhewed him to all perſons, jeering and crying out aloud, that that was Proterius who had been killed. After this, they drag'd the body all over the City, and then burnt it. Nor did they abhor taſting of his very bowels, according to the uſage of Savage-beaſts; as the Supplicatory Libel (wherein all theſe paſſages are contained,) ſent by all the Biſhops of Egypt, and by the whole Clergy of Alexandria, to Leo, who after Marcianus's death, as hath been ſaid, was inveſted with the Empire of the Romans, [doth evidence;] the Contents whereof are conceived in theſe expreſs words.

h The Great Church of the City Alexandria, was termed Cæſaria, as Epiphanius informs us, in Hæreſ. Arian, and Liberatus, in his Breviarium, chap. 18. But Socrates (Book 7. chap. 15.) ſays the name of that Church was Cæſarium. Athanaſius declares the reaſon of this Appellation (in his Epiſt. ad Solitar.) to wit, becauſe that Church had been built in a place which heretofore was called the Cæſarium, that is, the Temple of the Cæſars. There had been a School in the ſame place alſo, and a palace of the Emperour Adrian's, which in ſucceeding times was termed Licinius's Palace, as Epiphanius atteſts. Valeſ.

To the Pious, Chriſt-Lover, and by-God-deſigned Leo, Victor, Triumphator, and Auguſtus; The humble Addreſs preſented by all the Biſhops of Your Egyptick Diœceſis and by the Eccleſiaſticks in Your Greateſt and Moſt Holy Church of the Alexandrians.

Whereas by Celeſtial Grace You have been beſtowed as a moſt Eximious Gift upon the World, 'tis no wonder if You ceaſe not (Moſt Sacred Emperour!) daily after God, from making Proviſion for the Publick. And after ſome other words. And whileſt there was an uninterrupted peace amongſt the Orthodox Laity, both with us, and alſo at the City Alexandria, [diſturbances were raiſed] again by Timotheus, who made a ſeparation of himſelf from the Catholick Church and Faith, and cut himſelf off [therefrom,] ſoon after the holy Synod at Chalcedon, (at which time he was but a Presbyter,) together with four or five perſons only heretofore Biſhops, and ſome few Monks, who together with him, were diſtempered with the Heretical errour of Apollinaris and * that perſon. On which account having then been canonically depoſed by Proterius of divine memory, and by a Synod of [the Biſhops of] all Egypt, they deſervedly experienced the Imperial diſpleaſure † by Exile. And after ſome words interpoſed. And ‖ having taken his advantage of that opportunity, when the Emperour Marcianus of Sacred * Memory made his departure hence to God; with impious Expreſſions (as if he had been ſubject to no Laws,) he in a moſt ſhameleſs manner raged againſt [and reproach'd] the ſame Emperour: and impudently Anathematizing the Holy and Oecumenical Synod at Chalcedon, he draws after him a multitude of ‖ Mercenary and diſorderly fellows, with whom he has made war, contrary to the Divine Canons, and to the Eccleſiaſtick Conſtitution, [in oppoſition] to the Republick, and to the Laws; and † has violently thruſt himſelf into the Holy Church of God, which at that time had its Paſtour and Teacher, Our moſt Holy Father and Arch-Biſhop Proterius, who then Celebrated the uſual Religious and ſolemn Aſſemblies, and poured forth his prayers to Chriſt the Saviour of us all, for Your Religious Empire, and for Your Chriſt-loving Palace. And, after the interpoſition of a few words. Then after the ſpace of one day, when (as 'twas cuſtomary) the moſt pious Proterius continued in the Biſhops Palace, Timotheus taking with him two Biſhops who had been legally depoſed, and [ſome] Eccleſiaſticks, who, as we have ſaid, had in like manner been condemned to dwell in Exile; [i] as if he could have received Ordination from two [Biſhops;] not ſo much as one of the Orthodox Biſhops throughout the Egyptick Diœceſis being there, who are always wont to be preſent at ſuch Ordinations of the Biſhops of the Alexandrians:) takes poſſeſſion, as he ſuppoſed, of the Archiepiſcopal Chair; audaciouſly attempting manifeſtly to commit adultery upon that Church, which had its own Bridegroom, who performed the divine [offices] therein, and canonically adminiſtred his own See. And after ſome other words. That Bleſſed perſon [Proterius] could do nothing elſe, than (as 'tis written,) *Give place unto wrath, and make his eſcape to the adorable Baptiſtery, that he might avoid their incurſion, who ran in upon him to murder him: in which † place moſt eſpecially, a dread and terrour is uſually infuſed into the minds even of Barbarians, *and all other Savage and cruel perſons, who are ignorant of the adorableneſs of that place, and of the Grace flowing therefrom. [k] Liberatus (in his Breviarium. chap. 15) relates, that Pro-terius was not murdered on the Festival of Easter, but three days before. For these are his words: Et ante triduum paschæ, &c. And on the third day before Easter, whereon the Lord's Supper is celebrated, Proterius of holy memory is by which it appertains to mediate between God and Men; kill that guiltless person, and together with him commit a barbarous murder upon six others. And, after they had carried about his Body which was Wounds all over, and likewise barbarously drag'd it almost throughout every place of the City, and [further] in a most lamentable manner insulted over it; without any thing of compassion they scourged the Corps, insensible of its stripes, [1] cutting it limb from limb. Nor did they abstain, according to the usage of Savage beasts, from tasting of his Entrails, whom a little before they were supposed to have as an Intercessour between God and Men. [In fine,] having cast the remains of his Body into a fire, they threw the ashes thereof into the winds; [by the commission of these Barbarities] far exceeding the utmost Savageness of wild-beasts: the Occasioner and crafty Contriver of all which Nefarious facts, was Timotheus.

the multitudes themselves shut up in the Church, whither out of fear he had betaken himself. And there on the same day in the Baptistery, he is slain, torn in pieces, cast out, and his Corps is burnt, and his ashes are strewed into the winds. All which Liberatus has almost word for word written out of the Gesta de nomine Acacii, which we owe to Jacobus Sirmondus. Vales.

[1] Instead of [διαλομόν τε καλαμέλη] it must undoubtedly be written thus: διατεμόντες κατὰ μέλη, cutting it in pieces, or, limb from limb. Instead of μέλη, the reading in the Florent. MS. is μέλῳ; which is a very small difference. Nicephorus confirms our Emendation, at Book 15. Chap. 17; who has it expresly written as I had conjectured. Further, this Supplicatory Libel of the Bishops of the Egyptick Diœcesis to the Emperour Leo, if any one has a mind to read it entire, occurrs in Latine, in the third part of the Chalcedon Synod, chap. 11. Vales.

Moreover, Zacharias giving a Narrative of these matters [in his History,] is of opinion, that most of these things were done [in such a manner as I have related them;] but says they were occasioned by Proterius's fault, who had raised most grievous Seditions at Alexandria: [he affirms likewise,] that these Facts were audaciously perpetrated (not by the people, but) by some of the Souldiers; which affirmation he grounds on the Letter written by Timotheus to [the Emperour] Leo. Further, in order to the punishing of these enormities, Stilas is sent by the Emperour Leo.

CHAP. IX.

Concerning the Emperour Leo's Circular Letters.

ALso, Leo wrote Circular Letters to the Bishops throughout the whole Roman Empire, and to those persons eminent for their leading a Monastick life; asking their opinion, both concerning the Synod at Chalcedon, and also about Timotheus surnamed Ælurus's Ordination: he sent to them likewise Copies of the Supplicatory-Libels presented to him, as well by Proterius's Party, as by that of Timotheus Ælurus. The Contents of the Circular Letters [of Leo] are these.

A Copy of the most Pious Emperour Leo's Sacred Letter, sent to Anatolius Bishop of Constantinople, and to the Metropolitans, and other Bishops over the whole World.

Emperour Cæsar, Leo, Pius, Victor, Triumphator, Maximus, always Augustus; to Anatolius the Bishop. It was the Desire and Prayer of Our Piety, that the most Holy Orthodox Churches, and also [all] the Cities * of the Roman Empire, should enjoy the greatest Peace imaginable; nor that any thing should happen, which might disturb their Constitution and Tranquillity. But, what [disturbances] have lately hapned at Alexandria, are (we are fully persuaded,) already made known to Your Sanctity. Nevertheless, that you may have a more perfect account concerning all things, what the Causes were of so great a Tumult and Confusion; We have transmitted to Your Piety the Copies of the Supplicatory-Libels, which the most Pious Bishops and Ecclesiasticks, coming from the foresaid City [Alexandria] and from the Ægyptick Diœcesis, to the Imperial City Constantinople, have brought to Our Piety against Timotheus: and moreover, the Copies of the Supplicatory-Libels, which [some persons,] coming from Alexandria to Our Divine Court on Timotheus's account, have presented to Our Serenity: so that, Your Sanctity may apparently know what hath been done by the foresaid Timotheus, whom the populacy of Alexandria, the [a] Honorati, the Decuriones, and the Navicularii, desire to have for their Bishop; [and that you may have an account] concerning other matters [b] contained in The Text of the Supplicatory-Libels; and moreover, concerning the Chalcedon Synod, to which [the forementioned persons] do in no wise agree, as their Supplicatory-Libels, here under-placed, do demonstrate. Let therefore Your Piety cause all the Orthodox and Holy Bishops, who at present are resident in this Imperial City, as likewise the most Pious Ecclesiasticks, forthwith to come together unto You. And having with great care * treated of, and enquired into all things; (for as much as the City Alexandria hath already been disturbed, the State and Repose whereof is our greatest care;) acquaint us with Your Sentiment concerning the foresaid Timotheus, and concerning the Chalcedon Synod, without any humane fear, and without affection or hatred, placing before your eyes the only fear of the Omnipotent God, in regard you well know, that you shall give an account concerning this affair to the incorrupt Deity. That so, We having been perfectly informed of all things by Your Letters, may be enabled to * promulge an accommodate Edict.

* Or, under the Government of the Romans.

[a] Ἀξιωματικοὶ, καὶ πολιτευόμενοι, καὶ ναυκληροι. Who these ἀξιωματικοὶ, and who were termed πολιτευόμενοι, I have already shown in my Notes on Amm. Marcellinus, pag. 14. and pag. 225. [the ἀξιωματικοὶ, whom we render the Honorati, were those persons who bore the Civil Dignities as well in the Cities, as in the Provinces;

* Τεκτόνιον; a special Greek term.

the πολιτευόμενοι were the Decuriones.] Gregorius Nazianzenus joyns them both together, in his 49*th Epistle to Olympius*, where his words are these: πάντας πολίτας τε καὶ πολιτευτὰς καὶ ἀξιωματικούς. That is, all the Citizens, the Decuriones, and the Honorati. The same Gregorius, in his 22*d Epistle to the Cæsarienses*, joyns the same persons both together, in these words; τοῖς ὅσοι τῶν ἀξιωματικῶν καὶ βουλευτικῶν τύπων; that is, all those who are of the Order of the Honorati, and of the Decuriones. The Old Translatour therefore of this Letter, renders this passage truly, thus, Honorati & Curiales & Naucleri, the Honorati, the Curiales, and the Naucleri. The Naucleri were the Masters of the Vessels in the River Nyle, who convey'd the Corn and publick Provisions from Egypt to Constantinople. Aurelianus seems to have instituted their Body, as he himself shews in his Epistle to Arabianus, which is cited by Vopiscus. These Naucleri, or Navicularii were a Society of Sea faring Men, ordain'd for Transportation of Corn and publick Provisions in several Quarters of the Empire; (for there was a Body of them in the East, another in Africk, and a third at Alexandria;) they were a set number, and transported the said Provisions at their own expence, succeeding by turns in the charge and burthen; to which their Sons and Heirs were liable, as were also those who possest their Estates after them, according to that proportion which they possessed. To this Function they were always obnoxious, so that scarcely could they be excused by any great Honour obtained. They were forced to build Ships and Vessels of certain Burthens; but the Materials for them were supplied by the Country. Their Charge was great, and so were their Privileges, as may be seen by various Laws extant concerning them in the Theodosian Code. Vales.

[b] I am of the same Opinion with Sir Henry Savil, who at the margin of his Copy had remark'd, that in his Judgment the reading should be περιεχομένων, contained: so Christophorson read; and 'tis so in Nicephorus phorus, Book 15. Chap. 18. Valeſ. In Robert Stephens the reading is παρεχομένων, given, or, exhibited.

This was the Letter ſent to Anatolius. [The Emperour] wrote Letters like this, to other Biſhops alſo, and to thoſe eminent perſons, who (as I have ſaid, at that time * lead a life void of the furniture [of living] and remote from matter. Of which number was Symeones, the firſt Inventer of the Station † in a Pillar, whom we have mentioned in the Firſt [Book of our] Hiſtory: amongſt whom alſo were Baradatus and [c] Jacobus the Syrians.

† Or, upon.

[c] Nicephorus Calliſtus terms this Jacobus, Niſibenus, and adds, that mention is made, as well of him, as of Varadatus [or, Baradatus,] by Theodoret in his Hiſtoria Religioſa. Notwithſtanding, Theodoret, in Chap. 21. of his Hiſtoria Religioſa does not ſay, that Jacobus was a Niſibene; which thing Theodoret would not in any wiſe have omitted, if Jacobus had indeed been a Niſibene. For, whereas he notes, that this Latter Jacobus was like the former Jacobus Niſibenus, not only in Name, but in Manners, and Dignity, (for both of them were Prieſts;) if he had been a Niſibene alſo, Theodoret would in no wiſe have omitted that at that place. Neither, does Theodorus Lector (Collectan. Book 1.) make this Latter Jacobus, who anſwered Leo Auguſtus's Circular Letters, a Niſibene; nor yet Theophanes in his Chronicon, pag 96. There is alſo extant an Epiſtle of Theodoret's, written to this Jacobus, in which he terms him a Presbyter and a Monk. Inſtead of Baradatus, Theophanes ſtiles him Bardas, corruptly as I think. In the Third part of the Chalcedon Synod, pag. 375. amongſt the Monks, to whom the Emperour Leo wrote Letters, the firſt named is the Monk Jacobus Niſibenus, then Symeones and Baradatus. Ephremius Biſhop of Antioch makes mention of them alſo, in his Epiſtle ad Monachos Σκηνίτας, that is, Severianos; and in his third Oration, which he wrote to the Monks Domnus & Johannes, as it occurs in Photius. Valeſ.

CHAP. X.

Concerning thoſe things which the Biſhops and Symeones the Stylite wrote in anſwer [to the Emperour Leo's Circular Letters.]

IN the firſt place therefore, Leo Biſhop of the Elder Rome wrote in defence of the Chalcedon Synod, and diſallowed of Timotheus's Ordination, [a] as having been illegally performed. Which Letter of Leo's, the Emperour Leo ſent to Timotheus Prelate of the Alexandrian Church, by [b] Diomedes the [c] Silentiarius, who was imployed in carrying the Imperial Mandates.

[a] I am of the ſame mind with Chriſtophorſon & Sir Henry Savil; who inſtead of [ᾗ ἀθέσμως, and having been illegally] having mended it thus [ὡς ἀθέσμως γενομένην, as having been illegally performed.] 'Tis certain, in theſe Books of Evagrius, ᾗ was moſt frequently put inſtead of ὡς; which we, following the Authority of the MS. Copies, have mended. But at this place, in regard the Manuſcript Copies differed not from the printed ones, we ſcrupled the altering of any thing. Valeſ.

[b] The Name of this Silentiarius was wanting in the ordinary Editions, and in Nicephorus. We have put it in, from the incomparable Florentine Manuſcript; wherein 'tis plainly and expreſsly written thus; Διομήδους σιλεντιαρίου, by Diomedes the Silentiarius. Concerning the Silentiarii, I have heretofore obſerved ſomething in my Notes on Amm. Marcellinus. Valeſ.

[c] Nicolaus Alemannus (in his Hiſtorical Notes on Procopius's Hiſtoria Arcana, pag. 103. Edit. Lugd. 1623.) tells us, that the Silentiarii, whom Procopius (as he remarks,) ſometimes terms Domeſtici and Protectores, were Officers of the greateſt Honour about the Emperour, in regard they were of the Emperour's inmoſt Chamber; on which account they were alſo termed Cubicularii. He ſays further, that the outward Chamber (out of which there was an immediate paſſage into the very Chamber of the Emperour, by reaſon of the ſilence there kept in Reverence to the Emperour,) was termed Silentium, the Silence; which the Greeks by a corrupt name called σιλεντιάριον: whence theſe Cubicularii had the name of Silentiarii. Meurſius (in the word σιλεντιάριος) makes two Orders of theſe Officers: the firſt was a meaner ſort of Office, their buſineſs was to command the people to be ſilent and quiet. The other Order of the Silentiarii was far more honourable; they were, ſays Meurſius, over the Secrets of the Emperour, and are reckoned amongſt the Clariſſimi. See Dr. Howell's account of theſe Officers, Part II. of his Hiſt. chap. 1. pag. 51.

To whom Timotheus returned anſwer, wherein he blamed the Chalcedon Synod, and [found fault with] Leo's Letter. The Copies of theſe Epiſtles are extant [a] in that Collection of Letters termed the Encyclicæ. But I have deſignedly omitted the inſerting them, becauſe I * would not have this preſent Work ſwell to a Greatneſs of bulk. The Biſhops of other Cities likewiſe ſtedfaſtly adhered to the Sanctions [of the Synod] at Chalcedon, and † unanimouſly condemned Timotheus's Ordination. Excepting only [e] Amphilochius [Biſhop] of Side; who wrote a Letter to the Emperour, wherein he cried out indeed againſt Timotheus's Ordination; but admitted not of the Synod at Chalcedon. Zacharias the Rhetorician has written concerning theſe very affairs, and has inſerted this very Letter of Amphilochius's into his Hiſtory. Moreover, Symeones of Holy Memory, wrote two Letters concerning theſe matters, one to the Emperour Leo, another to Baſilius Biſhop of Antioch. Of which two Letters, I will inſert into this my Hiſtory that which he wrote to Baſilius, in regard 'tis very ſhort; the Contents whereof are theſe.

[a] Ἐν τοῖς καλουμένοις ἐγκυκλίοις. Chriſtoph. underſtood this place very ill, as it appears from his Verſion: for he renders it thus; Iſtarum Epiſtolarum Exemplaria extant in literis Leonis Imperatoris generatim ad omnes ſcriptis, &c. The Copies of theſe Epiſtles are extant in the Emperour Leo's Letters, which he wrote in general to all Perſons, &c. But Liberatus Diaconus, in his Breviarium, chap. 15. does incomparably well declare what theſe Encyclicæ [that is, Circular Letters] were, in theſe words. Imperator ſcripſit ſingularum civitatum Epiſcopis de utroque negotio, &c. The Emperour wrote to the Biſhops of every City, concerning each affair, conſulting what ought to be done, &c. Who return anſwer, that the Chalcedon Synod is to be vindicated even unto blood: but that Timotheus was not only not to be reckoned amongſt the Biſhops, but to be deprived even of the Chriſtian Appellation. And theſe Epiſtles or Relations of all the Biſhops, in one body of a book, are termed Encyclicæ. Further, theſe Encyclicæ, tranſlated almoſt all into Latine, are extant in the third part of the Chalcedon Synod, pag. 372, &c. of the Cologne Edition; an eximious piece of Eccleſiaſtical Antiquity, which I heartily wiſh were extant in Greek. There is mention made of theſe Encyclicæ in Victor Turonenſis's Chronicon. Valeſ.

[e] There is mention of this Amphilochius Biſhop of Side, in Photius's Bibliotheca, chap. 52. Where the Letters of Atticus and Siſinnius Biſhops of Conſtantinople, written to him, are recorded. The ſame Amphilochius was preſent at the Epheſine and Chalcedon Synods, as 'tis apparent from the Synodick Acts. Further, Eulogius Biſhop of Alexandria, book 9, does atteſt, that this Amphilochius Biſhop of Side, although at the beginning he had affirmed in his Letters to the Emperor Leo, that he could in no wiſe give his aſſent to the Chalcedon Synod, yet ſome little time after, conſented and ſubſcribed to that ſame Synod. Eulogius's words are related by Photius in his Bibliotheca, pag. 879; Edit. David Hoeſchel. 1611. Valeſ.

To my moſt Pious and moſt Holy Lord, the Religious Baſilius Arch-Biſhop; the Sinner and mean Symeones [wiſheth] Health in the Lord.

It is now, My Lord, opportune to ſay, Bleſſed be God, who hath not turned away our Prayer, nor [removed] his mercy from us Sinners. For, on receipt of the Letters of Your Dignity, I admired the Zeal and Piety of our Emperour moſt dear to God, which he hath ſhown, and [now] does demonſtrate towards the Holy Fathers, and their moſt firm Faith. Nor is this Gift from us, according as the Holy Apoſtle ſaith; but from God, who through our Prayers hath given * Him this propenſity and ſingular earneſtneſs of mind. And, after ſome few words: Wherefore, I my ſelf, a mean perſon, and of ſlender account, † the untimely Birth of the Monks, have made known my Sentiment to his Imperial Majeſty concerning the Faith of the ſix hundred and thirty Holy Fathers convened at Chalcedon; who do perſiſt in, and am grounded upon upon that Faith which has been revealed by the Holy Spirit. For, if our Saviour is present amongst two or three who are gathered together in his Name, * how could it possibly be amongst so many, so great, and such Holy Fathers, that the Holy Spirit should not have been with them from the beginning? And, after the interposition of some words: Wherefore be strong, and behave your self valiantly in the defence of true Piety; in such manner as Jesus the Son of Nave, the Servant of the Lord, [behaved himself] in defence of the Israelitish people. Give, I beseech you, my Salutes to all the Pious Clergy under Your Sanctity, and to the blessed and most faithful † Laity.

* Or, how could he [our Saviour] have had a place amongst so many, so great, and such Holy Fathers, unless the Holy Spirit had been with them from the beginning?

CHAP. XI.

Concerning the Banishment of Timotheus Ælurus, and the Ordination of Timotheus Salophaciolus; and concerning Gennadius and Acacius [Bishops] of Constantinople.

*See ch. 5. After these things, Timotheus is condemned to be banished, he also [as well as Dioscorus] being ordered to dwell at Gangra. The †Or, elect Timotheus, another Bishop, Successour to Proterius. Alexandrians therefore † elect another Timotheus to succeed Proterius in that Bishoprick: this [Timotheus] some persons termed [a] Basilicus, others [called him] Salophaciolus. Anatolius dying [in this interim,] Gennadius succeeds in the Chair of the Imperial City [Constantinople.] And after him Acacius, who had presided over The Orphan's Hospital at the Imperial City.

[a] Οἱ μὲν βασιλικὸν. So also Nicephorus writes it. But in Liberatus's Breviarium, chap. 16. this Surname of Timotheus is written far otherwise. For Liberatus's words are these: Et exilio relegatur Timotheus Ælurus Chersonam arctâ custodiâ, & fit pro Proterio Timotheus cognomento Salophaciolus sive Asbus; And Timotheus Ælurus is conveyed into Banishment to Chersona under a close Guard; and in Proterius's stead Timotheus, surnamed Salophaciolus, or Asbus, is made [Bishop.] But in Liberatus it must be written Albus; as Theophanes informs us in these words, (See his Chronicon, pag. 96.) Τιμόθεος ὁ ἄλλος ἐπίκλην λεύκος, ὁ καὶ Σαλοφακιόλος ἐχειροτονήθη. But another Timothy, surnamed Albus, called also Salophaciolus, was ordained. Cedrenus relates the same. What must we say therefore? Shall we affirm that in Evagrius it must be written Albus, instead of Basilicus? Or, does Salophaciolus import something that is Royal? Indeed, φακιόλιον in Greek signifies fascia, which may be taken for a Royal Diadem. But, nothing of Certainty can be gotten out of this Surname, in regard 'tis variously written in ancient Writers. Vales.

CHAP. XII.

Concerning the Earthquake which hapned at Antioch, Three hundred forty and seven Years after that [which had hapned] in the Times of Trajan.

[Further,] on the second Year of Leo's Empire, there hapned a great and vehement Motion and shaking of the Earth at Antioch; some [Facts] perpetrated with the utmost Rage and Fury imaginable, and which far exceeded the most superlative Ferity of Beasts, having before-hand been committed by the Populacy of that City; which [Facts] were the Prelude, as 'twere, to such Mischiefs as these. Now, this most calamitous Accident hapned on the five hundred and sixth Year of [a] Antioch's being entitled to all the Privileges and Immunities of a free City, about the fourth Hour of the Night that * preceded the fourteenth Day of the Month Gorpiæus, (which Month the Romans term September,) the Lord's day approaching, [b] on the eleventh ‖ Partition of the Cycle: this is related to have been the sixth [Earthquake which shaked Antioch,] three hundred [c] forty and seven Years having passed, from the time that that [Earthquake] had hapned [which came to pass] in Trajan's Empire. For that [Earthquake in Trajan's time] hapned on the hundred [d] fifty ninth Year of Antioch's being entitled to the Privileges and Immunities of a free City.

* Or, led to.

‖ Or, indiction.

[a] Χρηματίσαντος τῆς πόλεως. When Provinces submitted themselves to the Roman Empire, 'twas usual for the Emperour to cause an Edict to be drawn up, and proclaimed openly upon the place. The Tenour whereof was, first to entitle the Emperour himself to all respects of Dominion and Supremacy over that People; and then secondly, to abate from this by a popular Insinuation of all possible Sacredness, and Liberty of the Provincials. A particular Instance hereof, as it relates to this very City Antioch, is produced by Mr. Jo. Gregory of Oxford (see his Works, pag. 156. Edit. London, 1665.) from Joannes Antiochenus's MS. Geograph. Book 9. In these words: Καὶ παρεδόθη ἡ ἀντιόχεια ἡ ἐλευθερία αὐτῆς, ὅτε ἐγένετο ὑπὸ ῥωμαίους, &c. And when the City Antioch had yielded it self up to the subjection of the Roman Empire, an Edict of the Liberties thereof was sent by Julius Cæsar, and publickly proclaimed at Antioch upon the twentieth of May: the Contents whereof were these, AT ANTIOCH THE HOLY, SACRED AND FREE CITY, THE METROPOLITAN QUEEN, AND PRESIDENT OF THE EAST, CAIUS JULIUS CÆSAR, &c. The Provinces usually returned the Honour of these Privileges back upon the Emperour, by this way of Acknowledgment. That they might keep the Emperour's Grace in perpetual Memory, they reckoned all their publick Affairs ever after from that time; χρηματίζει δὲ (continues the same Joannes Antiochenus) ἡ μεγάλη ἀντιόχεια, &c. Therefore Antioch the Great, in honour of the Emperour, fixed its Æra in Caius Julius Cæsar, and made this Year of Grace the first. On which account, this Æra of theirs, which precedes that of our Lord's Nativity forty eight Years, was peculiarly called χρηματισμὸς τῶν ἀντιοχέων; because at the fixing hereof, the Emperour did χρηματίσαι ἑαυτὸν, publickly name himself to all the title of Dominion: and also χρηματίσαι αὐτοὺς, publickly entitle them to all Privileges and Immunities.

[b] Ἀνὰ τὸν ἑνδέκατον ἐπενέμησιν τοῦ κύκλου ἑαυτὸς τυγχάνειν ἱστορεῖται, &c. Musculus has rendred this place very ill. But Christophorson, in regard he could not understand the meaning of these words, omitted them in his Version. Indeed, this place tortured me a long while, and very much. Notwithstanding, at length I found the meaning of it to be this. After Evagrius has set forth the time wherein the Earthquake hapned at Antioch, in the Reign of Leo Augustus, by certain Notes; to wit, of the Year, Month, Week, Day, and Indiction: in the last place he adds these words, τοῦ κύκλου ἕκτου: That is, that that Earthquake had hapned without any turning of the Cycles, Three hundred forty seven Years compleat, after that Earthquake which had hapned in Trajan's time. For this Note of Time hath no Cycle. But the former Notes of Time assigned by Evagrius, are [Notes] of the Cycles or Periods. For, an Indiction is a Cycle of fifteen Years; and a Week, a Month, and a Year, are Circles and Periods always recurring. This therefore is my Sentiment concerning the Explication of this place: Nevertheless, if any one shall produce a more certain Account of this passage, I will not refuse to alter my Opinion. See Evagrius, Book 3. Chap. 33. and Note (b) there. This place may also be taken otherwise, by changing only the Accent, in this manner, ἕκτου τυγχάνειν ἱστορεῖται; That so the sense may be this: This is said to be the sixth Earthquake which shaked Antioch. Nor, do I now doubt, but this is the true Interpretation of this place. In the Tellerian Manuscript, I found it plainly written [ἕκτου, the sixth] with an asperate, and the Accent in the first Syllable. Vales. The Reading in Robert Stephens is the same with that set at the beginning of this Note. In the Greek Text of Valesius's Edition, this place is pointed and accented thus: ἀνὰ τὸν ἑνδέκατον ἐπενέμησιν τοῦ κύκλου, ἕκτου τυγχάνειν ἱστορεῖται, &c. which Reading and Punctation we have followed in our Version.

[c] I have restored this place from the incomparable Florentine MS. wherein 'tis plainly written thus: ζ' καὶ μ'; that is, forty and seven. The Reading in Nicephorus, at Book 15. Chap. 20. is altogether the same. Vales. And so 'tis in Robert Stephens's Edition also; notwithstanding Valesius's saying that he restored this place.

[d] Baronius in his Ecclesiastick Annals, at the Year of Christ 111, says that Evagrius is mistaken, in affirming, that that Earthquake which came to pass at Antioch in Trajan's Reign, hapned on the Year (according to the Antiochians Account) 159. For, that Earthquake hapned in the Consulate of Messala and Pedo; as 'tis manifest from Dion;

Dion, who asserts that the Consul Pedo perished in that Earthquake. Further, the Consulate of Messala and Pedo fell on the Year of Christ 115, as 'tis agreed amongst all Chronologers. It was then, according to the Antiochians account, the hundred sixty third year, not the hundred fifty ninth year, as Evagrius says. For the years of the Antiochians precede Christ's Nativity forty eight years. Moreover, concerning these years of the Antiochians, amongst the Ancients the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle has spoken best of all, in the affairs of Julius Cæsar: but amongst the Moderns, Dionysius Petavius [gives us the best account hereof] in his books de Doctrina Temporum, and in the second part of his Rationarium, chap. 14. To which Author nevertheless I can't give my assent in this which he affirms, viz. That the beginning of these years is deduced from the Month October, which was the popular [or ordinary] beginning of the year amongst the Antiochians. In my Annotations on Eusebius, [See Euseb. book concerning the Martyrs of Palestine, chap. 1. note (e)] I have in my judgment, sufficiently demonstrated, that the Antiochians began their year from the Month Dius, or November. Nor, is that true which Petavius writes at the same place, viz. that the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle seems to deduce the beginning of these years from the Month May. For the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle does not say that; he affirms only, that the Decree of the Senate, whereby Antioch was pronounced a free City, was received by the Antiochians on the Month of May, and then also publickly proposed. Vales.

But this [Earthquake] in the times of Leo [hapned] on the five hundred and sixth year, as 'tis declared by the most accurate and diligent Writers. Further, this Earthquake ruined almost all the Houses of the New City, the Inhabitants whereof were very numerous, nor was there any part of it empty, or wholly neglected; but 'twas extraordinary beautified and adorned by the [preceding] Emperours magnificence, who strove to out-do one another [in that thing.] Likewise, the first and second fabrick of the Palace fell down; but the other Building continued standing, together with the adjoyning Bath; which having been useless before at such time as this calamitous accident hapned, was of necessity [made use of] for the bathing of * the Citizens, the other Baths having been ruined. Moreover, the Porticus's before the Palace fell down, and the Tetrapylum [which stood] behind them. Besides, the Towers of the Hippodrome which [were] near the Gates, and [e] some of the Porticus's which led to these [Towers fell.] In the old City the Porticus's and Houses were wholly untouch'd by the Ruine: but some small part of Trajan's, Severus's and Adrianus's Baths, was shaken, and overturned. This Earthquake also ruined some [parts] of the Geitonia of [that Region] termed the [f] Ostracine, together with the Porticus's, as likewise that termed the [g] Nymphæum, Every of which particulars Johannes the Rhetorician has related with a singular accuracy. This Writer therefore affirms, that a thousand Talents of Gold were by the Emperour remitted to the City out of the Tributary Function; and that, to the Citizens [were abated] the [h] yearly Tolls paid to the publick Treasury for those Houses which had been destroyed by that Calamity: and moreover, that the [i] same [Emperour] took care of the publick [Works and] Buildings.

* Or, the City.

[e] In the Incomparable Florentine Manuscr. this whole place is written thus; Καὶ τῷ ἱππο-δρόμῳ δὲ τὰς περὶ τὰς δύο πύργους, καὶ τίνας τῶν ἐπ' αὐτὰς στοῶν, Besides, the Towers of the Hippodrome [or Cirque] which [were] near the Gates, and some of the Porticus's which lead to those [Towers,] fell. Which doubtless is the better Reading. The Gates of the Cirque were fortified with two Towers on each side. There were also some Porticus's, which led to those Towers, from the Gates of the Cirque, as I suppose. In the Tellerian MS. I found it written, πύλας τῷ ἐπ' αὐτὰς στοῶν, some of the Porticus's [which led] to those [Gates.] Vales. In Robert Stephens, this whole Clause is worded thus; καὶ τῷ ἱπποδρόμῳ ὄ τὰς περὶ τὰς δύο πύργους, καί πινας τῶν ἐπ' αὐτῷ στοῶν, and the Towers of the Hippodrome from the Gate, and some of the Porticus's [leading] from them.

[f] Instead of [Ostracinia,] the Reading in the Florentine and Tellerian MSS. and in Nicephorus, is truer; which is thus, Ostracine. Our Evagrius mentions this place again, at chap. 8. book 6. But what the Ostracine was, 'tis hard to say.—— Geitonia is a continuation of Houses which received [or stood behind] the publick Porticus's. Which Libanius also confirms in his Antiochicus, pag. 372. Edit. Paris. 1627. It was termed Ostracine, because the Potters Work-houses were there. The Old Glosses render ὀστράκινον, fictile; a thing made of Potters earth. Vales.

[g] So the Greeks termed the Temple of the Nymphs; which Libanius describes in his Antiochicus, pag. 372. Edit. ut prius. Vales.

[h] In the Version of this place, both Translatours have erred. For Musculus renders it thus: Dicit etiam mille auri talenta Civitati illi ab Imperatore de tributis esse remissa; & ex Tributis quoque constitutum esse, ut civibus illis qui eâ calamitate adfecti erant, ædes ipsorum simulque publica ædificia restaurarentur; He says also, that a thousand talents of Gold were by the Emperour remitted to that City of the Tributes; and that 'twas constituted out of the Tributes also, that to those Citizens who had been affected with that Calamity, their Houses together with the publick Edifices should be repaired. But Christophorson translates it in this manner; Ait porro, tum Civitati de Tributis mille auri talenta ab Imperatore esse condonata, tum Civibus etiam Vectigalia qui eâ clade afflicti erant: He saith further, that both to the City a thousand talents of Gold of the Tributes were remitted by the Emperour, and also the Taxes [or Customs] to those Citizens, who had been afflicted with that Calamity. Where you see, that both Translatours referred these words [τῶν ἠφανισμένων] to the Citizens; which is in no wise to be born with. For Evagrius would not have said τοῖς πολίταις τῶν ἠφανισμένων, but rather τοῖς ἠφανισμένοις. Nicephorus therefore understood these words righter, to wit, concerning the Houses of private Men, the Taxes whereof the Emperour remitted to the Citizens of Antioch. Nevertheless, Nicephorus has not fully apprehended Evagrius's meaning. For thus he expresses this place of Evagrius; καί γε διὰ τὸν σεισμὸν τῶν χίλια χρυσοῦ τάλαντα βασιλέα φασὶν ἀφεῖναι τῇ πόλει τῶν ἐπισίων φόρων τὰ τέλη, τῶν ἠφανισμένων οἴκων κλισμάτων. That is, as Langus renders it; Terræ motus ejus gratiâ, &c. And because of this Earthquake, and on account of the Houses ruined, the Emperour, 'tis reported, forgave the City a thousand Talents of Gold, the Tributes of the Annual Payments. But Evagrius, or rather Johannes the Rhetorician, says more. For he affirms, that the Emperour remitted to the Antiochians a thousand Talents of Gold of the Tributary Function; but forgave to each Citizen the Tributes of those Houses which had been ruined by the Earthquake. Now these Tributes may be understood in a twofold sense; Either (1.) concerning the Annual Pension which by Hirers was paid to the Owners [or Lords] of the Houses; Or (2.) concerning the Money which was paid to the Fiscus [Exchequer,] because those Houses had been built upon the publick Soil. In such manner as amongst us, an Annual Rent is wont to be paid by Possessours of Houses as well in the City as Country, to the Lords of the Soil. And in this latter sense I had rather take τὰ τέλη [the Tributes] here. For this word is more frequently used to signify Tributes, Tolls, or Customs, which are paid to the publick. But if this Term should be so taken here, as to signify the Price of Houses which is usually paid by the Hirer, there would have been no Liberality of the Emperour's in that. For he would have given nothing of his own to the Citizens, but that which was another's. Vales.

[i] Instead of [ὁπωσδήποτε ὑπ' τούτων] the Reading undoubtedly must be πάντων, the same; add the words τῷ βασιλέα, Emperour. And thus Christophorson seems to have read. Further, concerning this Earthquake, Isaac Syrus had written an Elegy, as Marcellinus attests in his Chronicon, in these words: Patricio & Ricimere Coss. &c. In the Consulate of Patricius and Ricimeres, Isaac a Presbyter of the Antiochian Church wrote many things in the Syrian Language, and especially against the Nestorians and Eutychians. He likewise bewailed the ruine of Antioch in an Elegy, in such manner as Ephrem Diaconus did the fall of Nicomedia. Vales.

CHAP. XIII.

Concerning the Fire which [hapned] at Constantinople.

[a] THere hapn'd together with these [mischiefs] a like, or rather a far more grievous [calamity] at Constantinople; this mischievous accident

[a] 'Tis not amongst Authors agreed concerning the year whereon this Fire hapned at Constantinople. For Theophanes and Cedrenus place it on the fifth year of Leo, in the fifteenth Indiction, Leo Augustus being the second time Consul with Severus, which was the year of Christ 462. But Marcellinus Comes and the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle place this Fire of Constantinople in the Consulate of Basiliscus and Hermenericus, that is on the year of Christ 465. Our Evagrius seems to have followed the former Opinion. For the Verb [συνελήχθη, hapned together,] which he uses at this place, gives an indication of what I have said; to wit, that that Conflagration of Constantinople hapned no long time after the Antiochian Earthquake. Further, concerning that Fire wherewith the City Constantinople was consumed in the times of Leo Augustus, Candidus Isaurus does also write, in the first book of his History, and relates that many things were usefully ordered therein by Aspar the Patritius. Vales.

cident began in that part of the City that lay towards the Sea, which they term the [b] Ox-Street. 'Tis reported, that about such time as Candles are usually lighted, a certain mischievous and execrable Devil having clothed himself in the shape of a Woman, or rather in reality a poor Woman instigated by the Devil, (for 'tis reported both ways) carried a Candle into the Market, being about to buy some * Salt-fish; and that the Woman set down the Candle there, and went away. And, that the fire having taken hold of some Flax, raised a vast flame, and in a moment burnt † the Market house. After which, that it easily consumed the adjoyning buildings, the fire preying all about, not only upon such [houses] as might with ease be fired, but upon Stone-buildings also; and that it continued till the fourth day; and that, having exceeded all possibility of being extinguished, all the middle of the City, from the Northern to the Southern Quarter, five furlongs in length, and fourteen in breadth, was in such a manner consumed; that nothing, either of the publick or private buildings, was left [standing] within this compass, not the Pillars, nor Arches of Stone: but, that all the most hardned matter was burnt, as if it [had been straw, or] any such combustible stuff. Further, this calamitous mischief raged in the Northern part, * wherein is the Haven of the City, from that termed the † Bosporos, unto the Old Temple of Apollo. In the Southern part, from Julianus's Haven to those houses which stand not far off from that Oratory termed the Church of [c] Concordia. And in the middle part of the City, from that termed Constantine's Forum, to that called Taurus's Forum, [it left] a miserable and most deformed spectacle to [the view of] all Men. For, whatever [Edifices] had stood stately to behold in the City, or had been brought to a Magnificence and incomparableness of Beauty, or * accommodated to publick or private uses, were every one on a sudden transformed into mountains and hills, inaccessible and impassible, made up with all manner of Rubbish, which deformed the pristine beauty and sight [of the City.] In so much that even the possessours themselves of the places could not discern, what any one of those former [Edifices] had been, and in what place [it had stood.]

[b] He means the Portus Phosphorianus, which was in the fifth Region of the City, as the old Description of Constantinople informs us. The Greeks termed it φωσφόριον and βοωΐειον; as Constantinus Porphyrogennetus tells us in his second book de Thematibus about the end, and Georgius Codinus in his book de Originibus Constantinop. 57. Vales.

* Or, Salt-meat.

* Or, wherein are the Havens of the City.

† Or, Ox Street.

[c] The Church of Homonœa [or Concord] was in the 9th Region of the City Constantinople, as the Old description of that City informs us. Why this Church had this name, we are told by Theodorus Lector, in book 4. of his Eccles. History; whose words are cited by Johannes Damascenus in his third book de Imaginibus. For it was called ὁμόνοια [Concord,] because the hundred and fifty Fathers of the Constantinopolitan Synod in the Reign of Theodosius the Great, [See Socrate's Eccles. Hist. book 5. chap. 8.] meeting therein, agreed in one opinion concerning the Consubstantial Trinity. Vales.

CHAP. XIV.

Concerning the universal Calamities.

[a] Instead of [τοῦ τῆς αὐτῆς χρόνοις,] it would be better written thus, τοῦ τοῦ αὐτοῦ χρόνου, about the same times.] Vales.

[b] Evagrius means the War which the Hunni waged against the Eastern Romans, under the Command of Dengizich son of Attila, in the Consulate of Zeno and Marcianus, on the year of Christ 469; as Marcellinus Comes relates in his Chronicon. Nevertheless, the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle places that War on the foregoing year, whereon Anthemius Augustus was Consul; ἐπὶ τότε τοῦ αὐτοῦ ζιγίριχος ὁ ἄτταλα ἐσφάγη ὑπὸ ἀναγάστου τοῦ στρατηλάτου θρᾴκης, &c. under the same Consul Ginzirichus Son to Attilas was slain by Anagastus Magister Militum [Master of the Milice] of Thrace: I read Dengizichus, from Priscus Rhetor, who describes this War, pag. 44, 45, of the King's Edition. Further, this Anagastus Magister Militum throughout the Thracia's, who slew Dengizichus King of the Hunni in Battle, had succeeded Arnegiscles Magister Militum. Vales.

were shaken with an Earthquake; as was Ionia, and likewise those Islands called the Cyclades: in so much that in the Islands Cnidus and Coos very many [Buildings] were overturned. Further, Priscus relates, that at Constantinople and in the Country of the Bithynians, there hapned most violent storms of rain, the waters descending from Heaven in the manner of Rivers, for the space of three or four days. And, that Mountains were levelled into Plains, and Villages, over-whelmed with Waters, perished. Moreover, that Islands arose in the Lake Boäne, (which is not far distant from Nicomedia,) from the vast quantity of dirt and filth conveyed into it. But these things came to pass sometime afterward.

CHAP. XV.

Concerning the Marriage of Zeno and Ariadne.

[Moreover,] Leo takes Zeno to be his Son in Law, by [giving him] his Daughter Ariadne in Marriage. This Person having from his Cradle been called [a] Aricmesius, after his Marriage assumed the name of Zeno, from a certain [b] Person so named, who had arrived at great glory amongst the Isauri. But, by what means this Zeno arrived at this heighth of Honour, and on what account he was by Leo preferred before all Persons, Eustathius the Syrian had declared.

[a] In the most excellent Florentine MS. and in Nicephorus, instead of [ἀεικμῆσιν, Aricmesius,] 'tis ἀεικμήσιον, Aricmesius. Further, Ariadne married Zeno on the third year of Leo Augustus's Reign, as Theophanes relates in his Chronicon. Vales.

[b] He means Flavius Zeno, who was Consul in the Reign of Theodosius Augustus, on the year of Christ 448, and Magister Militum throughout the East. Concerning whose singular power, see what I have written in my Annotation at Priscus Rhetor's Excerpta Legationum, pag. 207. of the King's Edition. Vales.

CHAP. XVI.

Concerning Anthemius Emperour of Rome, and those Emperours who succeeded him.

BY reason of an Embassie of the Western Romans [to Leo,] Anthemius [by him] is sent [and created] Emperour of Rome, to whom Marcianus the preceding Emperour had married his own Daughter. [Not long after,] Basiliscus Brother of Verina the Wife of Leo [Augustus,] is sent Master of the Milice against [a] Gizerichus, with a choice Army of Souldiers.

[a] Concerning that vast Army, which the Emperour Leo sent against the Vandals into Africk, Theophanes, Cedrenus, and Idatius in his Chronicon, are to be consulted. Concerning the preparations of the same War Candidus Isaurus writes also, in the first book of his History; the passage whereof, because 'tis not yet extant, I will annex here: Κανδίδος ἱστοριογράφος φησὶν ὅτι ὁ λέων ὁ μακέλλης, ὁ μὴ μαρκιανὸν βασιλεύσας, περὶ τῶν ἐπιτροπείαν τῶν ΧΙ βανδίλων ἄπειρα χρήματα δεδαπάνηκε. ἦσαν γὰρ ὡς οἱ ταῦτα ἐφευρόντες κεχειρικότες, διὰ μὲν τὴν ὑπάρχων χρυσὸν λίτρας τετρακισμυρίας τρεῖς ἑπτακισχιλίας. διὰ δὲ τὸν κόμητα τὸν τῶν δισμυρίων, ἑπταχιλίοις δὲ πλείοις, ἢ ἀργυρίου λίτρας ἑπτακόσιας χιλιάδας. ἅτε τῶν ἀνηλωμένων ἀρχόντων ἐκ τῶν δημοσίων ἢ ἐκ τῆς βασιλέως ἀνθεμίου; That is, Candidus the Hiſtoriographer ſays, that Leo, termed alſo Macelles, who reigned after Marcianus, ſpent an innumerable ſum of Money in an Expedition againſt the Vandals. For, as thoſe have atteſted who furniſhed that money, forty ſeven thouſand pounds of Gold were diſburſed by the Præfecti Prætorio; by the Comes Largitionum were ſpent ſeventeen thouſand pounds of Gold, and of Silver ſeven hundred thouſand pounds: in regard this charge was abundantly ſupplied, partly by the goods of Perſons proſcribed and partly by the Emperour Anthemius. This eminent paſſage is extant in Suidas, in the word χειρίζω; but the Author's name is corrupted. In the ſame place of Suidas, inſtead of [ἢ ἀνηλωμένων ἀρχόντων,] it muſt be made [τῶν ἀνηλωμένων ἀρχέντων, &c] Further, this Vandalick Expedition had hapned on the year of Chriſt 468, as Baronius has rightly obſerved; which is confirmed by Cedrenus, Idatius and Marcellinus. Two years after this, another Expedition againſt the Vandals was undertaken by the Commander (Dux) Heraclius, and Marſus, as Theophanes relates in his Chronicon, who is the only Perſon that I know of, who has made mention of this Expedition. Procopius, in his Vandalicks, has confounded this ſecond Expedition with the former. Further, this ſecond Expedition had an event fortunate enough. For Gizerichus being put into a fear, was compelled to make a Peace with the Oriental Romans. Valeſ.

All which have with great accuracy been recorded by [b] Priſcus the Rhetorician: as likewiſe in what manner the ſame [Emperour] Leo killed Aſpar (who had inveſted him with the Empire, whom he circumvented by Treachery, rending him this reward, as 'twere, of his own promotion;) and his Sons Ardaburius and Patricius, whom ſome time before he had created Cæſar, that he might poſſeſs himſelf of Aſpar's [c] Favour and Benevolence. But, after the murder of Anthemius, who had reigned five years at Rome, Olybrius is proclaimed Emperour by Ricimeres; and after him Glycerius is made Emperour. Whom [d] Nepos having expelled, during the ſpace of five years holds the Empire, and ordains Glycerius [e] Biſhop of the Romans at Salonæ a City of Dalmatia. Afterwards Nepos is driven from the Empire by Oreſtes, and after him his Son Romulus, ſurnamed Auguſtulus, is made the laſt Emperour of Rome, [f] one thouſand three hundred and three years after the Reign of Romulus. After this [Auguſtulus,] Odoacer, rejecting the name of Emperour, and ſtyling himſelf King [g] adminiſtred the affairs of the Romans.

[b] Priſcus had at large deſcribed this Vandalick War in the firſt book of his Hiſtories; as (beſides Evagrius) Theophan. informs us in his Chronicon, page 100. But the place is corrupted, which I will annex here: ὕστερον δὲ δώρεις τισὶ μιχείρισε καὶ πολλοῖς χρήμασι δελεασθείς, ἐνέδωκεν, καὶ ἥττων ἐκρίθη, ὡς Περσικὸς ἱστόρησεν ὁ Θρᾷξ, But having at laſt been wheadled and allured by gifts and many riches, by Gizerichus, he yielded, and was voluntarily vanquiſhed, as Perſicus the Thracian has related It muſt undoubtedly be written thus; ὡς Πρίσκος ἱστόρησεν ὁ Θρᾷξ, as Priſcus the Thracian has related. For Priſcus the Hiſtorian has deſcribed that War, as Evagrius atteſts. Now Priſcus was a Thracian, born at Panium a Town of Thrace, which Town is mentioned by Hierocles. Provincia Europa ſub Conſulari urbes quatuordecim. Eudoxia, Heraclia, Arcadiopolis, Biſue, Panion, Orni, &c. The Province Europa under a Conſularis [contains] fourteen Cities. Eudoxia, Heraclia, Arcadiopolis, Biſue, Panium, Orni, &c. Beſides Suidas does alſo affirm, that Priſcus the Writer of the Hiſtories was a Panite. Valeſ.

[c] As to my ſelf it ſeemeth, I have reſtored this place not unhappily, after this manner; ἵνα τὴν ἄσπαρος εὔνοιαν κτήσηται, that he might poſſeſs himſelf of Aſpar's favour and benevolence. Cedrenus confirms our Emendation, at the twelfth year of Leo Auguſtus, in theſe words; τῷ δ' αὐτῷ ἔτει καὶ ὁ ἄσπαρος υἱὸς παρείκιος καίσαρ ἀνδρὶ τῷ λέοντος γίνεται, καὶ ἐν ἀλεξανδρείᾳ πέμπεται διὰ τὸ ἑλκύσαι τὸν ἄσπαρα ἐκ τῆς ἀρειανικῆς δόξης, καὶ ἀνοεῖν πιῆσαι τῷ βασιλεῖ; On the ſame year alſo Patricius, Aſpar's Son, is created Cæſar by Leo, and is ſent to Alexandria to draw off Aſpar from the Arian Opinion and to make him faithful and kind to the Emperour. And Theophanes expreſſes it thus; τῷ δ' αὐτῷ ἔτει &c. On the ſame year Patricius the Son of Aſpar, whom the Emperour Leo had made Cæſar, went to Alexandria, with a deſign to draw off Aſpar from Arianiſm, and to render him faithful and friendly to the Emperour. Valeſ. In Robert Stephens. the Reading is; ἵνα τὸν ἄσπαρος ἄνοιαν κτήσηται, that he might poſſeſs himſelf of Aſpar's Madneſs.

[d] The Prepoſition μὴ is to be expunged, which led Tranſlatours into a miſtake. For Nepos was not made Emperour on the fifth year after Glycerius's Depoſition, but on the ſame year whereon Glycerius had been rejected, (as 'tis related in the Old Faſti, which Cuſpinianus ſet forth;) that is, on the year of Chriſt 474. After this Nepos held the Empire five years For he was ſlain when Baſilius was Conſul alone, on the year of Chriſt 480; as Marcellinus atteſts in his Chronicon, and as 'tis affirmed by the Old Author of the Faſti, whom Cuſpinianus publiſhed. From which Author we are inform'd, that Julius Nepos retained the name of Emperour until his death. Valeſ.

[e] 'Tis falſe, that Glycerius from being Emperour was made Biſhop of Rome. Nor is it true, that he was conſtituted Biſhop of Portue, which ſome have affirmed, following Marcellinus as their Author. Notwithſtanding, Marcellinus does not ſay ſo. For his words are theſe; Leone ſolo Coſ. Glycerius Cæſar Romæ Imperium tenens, &c. Leo being Conſul alone, Glycerius Cæſar holding the Empire of Rome, is driven from the Empire by Nepos, Son of the Siſter of Marcellinus heretofore Patricius; and of a Cæſar is ordained a Biſhop in the Port of the City Rome. But in Marcellinus the punctation is to be altered thus; Imperio expulſus Portu urbis Romæ, ex Cæſare Epiſcopus ordinatus eſt. Being driven from the Empire in the Port of the City Rome, of a Cæſar is ordained a Biſhop. Our Emendation is confirmed by the Old Author of the Faſti, whom I have quoted above; (whoſe words are theſe;) Domino Leone Juniore Auguſt. Coſ. dejectus de Imperio Glycerius in Portu urbis Romæ, Dominus Leo Junior Auguſtus being Conſul, Glycerius is caſt from his Empire in the Port of the City of Rome. 'Tis certain Jordanes, in his Book de Succeſſione Regnorum, affirms that Glycerius was made Biſhop at Salona. Jordanes's words are theſe; Occiſoque Romæ Anthemio Nepotem filiam Nepotiani, &c. And having killed Anthemius at Rome, he created Nepos Son of Nepotianus (to whom he married his Neece,) Cæſar at Ravenna, by Domitianus his Client. Which Nepos having legally obtained the Empire, expelled Glycerius, (who had given the Kingdom to himſelf in a tyrannick manner,) from the Empire and made him Biſhop in Salona of Dalmatia. At this place therefore in the Greek Text, the word [ῥωμαίων, of the Romans] muſt be expunged, or rather tranſpoſed after this manner; τὴν ἀρχὴν ῥωμαίων κρατεῖ, ἐπίσκοπον δὲ τὸν γλυκέριον, &c. holds the Empire of the Romans, and ordains Glycerius, Biſhop, &c. Valeſ.

[f] Marcellinus Comes's computation is truer, who in his Chronicon writes thus concerning this Romulus: Baſiliſco & Armato Coſſ. &c. In the Conſulate of Baſiliſcus and Armatus, the Weſtern Empire of the Roman Nation (which Octavianus Auguſtus the firſt of the Auguſti began to hold on the ſeven hundred and ninth year from the Building of the City,) periſhed with this Auguſtulus, on the year of the Reign of the Emperours his predeceſſors DXXII. Jordanes has the ſame words in his book de Succeſſione Regnorum. Now, this ſum makes one thouſand two hundred thirty and one years. Therefore Cedrenus muſt be corrected, who from Romulus the Builder of the City, to this Romulus Auguſtulus, reckons but one thouſand and eighty years. Valeſ.

[g] The Reading in Robert Stephens is [ἐπιχειρίζει, attempts;] without doubt it ſhould be [ἐγχειρίζεται, takes in hand,] as Nicephorus words it, book 15. chap. 11. In the Tellerian MS. I found it written [μεταχειρίζει, adminiſtred,] which Reading pleaſes me beſt. Valeſ.

Concerning the death of Leo, and the Empire of Leo Junior, and alſo concerning Zeno his Father.

AT the ſame time the Emperour Leo ended his Reign at Byzantium, after he had governed the Empire ſeventeen years, having declared Leo (the Son of his own Daughter Ariadne and Zeno) a very young Child, Emperour. After * his death, his Father Zeno † aſſumes the Purple, Verina the Wife of Leo giving him her aſſiſtance, as being her Son in Law. The Child [Leo Junior] dying not long after, Zeno continued ſole poſſeſſour of the Empire. [a] Before the following (to wit, the eighteenth) Chapter, in the incomparable Florentine Manuſcript theſe words were written, τέλος τοῦ β' λόγου, The end of the Second Book. Then after the [ſeventeenth] Chaper, theſe words occur; εἰσὶν ὡς ἐν ἐπιτομῇ τὰ ἐν τῇ συνόδῳ τῇ ἐν χαλκηδόνι συλλεγείσῃ κεκινημένα ἐν τούτοις, The matters agitated at the Synod convened at Chalcedon, being reduced into an Epitome, are theſe. Valeſ.

CHAP. XVIII.

An Epitome of the Acts at the Synod of Chalcedon, set at the end of the Second Book.

PAschasinus and Lucentius, Bishops, and Boniphacius, a Presbyter, filled the place of Leo Pontiff of the Elder Rome. Anatolius being Prelate of Constantinople, and Dioscorus Bishop of the Alexandrians; Maximus also of Antioch, and Juvenalis of Jerusalem, and those Bishops about them [were there.] Together with whom were present those Personages who held the principal Places in the eximious Senate [of Constantinople.] To whom they who filled the place of Leo said, that Dioscorus ought not to sit together with them in the Council. For this [they said] was given them in charge by Leo. And, unless it were done, that they would go [forthwith] out of the Church. And when [those] of the Senate asked, what were the matters objected against Dioscorus; they made answer, that Dioscorus ought to give an account of his own Judgment, who, contrary to what was fitting and just, had accepted the Person of the Judge, [a] without the permission of him who governeth the Bishoprick of Rome. After which words, when Dioscorus, by the Senate's Decree, was standing in a place in the midst; Eusebius Bishop of Dorylæum made a Request, that the Supplicatory Libel, which had by him been presented to the Emperour might be recited; which Request he made in these expres words: I have been injured by Dioscorus; the Faith hath been injured: Flavianus the Bishop has been murdered; and together with me unjustly deposed by him. Do you give order, that my Supplicatory Libel may be read. Which thing therefore having been debated, the Libel was permitted to be read, the Contents whereof were these.

[a] In the fourth chapter of this Book, (where we have this same passage) these words [τῆς ἁγιωτάτης ἐκκλησίας τῆς ἐπικοσμουσης ῥώμης παρελθόντος, without the permission of him who governeth the Bishoprick of Rome,] occurrs not, neither in the Greek Text of Valesius's Edition, nor in that of Robert Stephens's; though Valesius takes notice of them in his Version there. At this place they are inserted into both the now mentioned Greek Editions; and therefore we have rendred them here, but (with good reason) have omitted them at the said fourth Chapter. This latter answer of the Roman Legates to the Senatours, seems obscure and unintelligible.

From Eusebius the meanest Bishop of Dorylæum, who speaks in defence of himself, of the Orthodox Faith, and of Flavianus of Blessed memory, who was Bishop of Constantinople. [It is] the design of your power, to make provision for all your Subjects, and to stretch forth an hand to all those who are injured: especially to them who are recounted amongst the Ecclesiasticks. And hereby you worship the Deity, by whom a power hath been given you to Rule and Govern * the World. In regard therefore the Faith of Christ and we have suffered many and grievous things, contrary to all reason and Equity, from Dioscorus the most reverend Bishop of the great City Alexandria; We address to Your Piety, entreating we may have Right done Us. Now, the business is this. At the Synod lately held in the Metropolis of the Ephesians, (would to God that Synod had never been held, that it might not have filled the World with mischiefs and disturbance!) that † Good man Dioscorus, disregarding the consideration of what is just, and not [respecting] the fear of God, (for he was of the same Opinion, and entertained the same Sentiments with the vain-minded and heretical Eutyches; but concealed it from many Persons, as 'twas afterwards plainly evidenced by his own declaration:) took an occasion from that Accusation which I had brought against Eutyches, a Person of the same Opinion with himself, and from that Sentence pronounc'd against the same Eutyches by Bishop Flavianus of Holy memory, [whereby] he assembled a multitude of disorderly and tumultuous Persons: and having possest himself of power by money, as much as in him lay, he hath weakned the pious Religion of the Orthodox and has confirmed the ill Opinion of the Monk Eutyches, which long since, even from the beginning, hath been condemned by the Holy Fathers. Whereas therefore, the matters are not small and trivial, Which he hath audaciously attempted, both against the Faith of Christ, and against Us, We fall at the feet of Your [Imperial] Majesty, and humbly beseech You, to order the said most Religious Bishop Dioscorus, to give in his Answer to what is objected against him by us: to wit, by having the Monuments of the Acts, Which he has made against us, read before the Holy Synod. From which [Acts] We are able to demonstrate, that he even himself is estranged from the Orthodox Faith, Hath confirmed an Heresy full of Impiety, Hath unjustly deposed Us, and in a most grievous and injurious manner oppressed Us: You sending your Divine and Adorable Mandates to the Holy and Oecumenical Synod of Bishops, most dear to God, [b] to the end that it may hear both Us and the forementioned Dioscorus, and bring to the knowledge of Your Piety all that is transacted, according to that which shall please Your Immortal Height. And if We shall obtain this, We will pour forth incessant Prayers for your Eternal Empire, most Divine Emperours!

[b] In the incomparable Florentine MS. this place is read thus: Ἐφ' ᾧ τε ἡμῶν καὶ τῶν προκειμένων ἀκοῦσαι, To the end that it may hear both us, &c. The Reading in the Acts of the Chalcedon Council is the same. Christophorson, and Sir Henry Savil, at the margin of his Copy, have mended it thus; Ἐφ' ᾧ τὰ ἡμῶν καὶ τὰ, &c. To the end that it may hear our Cause and that of the forementioned Dioscorus. But I had rather write it Ἐφ' ᾧ ἡμῶν τε καὶ τῶ, &c. Vales. In Robert Stephens the Reading is Ἐφ' ὧν τε ἡμῶν καὶ τῶ, &c. where also the word [ἀκοῦσαι] is wanting.

By the joynt Request therefore of Dioscorus and Eusebius, The Acts of the Second Ephesine Synod were publickly recited: by which 'twas manifestly demonstrated, that Leo's Letter had not been read, and that, notwithstanding there had been an Interlocution once and twice concerning that matter. Wherefore, when Dioscorus was asked to declare the Cause hereof, his Answer was, That he himself by Interlocution [had given order] once and twice that that should be done; and he requested, that Juvenalis Bishop of Jerusalem, and Thalassius [Bishop] of the First Cæsarea in Cappadocia, might give a more manifest Declaration of this matter. For [he said] That they had received an Authority [of presiding in the Synod] together with him. Juvenalis did indeed affirm, That when [the Emperours] Divine Letter * had been read in the first place, he made an Interlocution, [ordering] that [c] that [Letter] should be recited; but, that

[c] Instead of [ἐκείνῳ, to him] doubtless the Reading must be [ἐκεῖνο, that,] understand [τὸ θεῖον γράμμα, the Divine Letter.] Which Emendation is confirmed by the Acts of the Chalcedon Council, pag. 52, and 53. Edit. Bin. where these words occurr. Gloriosissimi Judices & Amplissimus Senatus dixerunt, &c. The most Glorious Judges and the most Noble Senate said, Let the most Blessed Bishop Juvenalis declare, why when the most Reverend Bishop Dioscorus made an Interlocution for the reciting of the Letter of the most Holy Romish Archbishop, that Letter was not read. Juvenalis the most Reverend Bishop of Jerusalem said: Johannes the Presbyter and Primicerius [chief] of the Notaries said, that he had in his hands the Sacred Letters of the most Religious and most Pious Emperours; and I answered that the Imperial Letters Letters muſt be read. Further, the very words which Juvenalis had made uſe of in that ſecond Epheſine Synod, occurrs in the aboveſaid 52. pag. where the Acts of the ſecond Epheſine Synod are recorded. Moreover Nicephorus confirms our Emendation in the laſt Chapter of his fifteenth Book, where he gives us a Summary of the Acts of the Chalcedon Council, moſtly tranſcribed from Evagrius. I have been larger in my Remarks upon theſe things, becauſe Chriſtophorſon, in the Rendition of this place, hath wandred far from the truth. By the way, you may obſerve the fraud committed in that ſecond Epheſine Synod. For, when Hilarius the Deacon, the Legate of the Apoſtolick See, had openly declared to the Biſhops who were preſent, that he had Pope Leo's Letter, and had required that it might be read in the Council: Johannes the Presbyter and Primicerius of the Notaries, aroſe and ſaid, that he had in his hands other Letters written from the Emperour to Dioſcorus. Then Juvenalis commanded, that thoſe Letters of the Emperour ſhould be read, no mention being made of Leo's Letter. You ſee therefore, that the reading of Leo's Letter was deſignedly impeded, by the fraud of Dioſcorus; who, inſtead of Leo's Epiſtle, cauſed the Emperour Theodoſius's Letter to be read in the Synod. Further, the Tellerian Manuſcript does confirm our Emendation; in which Copy I found it written as I had conjectured. Valeſ.

afterwards no mention was made of that * Epiſtle. But Thalaſſius ſaid, that he hindred not the reading of that Letter; and that he had not ſo much † Authority, as that he alone could decree, that it ſhould ‖ be read. When therefore a further progreſs was made in the reading of the Acts, and ſome of the Biſhops found fault with ſome words as being falſe and forged; Stephanus Biſhop of the Epheſians was asked, what Notaries of his at that time had taken [thoſe words] in writing; his anſwer was, that Julianus, (afterwards made Biſhop of Lebedus,) and Criſpinus were his Notaries: but, that Dioſcorus's Notaries would not permit * that to be done, but took hold of their fingers whilſt they were writing; in ſo much that they were in danger of undergoing moſt foul abuſes. Further, the ſame Stephanus † depoſed, that [himſelf and the other Biſhops] had ſubſcribed to Flavianus's Depoſition in one and the ſame day. Hereto added Acacius Biſhop of Ariarathia, that all [of them] had ſubſcribed in a Paper not written on, [and that they were compelled to it] by force and neceſſity, having been ſurrounded with innumerable miſchiefs, in regard Souldiers [Armed] with murdering ‖ weapons had encompaſſed them. Further, when another Sentence was read, Theodorus Biſhop of Claudiopolis ſaid, that no body uttered thoſe Words. Moreover, upon a procedure in reading [the Acts, in this manner] when [they came] to a certain [d] place wherein Eutyches had ſaid, [that he] Anathematized] thoſe who ſhould affirm that the Fleſh of God and our Lord and Saviour Jeſus Chriſt had deſcended from Heaven: the Acts declared, That againſt theſe Words Euſebius had ſaid, that thoſe were indeed condemned by Eutyches, who ſhould ſay that Chriſt's Fleſh had deſcended from Heaven, but that it was not added by him, whence the Fleſh was. The ſame Acts added alſo, that Diogenes Biſhop of Cyzicum ſubjoyned [theſe Words:] [e] declare therefore, from whence? and, that notwithſtanding they were not permitted to make any further inquiry into theſe things. Further, the ſame Acts do manifeſt, that Baſilius Biſhop of Seleucia in Iſauria, ſpake [theſe words:] I adore our one Lord Jeſus Chriſt, * the Son of God, the only God the Word; Who after the Incarnation and Union, is known in two Natures. And, that againſt theſe Words the Egyptians cryed out: Let no man divide Him Who is not to be parted, he ought not to call one Son two. But that the Eaſterns exclaimed, Anathema to him who parts, Anathema to him who divides. 'Tis contained in the ſame Acts, that Eutyches was asked, whether he would affirm two Natures in Chriſt. And, that he anſwered, that he aſſerted Chriſt [to conſiſt] of two Natures before the Union: but after the Union, [he acknowledged but] one [Nature in him.] And, that Baſilius ſaid [theſe Words;] unleſs you aſſirm two undivided and inconfuſed Natures after the Union, you aſſert a confuſion and a commixture. But if you add Incarnate and Inhumanate, and do underſtand Incarnation and Inhumanation in ſuch manner as Cyrillus doth, you affirm the ſame that We do. For, the Divinity which [is] from [his] Father, is one thing; the Humanity which is from [his] Mother, is another. When [f] they were interrogated, upon what account they had ſubſcribed to Flavianus's Depoſition; the Acts declare that the Eaſterns cryed out, We have all ſinned, We do all crave pardon. Again further, the ſame Acts being read on, do manifeſt, that the Biſhops were queſtioned, for what reaſon they would not permit Euſebius to come in, when he deſired it. To which Dioſcorus made anſwer, that Elpidius brought the Commonitory; and, that he affirmed, that the Emperour Theodoſius had given order, that Euſebius ſhould not be ſuffered to come in. The Acts do manifeſt, that Juvenalis alſo ſaid the ſame Words. But Thalaſſius ſaid, that he himſelf [g] had not Authority. Which anſwers were diſallowed of by the Judges. For [they ſaid,] that this Apology was invalid [where a matter] of Faith is the ſubject of the Conference. After theſe things, the ſame Acts do declare, that Dioſcorus [h] made a Complaint in theſe Words: What Canons are now obſerved, whenas Theodoret is [ſuffered to] come in; And, that the Senatours made anſwer, That Theodoret was come in as an Accuſer. And when Dioſcorus ſubjoyned, that Theodoret ſate amongſt the Biſhops; the Senatours ſaid again, That Euſebius and Theodoret ſhould take the place of the Accuſers, in like manner as Dioſcorus had the place of the Accuſed allotted to him. When therefore all [the Acts] of the Second Epheſine Synod had been read, and the Sentence [of Depoſition pronounc'd] againſt Flavianus and Euſebius, had been likewiſe recited, as far as that * place, where [i] Hilarius the Deacon had ſaid, 'Tis contradicted: the Biſhops of the Eaſt and thoſe with them determined] by the Princes in ſuch cauſes as theſe, have not authority. Chriſtophorſon has followed the ſame ſenſe alſo. Likewiſe Langus, Nicephorus's Tranſlator, hath fallen into the ſame miſtake. But, from the Acts of the Chalcedon Council, it is eaſy to confute this Rendition. For Thalaſſius being queſtioned by the Judges, makes this anſwer only, ἐγὼ οὐκ ἦμην αὐθέντης, that is, all power and authority was not in me. For, altho' Juvenalis and Thalaſſius were ordered by the Emperour Theodoſius to preſide at the ſecond Epheſine Synod together with Dioſcorus, notwithſtanding in reallity all the power was in Dioſcorus's hands. Further, the Judges condemned the Anſwer of Dioſcorus, Juvenalis, and Thalaſſius in theſe words, In a matter of Faith this defence is not to be admitted. Valeſ.

[f] In the Acts of the Chalcedon Council, only Baſilius is ſaid to have been queſtioned by the Judges and Senatours; and what anſwer he returned to their queſtion, is added there alſo. Notwithſtanding, Nicephorus confirms the vulgar reading, which is [ὧν ἐρωτηθέντων, when they were interrogated:] which if we will retain, it muſt be ſaid, that Baſilius and thoſe who were with him, were interrogated by the Judges. Valeſ.

[g] In the Rendition of this place, both Tranſlators have erred. For Muſculus renders it thus: Thalaſſius verò dixit, non habere autoritatem ea quæ à principibus in hujuſmodi cauſis judicantur. But Thalaſſius ſaid, that thoſe things which are judged [or

* Or, expreſſion.

[h] I agree with Chriſtophorſon and Sir Henry Savil; who inſtead of [πέμψαντος, was ſent for,] mended it thus, [μέμψασθαι, made a complaint.] Which fault I found to have been frequently committed in the Manuſcript Copies. Valeſ.

[i] This place muſt be corrected from the firſt Action of the Chalcedon Synod, pag. 142. Where, after the Sentence of Condemnation pronounc'd by Dioſcorus againſt Flavianus and Euſebius, when Flavianus had ſaid, παραιτοῦμαί σε, I refuſe you: Hilarius Deacon of the Church of Rome, ſaid, κονλεβδίκτωρ, 'tis contradicted. Which words are written out from the Acts of the ſecond Epheſine Synod. Valeſ.

exclaimed, Anathema to Dioscorus: in this very hour [k] Christ hath deposed Dioscorus: Flavianus hath been deposed by Dioscorus: Holy Lord, do Thou revenge him, Orthodox Emperour, do you revenge Him! Many years to Leo: many years to the [l] Patriarch. Then, when the following words were read, which manifested, that all the then convened Bishops had agreed to the deposition of Flavianus and Eusebius, the most Glorious Judges made an Interlocution in these expres words.

[k] Διόσκορον ὁ Χριστὸς καθεῖλε. So 'tis also written in Nicephorus. But in the Acts of the Chalcedon Synod 'tis written far otherwise, to wit, after this manner: ταύτῃ τῇ ὥρᾳ καθεῖλε. ταύτῃ τῇ ὥρᾳ καταιρέσθω. That is, in this very hour [Dioscorus] hath deposed: in this very hour let him be deposed. Which reading I approve of as being the better. But, as this place of Evagrius is to be corrected from the Acts of the Chalcedon Council, so on the other hand, the Acts of the Chalcedon Council are to be amended from our Evagrius. For, instead of these words which follow, ἄγε κύριε σὺ αὐτὸν ἐκδίκησον, Holy Lord, do Thou revenge him; it must [in the Chalcedon Acts] be written thus: φλαβιανὸς παρὰ διοσκόρου καθῃρέθη, ἄγε κύριε. &c. Flavianus hath been deposed by Dioscorus: Holy Lord, do thou revenge him, Orthodox Emperour, &c. as it is in Evagrius and Nicephorus: and so the old Translatour of the Chalcedon Council seems to have read: for he renders it thus: Sancte domine, tu illum vindica: Catholice Imperator, tu illum vindica, Holy Lord, do Thou revenge him: Catholick Emperour, do you revenge him. From which Version we conclude, that these words [Flavianus hath been deposed by Dioscorus] ought necessarily to precede. Otherwise, whither should these words [do You revenge him] be referred? Vales.

[l] Some body may make a query here, what Patriarch is to be understood at this place. My affirmation is that Anatolius Bishop of Constantinople is meant. Further, two things are remarkable here. The first is, that the oriental Bishops wish many years not to their own Patriarch, but to another. Secondly, that they term the Bishop of Constantinople simply and absolutely, The Patriarch, to wit, giving him this honour on account of the prerogative of his See. For, in the Constantinopolitan Synod, the second place was assigned to the See of Constantinople. Vales.

We perceive, that a more exact scrutiny concerning the Ordodox and Catholick Faith ought to be made to morrow, when the Synod will be more compleat and full. But, in regard Flavianus of Pious Memory, and Eusebius the most Religious Bishop of Dorylæum (from a search made into the Acts and Decrees, and also from their testimony by word of mouth who presided in the Synod then convened; who have confessed that they have erred, and have deposed them without cause, when they had in no wise erred in relation to the Faith:) have, as 'tis evidently known, been unjustly deposed: it appears to us (agreeable to that which is acceptable unto God,) to be just, (provided it shall please our most Divine and most Pious Lord;) that Dioscorus the most Religious Bishop of Alexandria, Juvenalis the most Religious Bishop of Jerusalem, Thalassius the most Religious Bishop of Cæsarea, Eusebius the most Religious Bishop of [m] Ancyra, Eustathius the most Religious Bishop of Berytus, and Basilius the most Religious Bishop of Seleucia in Isauria, which [Prelates] had power, and presided over the then Synod, should [n] lie under the very same punishment, being by [the sentence of] this sacred Synod according to the Canons estranged from the Episcopal dignity: all things which have been consequently done being made known to his most sacred Imperial Majesty.

[m] From the Acts of the Chalcedon Council, pag. 15. (where this Interlocution of the Judges is recorded;) Instead of Armenia, it must be made Ancyra. Vales.

[n] Instead of [ἐκπεσεῖν, fall from,] in the First Action of the Chalcedon Council, pag. 152. it is truer written thus [ὑποπεσεῖν, lie under.] For 'tis referred to what went before, to wit, τῷ αὐτῷ ὑπηρίῳ, the very same punishment; and the same herewith is the reading in the fourth chapter of this book, where this Interlocution of the Judges occurs entire. In the fourth Action of the Chalcedon Synod, pag. 217. the reading indeed is ἐκπεσεῖν: but there is a word added in the foregoing [clause,] in this manner, τῷ αὐτῷ ὑπαχθῆναι ὑπηρίῳ, subjected to the same punishment. If we should retain the word ἐκπεσεῖν, then these words [ἀλλοτρίους γενομένους, being estranged from] which follow, would be superfluous. Indeed, these two last mentioned words are wanting in the Tellerian and Florentine MSS. and in Nicephorus. Vales.

After these words, the Easterns cryed out This [is] a just judgment: but the Bishops of Illyricum exclaimed, We have all sinned, let us all be vouchsafed pardon. And again, when the Easterns acclaimed, This is a just sentence: Christ hath deposed a Murderer, Christ hath revenged the Martyrs: the Senators made an Interlocution, That every one of the Bishops convened, should by himself * declare his own Faith; knowing for certain, that the most Divine Emperour did believe, according to that Exposition of the Faith of the three hundred and eighteen [Fathers, assembled] at Nice, and the hundred and fifty Fathers [convened] ° at Constantinople; also according to the Epistles of the Holy Fathers, Gregorius, Basilius, Hilarius, Athanasius, Ambrosius; and according to Cyril's two Letters, which were recited at the First Synod at Ephesus: for, that the most Pious Leo Bishop of the Elder Rome, had deposed Eutyches according to the same Faith.

° In the excellent Florent. MS. these words [at Constantinople] are wanting; nor do they occurr in the Acts of the Chalcedon Council, as may be seen at pag. 152; Edit. Bin. Vales.

The First Session therefore having after this manner been ended, when the most Holy Bishops had come together [p] alone in order to another [Action,] Eusebius Bishop of Dorylæum presented Libels in defence of himself and Flavianus; wherein he accused Dioscorus as entertaining the same Sentiments with Eutyches, and because he had divested them of the Sacerdotal Function. He added also, that Dioscorus had inserted some words, which had not been spoken at the then convened Synod, into the Acts thereof; and moreover, that Dioscorus had procured that they should subscribe in blank papers. He requested further, that all the Acts of the second Ephesine Synod might be made null by the vote of [the Prelates who] were convened, that themselves might be restored to the Sacerdotal dignity, and that that nefarious opinion might be Anathematized. He requested also after the reading [of his Libel,] that his Adversary might be present. When this was by an Interlocution ordered to be done; Aëtius Arch-Deacon and Primicerius of the Notaries said, that he had gone to Dioscorus, as also to the others; and that Dioscorus had answered, that he was not permitted by his keepers to come to the Council. By making another Interlocution it was ordered, that Dioscorus should be sought for before [the doors of] the Council. And when he was not found, Anatolius Bishop of Constantinople made an Interlocution, that he ought to be sent for, and to be present in the Synod. Which having been done, the messengers sent to Dioscorus returned and said that he told them, I am under custody: let [my keepers] say, whether or no they will permit me to go [to the Council.] And upon the messengers saying to him, that they had been sent to him, not to the Magistriani, they brought word that

[p] In the third Action of the Chalcedon Synod, only the Bishops met, nor were there any of the Secular Judges, or Senators present in the Council. For, in that Session the Faith was to be treated of: which that they should declare and set forth, the Bishops had before been invited by the most glorious Judges. But the Bishops for a long while refused to do that, saying that the Draught of the Nicene Creed was sufficient, which had been confirmed by the Constantinopolitan, and first Ephesine Synod. Nevertheless, at length they had yielded to the Judges request, and promised they would do it. Further, where the Faith is treated of the Secular Judges have nothing to do. In the Third Action therefore, wherein the Faith was to be treated of, no Secular Judges were present. It is further to be remarked, that at this place Evagrius hath omitted the transactions of the Second Action. Evagrius therefore seems to have taken the Third Action for the Second. Which is confirmed by the Acts of this very Synod, pag. 177; where that seems to be the Second Meeting, or Action, which now is the Third. Vales.

that Dioſcorus had ſaid, I am ready to come to the Holy and Oecumenical Synod; but I am bindred. Whereto Himerius added, that in their return from Dioſcorus, the [q] Aſſiſtant to the Maſter of the ſacred Offices met them, and that in company with him the Biſhops had gone again to Dioſcorus, and that he had ſome things concerning theſe matters which he had taken in [r] Notes. Which having been read, 'twas manifeſted that Dioſcorus had ſpoken theſe expreſs words. Having recollected my ſelf, and conſidered what is expedient [for me,] I anſwer thus.

[q] Βοηθὸς τῶν μαγίστρων. Langus and Chriſtophorſon have rendred it Boethus, as if that were a proper name. But Βοηθὸς is the name of an Office. For the Princeps officii magiſtri officiorum was ſo termed, who was of the Schole [or, Body] of The Agentes in Rebus, as we are informed from the Notitia Imperii Romani. Farther, this Aſſiſtant of the Maſter of the Offices, was by his proper name called Eleuſinius, as 'tis recorded in the Third Action of the Chalcedon Synod. Valeſ.

[r] Ἐν σημείοις. In the Acts of the Chalcedon Council, in ſtead of theſe words, 'tis written, ἐν ἐκλήψεσι; which the old Tranſlatour hath rendred thus: Et certa locuti ſunt, quæ in exceptis habeo, And they have ſpoken ſome words, which I have in my Excepta [that is, in my account taken thereof in writing.] 'Tis certain, Himerius was a Notary and a Reader, ſent by the Council (together with the Biſhops) to Dioſcorus, that he might take thoſe things in writing, which ſhould be ſaid on both ſides; for that was the Office of Notaries. The Biſhops, as often as they went to a Synod, were wont to carry each his Notary along with them, who were to take the matters tranſacted in the Synod in writing: to the end that, after the ending of the Synod, each Biſhop might carry a copy of the Acts into his own Country. Further, I approve highly of the old Tranſlatour's rendring σημεῖα excepta. Whence I am of opinion, that Origen's σημειώσεις ought in Latine to be termed Excepta. I know indeed, that Origen's σημειώσεις are by Ruſinus and Jerome commonly termed Excerpta, Excerptions; but my Sentiment is, that 'tis corruptly written, in regard they ought rather to be termed Excepta. Valeſ.

In regard the moſt magnificent Judges who ſate in the Seſſion before this, have Decreed ſeveral things after many Interlocutions made by every one; and I am now cited to a Second Seſſion, to the end that the foreſaid [Decrees] may be voided and made null; 'tis my requeſt, that the moſt magnificent Judges and Sacred Senate, who were at the Former Seſſion, may be preſent now alſo, in order to a re-examination of the ſame matters. To whom Acacius, as 'tis manifeſtly related in the ſaid Acts, gave anſwer in theſe very words. The Holy and Great Synod have not commanded Your Sanctity therefore to be preſent, that thoſe things which have been tranſacted before the moſt Magnificent Judges and the Sacred Senate might be voided and made null: but [the Synod] hath ſent us, [with a command] that You ſhould come to the Seſſion, and that Your Sanctity ſhould not be abſent therefrom. To whom Dioſcorus returned this anſwer, (as the Acts declare;) You have told me even now, that Euſebius hath preſented Libels: I make a requeſt again, that my Cauſe may be examined before the Judges and Senate. Then, after other things of this nature, which are put into the Acts; thoſe were again ſent, who might perſwade Dioſcorus to be preſent at what was tranſacted. Which having been done, thoſe who had been ſent returned, and ſaid, that they had taken Dioſcorus's anſwer in Notes, which [Notes] do manifeſt, that he ſaid theſe words. I have already ſignified to Your piety, that I am afflicted with a diſtemper, and that 'tis my requeſt, that the moſt Magnificent Judges, alſo and the Sacred Senate may now likewiſe be preſent at the Judgment of thoſe things which ſhall be inquired into: but in regard my diſtemper hath increaſed, upon that account I have made a delay. And the Acts do manifeſt that Cecropius ſaid unto Dioſcorus; that a little before he had not made the leaſt mention concerning his ſickneſs; and that therefore he ought to ſatisfie the Canons. To whom Dioſcorus made this return, I have ſaid once, that the Judges ought to be preſent. Then, that Ruſinus Biſhop of Samoſata ſaid unto Dioſcorus, that the * Agitations and Debates [in the Council] were Canonical, and that Dioſcorus, if he were preſent, might freely ſpeak what he ſhould have a mind to. And when Dioſcorus enquired, whether Juvenalis and Thalaſſius and Euſtathius were come [to the Synod,] [r] he anſwered, that that was nothing pertinent to the buſineſs. To which words the Acts do ſet forth, that Dioſcorus ſubjoyned theſe, that he had requeſted the Chriſt-loving Emperour, [that he would give order] that the Judges alſo might be preſent [in the Council,] as likewiſe thoſe [Prelates] who together with him * had been Judges. And, that hereto the [Synod's] Meſſengers ſaid, that Euſebius had accuſed him only, and that all the reſt ought not to be preſent. And, that to theſe words Dioſcorus replied, that thoſe other perſons ought alſo to be preſent who had been judged together with him: for, that Euſebius had no private † Cauſe againſt him, but [a common one, to wit,] concerning thoſe things on account of which all of them had been judged. And again, when the [Synod's] Meſſengers perſiſted ‖ in the ſame things, Dioſcorus made anſwer, what I have ſaid, I have ſaid once; nor have I any thing further to ſay. To which words [when declared to the Synod,] Euſebius [Biſhop] of Dorylæum ſaid, that he had [matter of accuſation] againſt Dioſcorus only, and againſt no perſon elſe: and he deſired that Dioſcorus might be cited in by a third Summons. [After this] Aëtius gave information, that ſome perſons who ſtiled themſelves Eccleſiaſticks, together with ſome others who were Laïcks, coming from the City Alexandria, had lately preſented Libels againſt Dioſcorus, and that theſe men were now ſtanding before [the doors of] the Council, and * crying out. When therefore Theodorus, a Deacon of the Holy Church of Alexandria, had in the firſt place preſented [Libels;] and then Iſchirio, who was a Deacon likewiſe; and after him Athanaſius a Presbyter and Cyrillus's ſiſters ſon; and laſtly Sophronius; in which [Libels] they accuſed Dioſcorus partly for Blaſphemies, and partly on account of bodily [damages] and [t] violent exaction of moneys: a third Citation is iſſued out, wherein Dioſcorus is admoniſhed to come [to the Synod.] The Meſſengers therefore appointed for this buſineſs, being returned, made report that Dioſcorus had ſaid [theſe words:] I have ſufficiently informed Your Piety; nor can I add any thing elſe thereto. Again, when the perſons ſent upon this account had continued to be very urgent in their perſwaſives to Dioſcorus [that he would come,] and he having always given the ſame anſwer; Paſchaſinus the Biſhop ſaid [theſe words.] Dioſcorus having now been thrice Summoned, hath not appeared, being prick'd in

[t] I am of the ſame opinion with Learned men, who inſtead of [βίας ἀφαιρέσεως] had mended it thus, βιαίας ἀφαιρέσεως, violent exaction; by conjecture, as I think. For our Copies have no alteration here. Yet the Tellerian Manuſcript (which I procured opportunely, whileſt our Edition was in the preſs,) has it plainly written, βιαίας ἁρπαγῆς. Valeſ.

in conscience: and he [u] asked what [punishment] he deserved. Whereto when the Bishops had returned answer, that he had * offended against the Canons, and when Proterius Bishop of Smyrna had said, at such time as the Holy Flavianus was murdered, nothing had been agreeably and orderly done against him: they who supplied the place of Leo Bishop of the Elder Rome, † made this Declaration in these express words.

* Or, made himself obnoxious to. † Or, pronounced Sentence.

What Dioscorus who hath been Bishop of the Great City Alexandria has audaciously attempted against the Order of the Canons, and the Ecclesiastick Constitution, hath been made manifest, both by those things which have already been enquired into at the First Session, and also from what hath been done this day. For this person, (to omit many other things,) making use of his own authority, uncanonically admitted to communion Eutyches, (a man that embraces the same Sentiments with himself, who had been deposed canonically by his own Bishop of Holy Memory, we mean our Father and Arch-Bishop Flavianus;) before * his sitting [in the Synod] at Ephesus together with the Bishops beloved by God. But the Apostolick See has granted a pardon to those [Prelates,] for what hath been involuntarily done there by them. Who also to this present continue of the same opinion with the most Holy Arch-Bishop Leo, and with all the Holy and Oecumenical Synod. On which account, he hath received them to his own communion, as being asserters of the same faith with himself. But † this man till this very time hath not desisted from boasting of these things, on account whereof he ought rather to mourn, and lay himself prostrate on the earth. Besides, he permitted not the Letter of the most Blessed Pope Leo, to be read, (which had been written by him to Flavianus of Holy Memory;) and this [he did,] notwithstanding he was several times entreated by those persons who brought the Letter, to suffer it to be read; and notwithstanding he had promised with an Oath that it should be read. The not reading of which Letter has filled the most Holy Churches over the whole world with scandals and detriment. Nevertheless, although such things as these have been audaciously attempted by him, [w] yet we had some thoughts concerning the vouchsafing to him something of compassion in relation to his former impious Fact, as also to the rest of the Bishops beloved by God, although they had not the same authority of judging that he was invested with.

* Dioscorus's.

† Dioscorus.

[w] Ἐσκοπεῖμεν δὲ τῆς. The same is the reading also in Nicephorus.

But, in the Chalcedon Acts, and in the fourth chapter of this book, (where this sentence of condemnation occurrs,) it is more truly written ἐσκοπεῖμεν, it was our design. But, by transposing the prepositions, I had rather write it thus, διεσκοπεῖμεν ἐπὶ τῆς, &c. we had considered in relation to, &c. which writing is far more elegant. Vales.

* Or, second.

But in regard he has out-done his former iniquity by his * latter facts, (for he has audaciously pronounced an excommunication against the most Holy and most Pious Leo Arch-Bishop of Rome the Great; and moreover, (when Libels stuft with Crimes were preferred to the Holy and Great Synod against him,) having been canonically called once, twice, and thrice, by the Bishops beloved of God, he obeyed not, to wit, being prick'd by his own conscience; [Lastly,] he has illegally received [to Communion] those, who have been justly deposed by several Synods: [on these various accounts we say]) he himself hath pronounced sentence against himself, having many ways trampled under foot the Ecclesiastick Rules. Wherefore, the most Holy and most Blessed Leo Arch-Bishop of the Greatest and the Elder Rome, by Us and the present Synod, together with the thrice Blessed and most eminent Apostle Peter, who is the * Rock and basis of the Catholick Church, and the foundation of the Orthodox Faith, hath divested him of the Episcopal dignity, and hath * removed him from [the performance of] every Sacerdotal Office. Therefore, the Holy and Great Synod it self will Decree those things concerning the forementioned Dioscorus, which shall seem agreeable to the Canons.

* These Legates of the Romish See (I suppose) point at that expression used by our Saviour to Peter, recorded Matth. 16. 18. As a Comment on which Text take these words of Saint Cyprian, in his book de Unitate Ecclesiæ, termed also Tractatus de Simplicitate Prelatorum, pag. 113. Edit. Basil 1558. Loquitur dominus ad Petrum, Ego tibi dico, inquit, quia tu es Petrus, & Super istam Petram ædificabo Ecclesiam meam, &c. The Lord speaketh to Peter, I say unto thee, says he, that Thou art Peter, and upon this Rock I will build my Church, &c. ——And after his Resurrection he says to the same person, Feed my sheep. And although he gives an equal power to all the Apostles after his Resurrection, and says, As the Father hath sent me, so also I send you, &c. ——Yet that he might manifest the Unity, by his own authority he hath disposed the original of the same Unity as beginning from One. For the rest of the Apostles were the same also, that Peter was, endowed with an equal fellowship, both of honour and power; but the original proceeds from Unity, that the Church may be shown to be one.

[y] Παῦλος ἐκκλησιαστικῆς λειτουργίας.

When therefore these things had been confirmed by Anatolius, Maximus, and the rest of the Bishops, excepting those [Prelates] who together with Dioscorus had been deposed by the Council; a Relation concerning these [Transactions] was by the Synod written to [the Emperour] Marcianus, and by the same Synod a deposition was sent to Dioscorus, the Contents whereof were these.

Know, that by reason of Your contemning the Divine Canons, and on account of Your contumacy [Shown] towards this Holy and Oecumenical Synod, because (besides other Crimes whereof You have been convicted,) having been the third time called by this Holy and great Synod, according to the Divine Canons to answer to those Accusations brought against You, You have not appeared; on the thirteenth day of this instant month October, You are deposed from your Bishoprick by this Holy and Oecumenical Synod, and are * estranged from every Ecclesiastick[y] duty.

This word [λειτουργίας] is variously rendred by Translatours. For Langus renders it Consuetudinem, Custom. Musculus and Christophorson have translated it thus; & ab omni Ecclesiastico Jure esse abalienatum, and are alienated from all Ecclesiastick Right. The Old Translatour of the Chalcedon Council, pag. 214. renders it Functionem, Function; which, in my judgment is the truer Version. In the Libel of Deposition of the same Dioscorus, which the Chalcedon Synod sent, almost in the very same words, to the Clergy-men of the Alexandrian Church who were then at Chalcedon, instead of λειτουργίας, it is βαθμῦ, Degree. In the sentence of condemnation pronounced against the same Dioscorus by the Legates of the Romish See, instead of this word, ἐνέργεια, Office, is made use of. Now, these words are therefore added by the Synod, that they might shew, that Dioscorus was reduced to a Laïck communion. For he is not only said to be divested of the Episcopal dignity, but is also removed from every Ecclesiastick Office: least any one should think him to be removed from the Episcopal Act: [or, acting as a Bishop] and thrust down into the degree of the Presbyterate. For to do that, is sacrilege, as 'tis said in the fourth Action of the Chalcedon Synod, pag. 247. Vales.

Then,

Then, having written concerning these things to the pious x Bishops of the most Holy Church at Alexandria, and when the a Edict against Dioscorus had been proposed, this Sessions was ended.

x Ἐπισκόπες τὰς ἐν Ἀλεξανδρείᾳ ἁγιωτάτης ἐκκλησίας. It should (as it seems) be written κληρικὰς, Clergy of the most Holy, &c. For Dioscorus's Libel of Deposition was sent to the Clergy-men of the Alexandrian Church, who were then at Chalcedon, as may be seen in the Acts of the Chalcedon Council, pag. 214. Due order did require indeed that Dioscorus's Deposition should be declared by the Synod to the Bishops of Egypt also. But the Bishops of the Chalcedon Council were to perform that afterwards, in their Synodick Letter. At that time they had done sufficient, in declaring Dioscorus's Deposition to the Alexandrian Ecclesiasticks who were then at Chalcedon, to wit, to Eleemosinus the Presbyter and Oeconomus [or, Steward,] and to Euthalius Arch-Deacon, and to the rest of the Clergy. 'Tis certain, Evagrius's words do sufficiently declare, that there is no mention here concerning the Bishops of Egypt. For he calls them Bishops of the Alexandrian Church: which appellation agrees not with the Bishops of Egypt. Vales.

a In Nicephorus 'tis θεσπέσιον. But in the Acts of the Chalcedon Council, the reading it θεόθεσμα. In the Tellerian MS. I found it written θεσπέσιον. Vales. And so 'tis in Robert Stephens's Edition.

* Or, convention. The foregoing * Session having been thus ended, after this [the Bishops] being again convened, returned answer to the Interrogation of the Judges (who had requested that the † true Faith might be expounded,) [in this manner,] b that nothing further ought to be established, the matters against Eutyches having been fully finished, and determined by the Bishop of Rome, to which [determinations] they had all given their assent. Again, when all the Bishops cried out, that they all said the same things, and when the Judges by making an Interlocution had pronounced, that each Patriarch, having chosen one or two persons of his own Diœcesis, should come forth into the midst, to the end that the opinion of every one might be made manifest: Florentius Bishop of Sardis required a * Truce, to the end that with consideration they might arrive at the Truth. And Cecropius Bishop of Sebastopolis spoke these words. The Faith hath been well expounded by the Three hundred and eighteen Holy Fathers, and hath been confirmed by the Holy Fathers, Athanasius, Cyrillus, Celestinus, Hilarius, Basilius, Gregorius, and now again by the most Holy Leo. And our request is, that the [words] of the Three hundred and eighteen Holy Fathers, as also those of the most Holy Leo, may be recited. Which having been read, the whole Synod cried out, in these words; This is the Faith of the Orthodox: Thus we all believe, Pope Leo believes thus, Cyrillus believed thus, the Pope hath expounded it thus. And when there had been another Interlocution, that the Exposition of the Faith [set forth] by the Hundred and fifty Holy Fathers might be recited also, that was likewise read. To which the Synod again cried out, and said: This is the Faith of [us] all: This is the Faith of the Orthodox: Thus we all believe. a After whom Aëtius the Arch-Deacon said, that he had at hand the Epistle of the Divine Cyrillus to Nestorius, which all [the Fathers] convened at Ephesus had confirmed by their own Subscriptions; and that he had likewise another Letter of the same Cyrillus's, which had been written to Johannes [Bishop] of Antioch, and which had likewise been confirmed: and his request was, that both these Letters might be read. And after an Interlocution had been made concerning these [Letters,] they were both recited. Part of the Contents of the former Epistle run word for word thus.

b Καὶ ὡς ἡ Νεοτ. Doubtless the particle ᾗ must be expunged; in regard 'tis altogether superfluous at this place. Further, the place here meant by Evagrius, is extant in the Second Action of the Chalcedon Council, pag. 159. Edit. Bin. But 'tis to be remarked, of which I have given an Advertisement before, that the Copies of the Chalcedon Synod which Evagrius made use of, were different from those we now have. For that which is to us the Third Action, to Evagrius is the Second, as we have seen already. But, that which in our copies is inscribed the Second Action, is the Third to Evagrius; as it will be made manifest from this place, and those following. Vales.

Cyrillus, to the most Pious Nestorius, [my] Fellow-Minister.

Some persons, as I understand, * reproach my Reputation in the presence of Your Piety, and that frequently, taking an occasion [to do thus] most especially, at such time as those of the Magistracy, are met together; and peradventure they suppose, that Your ears are even delighted [with such discourses as these.] And after some words. The Holy and Great Synod therefore hath said, † that He the only begotten Son hath been begotten of God and the Father according to Nature, very God of very God, the Light of the Light; that He, by whom the Father hath made all things, descended, as Incarnate, made man, suffered, rose again the third day, ascended into the Heavens. These Expressions and Forms we also ought to follow, considering with our selves, what is meant by this [proposition,] God the Word was incarnate and was made man. For we do not affirm, that the Nature of The Word having been changed, was made Flesh: nor that it was converted into whole man, who [consists] of Soul and Body. But [We say] that rather, that when The Word had personally united to himself the Flesh enlivened with a rational soul, he was ineffably and incomprehensibly made man, and he hath been stiled the Son of man, not according to will only, or good pleasure; nor yet as it were in the Assumption of the person only. And, that the Natures [are] diverse, c which have come together into a true Unity: but, that of both [Natures there is] one Christ and [one] Son; not as if the diversity of the Natures were destroyed by the Union: but rather, * that the Divinity and Humanity have perfected to us one Lord, and Christ, and Son, by an ineffable mystical and secret concourse to an Unity. And after some few words. But, in regard having personally united the humanity to himself on our account and for our salvation, he proceeded from a woman, for this reason he is said to have been born according to the Flesh. For he was not at first born a common [and ordinary] man of the Holy Virgin, and after that The Word * descended upon him: but having been † united from the very womb, he is said to have undergone a Carnal Nativity, that he might procure [to himself] *the Nativity of his own Flesh. And so that is true which Cyrillus says, viz. that two Natures diverse amongst themselves, have come together into a true unity: which, nevertheless, Christophorson understood not. Not that of two Natures one is made, in such manner as Eutyches asserted: But, that of two Natures one Christ hath existed. And thus Cyrillus has explained his own opinion a little after these words; whereas he saith, διὰ τῆς ἀφράστου καὶ ἀπορρήτου πρὸς ἕνωσιν συνόδου, by an ineffable mystical and secret concourse to an unity. From hence it appears, that Johannes Langus, otherwise the Learned Translatour of Nicephorus, hath mistook here, who has rendred ἕνωσιν (not unity, but) Union. Most part of [Cyrillus's] other Letters hath been recorded in our foregoing † Book. But there is a passage in it, which Johannes [Bishop] of the Antiochians had written [in his Letter, to which passage] Cyrillus hath ‖ fully agreed. This Passage runs thus: We confess the Holy Virgin to be Theotocos, because God, The Word, took Flesh from Her, and was made Man; and from that very Conception united to himself a Temple taken from Her. But we know, that those Divine Men do take the Evangelick and Apostolick Expressions [uttered] concerning the Lord, * sometimes in a common sense, as [spoken] of one person: † at other whiles [they] divide them, as [uttered] concerning two Natures. And, [that they have] delivered these [Expressions as] becoming God, according to the Divinity of Christ: but those other [as] humble and mean, agreeable to the same person's Humanity. To which Words [Cyrillus] has subjoyned these. Having read these your sacred Expressions, We find that We our selves embrace the same Sentiments. For, there is one Lord, one Faith, one Baptism. We have therefore glorified God the Saviour of all [Men,] rejoycing mutually, that as well the Churches amongst us, as those with you, do profess a Faith that is agreeable, both to the divinely inspired Scriptures, and also to the Tradition of our Holy Fathers.

After the Reading hereof, those of this Synod cried out in these words: We do all believe thus; Pope Leo believes thus. Anathema to him that divides, and to him who confounds. This is the Faith of Leo the Archbishop. Leo believes thus; Leo and Anatolius believe thus. We all believe thus. As Cyrillus, so we believe. The eternal Memory of Cyrillus. As Cyrillus's Letters [f] are, so are our Sentiments. Thus we have believed; thus we do believe: Leo the Archbishop thinks thus; thus he believes; thus he hath written. Then, an Interlocution having been made, that Leo's Letter might also be read; being rendred [into Greek,] it was recited: which [Letter] is extant in the Acts [of the Council.] After therefore the reading thereof, the Bishops exclaimed, This is the Faith of the Fathers, This is the Faith of the Apostles. We all believe thus; [g] we that are Orthodox do believe thus. Anathema to him who believes not thus. Peter by Leo hath uttered these words: The Apostles have taught thus: Leo hath taught piously and truly, Cyrillus has taught thus, Leo and Cyrillus have taught alike: Anathema to him who believes not thus: This is the true Faith, the Orthodox think thus; this is the Faith of the Fathers. Why were not these [words] read at Ephesus? Dioscorus hath concealed these [Expressions.] It is recorded in the same Acts, that when part of the [fore-mentioned] Letter of Leo was read, the Contents whereof were these; And in order to the * paying that due Debt of our Nature, the Divine Nature was united to a Nature passible, to the end that (for this was agreeable to our Remedies,) He being one and the same Mediatour of God and Men, the Man Christ Jesus, might be able to die by one, and might not be able to die by the other: the Illyrician and Palestine Bishops being in doubt as to this Expression, Aetius, Arch-deacon of the most Holy Church of Constantinople, produced a Passage of Cyrillus's, the Contents whereof are these: Again, in regard his own Body * by the Grace of God, according as the Apostle Paul saith, hath tasted [h] death for every Man, be himself is [therefore] said to have suffered Death for us: not as if he had experienced Death, as to what belongs to his own Nature; (For 'tis stupidity and extream madness, either to affirm, or think this:) but because (as I have even now said,) his Flesh tasted Death. And again, as to an expression of Leo's Letter, which runs thus: For each Form acts with a communion of the other, that which is proper: to wit, The Word operates that which is The Word's; and the * Flesh performs that which is of the † Flesh: and the one of these shines with Miracles; but the other hath lain under Injuries: the Illyrician and Palestine Bishops being in doubt, the same Aetius read a ‖ Chapter of Cyrillus, the Contents whereof were these. Of the Expressions [used concerning Christ,] some are most especially agreeable to God; again, others are agreeable to Man. But a third sort possess a certain middle place, evidencing the Son of God, to be God, and also at the same time Man. After this, when the foresaid Bishops doubted at another place of Leo's Epistle, which runs thus: For, although in our Lord Jesus Christ, [there is] one Person of God and of Man; nevertheless that is one thing whence there is in both a Community of Contumely, and that is another whence there is a Community of Glory. For from us he [has] Humanity, which is less than the Father. But from the Father he has the Divinity, which is equal with his Father. Theodoret, after he had well considered this matter, said, that the Blessed Cyrillus had expresly spoken thus, in these words: And being made Man, and losing nothing that was his own, [i] he continued what he was, and the one dwelt in the other; that is, the Divine Nature * in Man. After this, when the Illustrious Judges enquired whether there were any person who as yet doubted; all answered, That no person made any further doubt. After whom, Atticus Bishop of Nicopolis requested, that a * Truce of some few days might be allowed them, to the end that with a sedate Mind and undisturbed Understanding such things might be decreed as were pleasing to God, and to the Holy Fathers. He desired also, that Cyrillus's Letter, written to Nestorius, might be delivered [to them;] in which Cyrillus intreats Nestorius, that he would give his Assent to the twelve Heads; [k] whereto all agreed. And when the Judges, by making an Interlocution, [k] There is an ambiguity in these words. For they may as well be referred to Cyrillus's twelve Heads, of which he speaks just before, as to the Requests of Atticus Bishop of Nicopolis; to which all the rest of the Bishops agreed, as we are informed in the Second Action of the Chalcedon-Council, about the end of it. Johannes Langus has followed the former sense: But the latter Explication pleases me best. Vales.

[i] In the Second Action of the Chalcedon-Council, this place of Cyrillus is written otherwise, thus: Μεμένηκε γὰρ ὅπερ ἦν. νοεῖται δὲ πάντως ἕτερον ἐν ἑτέρῳ κεκοινῶν, πάσχειν ἡ θεία φύσις ἐν τοῖς ἀνθρωπίνοις, For he continued what he was: but 'tis altogether to be understood, that the one dwells in the other, that is, the Divine Nature in the Humane. Vales.

But, in regard 'tis agreeable, that those who doubt should be confirmed, let the most Pious Bishop* Anatolius choose out of their number who have subscribed, such persons as he shall think fit to teach and inform those that doubt. Whereto those of the Synod subjoyned these Acclamations: We entreat [m] for the Fathers: [Let] the Fathers, who are of the same Sentiment with Leo, [be restored] to the Synod; The Fathers to the Synod: These Words to the Emperour: These Supplications to The Orthodox: These Supplications to Augusta: We have all sinned: Let us all be pardoned. After whom, the Eastern Bishops cried out, The Egyptian to Banishment. But the Illyricians exclaimed: We entreat [you,] have mercy upon all. And when such like Words as these had preceded, this Session was ended. At the Session after this, when the Senate had made an Interlocution, that the Decrees which had already been [n] given forth should be recited, Constantinus the Secretary read these expres Words out of a * Schedule.

[l] I assent to the Learned, who (instead of περὶ ἀναστολίῳ about Anatolius,) before us had mended it thus, [παρὰ ἀναστολίῳ, with Anatolius.] In Nicephorus the preposition is wanting, which nevertheless seems to me altogether necessary. Vales.

[m] In the excellent Florentine MS. the reading is περὶ τῶν πατέρων, for, or, concerning the Fathers; which is better than παρὰ τῶν, &c. from the, &c. And the same with that first mentioned, is the reading in the Second Action of the Chalcedon Council. Further; who these Fathers should be, for whom the Bishops entreat, that they may be restored to the Synod, 'tis not difficult to guess. For they are these, Juvenalis Bishop of Jerusalem, Thalassius of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, Eusebius, Eustathius, and Basilius; who had been deposed in the First Action together with Dioscorus, by an Interlocution of the Judges and Senatours. On account therefore of this Deposition which the Bishops had approved of by their Suffrages, these five Bishops, were present neither at the Second nor Third Action, as 'tis apparent from the Catalogue of the Bishops which is prefix'd before those Actions. Besides, in the Third Action, when the Legates of the Apostolick See had pronounced a Sentence of Deposition against Dioscorus, the rest of the Bishops confirmed it by their own Subscriptions: excepting these five, as Evagrius has truly observed above. In the Common Editions of the Chalcedon Synod, pag. 212. the Names even of these five Bishops occurr written also: but, out of order, and after all the other Bishops. Whence it appears, that they had not subscribed at such time as the Sentence was pronounc'd, but a long while after, when they had been restored, and had recovered their former Dignity. Moreover, it may be manifestly concluded from what is said above, that that is most true which I have already remark'd, viz. That the Second Action of the Chalcedon Synod is by Evagrius taken for The Third, and The Third for The Second. But, which Copies are worthiest to be believed, whether those which Evagrius made use of, or them which we have now extant, 'tis not easy to pronounce. To me, the Copies made use of by Evagrius seem more certain. First, on account of their Antiquity; for doubtless they were older than those we now use. Secondly, by reason of their legitimate and true Order of Matters transacted. For, after an accurate Examination of Dioscorus's Cause, and after the Interlocution of the Judges, who had pronounced him to have offended against the Canons, and that he was to be deposed; all which was done in the First Action: it remained, that Dioscorus by a Canonical Judgment of the Bishops should be condemned. Wherefore, that Action, wherein Dioscorus was deposed by the Bishops by a Synodick Sentence, ought immediately to follow The First Action Therefore Evagrius and Nicephorus have rightly placed it in the second place. A third Reason is drawn from the Third Action it self, pag. 177. where Dioscorus is said to have answered the Legates sent to him from the Holy Synod, in this manner: Quoniam ante hæc in congregatione, &c. In regard before this, the most magnificent Judges sitting in the Convention, have determined some things, after a large Interlocution of every one of them; but now a second meeting calls me out, in order to the nulling of what has been said before. Nevertheless, that is in the way, which occurrs at the close of the Second Action, viz. that the Bishops of Illyricum cried out thus, Dioscorus to the Synod, Dioscorus to the Churches Which doubtless they would not have dared to say after Dioscorus's Deposition, to which themselves had subscribed. Therefore, the Second Action, where this Acclamation occurrs, ought necessarily to precede The Third Action; in which Dioscorus was Canonically deposed. And this I think to be truer. Vales.

[n] Instead of [τοὺς δεδομένους τύπους, the due Decrees;] it must undoubtedly be τοὺς δεδομένους τύπους, the Decrees which had been given forth; which is the reading in Nicephorus. And this reading is confirmed by the Fourth Action of the Chalcedon Synod, pag. 218, &c. Vales.

* Or, Paper.

We perceive, that a more exact Scrutiny concerning the Orthodox and Catholick Faith ought to be made to morrow, when the Synod will be more compleat and full. But, in regard Flavianus of Pious Memory, and the most Religious Bishop Eusebius (from a search made into the Acts and Decrees, and also from their Testimony by Word of Mouth, who presided in the Synod then convened; who have confessed that they have erred, and have deposed them without cause, when they had in no wise erred in the Faith:) have, as 'tis evidently known, been unjustly deposed: it appears to us (agreeable to that which is acceptable unto God,) to be just, (provided it shall please our most Divine and most Pious Lord,) that Dioscorus the most Religious Bishop of Alexandria, Juvenalis the most Religious Bishop of Jerusalem, Thalassius the most Religious Bishop of Cæsarea in Cappadocia, Eusebius the most Religious Bishop of Ancyra, Eustathius the most Religious Bishop of Berytus, and Basilius the most Religious Bishop of Seleucia in Isauria, which [Prelates] had power, and presided over the then Synod, should lye under the very same punishment, [and] according to the Canons * be removed from the Episcopal Dignity: all things which have been consequently done, being made known † to his most sacred Imperial Majesty.

For the Secular Judges, who by the Emperour's Order were preſent at the Synod, never Commanded that Leo's Letter ſhould be inſerted into the Definition of the Faith; but only deſired that of the Biſhops: which nevertheleſs was denied them by the Biſhops, as 'tis apparent from the Fifth Action, pag. 250. Valeſ.

[s] Λέοντι πιστεύειν. The word [ἀκόλουθα Λέοντι agreeable to] muſt be underſtood For the Biſhops did not make anſwer that they believed Leo, according as Chriſtophorſon renders it; but, that they believed with Leo [or, as Leo did believe,] as Langus and Muſculus have rightly rendred it. For thus they had acclaimed, as Leo does, ſo we believe; as it occurs in the Fifth Action. Valeſ.

[t] Περσεθῆναι κατὰ Λέοντος. Nicephorus has mended it thus, κατὰ λέοντα, according to Leo. But, I doubt not but Evagrius wrote κατὰ τὰ λέοντος, according to Leo's Opinion. For ſo the Judges ſpeak in the Fifth Action of this Council, pag. 250. Further, before the word περσεθῆναι, the Verb [δεῖν, there ought] ſeems neceſſary to be added. Valeſ.

[u] In the Fifth Action of the Chalcedon Council, 'tis written adverbially, thus, ἀτρέπτως, καὶ ἀμερίστως, καὶ ἀσυγχύτως, inconvertibly, and indiviſibly, and inconfuſedly. Valeſ.

[vv] Before theſe, ſome words ſeem to be wanting in the Greek Text, which from the Acts of the Chalcedon Council may be ſupplied after this manner: παρεκάλεσαν αὐτοὺς οἱ ἐπίσκοποι ἐσελθεῖν εἰς τὸ μαρτύριον, the Biſhops entreated them to go into the Oratory [of the Holy Euphemia's Church.] Further, the miſtake of Langus and Chriſtophorſon is to be taken notice of here; who have rendred μαρτύριον, the Church of the Holy Martyr Euphemia. The Synod of Chalcedon was indeed aſſembled in the Temple, or Church of Saint Euphemia. But, the Treaty, or Conference, concerning the Faith was held in the Oratory of the ſaid Church, according as the Emperour had given Order in the Allocution which is recited in the Council, pag. 250. συνελθεῖν ἐν τῷ εὐκτηρίῳ τῆς ἁγιωτάτης μαρτύρος, to meet in the Oratory [or Quire] of the moſt Holy Church. For μαρτύριον [Martyrium] is taken for the Church, as it appears from the Third Action of the Chalcedon-Synod, where the Biſhops are ſaid to have met in the Martyrium of the moſt Holy and Victorious Martyr Euphemia. And in the other Actions of that Council, the ſame Biſhops are ſaid to have come together into the moſt Holy Church of the ſame Martyr. In regard therefore 'tis manifeſt, that the Oratory (wherein ſome few of the Biſhops met only, to treat concerning the Faith, together with Anatolius and the Deputies of the Romiſh See,) was part of St. Euphemia's Church, it remains to be inquired, what part of the Church that was. St. Euphemia's Church conſiſted of three ſpacious Edifices; the firſt whereof was an Atrium, or, Court; the ſecond, the Baſilica, [or, the Church it ſelf;] the third, the Altar built in form of a Cupolo, as Evagrius tells us in the third Chapter of this Book. The Oratory therefore is the ſame with the Altar, which now-a-days we term the Choire, or, Quire. Nor has our Evagrius done right, in making uſe of μαρτύριον to ſignify the Oratory; for the Emperour had not ordered the Biſhops to meet in the Martyrium, but in the Oratory of the Martyr, as we have now ſaid. Valeſ.

† Or, to the Divine heighth.

* Ordain'd, or, Conſtituted.

[x] Not a Metropolitical Right or Privilege, but the Name of a Metropolis only, was given to the City of Chalcedon: for theſe are the words of the Emperour Marcianus's Law; Τὴν καλχηδονέων πόλιν ἐν ᾗ τῆς ἁγίας πίστεως σύνοδος διεκροτήθη μητροπόλεως ἔχειν πρεσβεῖα ἐδεσπόσαμεν, ὀνόματι μόνῳ ταύτην τιμήσαντες, σωζομένῳ δηλαδὴ τῇ νικομηδέων μητροπόλει τῷ ἰδίῳ ἀξιώματι; that is, We have Decreed, that the City of the Chalcedonenſians, wherein the Synod of the moſt Holy Faith was convened, ſhould have the privileges of a Metropolis, honouring it with the Name only; to wit, its proper Dignity being preſerved to the Metropolis of the Nicomedians. But although the Emperour in theſe words ſeems to adorn only the City it ſelf of the Chalcedonenſians, with the Title of a Metropolis, yet that Privilege belongs even to the Church of the Chalcedonenſians alſo. From that time therefore the Biſhop of Chalcedon had the honour of a Metropolitan: but, had no Metropolitical Right or Privilege, becauſe the Emperour by this Law would have nothing diminiſh'd from the Dignity of the Biſhop of Nicomedia. The Biſhops of this very Council have determined [or judged] the ſame thing in the Cauſe of the Biſhops of Nicomedia and Nicæa. For, whereas Nicæa by the Emperour's Reſcript had obtained the honour of a Metropolis, the Judges and Biſhops who were in the Council made anſwer, That this Honour had been given only to the City by the Emperours; nor could the Biſhop of Nicæa by this Law arrogate to himſelf a Metropolitical Right or Privilege; but was only preferred before the other Biſhops of the Province Bithynia: ſo that, he was accounted in the ſecond place after the Metropolitan, as may be ſeen in the Thirteenth Action. Further, what the Metropolitical Rights and Privileges were, we are informed from the Canons of the Nicene Council; to wit, that the Ordinations of Provincial Biſhops ſhould not be made without the Metropolitan's conſent: and that the Metropolitan Biſhop ſhould have a Power of calling out the Provincial Biſhops to a Council of his own. Moreover, in the Florentine Manuſcript I found it written καλχηδοναίων, although in the Chalcedon Council it is always written καλχηδονέων. Regularly it ſhould be written καλχηδονίων. But the Ancients ſeem to have ſaid καλχηδονεῖς, as 'tis apparent from many places in the Chalcedon Council. Valeſ.

And

And the Emperour commanded the Bishops to stay three or four days, and that every one should propose [questions] concerning what he had a mind to, in the presence of the Judges; and * that all things should be ended by a convenient and fit determination. Thus this Convention was finished. There was [y] another [Session] also, wherein other Canons were made. And again, at another Session, Juvenalis and Maximus made an agreement, and it seemed good, that the [Bishop] of Antioch should have the two Phœnicia's, and Arabia; and the [Bishop] of Jerusalem the three Palestines [subject to his See.] And after an Interlocution of the Judges and agreement.] And doret's Cause was [z] discussed. Who had Anathematized Nestorius, in these words; Anathema to Nestorius, and to him who denies the Holy Virgin Mary to be Theotocos, and to him who divides the One Only-begotten Son into two Sons: moreover, I have subscribed to the Definition of the Faith, and to Leo's Epistle. After an Interlocution therefore made by them all, he recovered his own See. In another Session, Ibas's Cause was examined, and those things were read which had been transacted and pronounced against him; the Judges whereof were Photius Bishop of Tyre, and Eustathius Bishop of Berytus. And Sentence was deferred to the following [Session.] At the Eleventh Convention, when many of the Bishops had voted [a] Ibas to [a] be restored to his Bishoprick, some Bishops opposed it, and said, That his Accusers were without, and they requested that they might be ordered to come in. Those things therefore were read which had been transacted against Ibas. And when the Judges by an Interlocution had given order, that the Acts at Ephesus against Ibas should be read; the Bishops said, that all things which had been done, at the Second Ephesine Synod, were void and null; except only the Ordination of Maximus [Bishop] of Antioch. And they made a request to the Emperour concerning this matter, that by a Law he would decree, that nothing of those things [which had been done] at Ephesus after the First Synod (over which Cyrus of blessed Memory, Prelate of Alexandria, had presided;) should be valid. And Ibas had his Bishoprick adjudged to him. At another Action, the Cause of Bassianus Bishop of Ephesus was discussed; and 'twas decreed, [b] that as well he, as Stephanus, should be deposed, and another substituted in their room. And at another Session, the same thing was put to the Vote and confirmed. In the Thirteenth Action, the Cause between Eunomius [Bishop] of Nicomedia, and Anastasius Bishop of Nicæa was inquired into, who were at strife amongst themselves concerning their own Cities. Moreover, there was a Fourteenth Action, wherein the Cause [c] of Sabianus [the Bishop] was examined. And in fine, it was determined, that the Constantinopolitan See should have * precedency immediately after that of Rome.

y In Nicephorus, instead of [ἕτερος, other things,] it is righter thus, ἑτίερος, with the accent in the last syllable save one; understand, ζωέλευσις, Session, or Convension. I wonder, that neither Musculus nor Christophorson perceived this. Vales.

z Yes, in the Ninth Action, the Cause of Theodoret the Bishop was judged, as our Copies show us. But the Copies of the Chalcedon Synod, which Evagrius made use of, seem to have been different from ours. For, as we have seen a little before, Evagrius reckons a Seventh Action, wherein other Canons were promulged. Which Action is at this day wanting in our Copies. Vales.

a Εἰς ἱερέα. In the Tenth Action of the Chalcedon Council, and in Nicephorus, the Prepoposition is wanting. But in the Florentine Manuscript, I found it written ἐς ἱερέας; which is the same as if he should have said ἐν ἱερέων, among, or, of the number of the Bishops. Vales. The Reading in Robert Stephens is εἰς ἱερέα τὸ.

b The Bishops decreed, that as well Bassianus, as Stephanus should be removed from the Bishoprick of Ephesus, and that in their place another Bishop should be made; as may be seen in the Eleventh and Twelfth Action. This place of Evagrius therefore is to be made good thus; ἐξενεχθῆναι μὲν αὐτὸν καὶ Στέφανον, ἕτερον δὲ ἐνεχθῆναι, that as well he as Stephanus should be ejected, or deposed, and another substituted in their room. Vales.

* Or should be placed.

c Instead of Bassianus, it must be made Sabinianus from the Acts of the Chalcedon Council. Of this Sabinianus Bishop of the Perrenses (which is a City in the Euphratensian Province) Liberatus makes mention, in the twelfth chapter of his Breviarium. Also, there is an Epistle of Theodoret's extant, written to this Sabinianus, which is reckoned the 126th amongst his Epistles. Vales.

And [one] of the EX-PRÆFECTS.

CHAP. I.

Concerning Zeno's Empire, and concerning his Life.

BUT Zeno, after the death of his own * Son, was inveſted with the ſole Adminiſtration of the Empire; ſuppoſing as it were that he could not be poſſeſt of the Dominion of the whole World, unleſs with [an uncountroulable] Liberty he might proſecute all manner of pleaſures which occurred; at his firſt entrance he yielded himſelf ſo wholly up to the attempts and allurements of Luſts, [a] that no filthy or flagitious Fact could put a reſtraint upon him: but in ſuch a manner he * wallowed in the Commiſſion thereof, that he thought it vile and mean to commit theſe things in darkneſs and obſcurity: but [to perpetrate them] openly and in the ſight of all [was in his judgment] Royal and becoming only an Emperour. But, his Sentiments [in this matter] were ill and * abſolutely ſervile. [b] For an Emperour is not taken notice of for this, becauſe he rules over others, but on this account, in regard in the firſt place he governeth and moderateth himſelf, permitting nothing that is extravagant or ill [c] to creep into himſelf: But continues [d] ſo impregnable againſt intemperance, that [he may ſeem to be] a living Image of Virtues, inſtructing his Subjects to an imitation [of Himſelf.] But he who has proſtituted himſelf to pleaſures, by degrees is imprudently made the vileſt of Servants, and becomes a Captive not redeemable, * frequently changing his Maſters, like the unuſefulleſt ſort of Slaves. For innumerable pleaſures are made his Miſtreſſes, which can never have an end of their Train and Coherence, and of their ſucceeding one another: the pleaſure which is at hand never ſtopping, but becomes the Incentive and Preface of another; till ſuch time as any Perſon, [e] really and truly made an Emperour [over himſelf,] can expel that turbulent and tumultuous government of pleaſures, reigning in future, and not oppreſt with Tyranny: otherwiſe, continuing a Slave to his laſt breath, he muſt poſſeſs the infernal Pit.

* Viz. Leo the ſecond; See book 2. ch. 17.

* Or, like thoſe of ſlaves.

b "Οπ ἐκ ἐξ ὧν. In the Kings, Tellerian, and Florentine MSS. and in Stephens's Edit. the Adverb ὅπ is wanting, which Learned Men had put in by conjecture, unhappily enough. But, I doubt not but it ſhould be written, ἐκ χδ' ἐξ ὧν, &c. and have rendred it accordingly. Valeſ.

c Inſtead of [παφεισδύ(ιν, entrance,] in my judgment it ought to be παφεισδύνειν, to creep into: and this Reading is confirmed by Nicephorus, book 16 chap. 1. Valeſ.

d Οὕπως ὅδ' ἀνάλω]Θ; I aſſent to the Learned, who have long ſince mended it thus, ὅπως ὃ ἀνάλω]Θ, &c. But continues ſo impregnable, &c. although the Manuſcript Copies vary not here. But Nicephorus, when he perceived this place to be corrupted, interpolated it after this manner; κἀντεῦθεν ἀνάλω]Θ, &c. whence he continues ſo impregnable, &c. Valeſ.

* Or, changing his frequent ſlaveries.

CHAP. II.

Concerning the Incurſions of the Barbarians both in the Eaſt, and in the Weſt.

SUch a Perſon was Zeno at the beginning [of his Government,] [a] a Man of an intemperate and diſſolute life. But thoſe who were his Subjects, as * well in the Eastern as Western parts, underwent most severe mischiefs and afflictions: on this side the † Saracens ruined all things: on that, a multitude of the Hunni, heretofore termed the Massagetæ, made incursions into Thracia, and passed the Danube no body making a resistance against them; Zeno himself also in a Barbarick manner [b] by force took away [from the Provincials] what [the Barbarians] had left.

Chriſtophorſon underſtood not this Phraſe, as 'tis apparent from his Verſion. For he has rendred it thus; Ad hunc modum Zeno in initio imperii ſui vitam inſtituit, After this manner Zeno at the beginning of his Empire ordered his life. Græcians take ἐνδεδη]μένον βίον, for a diſſolute and intemperate life. Which word does frequently occurr in this ſenſe in Dion Cocceianus and others. Hence ἐνδιαίτησις is taken for Luxury and Delights, as Suidas atteſts. Further, the Greeks do term Diſſolute and Luxurious Perſons thus, becauſe they are wont to obſerve no rule of living. So Dionyſius Halicarnaſſenſis in his fifth book, ſpeaking of a juſt King, ſays theſe words, μηδὲν ἐνδιαιτώμΘ τῶν πα]είων, Not at all receding from the Inſtitutions of his Anceſtours. Nicephorus therefore has rightly expounded this place of Evagrius thus, ἄῤῥυθμός πς κ) ἀνάγω]Θ, κ) τὸν βίον μάλιστα ἐνδεδη]μέν]Θ, an incompoſed and diſorderly Perſon, and moſt extravagantly diſſolute in his life. Valeſ.

† Or, the Barbarians inhabiting Tents.

[b] 'Tis strange that neither Translatour hath hit the sense of this place. For Musculus renders it thus Zenone deinceps ad Barbaricum morem violenter abrepto, Zeno being from thenceforth violently hurried away to a Barbarick disposition. But Christophorson translates it in this manner; Zeno vero reliquis etiam Imperii partibus per vim barbaro quodam more ac modo spoliatus est, But Zeno in the other parts of the Empire also by force committed spoils in a certain barbarous fashion and manner. But had they consulted Nicephorus, they might have had a right understanding of this place from him. For Nicephorus has explained these words of Evagrius thus: ὅσα δὲ τούτοις καλαλιμπάνεσο, ζωώνι πρὸς βίαν ἀφήρετο, οὐχ' ἧσσον ἢ οἱ βάρβαροι ὕστερον; that is, But whatever had been left by them [the Barbarians] was forcibly taken away by Zeno, who infested [the Provinces] at no less rate than the Barbarians. Further, in the Florentine and Tellerian MSS. instead of πρὸς βίαν, the Reading is πρὸς βίας, in the Plural number, which seems to me more elegant. Vales.

CHAP. III.

Concerning Basiliscus's Tyranny, and Zeno's Flight.

BUt when Basiliscus Verina's Brother made an Insurrection against him, (For even his own Relations were enemies to Zeno, all Persons equally abominating his debauch'd Life;) he had not so much as a thought in him that was manly and courageous: (For wickedness is a cowardly thing, which breed desperation and despondency, and gives a sufficient indication of an unmanliness of mind, from its being vanquished by pleasures:) but flies with all the haste imaginable, and without a Battel yields so great an Empire to Basiliscus. He endured also a tedious [a] Siege [b] in the Country of the Isaurians, where he himself had been born, having his Wife Ariadne with him, (who after [her Husband's flight] had left her Mother,) and as many of his Friends as had continued faithful to him. Basiliscus therefore having thus encircled himself with the Crown of the Romans, and proclaimed his Son Marcus Cæsar, took a contrary course, both to Zeno, and to those who had been Emperours before [Zeno.]

[a] Zeno having heard of Basiliscus's defection, struck with fear, fled with his Wife Ariadne into Isauria, and betook himself to a most strong Castle, the name whereof was Ubara: but afterwards, when Basiliscus had sent Hillus and Trocondus with vast Forces against him, he went to Tessædes, or rather as Nicephorus says, to the City Seleucia, which was the Head City of all Isauria. There he was a long while besieged by Hillus and Trocondus, as Theophanes relates in his Chronicon, pag. 104. Cedrenus also and Nicephorus do affirm the same. But in Theophanes, the name Trocondus is corrupted. For the Common Editions have it Ἴλλυς καὶ Σεκόνδυς, Hillus and Secundus, whereas it should be Τροκόνδυς, Trocondus, as it is rightly written in Nicephorus. Indeed the same Theophanes, pag. 106. terms him Procundus; which comes nearer to the true Reading. This Person was Brother to Hillus, and bore the Consulate in the year of Christ 482, as it occurrs in Marcellinus's Chronicon: but at length, when Hillus had set up for a Tyrant, Trocondus, who had been sent by his Brother to get Forces, was taken by Johannes a Master of the Milice, and beheaded; as Theophanes informs us, pag. 112. Notwithstanding, at that place of Theophanes, the name Trocondus is likewise corrupted. Vales.

[b] Κατὰ τὴν αὐτῶν ἧβ ἰσαύρων. The words are transposed; and are to be restored to their pristine order, in this manner, κατ' ἐν αὐτῶν ἐπιγαστὸς τῶν ἰσαύρων χώραν, In the Country of the Isaurians, where he himself had been born: which words of Evagrius, Nicephorus has expresst thus: ἐρρῶσθαι δὲ ἀξιόμαχον συγκεισθαι, εἰς πολιορκίαν ζωώνου ἐπιπεμφθὲν ἀνὰ τὴν ἰσαυρίαν Σελεύκειαν· ἧπερ φέρειν εἰς ἐκεῖνον ἐσαγῆναι τὸν, ἐν ᾧ γεγένηται, And having gathered an Army fit for an Engagement, he sent it to besiege Zeno at Seleucia in Isauria. Which Country had given Zeno Birth, and at that time hid the Fugitive. Vales.

CHAP. IV.

* Rejecting, or, abolishing.

[INduced thereto] [a] by an Embassy therefore of some Persons [sent to him] from Alexandria, he recals Timotheus from Exile, (who had been banished eighteen years;) Acacius [at that time] administring the Bishoprick of Constantinople. When therefore Timotheus was arrived at the Imperial City, he perswades Basiliscus ‖ to send his Circular Letters to the Prelates in all places, and to Anathematize what had been done at Chalcedon, and Leo's Book. The † Contents of the Circular Letters run thus.

[a] Ἐκ πρεσβείας δή. Without doubt it must be written thus, Ἐκπρεσβείας δή, by an Embassy therefore. Which though it may seem a small and trivial Emendation, is yet altogether necessary. In Nicephorus, 'tis δῆθεν, to wit, or, therefore. Vales.

* Or, Afterwards.

[b] There is indeed extant a Conſtitution of the Emperour Conſtantine's, wherein the Dogmatical Book of Arius, are ordered to be burnt; which Conſtitution occurrs at page 221. of our Socrates. Nevertheleſs, the Emperour Baſiliſcus ſeems here to mean another Law, which had been promulged by Conſtantine againſt all Hereticks in general. But that Law hath periſhed by the injury of time. Yet part of it is ſtill remaining in Euſebius, in the Third Book of his Life of Conſtantine, chap. 64, and 66. But, there are two Conſtitutions extant of Theodoſius Junior's, concerning the Burning of Neſtorius's Books. The former of which makes mention of the Law of Conſtantine of Bleſſed Memory, againſt Arius's impious Books. Further, theſe Conſtitutions of Theodoſius occurr in the third part of the Epheſine Council. Baſiliſcus had ſubjoyned theſe Laws of Theodoſius to his own Circular Edict, as 'tis hereafter atteſted. Valeſ.

CHAP. V.

Concerning thoſe Perſons who conſented to Baſiliſcus's Circular Letters, and rejected the Synod [of Chalcedon.]

AS therefore 'tis related by Zacharias the Rhetorician, Timotheus, newly returned from Exile (as I have ſaid,) gave his conſent to theſe Circular Letters: as did likewiſe Peter Biſhop of Antioch, ſurnamed * Fullo, who together with Timotheus was preſent at the Imperial [City Conſtantinople.] Theſe things having been performed in this manner, † they vote that Paulus alſo ſhould recover the Archiepiſcopal Chair of Epheſus. Further, [the ſame Zacharias] affirms, that Anaſtaſius, who had ſucceeded ceeded Juvenalis [in the See] of Jerusalem, subscribed the same Circular Letters, as likewise very many others: insomuch that they were in number about Five hundred, who condemned Leo's * Letter, and the Chalcedon Synod. [The same Author] [a] does also some where record the Supplicatory Libel presented by the Bishops of Asia [b] convened at Ephesus, to Basiliscus; part of the Contents of which [Libel] run thus.

* Or, Tome,

[a] Καί πυ χὴ δεήσον ἐγγεγραφῆ. Doubtless it must be made ἐγγεγράφει, does record; which I admire Translatours perceived not. Zacharias is understood, who in his Ecclesiastical History had recorded this Libel entire, which the Bishops of Asia, convened at Ephesus, had sent to the Emperour Basiliscus. Vales.

[b] Concerning this Ephesine Council which was held in the times of the Emperour Basiliscus, Baronius in his Annals, at the year of Christ 476, writes very slightly and negligently: remarking this only, that it was celebrated by the Eutychians. But he mentions neither upon what account it was assembled, nor what was transacted therein: it is our office therefore, by our care and diligence to supply what he has omitted. After the Circular Letters sent forth by the Emperour Basiliscus against the Chalcedon Council, Acacius Bishop of Constantinople, the only person of the Patriarchs subject to the Eastern Empire, refused subscribing to these Letters, nor would ever endure to expunge the Chalcedon Synod out of the Ecclesiastical Tables. Moreover, the Monks of Constantinople resolutely opposed Basiliscus. Lastly, the Constantinopolitan populacy began to be most grievously tumultuous, threatning to fire the City and the Palace, if the Emperour should persist to put a force upon Acacius and the Catholicks. Basiliscus, terrified hereat, flies from the Imperial City; took from the Constantinopolitan Church their Rights and Privileges, and forbad the Senators to speak to [or salute] Acacius. But afterwards, when he heard that Zeno was on his return out of Isauria; being stricken with fear, he came into the Church together with his wife and children; and excusing himself to Acacius and the Clergy of the Imperial City, restored their Rights to the Constantinopolitan Church, and set forth his Anti-Circular [that is, Letters contrary to his Circular] Letters: thus Theodorus Lector informs us, Book 1. The Eutychians therefore, (when they saw Acacius contend with so much fierceness for the confirmation of the Chalcedon Synod; and that not only the Monasteries, but the people also of the Imperial City, and other Priests every where, were excited by Acacius against Basiliscus) convened a Council of Bishops of their own party in the City Ephesus: in which Council they condemned and deposed both Acacius, and some other Bishops who embraced the same Sentiments with him: and then they entreated the Emperour Basiliscus, that he would persist in his former opinion, and would not promulge a Constitution Contrary to his own Circular Letters. In the same Synod, Paulus is ordained Bishop of Ephesus by the Bishops of the same Province, and the Patriarchical privilege is restored to the Ephesine See, as our Evagrius relates in the sixth chapter of this book. Further, this Ephesine Council was held on the year of Christ 477, after the Consulate of Basiliscus and Armatus. Which I gather from hence, because this Synod was assembled a little before Basiliscus promulged his Anti-circular Letters. Now Basiliscus published those Letters on that year I have mentioned; when he understood that Zeno was returning out of Isauria with an Army; as I have observed above out of Theodorus Lector. Indeed, the Asian Bishops seem to intimate this in their Letter to Basiliscus, in these words: μήδεν ἓν ἕτερον πρὸ τῶν θεία ὑμῶν ἐγκύκλια φωνηθῆναι θελήσατε, Be pleased therefore to publish nothing contrary to your Divine Circular Letters. Moreover, Timotheus Ælurus seems to have presided at this Council. For he came to Ephesus in the Reign of Basiliscus, and seated Paulus in his Episcopal Chair, as Evagrius relates from Zacharias. Nor is it likely, that Acacius Patriarch of Constantinople should have been deposed by any other person than the Alexandrian Bishop, who held the dignity of a Patriarch equal to Acacius. For who can believe that the Constantinopolitan Bishop was deposed by the Bishops of Asia, who long before this, [from the times of John Chrysostom, were subject to the Bishops of Constantinople? Vales.

To the most Pious in all things, and the Lovers of Christ, our Lords Basiliscus and Marcus, perpetual Victors, [c] Augusti. And after some words. You have always seemed (Most pious and Christ-Loving Emperours!) to be divers ways assaulted, together with the Faith which is hated and opposed. And after other words.

[c] Marcus was first created Cæsar by his Father Basiliscus, as Marcellinus relates in his Chronicon, Theophanes, and others. 'Tis certain, in Basiliscus's Circular Letters he is only termed the most noble Cæsar. But afterwards he was styled Augustus by his Father, as this Letter of the Bishops of the Ephesine Council doth inform us. Also, in the Anti Circular Letter of Basiliscus, the same Marcus is named Emperour with his Father. The Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle is mistaken therefore, who relates that Basiliscus, as soon as he was proclaimed Emperour, crowned his Son Marcus Emperour. Candidus says truer, in the second book of his History, in Photius. Vales.

A certain terrible expectation of Judgment; and an * Ardour of Divine Fire, and the Just † Resentment of Your Serenity, will in a short time ‖ Seize the Adversaries, who [d] with a certain arrogant folly, as it were with Darts, attempt to make an attack against the powerful God and your Empire fortified by the [true] Faith; nor do they in any manner spare our Tenuity: but continually assault us with reproaches and lyes as if by a necessity and a force we had subscribed to your Divine and Apostolick Circular Letters; whereas we have set our hands thereto with all imaginable joy and alacrity of mind. And after some other words. Be pleased therefore to publish nothing contrary to your Divine Circular Letters; knowing for certain what we have already said, that the whole world will be overturned again, and that the mischiefs done by the Synod at Chalcedon will be found small and trivial, which [yet] have effected these innumerable murders, and have unjustly and illegally poured forth the bloud of the Orthodox. And after other words. We protest before our Saviour Jesus Christ, [e] We entreat Your piety to be free from that just Canonical and Ecclesiastick * condemnation and deposition inflicted on them, and especially [from that inflicted] on him, who by many [evidences] has been detected not to have governed the Bishoprick of the Imperial [City] holily.

* Ζῆλος, a fervency, or, a parching heat.

‖ Or, engage.

[d] Ἀλαζονικῇ πυρεία, with a proud revenge: the reading in Nicephorus is the same. Where Johannes Langus renders πυρείαν, revenge. But I am of opinion, that by a small change this place is thus to be restored; ἀλαζονικῇ τινι μωρείᾳ, with a certain arrogant folly. Vales.

[e] Ἐλαθέειν τὴν μετέρην εὐσέβειαν, &c. Christophorson read ἡμετέρων, our piety; contrary to the Faith and Authority of all Copies, and without any sense. Besides, he has rendred the following words very badly. Whence it hapned, that Baronius, who every where follows Christophorson's Version, could in no wise understand the translatours of this Ephesine Council. So great a hindrance is an ill Rendition. Nor has Johannes Langus translated this Clause more happily. For he hath rendred it thus: Attestamur coram Salvatore Nostro Jesu Christo, &c. We attest before our Saviour Jesus Christ, that your piety is free and innocent. From which we request, that a Just and Canonical and Ecclesiastick Sentence of Condemnation and Deposition may be pronounc'd against them, and especially against him who hath been many ways found out to have administred the Bishoprick in the Imperial City impiously. But the Bishops of Asia do not say this: but request of the Emperours, Basiliscus and Marcus, that they would not communicate any more with Acacius and the other Bishops, whom they themselves had condemned and deposed by an Ecclesiastick Sentence: For this is the import of these words, ἐλαθέειν τὴν ὑμέτερην εὐσέβειαν ἐπὶ λύμασι τῆς ἐπενεχθείσης, &c; which are to be written in one entire Clause, without any distinction. But Translatours, following Nicephorus, and the Edition of Robert Stephens, have placed a distinction after the ἐπὶ, which led them into a mistake. Vales.

* In this Edition of Valesius's, 'tis καθαχρήτεως, abuse: it is, I suppose, an errour of the Press, put instead of καθαιρέσεως, condemnation; which is the reading in Stephens's Edition.

[Further] the same Zacharias writes word for word thus. As soon as the Circular and Imperial Letters were published, those persons in the Imperial [City] [f] who were distempered with Eutyches's Opinion and followed a Monastick life, [f] Οἱ τῷ εὐτυχοῦς φανταείαν νοσοῦντες. Translatours understood not these words of Zacharias Rhetor. Nor does Nicephorus seem to have understood them. For, instead of them, he has substituted these; οἱ τὰ εὐτυχοῦς φανταζόμενοι, those who imagine [or fancy] Eutyches's Tenets. By φανταείαν [Phantasie,] or, [Imagination,] Zacharias means the opinion of Eutyches, who asserted, that the flesh of Christ was not true nor consubstantial with us, but Phantastical or imaginary; as may be seen in the Acts of the Chalcedon Council. Hence the Epistles of Avitus Bishop of Vienna, wherein he confutes Eutyches's Errour, have this Title, Contra phantasma, against the Phantasme; as Sirmondus attests. Further, from this place it may be gathered that Zacharias Rhetor was not an Eutychian, as Baronius thought at the year of Christ 476. For he would never have expresst himself thus, had he been a follower of Eutyches's Sect. It must therefore either be said, that these are not the words of Zacharias Rhetor, (which notwithstanding Evagrius affirms;) or else, that he was not an Eutychianist. See chap. 14. Vales.

supposing they had met with Timotheus as with some unexpected gain, and hoping to reap a great advantage to themselves from the Circular Letters, in great hast betook themselves to Timotheus. And when they had been convinced by him, that the Word of God was of the same substance with us according to the flesh, but Consubstantial to the Father in relation to the Deity, they went back [to their own homes.]

CHAP. VI.

That Timotheus Ælurus recovered the [Bishoprick] of Alexandria, and having restored the privilege of a Patriarchate to the [Church] of Ephesus, Anathematized the Chalcedon-Synod.

THE same [Zacharias] says, that Timotheus leaving the Imperial [City Constantinople,] arrived at Ephesus, and [there] * placed [a] Paulus in the Archi-Episcopal See of the Ephesians. This [Paulus] had long before this been ordained by the Bishops of that Province, [b] agreeable to the more ancient usage: but had been ejected out of his See. Timotheus also restored to the Ephesine Church the [c] Patriarchical privilege, which the Synod of Chalcedon had deprived it of, as I have said. Removing from thence, he comes to Alexandria, and persisted to request those who came to him, to Anathematize the Synod of Chalcedon. Nevertheless, many others of his own Faction receded from him (as 'tis related by the same Zacharias,) as did likewise Theodotus one of those that had been ordained at Joppa by * Theodosius, who was made Bishop of Jerusalem by some persons, at such time as Juvenalis went to Constantinople.

* Or, Seated Arch-Bishop Paulus in the [Chair] of the Ephesians.

[a] Timotheus Ælurus and Petrus Fullo, together with other Bishops, being a little before this assembled at Constantinople, Decreed that this Paulus should be restored to the See of Ephesus, out of which he had been ejected. For these are Evagrius's words of the fifth chapter of this book, ψηφίζονται καὶ παῦλον τὸν τῆς ἐφεσίων ἀρχιεπισκοπικὸν ὑπελθεῖν θρόνον, they Vote that Paulus also should recover the Archiepiscopal Chair of Ephesus. Which place Christophorson has not rendred truly, in this manner; His rebus ita constitutis Paulus ad sedem Archiepiscopatûs Ephesiani capessendam deligitur, These things having been thus constituted, Paulus is chosen to take the Archiepiscopal See of Ephesus. For Paulus was not elected by Ælurus and Petrus Fullo at Constantinople, that he should take the Ephesine See: but having been expelled out of the See of Ephesus, he came to Constantinople: where a Council of Eutychianists being convened, it was Decreed that he should recover the Archiepiscopate of the City Ephesus. In the fifth chapter of this book, the reading in the vulgar Editions was, ὑπελθεῖν θρόνον, Come into the Chair. But from the Florentine and Tellerian MSS. I have mended it, ὑπελθεῖν enter upon. Yet I had rather add a preposition, and write it thus, ἐπανελθεῖν return to, recover, or, re-enter upon. Valesius

[b] Ἀνὰ τὴν ἀρχαιοτέραν συνήθειαν. I had rather make it κατὰ τὴν, &c. agreeable to, &c. Further, what Zacharias says here is most true, to wit, that it was the ancient usage, that the Bishop of Ephesus should be ordained by the Bishops of his own Province. For, from St. Timothy who was the first Bishop of the Ephesians, until Castinus, and Heraclides, whom John Chrysostom ordained, all the Bishops of the Ephesians were ordained in the same City by the Bishops of that Province, as 'tis apparent from the Eleventh Action of the Chalcedon Council. Valesius.

[c] Zacharias does here call the Patriarchical privilege the Right of Primacy, or the privilege of Ordaining Metropolitans. For in this the Patriarchical privilege did properly consist, as I have observed in my Little Book concerning the interpretation of the Sixth Canon of the Nicene Council, which is published at the close of Our Socrates. Now whereas Zacharias, or rather Evagrius, adds, that this privilege had been taken away from the See of Ephesus by the Chalcedon Synod; he means the Sixteenth Action of the Chalcedon Synod; wherein it was Decreed, that the Constantinopolitan Bishops should Ordain Metropolitans in the Asian Diœceses. Valesius.

CHAP. VII.

That the Monks having raised a Sedition by the perswasion of Acacius, Basiliscus was put into a fear, and wrote and promulged Circular Letters contrary to those he had published before.

[THE same Zacharias] relates likewise, that Acacius Bishop of Constantinople [a] was extreamly troubled at these things, and that he incited the Monks and Populacy of the Imperial [City] against Basiliscus, as being an Heretick. And, that Basiliscus, at length * renounced his Circular Letters, and wrote a Constitution, that what had been surreptitiously [and rashly] done, should be wholly vacated and made null; and, that he sent abroad Letters contrary to his former Circular Letters, wherein he confirmed the Synod at Chalcedon. And these Anti-Circular-Letters (as he terms them,) Zacharias has omitted, who hath written his whole History with partiality and in favour to his own party. But the Contents of them run word for word thus.

[a] Πεεὶ τα-ῦτα ἐτεταράχθαι. I had conjectured long since, that it should be πεεὶ ταῦτα ἐτεταράχθαι, was extreamly troubled. The Tellerian MS. has at length confirmed this my conjecture; wherein I found it written πεεὶ ταῦτα ἐτεταράχθαι. Valesius.

* Or, Denyed; that is, repealed, or revok'd.

Basiliscus's Anti-Circular-Letter.

Emperours, Cæsars, Basiliscus and Marcus. We Decree, that the Apostolick and Orthodox Faith (which originally and from the beginning hath flourished in the Catholick Churches, which hath obtained even until our Empire, which doth now obtain under our Empire, and which ought forever to obtain, into which we have been baptized, and which we believe) shall only continue inviolate and unshaken, and shall for ever be prevalent in all the Catholick and Apostolick Churches of the Orthodox; and, that nothing else shall be required. For this reason therefore We command, that all things which have been done on account of the faith or Ecclesiastick * Discipline under our Empire, whether they be Circular Letters, or other [Letters,] or what ever else, shall be void and null: Nestorius and Eutyches, and every other Heresie, and all those who embrace the same Sentiments with them, being Anathematized. And ['tis our will,] that concerning this Subject, neither any Synod should be convened, nor any other question [started:] but, that these things should continue firm and unshaken. Moreover, [We command,] [b] that those Provinces (the Ordination whereof the Chair of this Imperial and Glorious City hath had,) shall be restored to the most pious and most Holy Patriarch and Arch-Bishop Acacius: to wit, the most pious Bishops that now are, continuing in their own Sees; [yet so] that after their deaths on prejudice from this businesse may arise to the Right of Ordination [belonging to] the Holy Chair of this Imperial and famous City. Now, * it is dubious to no person, that this our Divine Decree has the force of a Divine Constitution. And these things proceeded in this manner.

* Or, Constitution,

* Or, It has been dubious.

[b] When by the Emperour Basiliscus's Circular Letters, the Chalcedon Synod had been wholly abrogated, the privileges of the Constantinopolitan See which had been established in that Council, seemed to have been taken away by that same Sanction. By which thing Acacius was chiefly moved, and used his utmost endeavour, that the Emperour Basiliscus should revoke his own Constitution. Besides, in the Ephesine Synod, the Patriarchical privilege had been restored to the See of Ephesus by Timotheus Ælurus, as we we have seen before. Which having been done, the Asian Diœceſis, the ordinations whereof had been given to the Biſhop of Conſtantinople by the Decree of the Chalcedon Synod, was taken away from that See. There was therefore need of a new Conſtitution, whereby its Rights and Privileges might be reſtored to the Conſtantinopolitan See. This therefore the Emperour Baſiliſcus now performs, by the publication of theſe his Anti-Circular-Letters. Theodorus Lector does likewiſe atteſt the ſame, in his firſt Book Collectan. about the cloſe thereof. Valeſ.

BUT Zeno having (as 'tis reported) [ſeen in his ſleep] the Holy [a] Proto-Martyr Thecla, famous for her many Conflicts, who incited him, and made him a promiſe that his Empire ſhould be reſtor'd to him; marched his Army towards Byzantium. And having with gifts, corrupted thoſe who beſieged him, he drives out Baſiliſcus who had held the Empire two years; and delivers him to the enemy after he had made his eſcape to the Holy Rails [of the Altar.] On this account Zeno dedicated a ſpatious Church, eminent for its *ſplendidneſs and beauty, to the Proto-Martyr Thecla, at Seleucia ſituate in the Country of Iſauria, and beautified it with many and Imperial Sacred gifts, which are preſerved till theſe our times. Further, Baſiliſcus is ſent into the Region of the Cappadocians, †in order to his being put to death: but he is [b] ſlain in that Station named [c] Acuſus, together with his wife and children. And Zeno makes a Law, which abrogates what had been conſtituted by the Tyrant Baſiliſcus in his Circular Letters. Then alſo Petrus ſurnamed Fullo is driven from the Church of the Antiochians; and Paulus from that of the Epheſians.

[a] The Greeks who delight much in Epithets, are wont to grace each Saint with proper and peculiar Titles. Thus they commonly term Thecla the Apoſtle and Proto Martyr. They call her an Apoſtle, becauſe, like an Apoſtle, ſhe had preach'd the Faith of Chriſt in many places: and they ſtyle her Proto-Martyr, in regard as Stephen was the firſt Martyr of Chriſt amongſt men, ſo was ſhe the firſt amongſt women; as Baſilius Seleucienſis does atteſt in his firſt book concerning the Life and Miracles of the bleſſed Thecla. She is called Thecla by way of contraction, inſtead of Theoclia. For thus the ſame Baſilius does frequently term her. Valeſ.

*Or, Excellency.

†Or, being about to die.

[b] Ἀποφαίνεται. With Evagrius agrees Malchus in the firſt book of his Byzantine Hiſtory, and Candidus Iſaurus in the ſecond book of his Hiſtories; both which Authors relate, that Baſiliſcus was killed by the ſword. But the other Hiſtorians tell us, that he dyed by hunger and cold, together with his wife and children. This diſagreement of Writers in reference to Baſiliſcus's death, is taken notice of by Theophanes in his Chronicon, pag. 107. Valeſ.

[c] Ἐν ἀκυσῷ. So alſo the name of this Station is written in Nicephorus. But Cedrenus and Theophanes term it Cucuſus. Marcellinus and the Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle call it Leminis and Limnæ, a Caſtrum [or, Caſtle] of Cappadocia, into which Baſiliſcus was thruſt together with his wife and children; and the gate of one of the Towers, wherein he was incloſed, being ſtop'd up, he periſhed there by hunger and cold. Valeſ.

CHAP. IX.

That after Baſiliſcus's death, the Biſhops of Aſia, that they might appeaſe Acacius, ſent him a Penitentiary-Libel, [craving pardon] for their offence in rejecting the Synod of Chalcedon.

[IN the Interim,] the Biſhops of Aſia, in order to their appeaſing Acacius, excuſed themſelves, and craved pardon, ſending a Penitentiary-Libel [to him,] wherein they affirmed, that they had ſubſcribed to the Circular-Letters by force and conſtraint, not voluntarily; and they ſwore, that the thing was ſo, and that they had not believed, nor did believe otherwiſe than agreeable to the Synod at Chalcedon. The * purport of their Letters is this. The Epiſtle, or Petition, ſent to Acacius Biſhop of Conſtantinople, from the Biſhops of Aſia. To Acacius the moſt Holy and moſt Pious Patriarch of the moſt Holy Church at the Imperial [City] Conſtantinople, New Rome. And after other words. [a] He hath arrived amongſt us and does what is right and fitting; who alſo ſhall fill your place. And after a few words. By theſe Libels we ſignifie to you, that we have ſubſcribed, not according to the intent of our minds, but by force and conſtraint, giving our conſent thereto in words and Letters, but not in heart. For by [the aſſiſtance of] [b] your acceptable interceſſions, together with the aſſent of the Deity, we believe in ſuch manner as we have received from thoſe Three hundred and eighteen Luminaries of the world, and from the Hundred and fifty Holy Fathers. Beſides, [we believe] thoſe matters alſo, which have been piouſly and rightly determined at Chalcedon by the Holy Fathers convened there. Further, whether Zacharias the Rhetorican has caluminated theſe [Biſhops of Aſia,] or whether they themſelves have lyed, in averring that they ſubſcribed involuntarily, I cannot affirm.

*Or, force.

[a] Ἔθεντο ἐφ' ἡμᾶς. Chriſtophorſon and Sir Henry Savil have mended it thus ἐφ' ὑμᾶς, amongſt you without any thing of ſenſe. Nicephorus, 'tis certain, confirms the vulgar reading. Viz. amongſt us. But in the next words which follow, it ought to be made ὑμέτερον τόπον, your place, inſtead of ἡμέτερον τόπον, our place. Johannes Langus perceived this before us, who has rendred this paſſage tranſcribed out of Evagrius thus, Rectè ſanè ad nos venit, qui locum etiam veſtrum obtinebit. He hath indeed come rightly unto us, who ſhall alſo poſſeſs your place. By which words the Biſhops of Aſia mean the Legate, which Acacius Biſhop of Conſtantinople had ſent to them, to wit a Presbyter or a Deacon of the Conſtantinopolitan Church. But if any one had rather, with Chriſtophorſon, read ἐφ' ὑμᾶς, amongſt you; we muſt underſtand it of the Legate which the Biſhops of Aſia had ſent to Acacius, that he might preſent the Libel of ſatisfaction to him. And this I think is truer. Valeſ.

Concerning thoſe who governed the Biſhoprick of Antioch.

But after Stephanus, the Government of that ſame See was committed to Calendion, who excited thoſe that came to him to Anathematize Timotheus, together with Baſiliſcus's Circular Letters.

[a] After Petrus Fullo, Johannes Apamenus was Biſhop of Antioch. He being ejected after three months, Stephanus was put into his place, as Theophanes relates in his Chronicon, page 107: to which Writer agrees Gelaſius in Geſtis de nomine Acacii, and Liberatus in his Breviary, chap. 18. Pope Felix has mentioned the ſame Johannes, in the Sentence of Condemnation which he dictated againſt Acacius, and in the Epiſtle which in the name of the Roman Synod he wrote to all the Presbyters and Archimandrites in Conſtantinople and Bithynia. Valeſ.

That the Emperour Zeno took a resolution of persecuting Ælurus: but by reason of his age he had compassion on him and let him alone. And how after Ælurus's death, Petrus Mongus was ordained by the Alexandrians. But Timotheus, Proterius's successour, by the order of the Emperour, obtained the Chair of the Alexandrians.

MOreover, Zeno was resolved to have expelled Timotheus out of Alexandria: but understanding from some persons that he was now very aged, and would soon * go the way of all men, he † altered his resolution. And not long after [Timotheus] paid the common debt [of Nature:] whereupon [a] those of Alexandria by their own authority elect Petrus, surnamed Mongus, Bishop. Which, when it came to Zeno's hearing, disturbed him extreamly. Wherefore Zeno [b] punished Petrus with death: but he recalled Timotheus [Salophaciolus,] Proterius's successour, who then lived at Canopus on account of a Sedition raised by the people. Timotheus therefore by the Emperour's order recovered his own See.

* Or, enter the Inn, or, house of all men.

† Or, forbad.

[a] Οἱ τῆς ἀλεξανδρέων ἐπίσκοποι, &c. the Bishops of Alexandria elect, &c. I had rather write ἐπίσκοπον, and so reade the whole clause thus, χὴ πόλεμον ἀνδενδία προχειρίζονται σφῶν οἱ τῆς ἀλεξανδρέων ἐπίσκοπον; whereupon those of Alexandria by their own authority elect Petrus surnamed Mongus Bishop: and I am of opinion that Evagrius wrote thus. 'Tis certain, these words οἱ τῆς ἀλεξανδρέων ἐπίσκοποι cannot be spoken of the Suffragan Bishops. Besides, Petrus Mongus was ordained but by one Bishop, as 'tis related in Gestis de nomine Acacii, and in Acacius's Epistle to Pope Simplicius. Vales.

[b] Ζημίαν προξέμησε. I doubt not but it should be written προστέμησε, punished. For προξημᾶν signifies mulctare, to punish. Whence πρόστιμον imports Punishment, as Suidas attests. But προξημᾶν (which is the reading in Robert Stephens's Edition) signifies quite another thing. Nicephorus having found this fault in his Copy, expunged the Preposition, and worded this place of Evagrius thus, τὸν μὲν ὑφισαμένης δανάτῳ ζημίᾳ ἐπίμα, that is He punished those who had elected [Petrus Mongus Bishop] with a capital punishment. And yet Evagrius does not say so. For he relates, that Mongus himself was condemned by Zeno, not the Bishops who had chosen Mongus. 'Tis apparent therefore that Nicephorus had read thus in our Evagrius; χὴ τοὺ μὲν ὁ ζήνων δανάτῳ ζημίαν προστίμησε, wherefore Zeno punished those with death; and that he understood it as spoken of the Heretical Bishops who had elected Mongus. Doubtless, the Bishops who had chosen Mongus deserved a forer punishment than Mongus himself, who was elected by them. For they had done that on their own authority, without the Emperours advice and direction: whenas it had been customary, by reason of the largeness of the City Alexandria, that the Bishop thereof should not be elected, unless the Emperour's mind were first known. Besides, they had presumed to elect another Bishop when the See was not void, but whilst Timotheus Salophaciolus as yet survived. Whereupon the Seditions and Divisions, which seemed to have been extinguished by the death of Timotheus Ælurus, were rekindled. For these reasons, those Bishops were to be punished with a capital punishment, rather than Mongus. Nevertheless, in my judgment neither is true. For Mongus was punished only with banishment. But the Bishops who had ordained him, are ordered to be punished by Anthemius the Augustalis; as Liberatus affirms in his Breviary, chap. 16. Vales.

CHAP. XII.

Concerning Johannes who obtained the Presidency over the Alexandrian Church after Timotheus, and how Zeno outed him in regard he had forsworn himself, and restored the Chair of Alexandria to Petrus Mongus.

[a] I am of the same mind with Christophorson and Sir Henry Savil, who instead of [ἐκβολῆς δὲ ἐνίων] have mended it thus, ἐκ βελῆς δὲ ἐνίων, but by the advice of some persons: which amendment is confirmed by Nicephorus and the Tellerian Manuscript. Moreover, Liberatus in his Breviarium chap. 16, affirms that Johannes the Oeconomus [or, Steward] was sent to Constantinople on a far different account. For he says, that Timotheus Salophaciolus, after he had recovered his Episcopal Chair by the Decree of Zeno Augustus, sent some Ecclesiasticks to Constantinople, amongst whom was Johannes the Oeconomus, who might give the Emperour thanks for his own restitution. They also made a request to the Emperour at the same time, that if any thing should happen to Timotheus otherwise than well, no other person but a Catholick might be put into his See by the Clergy and people of Alexandria; as we are informed in Gestis de nomine Acacii. Which thing Zeno in his answer to Salophaciolus's advices, ordered to be done by a Letter written to the Alexandrian Clergy; as Felix attested in his first Epistle to Acacius, and Gelasius in Gestis de nomine Acacii. Further, in the Florentine Manuscript, at the Margin here, these words occur, περὶ ἰωάννου τοῦ ταβεννησιώτου, concerning Johannes Tabennesiota. 'Tis certain this Johannes is termed Tabennesiota by Theophanes also in his Chronicon, because he had been a Monk in the Monastery of the Tabennenses at Canopus, where Timotheus Salophaciolus had likewise formerly followed a Monastick life and discipline; as Theophanes relates. Vales.

nes a Presbyter, [b] appointed to be the Steward of the venerable Church of the Holy Forerunner and Baptist John, makes a journey to the Imperial City [Constantinople,] being sent on an Embassage [to make an address to the Emperour,] that if it should happen that their Bishop should die, the Inhabitants of Alexandria might have a [c] liberty of Electing one to preside over their Church whom they should have a mind to. This person, as Zacharias affirms, was by the Emperour discovered to have a design of procuring the Bishoprick for himself. and when he had obliged himself by oaths, that he would never seek to get the Alexandrian Chair, he returned into his own Country. But the Emperour promulged a Law, that after Timotheus's death, that person should be Bishop whom the Clergy and * people [of Alexandria] should Elect. Timotheus having ended his life not long after, this Johannes (as [b] Οἰκονομεῖν τῆς ἁγιωτάτης τοῦ ἁγίου πρόδρομου καὶ βαπτιστοῦ ἰωάννου ἐκκλησίας. Victor Tunonensis in his Chronicon, and Liberatus in his Breviary term this Johannes barely and simply Oeconomus. But in the Gesta de nomine Acacii he is styled the Oeconomus of Timotheus Catholicus. Why therefore does Evagrius (or rather Zacharias, out of whom Evagrius took it,) say here, that Johannes was Oeconomus of Saint John's Church? For he was not Steward of this Church only; but he look'd after the revenues and money of all the Churches which were under the Bishop of Alexandria, as Liberatus informs us in his sixteenth chapter, in these words: Porro Johannes ex Oeconomo amicus factus est Hillo Magistro; qui cum reliquis descendit Alexandriam. Factusque est iterum Oeconomus, habens causas omnium Ecclesiarum. Further Johannes of an Oeconomus is made a friend to Hillus the Magister; who together with the rest went down to Alexandria. And he is made Steward again [or, the second time,] having all the Causes of the Churches. Instead of [habens causas omnium Ecclesiarum,] I think it should be habens gazas omnium Ecclesiarum, having the treasure or riches of all the Churches. This emendation, Liberatus's following words do confirm, which run thus: Qui multa & pretiosa xenia direxit Hillo Magistro, &c. Who directed [or sent] many and those pretious presents to Hillus the Magister, &c. Or must it be said that the Church of Saint John Baptist was then the Greatest Church of Alexandria? Indeed, heretofore the Greater Church of Alexandria was termed the Cæsarea, as I have observed at Socrates. But 'tis possible, that the Church of Saint John, which had been built there by Theodosius after the demolishment of the Serapium, might become the Greater Church, the Episcopal Chair being removed thither. Concerning this Church of Saint John Baptist, Rufinus speaks in chap. 27. of his second book Eccles. Histor. And in the following chapter he adds concerning the Reliques of Saint John Baptist, that in the time of Athanasius they were brought to Alexandria. To which afterwards, the Serapium [or, Serapis's Temple] being demolished, Golden houses (that I may use Rufinus's words, which are Aurea Tecta,) were erected in the reign of Theodosius. 'Tis certain in this Church of Saint John, the Patriarch of Alexandria performed the Religious assemblies, as Theophanes informs us concerning Dioscorus, pag. 139. Vales.

* Or, Comonalty.

[c] The power therefore of Electing their Bishops had been taken from the Clergy and people of the City Alexandria, and the Emperour had removed the privilege of nominating the Bishop of Alexandria to himself, as 'tis apparent from this place. Which, we deny not, was done by force and against the Ecclesiastick Laws. Nevertheless, the Roman Emperours not without reason challenged that power to themselves after the murder of Proterius the Alexandrian Bishop, in regard the City of Alexandria, by its own inclination prone to Seditions, had several times raised vehement disturbances in the Election of Bishops. Vales.

the same Zacharias has related, gave money [a] disregarding the Oaths wherein [he had bound himself] to the Emperour, is constituted Bishop of Alexandria. Which when the Emperour understood, he ordered him to be Ejected. And by the perswasion of some Persons, the Emperour wrote an Exhortatory Edict to the Alexandrians, which he termed his * Henoticon; and ordered, that the Chair of Alexandria should be restored to Petrus, provided he would subscribe to His Henoticon, and receive those of Proterius's Party to Communion.

[a] Καὶ ὃς τὰ ὠμοσμένα τῷ βασιλεῖ ἀλογήσας. In the excellent Florentine Manuscr. I found it written thus: ἃ ἐς ἴσα ὠμοσμένα, &c. and we have rendred it accordingly.

* Or, Uniting Rescript.

Further, concerning this Oath wherein Johannes Tabennesiota had formerly bound himself in the Emperours presence, that he would never climb up into the Alexandrian See, Pope Simplicius speaks in his seventeenth Epistle to Acacius. Liberatus also attests the same, in his Breviary, chap. 17. Vales.

CHAP. XIII.

That Petrus Mongus embraced Zeno's Henoticon and joined himself to the * Proterians.

* Or, Those of Proterius's party.

[a] THis Disposition, which had been made by the advice of Acacius Bishop of the Imperial City, [b] Pergamius, who was constituted Præfect of Egypt carries along with him. He being arrived at Alexandria, and finding Johannes fled, held a Conference with Petrus, and perswades him to admit of Zeno's Exhortatory Edict; and moreover [to receive] those who had dissented from him. He admits therefore of the forementioned Exhortatory Edict, and subscribes to it. He promises also that he would receive those who were of the contrary party. Wherefore not long after this, when a publick Festivity was celebrated at Alexandria, and all Persons by a general consent agreed to that termed Zeno's Henoticon, Petrus likewise admitted [to Communion] those of Proterius's party. And having made an Exhortatory Oration to the People in the Church, he recited Zeno's Exhortatory Edict also, the Contents whereof were these.

[a] Τούτῳ τῇ οἰκονομίαν. To wit, Zeno's uniting Edict, which a little before Evagrius has termed a συγγνώμην. And 'tis therefore called a συγγνώμη here and hereafter by Evagrius, because the Emperour in that Edict speaks to all the Clergy and Laity, and by Preaching as it were, exhorts them, like a Priest, to embrace unity. But, 'tis termed an οἰκονομία for this reason, because by a wholesom Dispensation (as at the first blush it appears,) it invites all Catholicks to one and the same Communion, the mention of the Chalcedon Synod being suppressed. Further, this Edict of Zeno bore date on the year of Christ 482; Trocondus and Severinus being Consuls, as Baronius writes. Which is evidently confirmed by Victor Turonensis in his Chronicon. Vales.

[b] Liberatus in his Breviary, chap. 18. relates that Pergamius was not Præfect of Egypt, but Dux [or Commander of the Milice:] his words are these; Acacius persuasit Zenoni, &c. Acacius perswaded Zeno, that he should write to Apollonius the Augustalis, and to Pergamius the Dux, that they should drive Johannes out of the Alexandrian See, as having seized it contrary to his own Oath, which he had given in the Imperial City; and that they should give their assistance to Petrus Mongus, that he might continue in that See. Zeno's Henoticon.

EMperour Cæsar Zeno, Pius, Victor, Triumphator, Maximus, always Adorable, Augustus; To the [a] most Reverend Bishops, Clergy, Monks, and Laicks, in Alexandria, and throughout Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis.

[a] Facundus Hermianensis, citing this Edict of Zeno's in his twelfth Book, reads ὀρθοδόξοις, to the Orthodox Bishops. For the words are these: Flavius Zeno Pius, Victor, Triumphator, Maximus, always Augustus, to the Orthodox Bishops, &c. Then Facundus finds fault with that term Orthodox, and expresses his anger against it in many words; that the Emperour should not be afraid of giving the title of Orthodox to a company of Hereticks who had no head. Further, this Edict of Zeno was promulged in the year of Christ 482, as Baronius has recorded. Vales.

and Condition? On this account therefore, We have made it Our busines to certify You, that neither We, nor the Churches in all places, either have had, or have, or in future will have, nor do We know any Persons that have, any other Symbol, or Creed, or Definition of the Faith, save the forementioned Holy Creed of the Three hundred and eighteen Holy Fathers, which the foresaid Hundred and fifty Holy Fathers confirmed. Moreover, if any one hath [any other Creed,] We account him a Person estranged [from the Church.] For by this Creed only (as we have said,) We are confident Our Empire is * preserved. And all Persons vouchsafed the Salutary † Illumination, receiving this only [Creed] are Baptized. The same [Creed] hath been followed by all the Holy Fathers convened at Ephesus; who likewise deposed the impious Nestorius, and also those that afterwards embraced his Sentiments. Which Nestorius together with Eutyches, in regard they held Opinions contrary to the foresaid [Fathers,] We do Anathematize, and do also admit of the Twelve * Heads, which were dictated by Cyrillus of holy Memory, who was heretofore Archbishop of the Holy Catholick Church of the Alexandrians. But we confess the only Begotten Son of God and God, (who was truly and really made Man, our Lord Jesus Christ, Consubstantial to the Father according to the Deity, and of the same substance with us as to his Humanity; who descended and was incarnate by the Holy Ghost, of Mary the Virgin and Theotocos,) to be one, and not two. For we affirm, that the Miracles, and Sufferings which he voluntrily underwent in the Flesh, are of one. But we in no wise admit of those who divide, or confound, or introduce a † Phantasie. In regard the * impeccable and true Incarnation from the Theotocos hath not made an accession of [another] Son. For the Trinity hath ever continued the Trinity, although one of the Trinity, [to wit,] God the Word, hath been incarnate. Assuredly knowing therefore, that neither the Holy Orthodox Churches of God in all places, nor the Prelates most beloved by God who preside over them, nor yet Our Empire, hath received, or doth admit of any other Creed, or Definition of the Faith, save the foresaid holy Creed; without making doubts or delays, [e] We have united our selves. Now, We have written these things [to you,] not that We might innovate the Faith, but in order to the giving you full satisfaction. But We Anathematize every Person, who has thought, or thinks otherwise, either now, or at any other time, whether at Chalcedon, or in any other Synod whatever: but more especially the foresaid Persons Nestorius and Eutyches, and such as embrace their Sentiments. Be ye joyned therefore to [Your] Spiritual Mother the Church, and together with Us enjoy that same divine Communion therein, according to the forementioned one and only Definition of the Faith of the Three hundred and eighteen Holy Fathers. For your most Holy Mother the Church expects to embrace You [f] as Her genuine Sons, and after a long time earnestly desires to hear Your sweet Voice. Make all imaginable haste therefore. For by doing hereof, you will procure to your selves both the Benevolence of our Master and Saviour and God Jesus Christ, and shall also be praised by Our Imperial Majesty. [e] Ἡνώσαμεν ἑαυτούς; so 'tis also written in Nicephorus. But Facundus and Liberatus seem to have read otherwise. For Facundus (pag. 551.) renders this place thus: Adunate ergo vos in nullo dubitantes, &c. Unite your selves therefore, being doubtful in nothing. For we have written these things to you, not to innovate the Faith, but that we might satisfy you, &c. And Liberat. translates it in this manner: Unite vosmetipsos, nihil dubitantes, &c. Unite your selves, doubting nothing, &c. Whence it appears, that they read Ἑνώσατε ἑαυτούς, &c. But the Reading in our Copies is better: For soon after it follows, ἀναθεματίζομεν, We Anathematize. Vales.

[f] Καὶ γνησίους ὑμᾶς υἱούς. That which frequently happens in these Books of Evagrius, occurrs here also, to wit, that ὡς is put instead of ὡς. 'Tis certain Liberatus reads ὡς here, as 'tis apparent from his Version. For thus he renders it: Sanctissima namque Mater nostra Ecclesia, &c. For our most Holy Mother the Church, as being the Person who hath begotten you, from a long time expects to embrace Her Sons, and earnestly desires to hear your sweet voice. Nor did Facundus read otherwise, in his twelfth Book. For thus his Version runs; Sancta enim Mater nostra Ecclesia, &c. For our Holy Mother the Church receives you as Her own Sons. Embrace her; for She desires after a long time to hear Your sweet Voice. Moreover, Nicephorus has it written, ὡς ὡς γνησίους. Further, from the forecited passages 'tis apparent, that Facundus and Liberatus in Zeno's Edict had read μήτηρ ἡμῶν, Our Mother; which Reading I am most pleased with. Besides, Facundus read ἀσπάσασθε, Embrace Ye Her; not as 'tis commonly read, ἀσπάσασθαι, to embrace. Which Reading nevertheless is intolerable. Lastly, Liberatus seems to have read ἐκ τῆς χρονίας, from a long time; not ὡς τῆς χρονίας, and after a long time. Vales.

That Johannes [Bishop] of Alexandria coming to Rome, perswades Simplicius to write to Zeno concerning what had hapned; [and what] Zeno [wrote back in answer to him.]

Hereat Simplicius Bishop of the Elder Rome was troubled, and wrote to Zeno; whereto Zeno returned answer, accusing Johannes of Perjury, and [affirming] that on that account, and for no other reason, he had been ejected out of his Bishoprick.

But in the Gesta de nomine Acacii, which in my judgment were written by Pope Gelasius, he is said to have requested the Refuge only of the Roman Church, in such manner as his predecessours had done; which I think is truer. For Johannes appealed not from any Ecclesiastical Judicature to Simplicius, in regard he had not been expelled out of his own See by the Sentence of a Synod, but by force: nor did he present a Libel to Pope Simplicius, but to Felix his Successour, as we shall see afterwards. Vales.

Some time afterwards, Calendion is condemned to be baniſhed into Oäſis, being ſuppoſed to have [b] favoured [c] Illus, Leontius, and Pamprepius, in relation to a Tyranny raiſed by them againſt Zeno. But Petrus Fullo, who [had been Biſhop of Antioch,] before [d] Calendion and Stephanus, as I have ſaid, recovered his own [Chair.] Who both ſubſcribed to Zeno's Henoticon, [e] and alſo ſent Synodical Letters to Petrus [Biſhop] of Alexandria.

[b] That this was the pretext of condemning Calendion, is atteſted by Liberatus in his Breviary, chap. 18. But the true cauſe of his being condemned and depoſed, was this, becauſe he would defend the Chalcedon Synod, nor would acquieſce in Zeno's Edict. Liberatus's words are theſe: Interea Calendion Archiepiſcopus Antiochenus deponitur, &c. In the interim Calendion Archbiſhop of Antioch is depoſed. Being accuſed in publick as having been undutiful [indevotus, without devotion] to his Prince, drawing the People into a Rebellion with Illus; but ſecretly, becauſe he would not keep himſelf from the Communion both of Pope Felix and Johannes. Gelaſius alſo in his thirteenth Epiſtle to the Dardani, ſays, that Calendion was therefore ejected by Zeno, becauſe he had razed his Name out of the Diptycks, and inſtead thereof put in Leontius's. Valeſ.

[c] Ἰλλῷ. In the Florentine and Tellerian MSS. I found it written ἴλλῳ. This is the Hillus, by Country an Iſaurian, in Dignity Magiſter Officiorum [Maſter of the Offices,] as Marcellinus tells us in his Chronicon: who after he had been in great favour with the Emperour, at length was incenſed againſt him, for what reaſon I know not; and together with Leontius ingaged himſelf in a Tyranny in the Eaſt, on the year of Chriſt 484, as Marcellinus records; or rather 483. as Baronius has rightly obſerved. Further, this Hillus is by Candidus Iſaurus and by Damaſcius in the Life of Iſidorus the Philoſopher, always called ἰλλῶ, with the Accent in the laſt Syllable. So 'tis alſo written in Suidas: Ἴλλος, ſays he, ὄνομα κύριον ὃς ὧδε μάγιστρος ζωίνου. ὁ κλ ἰλλῶς. διὸ καὶ ἰλλῶς τὸν φθορέα ἐκρέμασεν ὅτι διδύμα ξύλα. So that place of Suidas is to be read. Valeſ.

[d] Petrus Fullo was ejected out of the See of Antioch a little after the return of Zeno Auguſtus, on the year after the Conſulate of Baſiliſcus and Armatus. One Johannes whom Petrus had ordained [Biſhop] of Apamia, invaded his See, as I obſerved before at chap. 10, note (a.) He having been ejected, an Oriental Synod ordained Stephanus, as Theophanes tells us in his Chronicon. This Stephanus, when he had governed the See of Antioch about a year's ſpace, was moſt barbarouſly murdered by Hereticks in the Church, on the year of Chriſt 479, after the Conſulate of the moſt Famous Illus; as Baronius has rightly obſerved from Pope Simplicius's Epiſtles. Zeno being highly incenſed on account of this murther, ſent ſome Perſons to Antioch, who might revenge this Fact, and puniſh the Authors of the Sedition. Moreover, to avoid Tumults, he commanded Acacius Biſhop of Conſtantinople, to ordain a Biſhop of Antioch in the Imperial City. And this thing, done on account of preſerving the Eccleſiaſtick Peace, as well the Emperour as Acacius excuſed to Pope Simplicius, promiſing that in future the Ordination of the Prelate of Antioch ſhould be made by the Comprovincial Biſhops, according to the Preſcripts of the Canons. Stephanus Junior therefore is ordained by Acacius, and after he had ſate three years, Calendion is created Biſhop in his ſtead by an Oriental Synod, in the Conſulate of Trocundus and Severinus, on the year of Chriſt 482; as Baronius has learnedly obſerved from Pope Simplicius's Epiſtle. Theophanes does indeed affirm, that Calendion was ordained by Acacius at Conſtantinople, by the Emperour Zeno's order. Theophanes's Opinion ſeems to be confirmed by Candidus in the third Book of his Hiſtory; whoſe words are theſe, ὡς πέπυσμαι τῶν δυσεβῶς τὰς τῆς ἀναστολῆς παρόντος ἐκκλησίας καλενδίωνα ζλώων ὁ βασιλεὺς εἰς τὸ ἱερατεῖον ἀντιοχείας ἀπέστελλε, In like manner as the Emperour Zeno, when the Impious Petrus diſturbed the Churches of the Eaſt, ſent Calendion to be Conſecrated [Biſhop] of Antioch. Beſides, in the Geſta de Nomine Acacii, 'tis in expreſs words written, That Calendion was Ordained by Acacius Biſhop of Conſtantinople. Simplicius alſo affirms the ſame in the cited Epiſtle, if we weigh his words more attentively. For, what elſe is the meaning of theſe words: Antiochenum exordium Sacerdotis quâ ratione ſerius fuerit, Indicatum, quamvis minimè nos latere potuerit, tamen & ipſe vel Synodus ejus indicavit. Quod ſicut non optavimus fieri, ita faciles excuſationi quam neceſſitas fecit extitimus; quia quod voluntarium non eſt, non poteſt vocari in reatum, &c. For what Guilt, what neceſſity was to be excuſed before Simplicius, unleſs Acacius had Ordained Calendion at Conſtantinople contrary to the Eccleſiaſtick Laws? But now, what the ſame Theophanes adds concerning Johannes Codonatus, who was Ordained Biſhop by the Antiochians knowing nothing of the Ordination made at Conſtantinople, and whom Calendion afterwards removed to the See of Tyre: I fear Theophanes is miſtaken herein. For, not Calendion, but Acacius removed Johannes to the See of Tyre; as 'tis atteſted by Pope Felix in the Libel of Condemnation of Acacius, and by Gelaſius, and Liberatus. Valeſ.

[e] Καὶ Ζωιλικοῖς ὃ πρότερον. Doubtleſs it muſt be written, κὴ Ζωιλικοῖς ὃ πρὸς πέδον τὸ ἀλεξανδρέων ἐχρήσατο, And alſo ſent Synodical Letters to Petrus [Biſhop] of Alexandria. Thus Nicephorus read; and yet Chriſtophorſon, and Sir Henry Savil at the Margin of his Copy, mend it very ſimply, thus, πρὸς πρότερον, to Proterius. For Proterius was dead long before this. 'Tis manifeſt from Pope Gelaſius's Epiſtles, that Petrus Fullo held Communion with Petrus Mongus. Valeſ.

Acacius alſo Biſhop of Conſtantinople entred into a Communion with the [f] ſame [Petrus Biſhop of Alexandria:] as did likewiſe Martyrius Biſhop of Jeruſalem, who ſent his Synodical Letters to the ſame Petrus. After this, [g] ſome Perſons ſeparated themſelves from Petrus's Communion: ſo that from that time Petrus Anathematized the Synod of Chalcedon publickly. Which news coming to the hearing of Acacius Biſhop of Conſtantinople, troubled him [not a little.] Acacius therefore cauſed ſome Perſons to be ſent, who might enquire into the truth hereof. When Petrus being deſirous fully to ſatisfy, that no ſuch thing had been done by him, * framed Acts, wherein ſome Perſons affirmed, that to their knowledge no ſuch thing [h] had been done by Petrus.

[f] To wit, with Petrus Mongus. For with him, after the ejection of Johannes Tabenneſiota, Acacius held Communion, and received from, and ſent to him Synodical Letters, as Liberatus informs us.

* Or, wrote.

But Acacius never held Communion with Petrus Fullo: yea, he was wont to boaſt, that he had never been joyned in Communion with him: whereas yet, by this that he communicated with Petrus Mongus who maintained a Communion with Petrus Fullo, Acacius himſelf alſo might hold Communion with Fullo; as Pope Gelaſius ſays in his Epiſtle to the Orientals, which was firſt publiſhed by Jacobus Syrmondus. Valeſ.

[g] Evagrius gives no reaſon, why theſe Men ſeparated themſelves from the Communion of Petrus Mongus. Beſides, Liberatus in his Breviary, chap. 18. does relate this matter very obſcurely, in theſe words; Igitur Petrus Mongus ab Abbate Ammone & Johanne Epiſcopo Magileos, &c. Therefore Petrus Mongus, having undergone wars from the Abbot Ammon and Johannes the Biſhop of Magilis, and from the Abbots of the Monks of the lower Egypt, and a Sedition having been raiſed againſt him in the Cathedral Cæſarea, as 'tis called, [or, as 'tis reported;] anathematized the Chalcedon Synod, and Pope Leo's Tome. And theſe things he did, after he had written to Acacius and Simplicius that he held Communion with them and with the Holy Synod. And theſe matters having been in this manner performed, ſome Perſons departed from Petrus's Communion, and declared [them] to the Roman Biſhop at Rome. Which words, in themſelves obſcure enough, are in my judgment to be explained thus. Petrus Mongus, after he had been reſtored to the Alexandrian See upon Johannes's Ejection, at firſt uſed diſſimulation, and ſent Synodical Letters to Acacius and Simplicius, wherein he affirmed that he held Communion with the Synod of Chalcedon. He alſo admitted thoſe to Communion who were of Timotheus Salophaciolus's party, as Liberatus atteſts. But afterwards, when he had been vexed by the Eutychian Monks on account of his diſſimulation, he anathematized the Chalcedon Synod publickly in the Church. Valeſ.

[h] Γεγραφὸν, had been written: in my judgment it ſhould be πεπραχὸν, had been done. And ſo Nicephorus read, book 16. chap. 13. Valeſ.

CHAP. XVII.

Concerning thoſe things written by Petrus, to Acacius who had embraced the Chalcedon Synod.

[FOR] this Petrus, [a] in regard he was a perſon that could cloath himſelf in any dreſs, of a mind mutable and crafty, and one that could conform to the times; perſiſted not in the leaſt in one and the ſame Opinion. But ſometimes he Anathematized the Chalcedon Synod; at others retracted, and embraced that Council, with all Suffrages. He wrote a Letter therefore to Acacius Biſhop of Conſtantinople, the Contents whereof run word for word thus:

[a] Πέζος ὁ σκόθεργος. I have mended this place thus, [ὡς κόθορνος, in regard he was a perſon that could cloath himſelf in any dreſs,] partly from Nicephorus, and partly by the Authority of the Florentine and Tellerian MSS. Further, concerning this wavering and fraudulent humour of Petrus's, we have the atteſtation of Liberatus in theſe words: Sed permanſit Petrus in Epiſcopatu, &c. But Peter continued in his Biſhoprick, and wrote to Acacius, that he was a Communicator of [or, held Communion with] the Synod, and deceived the Alexandrians, becauſe he would not communicate with the Synod: ſo that ſome Eccleſiaſticks who were his Communicators, ſome Monks and Laicks, perceiving his fallaciouſneſs, ſeparated themſelves from his Communion. And holding ſeparate aſſemblies, would not endure to communicate with his Name. Valeſ.

The

The most high God will reward your Holiness, [b] for those great Labours and troubles, which for so many years space you [have undergone,] conserving and defending the Faith of the Holy Fathers, which by an uninterrupted Preaching you have confirmed. In which Faith we have found the Creed also of the Three hundred and eighteen Holy Fathers rightly and orderly placed, in which Creed we were heretofore baptized, and which we have and do believe: which Creed the Hundred and fifty Holy Fathers assembled at Constantinople have confirmed. You therefore without intermission leading all Men the way, have united the Holy Church of God, and by the weightiest and most convincing Instances and Arguments have perswaded us, that nothing contrary hereto hath been done in the most Holy and Oecumenical Synod convened at Chalcedon, which agrees with, and hath confirmed the Determinations of the Holy Fathers at Nicæa. For, having found nothing of any Innovation therein, we have given our absolute and perfect assent thereto, and believed it. But we understand, that certain Monks, envying Our Fraternity, have conveyed some Calumnies to your holy Ears; which could not readily induce your Holiness to be incensed [against us.] And in the first place [they affirm,] [c] that we have removed the Reliques of our Father of holy Memory the Blessed Archbishop Timotheus, to some other place. Which Fact is neither acceptable to God, nor agreeable to the Laws. Then they pass to another [Crime,] which is inconsistent with it self, and much worse than the former. For, how could we Anathematize the Holy Synod at Chalcedon, which we have believed and confirmed? But ye are not ignorant, nor is it concealed from your Piety, how great the Heat and Levity of the People amongst us is, as also [that] of the Monks who are desirous of change and innovation. Who having entred into a consult together with some malevolent Persons that have severed themselves from the Church, attempt to draw the People after them. But, by the assistance of your Prayers, [d] we have found a Way how to cure [this mischief,] without doing any prejudice to the holy Synod of Chalcedon; for we have been certainly informed, that nothing new hath been done there. And in order to the perswasion and * satisfaction of the more simple, we have taken care that the same thing should be said by [e] those who hold Assemblies together with us. And to [f] this business, after I had been wholly intent upon it, I soon put a stop. Further, I do signify to your Sanctity, that even at this very instant the Monks cease not, who sow Tares, intermixing some Persons among themselves, who never dwelt in [g] Monasteries [as] instruments [of Sedition;] and run up and down scattering various Rumours against Us, and † against the Peace of Christ's Church, and permitting us to perform nothing Canonically and in a manner befitting God's Holy Catholick Church: making it their business, that the People committed to our care should rule over, rather than obey us; in fine,] * they attempt the doing of whatever [actions] are unseemly [in the sight] of God. But we are confident, that Your Sanctity will give the Most divine Lord of the World an account of all things, and will take care, that [such an] Order shall be issued forth to them from His Serenity, as may be necessary in relation to the Ecclesiastick Peace, and befitting God and the Emperour: so that all Persons may acquiesce in what [shall be established.]

[b] Ὑπὸ τε πόνων. It must doubtless be ὑπὲρ τε πόνων, for those great Labours. Instead of ἀμείφθη, it must be ἀμείψεται, as it is in the Tellerian MS. and in Nicephorus. Vales.

[c] Mongus says, this Crime was objected against him, that he had removed the Reliques of Timotheus Salophaciolus into another place. But he neither excuses that Fact, nor denies it: resting satisfy'd only in saying this, That that Fact was impious in the presence of God and Men. For humane Laws do severely punish the disturbers of Sepulchers. 'Tis certain Victor Tunonensis in his Chronicon writes thus concerning Mongus: Post Consulatum Zenonis tertium, &c. After Zeno's third Consulate, ——He condemns the Chalcedon Synod out of the Pulpit before the People. He takes the Names of Proterius and Timotheus Salophaciolus out of the Ecclesiastick Diptycks, and writes therein those of Dioscorus and Ælurus, who had murdered Proterius; and having cast Timotheus Salophaciolus's Body out of the Church, he threw it into a desart place without the City. Liberatus also attests the same in his Breviary, chap. 18. in these words: ——Sed & Petrum Alexandrinum, &c.—— Moreover, Petrus Alexandrinus anathematizing the Chalcedon Synod and Pope Leo's Tome, who having expunged the Names of Proterius and Timotheus Catholicus out of the Diptycks, inserted those of Dioscorus and Ælurus; who took the Body of the same Timotheus Catholicus out of the Earth, and cast it forth, who had been buried amongst the Catholick Bishops, Acacius has in a strange manner praised him, concerning whom he had remembred before, that himself had related so great Crimes. Lastly, Pope Felix in the Sentence of Condemnation against Acacius, does expresly confirm this very thing. So that now there can be no further doubt of the truth of this Fact. Vales.

[d] Ἐσκεψάμεθα λόγον. Translatours have rendred this place variously. For Muscutus translates it thus; Libellum consideratè concinnavimus, We have with consideration composed a Libel. Christophorson, in this manner; Literas hasce excogitavimus, quæ huic malo remedio sint, We have found out these Letters, which may be a remedy for this mischief. But Johannes Langus, Nicephorus's Translatour, has rendred it thus; Re deliberatâ, rationem quæ mederi malo imminenti posset, invenimus, Having considered the business, we found out a way, which might cure the imminent evil. Of these three Renditions, the second is wholly to be rejected; but the first and third are tolerable. Nevertheless, it seems to me more fit, to render λόγον the Oration, or, Speech to the People, which Petrus made in the Church at such time as he ordered the Ecclesiastick Acts to be made up before Acacius's Legates; concerning which Acts Evagrius has spoken before, at the close of the foregoing chapter. Vales.

* Or, Defence.

[e] Τὰς ὁμοσυνελθόντας ἡμῖν. Johannes Langus renders this place thus: Fecimus ut ab iis qui nobiscum conventus agunt, ista dicerentur, We have caused, that these things should be said by those, who hold Assemblies with us. Musculus interprets it in this manner: Eos qui ad nos venerunt, hoc ipsum dicere fecimus, We have made those, who have come to us, say the same thing. Christophorson's Translation runs thus: Tum ut illi qui nobiscum unà accersebantur, pro defensione idem ipsum dicerent, effecimus, And also we have procured, that they who were sent for together with us, should for a defence say the very same thing. They thought therefore, that the word ὁμοσυνελθόντας signified no other thing than συνελθόντας. But by the term ὁμοσυνελθόντας, 'tis my judgment that the Ecclesiasticks and Laicks of Timotheus Salophaciolus's party are understood, who by the order of Zeno Augustus were associated and joined to Petrus Mongus. For the Emperour Zeno, by the perswasion and advice of Acacius, had written to Apollonius the Augustalis, and Pergamius the Dux, that they should eject Johannes Talaia, and install Petrus, provided he would admit of the Henoticon, and receive [to Communion] the Clergy of Timotheus Catholicus; as Liberatus relates in his Breviary, chap. 18. Zeno had likewise written Letters to Petrus Mongus, wherein he ordered him, that he should give reception to the Clergy of Timotheus's party, who were of the same Opinion with himself; as the same Liberatus affirms in these words; Et quidem Petrus inthronizatur ab omnibus, &c. And Petrus is installed by all Persons. 'Tis written from the Emperour, that he should receive those that agreed with him who had been of Timotheus Catholicus's Party. That is, as well the Clergy as Laity, who were willing to agree to Zeno's Edict. When therefore Petrus Mongus made up his Ecclesiastick Acts, wherewith he would prove to Acacius that he had never condemned the Chalcedon Synod; he made use of these Persons as Witnesses, and caused them to confirm this with their own Testimony, That the Chalcedon Synod had never been condemned by Petrus. Further, their Testimony seemed worthy to be credited, because they had been of Timotheus Catholicus's party, who had always defended the Chalcedon Synod. See the Close of the sixteenth Chapter. Pope Felix speaks concerning these very Persons in the Sentence of Condemnation against Acacius; where his words are these: Quid enim sunt aliud, qui post obitum sanctæ memoriæ Timothei, ad Ecclesiam sub Petro redeunt, &c. For what are they else, who after the death of Timotheus of holy memory, return to the Church, under Petrus, &c. Vales.

* Or, Darnel.

† Or, Against the Ecclesiastick peace of Christ.

CHAP. XVIII.

In what manner Johannes [Bishop] of Alexandria perswades Felix Pope of Rome to send a Deposition to Acacius [Bishop] of Constantinople.

[IN the interim] Johannes having fled to Rome, [desisted not from] troubling Felix, who had succeeded Simplicius in the Bishoprick of Rome, about those things done by Petrus; and [at length] prevails [so far,] as Zacharias affirms, that a Deposition was sent from Felix himself to Acacius, on account of his holding a Communion with Petrus. Which Deposition, in regard it was a thing done [a] contrary to the Prescript of the Canons, as the same Zacharias has related; for (some of those Persons who lead a Monastick Life in that termed The Monastery of the * Acœmeti, delivered it;) Acacius would not admit of, nor acknowledge. And these things have indeed [in this manner] been written by Zacharias: but he seems to me, to have had no exact knowledge of the matters at that time transacted; but, to have given us a very lame, maimed, and imperfect account; to wit, those things only which he had from Report and Hear-say. I my self therefore will give an accurate Narrative of that whole Tranfaction. [b] Libels having been presented to Felix by Johannes against Acacius, because he illegally held Communion with Petrus, and on account of other things done by him contrary to the Canons; the Bishops Vitalis and Misenus are sent [c] from Felix to [the Emperour] Zeno, [with the requests,] that the Synod at Chalcedon might be confirmed, that Petrus might be expelled [from his See] as being an Heretick, and that Acacius should be sent to Felix, to give an account of those matters; whereof Johannes (of whom we have made frequent mention) might accuse him.

* That is, the Monks who did not sleep.

[b] Some time before this, Johannes Tabennesiota (after he had been ejected out of his See,) had come to Rome, and had made his Case known to Pope Simplicius. But he had not presented a Libel to him; but had only perswaded him, that he would write to Acacius in defence of his Cause. Which thing Pope Simplicius performed with a ready and willing mind. But Acacius, having received Simplicius's Letters, returned Answer, that he in no wise acknowledged Johannes Bishop of Alexandria: but, had received Petrus Mongus to Communion, by order of the Emperour Zeno. At which Letters Simplicius being highly incensed, wrote back, that Acacius had not done what was regular and orderly, in that he had received Petrus to Communion, who stood condemned by the common Sentence of them both. And when Johannes was preparing to offer a Libel to the Pope, containing various Crimes against Acacius; in the interim Simplicius was prevented by death, before Acacius had given Answer to his last Letters, as Liberatus tells us in his Breviarium. But after Felix had been put into Simplicius's place, Johannes presented that Libel to Pope Felix, which he had before made ready to offer to Simplicius. Who forthwith sent a Libel of Citation to Acacius by the Bishops Vitalis and Misenus, ordering him to come to Rome immediately, and give in his Answer before the Apostolick See, to the Libel of Johannes the Bishop; as 'tis recorded in the Gesta de nomine Acacii, and in the Libel of Citation transmitted to Acacius. ——— Vales.

[a] In the Condemnation and Deposition of Acacius, the Greeks found fault chiefly with two things. First, because he had not been condemned and deposed in a Synod; but only Pope Felix had prefixt his own Name before the Sentence of Deposition. The other thing was, because Acacius having been neither convicted nor examined according to the Ecclesiastick Canons, had received a Sentence of Condemnation. To the former Objection those of the Church of Rome returned this Answer: That there was no need of a new Synod for the condemning of Acacius. For all Followers and Communicators [that is, those that held Communion] with Heretick, who had heretofore been condemned by a special Sentence, are to be understood as condemned together with the same Hereticks. So says Pope Gelasius in his Epistle to the Orientals (which was first published by Jacobus Syrmondus,) in the Gesta de nomine Acacii. I know what Answer is given by Baronius at the year of Christ 484, chap. 21: to wit, that Gelasius speaks concerning an Oecumenical Synod. But by Baronius's favour, this Answer is not satisfactory. For the Greeks in this affair made no difference between a General and a particular Council. But in general they affirmed, that Acacius had been condemned in no Synod particularly convened upon his account. For thus Pope Gelasius writes in the forementioned Epistle, speaking to the Orientals, in these words: An de uno dolet Acacio, quod speciali Synodo non fuerit confutatus, &c. Are you troubled about one Acacius, because he has not been confuted in a special Synod; whenas he himself in his own Letters hath detected his own Crime; nor having already voluntarily confessed, ought he to be heard; and are you not troubled about so great Catholick Prelates without any Examination secluded? Pope Gelasius confesses ingenuously, that Acacius had been convicted and heard in no special Synod. 'Tis certain, neither of those two Roman Synods, wherein Acacius was condemned, were convened upon his account. For the former was assembled on the account of Vitalis and Misenus the Legates of the Apostolick See; wherein Vitalis and Misenus were indeed condemned: but Petrus Bishop of Alexandria and Acacius, were only reprehended and by the by reproved, as Evagrius tells us a little after this. But the Latter Synod was assembled on the account of the Antiochian Church, on the same year, as Pope Felix informs us, in his Synodick Letter to all the Presbyters and Archimandrites at Constantinople and throughout Bithynia. In which Synod Petrus Bishop of Antioch was indeed chiefly and most especially condemned; who having ejected Calendion, had invaded the Antiochian See. But Petrus Bishop of Alexandria and Acacius Bishop of Constantinople, were only condemned as the Associates and Communicators of the same Petrus; as the Subscription annext to the same Letter doth declare [in these words] Candidus Tiburtinæ Civitatis Episcopus, &c. I Candidus Bishop of the Tiburtine City, following the authority of the Apostolick See, set forth by the Catholick deliberation of us all, according to the State of the Church; pronouncing an Anathema to Petrus the Invader of the Alexandrian Church, and to Acacius sometime of the Constantinopolitan Church, also to Petrus [Bishop] of Antioch, who have heretofore been rightly and deservedly separated from the Episcopal [Dignity] and number of Christians, and to all their followers, have subscribed, &c. But whereas the Greeks complained that Pope Felix had prefixt his own Name only before that Sentence; Felix, in the forecited Letter, answers this Objection thus, in these words: Unde nec causâ Antiochenæ Ecclesiæ apud B. Petrum Apostolum collecti, &c. Whence being at this present convened before the Blessed Apostle Peter on account of the Antiochian Church, we have again hastned to shew your love the usage which was always obtained amongst us. As often as the Lords and Prelates are convened within Italy on account of Ecclesiastical Causes, especially of Faith, an usage is retained, that the Successor of the Prelates of the Apostolick See, in the Name [or Person] of all the Prelates of all Italy, agreeable to the Care of all the Churches appertaining to them, should constitute all things. Pope Julius had said the same long before Felix, in his Letter to the Orientals, which Athanasius records in his Apologetick. But now, as to the second Objection of the Easterns, concerning Acacius's being condemned without any Examination; that is sufficiently answered by Pope Gelasius in his Epistle to the Orientals, the words whereof we have produced above. Vales.

[c] Πρὸς τὸν φίλικα περὶ τὸν ζιώνα. The words are transposed, which I restore thus; σέλλον περὶ τὸν φίλικα πρὸς τὸν ζιώνα, are sent from Felix to [the Emperour] Zeno. Vales.

CHAP. XIX.

Concerning Cyrillus Governour of the Monastery of the Acœmeti, how he sent some Persons to Felix at Rome, inciting him to revenge what had been committed against the Faith.

[a] BUT before their arrival at the Imperial City, Cyrillus Governour of those [Monks] termed the [b] Acœmeti, sends [some Persons] to Felix, complaining of his slackness, in regard so great offences were committed against the true Faith. Felix therefore writes to Misenus and those who accompanied him, [ordering them] to do nothing before they should have had a Conference with Cyrillus, and might be informed from him what was to be done.

[a] Πρὶν ἢ δὲ τούτοις φθῶσι τὴν βασιλείαν. Nicephorus has excellently well explained this place of Evagrius, in these words: Πρινὴ ἢ βιτάλιον καὶ μισῆνον τοὺς ἐκ ῥώμης ἥκοντας φθάσαι τὴν βασιλεύουσαν, &c. But before Vitalis and Misenus, coming from Rome, had arrived at the Imperial City, &c. In Evagrius therefore it must be written thus; πρινὴ ἢ τέλος φθῶσι τὴν βασίλειον. For so Evagrius does usually call Constantinople; as hereafter, at chap. 25. Vales.

[b] There were two Monasteries at Constantinople which were termed [The Monasteries] of the Acœmeti, to wit, [The Monastery] of Bassianus, and that of Dius. They had taken the Name of Bassianus and of Dius from their Founders. But they had the Appellation of Acœmeti, [or, Acœmitæ,] given them, because they celebrated the the Divine praiſes night and day, ſucceeding one another by turns; in ſo much that they ſeemed not to ſleep. So heretofore in the Gallia's, a continual praiſing of God is ſaid to have been kept up in ſome Monaſteries. Valeſ.

CHAP. XX.

Concerning what Felix wrote to Zeno, and Zeno to Felix.

THere were diſpatch'd to them other [a] Commonitories alſo from Felix; who likewiſe wrote Letters to Zeno, both concerning the Chalcedon Synod, and alſo about the Perſecution in Africa [which had been raiſed] by Onorichus. Beſides, he wrote to Acacius. The Emperour Zeno returned an anſwer to Felix, [wherein he told him] that Johannes had given him trouble in vain, becauſe * he had ſworn that he would in no wiſe at any time ſue for Admiſſion to the See of Alexandria; but, that afterwards he had diſregarded his Oath, and committed all manner of Sacrilege: and, that Petrus had not been ordained raſhly and without an exquiſite Tryal and Examination, but had with his own hand ſubſcribed, that he embraced the Faith of the Three hundred and eighteen Holy Fathers heretofore convened at Nicæa; which Faith the Holy Synod at Chalcedon alſo had [approved of, and] followed. The expreſs words [of Zeno's Letter] are theſe: You ought to be moſt undoubtedly aſſured, that both Our Piety, and the forementioned moſt Holy Petrus, and all the moſt holy Churches, do Embrace and Revere the moſt Holy Synod of the [b] Chalcedonians, which hath fully agreed with the Faith in the Synod of the Nicæans.

[a] Ὑπομνηστικά. Nicephorus ſuppoſed that theſe Commonitoria (for ſo the Latines term them, which the Greeks call ὑπομνηστικὰ,) were written to the Emperour Zeno. But Evagrius ſays they were written to Vitalis and Miſenus the Legates of the Apoſtolick See. 'Tis certain, Commonitories were wont to be ſent to Ambaſſadors and ſuch like Perſons, but not to the Roman Emperour. For they were as it were Orders and Inſtructions which publick Miniſters ought ſtudiouſly to obſerve. Valeſ.

* That is, Johannes.

[b] Καλχηδονέων. In the excellent Florent. Manuſcr. I found it written Καλχηδωναίων: and ſo alſo the ſame Manuſcript Copy has it written in other places, as I have remarked before. Indeed, the ancient Coyns do confirm this writing of this word, as does likewiſe the Author of the Etymologicon in the word καλχηδῶν. Valeſ.

[c] Ἐμφέρεσθαι τοῖς τε πεπραγμένοις Iagree with Sir Henry Savil, who in his Copy hath mended it thus, ἐμφέρεσθαί τε τοῖς πεπραγμένοις, There are alſo extant in the ſame Acts. But I can in no wiſe approve of Chriſtophorſon's Verſion, who has rendred this place thus: Extant præterea in Actis ejuſdem Concilii, &c. There are moreover, extant in the Acts of the ſame Council, &c. For Evagrius makes no mention here of any Council, only takes a view of the Collection of Letters, which belonged to Acacius's Cauſe. Chriſtophorſon thought (becauſe he ſaw mention was made of the Acts by Evagrius,) that it followed immediately, that theſe things were tranſacted in a Council. But the matter is not always ſo. For whatever things were done in any affair, may ſimply be called Acts, although no Council or Judiciary proceedings intervened. Valeſ.

[c] There are alſo extant in the ſame Acts the Letters, both from the forementioned Cyrillus, and from other Archimandrites of the Imperial City; and alſo [thoſe] from the Biſhops and Clergy of the Egyptick Diœceſis, [written] to Felix, againſt Petrus as being an Heretick, and againſt thoſe who communicated with him. Further, when the [Monks] belonging to the Monaſtery of the Acœmeti, were come to Felix, [d] they accuſed Miſenus and thoſe that accompanied him, becauſe till their arrival at Byzantium, [the name of] Petrus had in ſecret been recited in the Sacred Diptycks; but, that from that time till now it was recited publickly; and therefore, that Miſenus and thoſe who accompanied him had held Communion [with Petrus.] The Letter likewiſe of the Egyptians affirmed the ſame things [with what I have related] concerning Petrus; and further alſo, that Johannes being a Perſon Orthodox, had been legally Ordained; but, that Petrus was Ordained only by [e] two Biſhops, who maintained the ſame ill opinion with himſelf: and, that immediately after Johannes's flight, all manner of puniſhments had been inflicted on the Orthodox. And that Acacius had had information of all theſe things by ſome Perſons who had made a journey to him [from Alexandria] to the Imperial City; and [laſtly,] that Acacius was found to be Petrus's favourer and aſſiſtant in all things.

[d] Ὅτι ἠ διήλεγξαν. The Article ὅτι is to be expunged; which is not acknowledged by Nicephorus. Valeſ.

[e] All other Authors relate, that Mongus was ordained by one Biſhop, and he an Heretick. So ſays Acacius in his Letter to Pope Simplicius, and Felix in his Synodick Epiſtle to all the Monks and Archimandrites at Conſtantinople and in Bithynia. The ſame is likewiſe atteſted by Theophanes in his Chronicon, pag. 107; and by Gelaſius in the Geſta de nomine Acacii. Yet Liberatus affirms Petrus was ordained by more Biſhops than one, although he expreſſes not their number. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXI.

That Symeones a Monk belonging to the Monaſtery of the Acœmeti went to Rome, and accuſed thoſe Biſhops ſent from the Romans to Conſtantinople as having held Communion with Hereticks; and, that theſe Legates, and thoſe Perſons who held Communion with Petrus, were depoſed by the Romans.

THeſe [accuſations] were much increaſed by Symeones, one of thoſe Monks termed the Acœmeti, who was ſent [to Rome] from Cyrillus. For this Perſon accuſed Miſenus and Vitalis for having communicated with Hereticks; [he averred] that the name of Petrus was publickly recited in the Sacred Diptycks, and that by this means many of the ſimpler ſort were impoſed upon by Hereticks, who affirmed that Petrus was received [to Communion] even by the See of Rome. Symeones added likewiſe, that when ſeveral queſtions [were propoſed,] Miſenus and his Companions would not allow of a Conference with any Perſon that was Orthodox, or make a delivery of Letters to them, or take an exact ſcrutiny of any thing that was audaciouſly attempted againſt the true Faith. Sylvanus a Preſbyter (one that had converſed with Miſenus and Vitalis at Conſtantinople,) was likewiſe brought in, who confirmed what had been ſaid by the Monks. Moreover, Acacius's [a] Letter to Simplicius was read, [wherein Acacius] affirmed, that Petrus had been long ſince Depoſed; and that he was a Son of Night. And on theſe accounts Miſenus and Vitalis were removed from the Sacerdotal Function, and ſeparated from the undefiled Communion; the whole Synod having given their vote in theſe expreſs words: The Church of the Romans doth not receive [to Communion] the Heretick Petrus, who hath long ſince been both condemned by the Vote of the Sacred Chair, and alſo Excommunicated and Anathematized. Againſt whom (though nothing elſe were objected, yet) even this would be ſufficient, that having been ordained by Hereticks, he could not preſide over the Orthodox. This alſo was contained [in the ſaid Sentence:] [b] But, that Acacius [Biſhop] of Conſtantinople deſerves a ſevere reproof, the thing it ſelf has demonſtrated; becauſe in his Letter to Simplicius he has termed Petrus an Heretick, but at this preſent hath not detected

[a] This Letter of Acacius's is extant, ſet forth in Latine amongſt the Epiſtles of Pope Simplicius. The ſame Letter is mentioned in Pope Felix's Epiſtle, which contains Acacius's Sentence of Depoſition. Valeſ.

[b] Ἀλλὰ τὸν τῆς. We have added the Particle δὲ, But, from the detected it to the Emperour: for he ought, if he had loved Zeno, to have done this; but he loves the Emperour with a greater ardency of affection, [c] than he has for the Faith. But let us reduce our Relation to the [d] following Series of affairs. There is extant an Epistle of Acacius's, [written] to the Bishops in Egypt, and to the Ecclesiasticks and Monks, and to the whole Body of the Laity; wherein he has attempted to repair and make up the Schism which had hapned. Concerning which affair he wrote also to Petrus Bishop of Alexandria.

Florentine MS. which particle casts a great light upon this place.

the same Florentine Manuscript at the side of these words, this Scholion was written; Οὐ λέγει ἔτι ἐνταῦθα πέως πεπανῶς τὸν Ἀκάκιον ὑπὸ τῆ ἰδίως καθαιρεθῆναι. Θεόδωρος δὲ μάλιστα καὶ ὁ Κίλιξ βασίλειος πεπανῶς αὐτὸ φασι. That is, This Author does not say here expressly, that Acacius was deposed by the [Bishop] of Rome: but Theodorus and Basilius Cilix do manifestly affirm this. Nicephorus (book 16 chap. 17.) attests the same concerning Basilius Cilix. Further, our Evagrius is undeservedly reproved by that Scholiast, because at this place he speaks nothing of Acacius's Deposition. Evagrius does here relate all things that were transacted in the Roman Synod, which was convened in the year of Christ 484. against Vitalis and Misenus Legates of the Apostolick See. In that Synod Vitalis and Misenus were indeed deprived of the honour of the Priesthood. But Acacius was only reprehended and rebuked, as 'tis apparent from the Decree of the Synod, here recorded by Evagrius. After this, Felix sent his Synodick Letters to Acacius; wherein these words occurred; Peccasti, ne adjicias, & de prioribus supplica, You have offended, make no addition, and supplicate for [your] former [failings.] After receipt of which Letters, when Acacius still stood out, and committed Facts worse than the former; Pope Felix (the Bishop's being a second time convened,) promulged a Sentence of Deposition against Acacius, and directed it to Acacius, by Tutus Defensor of the Roman Church; which [Sentence] begins thus: Multarum transgressionum reperiris obnoxius, You are found guilty of many transgressions. That these things were transacted in this manner, Pope Felix informs us in his Synodick Letter, to the Presbyters and Archimandrites at Constantinople and throughout Bithynia. For, after he had written concerning Vitalis and Misenus, and concerning Acacius, who were condemned in the Roman Synod, he adds these words: Post illam sententiam quæ in Acacium perturbatorem totius Orientis Ecclesiæ dicta est, &c. After that Sentence which hath been pronounced against Acacius, the disturber of the whole Eastern Church, being now also convened, we have added to these Letters, &c. And a little after; Unde nunc causâ Antiochenæ Ecclesiæ, &c. Wherefore being at this present convened in the presence of the Blessed Apostle Peter on account of the Antiochian Church, we do again hasten to declare to your love the Custom which hath always obtained amongst us. From which words it appears, that this Letter was written by Felix, in the name of the third Roman Synod, which had been assembled on account of the Antiochian Church; which after Calendion was ejected, Petrus Fullo had invaded. In this Synod therefore Felix had dictatedt he Sentence against Acacius, (which begins thus; Multarum transgressionum reperiris obnoxius, You are found guilty of many transgressions;) and had transmitted it to Acacius, by Tutus the Defensor. Nor can any one say, that that Sentence was pronounc'd before in the second Roman Synod, at such time as Vitalis and Misenus were condemned; but was sent a little afterwards by Felix, by the order of the Third Roman Synod. For Evagrius refutes this, who does not say, that the Sentence of Deposition was pronounc'd against Acacius in that Roman Synod wherein Vitalis and Misenus were condemned. Besides, Liberatus in his Breviarium (chap. 18.) does manifestly declare, that that Sentence of Deposition against Acacius was pronounc'd long after the Condemnation of Vitalis and Misenus. For hear what Liberatus says; Redeunt aliquando Legati. Sed præcesserunt Monachi, &c. At length the Legates return. But the Monks had gone before, who in a grievous manner accused them of Treachery. Having been forthwith heard and convicted from those Letters which they had brought, they are removed from their own places. And after some few words; Ubi ergo ad plenum detectus est Acacius Hæreticus, &c When therefore the Heretick Acacius was fully detected, Pope Felix put these words in his Synodick Letters: You have offended, make no addition, and supplicate for [your] former [failings.] Acacius having received these Letters, persists in the same mind, neither receding from Petrus's Communion, nor yet perswading him openly to embrace the Chalcedon Synod and the Tome of Pope Leo. Pope Felix understanding this, sent a Writing of Condemnation to Acacius by Tutus the Defensor; the beginning whereof is this, You are found guilty of many Transgressions. Vales.

[c] Καὶ τῷ πίστιν ἀγαπᾶ. In the Florentine and Tellerian MSS. and in Nicephorus, the Reading is, ὃ τῷ πίστιν ἀσπᾶ, Loves not the Faith. But it would be better written thus; ἢ τὴν πίστιν ἀγαπᾶ. Thus Christophorson seems to have read, and so we have rendred it. At the Clause immediately foregoing, instead of [Δεῖ ἐάφ ἠγάπα τὸν ζωώνα τῦτο πεᾶξαι, For he ought, if he had loved Zeno, to have done this;] I would rather read thus; εἴπερ ἠσάπα τῷ πίστιν· μᾶλλον ἢ τὴν ζήνωνα, &c. Whereas, if he had loved the Faith rather than Zeno, he ought to have done this.

[d] After the Roman Synod which was convened on the account of Vitalis and Misenus, and wherein Vitalis and Misenus had been condemned; but Petrus and Acacius were only reproved and rebuked; it was consequent that Evagrius should have spoken concerning the Sentence of Deposition pronounc'd against Acacius, and sent to Constantinople by Tutus the Defensor. And yet Evagrius has not done this here. Whereof two Reasons may be assigned. For, either this was done by Evagrius in Reverence to the Constantinopolitan See; or else, because Evagrius had related that before from Zacharias Rhetor; as may be seen in the eighteenth Chapter. What therefore he had declared there, he look'd upon as superfluous to repeat at this place. Vales.

CHAP. XXII.

Concerning the Disturbances at Alexandria, and in several [other] places, on account of the Synod at Chalcedon.

THE Schism therefore increasing at Alexandria, Petrus (after he had [a] again Anathematized Leo's Epistle, and the Acts of the Chalcedon Synod, and those Persons who would not embrace the Writings of Dioscorus and Timotheus;) perswaded some of the Bishops and Archimandrites to communicate with himself. And because he could not induce others [to do the same,] he drove most of them from their own Monasteries. For which Reasons [b] Nephalius made a journey to the imperial City, and gave Zeno an account of these matters. Whereat Zeno was sorely troubled, and sends Cosmas, one of his own Protectors [to Alexandria;] who gave forth many and great Menaces against Petrus on account of [procuring an] Unity, in regard by his own roughness he had raised a great Dissention. But Cosmas, when nothing succeeded according to his wish and design, returned to the Imperial City, having only restored the ejected Monks to their own Monasteries. Again therefore the Emperour sends Arsenius, whom he had preferred to be Prefect of Egypt and Dux of the Companies of the Militia. He being arrived at Alexandria in company with Nephalius, made a Speech concerning Unity. But when he could not perswade [them to it,] he sent some of them to the Imperial City. Moreover, many Disputes were held before Zeno concerning the Synod at Chalcedon: but nothing was brought to effect, because Zeno did not * wholly assent to the Synod at Chalcedon.

[a] I have made good this place from the Florentine MS. in this manner, Λέοντ⟨ος⟩ αὖθις ἀναθεματίσας, After he had again Anathematized, &c. For Petrus Mongus condemned not the Chalcedon Synod together with Leo's Epistle, once, but oftner. Vales.

CHAP. XXIII.

Concerning Fravita and Euphemius [Bishops] of Constantinople; and concerning Athanasius and Johannes [Bishops] of Alexandria: also concerning Palladius and Flavianus [Prelates] of Antioch; and concerning some other Persons.

BUT Acacius [Bishop] of Constantinople having [a] in this interim gone the common way [of Mankind,] Fravita succeeded him in his Bishop, Further, 'tis to be observed, that Evagrius does in the first place relate Acacius's death. For, of those three Schismaticks who rent in sunder the Oriental Church, (to wit, Acacius Bishop of Constantinople, Petrus of Alexandria, and Petrus of Antioch;) the first that departed out of this Life (says Evagrius) was Acacius; then Petrus [Bishop] of Alexandria, who was termed Mongus; and last laſt of all died Petrus Fullo. But Victor Tunonenſis in his Chronicon relates, that the firſt that died of thoſe three I have mentioned, was Petrus [Biſhop] of Antioch. For his words are theſe: Poſt Conſulatum ſecundum Longini, &c. After Longinus's ſecond Conſulate, Petrus [Biſhop] of Antioch dies under condemnation, and in his place Calendion is ordained. But the Eaſtern Biſhops, as Perſons ignorant, conſecrate Johannes ſurnamed Codonatus, Biſhop over the ſaid Antiochian Church, to whom ſucceeded Petrus the Heretick. This was the year of Chriſt 488. Dynamius and Siſidius being Conſuls. But on the year following, wherein Probinus and Euſebius were Conſuls, the ſame Victor Tunonenſis records Acacius's death in theſe words: Euſebio V. C. Coſ. Acacius Conſtantinopolitanus Epiſcopus ſub damnatione moritur, &c. The moſt famous Perſonage Euſebius being Conſul, Acacius Biſhop of Conſtantinople dies under condemnation, and in his room Flavita is ordained Biſhop; to whom (he dying in the third month of his Promotion,) Euphemius Keeper of the Decrees of the Chalcedon Synod was ſucceſſor in the Biſhoprick. And on the next year, Longinus and Fauſtus being the ſecond time Conſuls, the ſame Victor relates, that Petrus [Biſhop] of Alexandria died under Condemnation. But Baronius, in his Eccleaſiaſtick Annals, relates indeed the death of theſe three Schiſmaticks in the ſame order with Victor Tunonenſis, but not on the ſame year. For he ſays, that Petrus Fullo died on the year of our Lord's Nativity 486. And, that Acacius died two years after that, that is, on the year of Chriſt 488: But in Mongus's death he agrees exactly with Victor. But I had rather follow Victor's Opinion, who places Fullo's death on the year of Chriſt 488. For Calendion was created Biſhop of Antioch on the year of our Lord's Nativity 482, as 'tis manifeſt from Pope Simplicius's Epiſtle; and in regard he held that Biſhoprick four years, as Theophanes does atteſt; it muſt neceſſarily be ſaid that Petrus Fullo, who on Calendion's being ejected was put into his place, had poſſeſſion of the See of Antioch on the year of Chriſt 486. But who can believe that Petrus Fullo, who committed ſo many and ſuch notorious Facts during the time of his Epiſcopate, ſhould have died a few months after his promotion? Petrus Fullo therefore died not on the year of Chriſt 486, as Baronius thought. But this Argument is with eaſe refuted; for 'tis grounded barely on Theophanes's Authority, who attributes four years to Calendion's ſitting Biſhop. But Calendion ſate Biſhop during the ſpace of one year only. For he was ejected by the treachery of his Ordainer Acacius, a little after the Roman Synod, on the year of Chriſt 483; as we are informed from Pope Felix's Letter to all the Presbyters and Archimandrites at Conſtantinople and throughout Bithynia, and from the Author of the Geſta de Nomine Acacii. But Theophanes and Cedrenus are notoriouſly miſtaken, who relate that Petrus Fullo departed this life after Petrus Mongus. Whom Pope Gelaſius has refuted in his Epiſtle to the Orientals, who does atteſt that of thoſe two Petrus Fullo died firſt. Valeſ.

[b] Theophanes relates, that Fravita wrote Synodick Letters to Petrus [Biſhop] of Alexandria, wherein he denied that he communicated with Felix Biſhop of Rome. And on the other hand, that he ſent Synodick Letters to Felix, wherein he declared to him, that he had no ſociety or Communion with Petrus [Biſhop] of Alexandria. Theophanes aſſigns only three months continuance in his Biſhoprick to the ſame Fravita; as does likewiſe Victor Tunonenſis; and not four, as Evagrius affirms in this Chapter. Valeſ.

This Athanaſius having after this ſent Synodick Letters to Palladius Succeſſor to [d] Petrus in the Biſhoprick of Antioch, did the ſame [that Petrus had done] in relation to the Synod at Chalcedon. The very ſame was likewiſe performed by Johannes, who after Athanaſius ſucceeded in the Alexandrian Chair. And after the death of Palladius Prelate of the Church at Antioch, when Flavianus had ſucceeded him in his Chair, Solomon a Presbyter of Antioch is ſent by him to Alexandria, who carried * his Synodick Letters, and requeſted Johannes's Letter in anſwer to Flavianus. But after this Johannes, another Johannes ſucceeds in the Chair of Alexandria. And theſe things proceeded in the ſame manner [as I have mentioned] † till the beginning of [the Emperour] Anaſtaſius's Reign. For he ejected Euphemius [out of his Biſhoprick.] Which [tranſactions] I was neceſſitated to joyn together in one continued ſeries, both for perſpicuity's ſake, and alſo that they might with more celerity be underſtood.

[d] Evagrius ſays not expreſly, on what year Petrus Biſhop of Antioch died; nor can it be gathered from his words that he died after Petrus Biſhop of Alexandria. Yea, rather the contrary may be extracted from Evagrius's words. For if Petrus Biſhop of Antioch had ſurvived Petrus Alexandrinus, doubtleſs Athanaſius, who ſucceeded Petrus Biſhop of Alexandria, would have ſent his Synodick Letters to Petrus Biſhop of Antioch. For theſe Synodick Letters were wont to be ſent by the Patriarchs at the very beginning of their Patriarchate. In regard therefore Athanaſius ſent his Synodick Letters to Palladius Biſhop of Antioch, it appears from thence, that Petrus Antiochenus died long before Petrus Alexandrinus. Further, concerning Athanaſius's Synodick Letters, Liberatus in his Breviarium ſays theſe words, Non poſt multum tempus, &c. No long time after dies alſo Petrus Mongus at Alexandria, and after him Athanaſius is ordained in that See: who himſelf alſo communicated with the Conſtantinopolitan, Antiochian, and Hieroſolymitan Church in the Edict. Valeſ.

* Flavianus's.

† Or, Till ſometimes of Anaſtaſius.

[c] There were at Alexandria two ſorts of Hereticks; to wit, the Dioſcoritæ, and the Eſaiani: concerning whom Liberatus ſpeaks in his Breviary. The Dioſcoritæ wholly condemned and anathematized the Chalcedon Synod. But the Eſaiani, following Zeno's Edict [that is, his Henoticon,] did not indeed in any wiſe admit that Synod; yet they pronounc'd not an Anathema againſt it. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXIV.

Concerning the ſlaughter of Armatus, who was kinſman to the Empreſs Verina.

BUT Zeno, by the perſwaſion of Illus, ſlew Armatus alſo, who was the Empreſs Verina's kinſman, whom, when he ſent [againſt him] by Baſiliſcus, Zeno had [a] enſnared with gifts, and, inſtead of being an Enemy, had made him a Friend and an Auxiliary. He alſo creates his Son Baſiliſcus, Cæſar, at the City Nicæa. But when he was come to Byzantium, he ſlays Armatus by treachery. But he makes his Son Baſiliſcus, inſtead of being a Cæſar, a Presbyter. Who was afterwards promoted to the Epiſcopal dignity.

[a] Zeno brought over Armatus to his own ſide, not only by gifts and preſents, but by promiſes alſo. For he promiſed, that as ſoon as he had recovered the Empire, he would make Armatus Perpetual Magiſter [or Maſter,] of the preſent Militia; and his Son Baſiliſcus, Cæſar, and his own Aſſeſſour; as Theophanes tells us in his Chronicon, pag. 107. Whoſe words, becauſe they are corrupted, nor could be underſtood by the Tranſlatour, I will annex here. Ἀλλὰ δώρεαις τοῖς παρὰ ζήνωνος, καὶ ἔτι ὡς ὅτι πολὺ τυφλωθεὶς, καὶ ἀστοχάστῳ διαδόχῳ στρατηλατείας, καὶ τὸν υἱὸν αὐτοῦ βασιλίσκον καίσαρα ποιῆσαι καὶ συγκλητεύσειν αὐτῷ, σὺν αὐτῷ καὶ βασιλίσκῳ ἐπανῆλθεν. That is, But he alſo (as it frequently [happens]) being blinded with gifts [ſent] from Zeno, and with a promiſe of the perpetual Maſterſhip of the Milice, and that Zeno would make his Son Baſiliſcus, Cæſar, and his Aſſeſſour; returned with Zeno againſt Baſiliſcus. I write therefore, καὶ ἀστοχάστῳ διαδόχῳ στρατηλατείας, and with a promiſe of the perpetual Maſterſhip of the Milice. Theophanes terms the perpetual Maſterſhip of the Milice ἀδιαδόχον στρατηλατείαν. The Author of the Alexandrian Chronicle does fully confirm our Emendation. For he writes, that Zeno had made a promiſe to Armatus, that he would grant to him the Magiſterial power of the preſent Milice as long as he ſhould live. Suidas relates much concerning this Armatus, in the word ἀρμάτου; which ſeems to have been taken out of Damaſcius in the Life of Hiſydorus the Philoſopher. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXV.

Concerning the Rebellion of * Theodoricus the Scythian; and concerning the same person's death.

* Or, Theudericus.

THeudericus, by Nation a Scythian, made an insurrection also against Zeno: and having gathered together his own Forces in the [Country] of the Thracians, undertakes an Expedition against † him. And when he had ruined all the Countries before him, as far as the mouth of Pontus, he wanted but little of taking the Imperial City it self; [and had seized it,] had not some of his Greatest Confidents, induced thereto [by gifts,] entred into a Consult ‖ about taking him off. Being informed therefore of this ill design of his own friends against him, he marched back; and not long after this is numbred amongst those departed this life. Moreover, I will declare the manner of his death, which hapned thus. [a] A Javelin fitted with a loop of leather to cast it with, was hung up before his Tent, agreeable to the mode of the Barbarians. Having therefore a mind to exercise his body, he ordered his horse to be brought to him. And it being not customary with him to make use of a [b] Strator, he mounted his horse without any help. But the horse, being a beast unmanaged and fiery, before Theodoricus had bestridden him and settled himself, rises with his fore-feet, and began to go forwards upright on his hinder feet only. So that Theodoricus striving with his horse, and not daring to [c] curb him with the Bridle, least he should fall backwards upon him, nor yet being firmly seated in his Saddle, was tossed this way and that way, and thrown upon the point [of his Javelin,] which ran obliquely into him, and wounded his side. Being conveyed from thence therefore to his bed, and having continued alive some few days, he died of that wound.

† Zeno.

[a] Δόρυ ἀμπεχυλαμβάνον. In the exposition of this word Translatours have been mistaken. Langus renders it Hastam expeditam, a Javelin fitted up and in readiness. Musculus, according to his own usage, having not a Latine word ready at hand, retained the Greek one. But Christophorson has rendred it worst of all, thus, Hastam cuspide bifidâ, a Javelin with a double point. I have translated it Hastam amentatam, a Javelin fitted with a loop of leather to cast it with. For ἀγκύλη is the same with Amentum; to wit, the thong wherewith Darts or Javelins were bound about, that they might be cast against the Enemy. The Old Glosses out of the Library of Petrus Daniel quoted by Turnebus, explain it thus: Amentum, corrigia lanceæ, quæ etiam ansula est ad jactum, that is, Amentum, the Latchets of a Launce, which is also a little handle to cast it. Where ansula is the same with ἀγκύλη, to wit, that whereby a Dart is held that it may be thrown. Hesychius expounds ἀμπεχυλίδες thus, τὸ ἐνεῖρεαι τοὺς δακτύλους τῇ ἀγκύλῃ τὸ ἀκοντίῳ. Τίθεται δὲ καὶ ὅπι τὸ ἕτοιμον ἔχει, to fit [or clasp together] the fingers about the leather-latchet of a missile weapon. 'Tis likewise used to signifie, to be ready. So Æschylus made use of this phrase, ἀγκυλημάτων κοτταβίδες, sounds made by the lashings of leather-thongs, [See Hesychius, in the word κόττα βος:] a Metaphor taken ἀπὸ τῶν δοράτων, ἅπερ ἀγκυλίδα καὶ ἀμεντάσκυλα ἐκάλουν, from those Javelins, which they termed amentata [that is, fitted with loops of leather to fling them with;] as Eustathius tells us, at the Second Book of the Iliads. Now, there was a double use of the Amentum. For, it conduced both to the holding of the Dart, and also that it might be thrown against the Enemy with a greater force. Valesius.

[b] Ἀναβολῆ δὲ οὐκ εἰωθὼς χρῆσθαι. In the incomparable Florentine MS. I found it plainly written ἀναβολεῖ, as Learned men had conjectured the reading should be. Now, ἀναβολεὺς is the same with him whom the Latines term a Strator, who is wont to lift his Master on horseback; as Suidas attests: in which Author there is a passage extant of an ancient Writer, who says these words concerning King Massanissa, ὁ δὲ μασσανίσσας γηραιὸς ἵππου χωρὶς ἀναβολέως ἐπέβαινε, But this Massanissa when he was old mounted his horse without a Strator. Where Suidas seems to have taken the word ἀναβολεὺς for a Scale which we vulgarly term a Stirrup. Valesius.

[c] Ἀναστειλεῖν. I think it must be made ἀναστειρέζειν, as 'tis in the Tellerian MS. For so the Analogy requires it should; as from πεῖρα is derived πειράζειν. Suidas expounds ἀναστειρέζειν thus, ἀναδήλειν, ἀναχαλινῶν, to pull back, to curb. But Nicephorus, instead of this word, made use of ἀναστέλλειν, to repress, or, to draw back. Further, the death of Theodoricus hapned on the year of Christ 481, as Marcellinus in his Chronicon attests, in these words: Placidio solo Coss. Theodoricus Triarii filius Rex Gothorum, &c. Placidius being Consul alone Theodoricus Triarius's Son King of the Goths, taking his Forces [along with him] as far as Anaplum, arrives at the distance of four miles from the City; but having done no harm to any of the Romans, returned forthwith. Further, hasting into Illyricum, whilest he was going between the moving Carriages of his own Army, he is wounded and striken thorow with the point of a dart lying upon one of the Wagons, [occasioned] by the motion of his own horse who started, and dies. Valesius.

CHAP. XXVI.

Concerning Marcianus's Insurrection; and what hapned in Relation to him.

[a] AFter these things, Marcianus (the Son of Anthemius who had been Emperour of Rome, a kinsman by marriage to Leo Zeno's predecessour in the Empire; for he had married Leontia Leo's younger daughter;) having disagreed with Zeno, made an attempt to set up for a Tyrant. And a sharp engagement happning about the Palace, wherein many fell on either side; Marcianus routs his opposers. And [by that attack] had possest himself of the Palace, had he not let that opportunity slip, by deferring that action till the morrow. For, Opportunity is a swift-wing'd Bird, and, whilst she flies at your feet, may peradventure be taken. But after she has avoided your hands, on a sudden she mounts on high, and derides those who pursue her, not suffering her self to be catcht by them in future. On which account therefore * Statuaries and Painters make her hair long before, but have the hinder part of her head to the very skin: with great prudence intimating thereby, that as long as Opportunity is behind, she may be perhaps laid hold on by her long hair: but being got before, she makes a perfect escape, not having any thing whereby she may be taken hold of by the Pursuer. Which very thing at that time befell Marcianus, who lost that opportunity which was seasonably offered him, and was not in future able to recover it. For, on the morrow he was betrayed by his own party; and having been wholly deserted, fled to the Church of the Divine Apostles. Whence he was drawn out by force, and banish'd to Cæsarea a City of the Cappadocians. Where keeping company with some Monks, he was afterwards found out to design a private escape. On which account he was by the Emperour sent to Tarsus of Cilicia, and having had his hair shorn, is ordained a Presbyter. These Transactions are with great elegancy written by Eustathius the Syrian.

[a] Theophanes relates this commotion of Marcianus's (in like manner as our Evagrius does,) soon after the death of Theodoricus the Son of Triarius. But Malchus dissents, in his Byzantine History. For he tells us, that Theodoricus Triarius having heard of Marcianus's Sedition, forthwith drew together vast Forces, and marched towards Constantinople; pretending to give the Emperour assistance; but in reality, that he might make himself master of the Imperial City. Malchus's words, if any one be desirous of reading them, occurr at pag. 86 of the King's Edition. Further, Procopius Marcianus's brother, after Marcianus was taken, and his Tyranny suppresst, fled into Græcia to Theodoricus. And when Zeno sent an Embassy requiring him to be delivered up to himself, he could never prevail to get that done by Theodoricus; as Candidus say, in his Second Book; and Malchus, in the book now cited. Valesius.

CHAP. XXVII.

Concerning the Tyranny of Illus and Leontius.

THE ſame Euſtathius relates, that Zeno framed innumerable deſigns and intrigues, even againſt Verina his own mother in Law; and, that after theſe things, he baniſh'd her into the Country of the Cilicians: but, that afterward, when Illus's Tyranny broke out, Verina remov'd to that termed the Caſtle of Papirius, and there ended her life. Moreover, the ſame Euſtathius hath written the Affairs of Illus with much Eloquence; how, having been treacherouſly laid wait for by Zeno, he made his eſcape; and, in what manner Zeno delivered up that perſon [to Illus] to be put to death, whom he had ordered to murder Illus; [paying him with] the loſs of his head, which reward Zeno gave him for his unſucceſsfullneſs in that attempt. Illus alſo was declared Maſter of the Oriental Milice by Zeno, who made made it his buſineſs to conceal [thoſe treacherous deſigns he had framed againſt Illus.] But Illus, having taken into an aſſociation with himſelf Leontius, and one Marſus a perſon eminent and skilful, and Pamprepius, went into the Eaſtern parts. Then [the ſaid Euſtathius relates] Leontius's being proclaimed Emperour, which was done at Tarſus of Cilicia; and alſo, what theſe perſons got by their Tyranny; Theodoricus (a perſon by original extract a Goth, and who was a man of eminency amongſt the Romans,) being ſent againſt them, with an Army conſiſting partly of Romans and partly of Barbarians. The ſame Euſtathius does very ingeniouſly deſcribe the ſlaughter of theſe perſons, which in a cruel manner was effected by Zeno's order, [he repaying them with this reward] for their Benevolence [they had ſhown] to himſelf: and, that Theodoricus, [a] made ſenſible of Zeno's treacherous deſigns [againſt himſelf,] departed to the Seniour Rome: (But others aſſirm, [b] that [Theodoricus made this journey into Italy] by Zeno's perſwaſion:) and having vanquiſhed Odoacer in an Engagement, made himſelf Maſter of Rome, and aſſumed to himſelf the name [only] of King.

[a] Τῆς ϑαλῆς διδόμενον ζήνωνος, made ſenſible of Zeno's intent. In the Florent. MS. 'tis truer written, thus, τῆς ὀπϑαλῆς, &c. made ſenſible of Zeno's treacherous deſigns, &c. Valeſ.

[b] Ὡς ϗ ἐπιϑήκη ζήνωνος. Tranſlatours ſaw not the meaning of this place; they were deceived by an ill punctation. But, by placing a middle diſtinction after theſe words, I have caſt a light upon this paſſage. For Evagrius ſays, two reaſons were brought, which had moved Theodoricus to go into Italy. The firſt was becauſe Zeno plotted againſt him. The ſecond is aſſigned in theſe words, But others affirm that, &c. Indeed, in the Excerpta of that old Author, which I publiſh'd long ſince at the end of Amm. Marcellinus, Theodoricus is ſaid to have gone into Italy with the conſent of Zeno. For theſe are the words there, at pag. 479; Zeno recompenſans beneficiis Theodoricum, &c. Zeno recompenſing Theodoricus with gifts, whom he made Patricius and Conſul, giving him much; and ſending him into Italy, made an agreement with him, that if Odoacer ſhould be vanquiſhed, from the merit of his own labours, he ſhould only reign before, in his room whileſt he ſhould live. [Loco ejus dum adviveret, in his room whileſt he ſhould live; ſo 'tis worded in this note of Valeſius's here: but in the forementioned Excerpta of the old Author, the reading is, loco ejus dum adveniret, in his room whileſt he ſhould come.] Jordanes does alſo atteſt the ſame in his Geticks, and in his Book de Succeſſione Regnorum. Valeſ.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Concerning Mammianus, and the * Structures [built by] him.

* Or, Works.

JOhannes the Rhetorician relates, that during the Reign of Zeno, one Mammianus, from being a Sedentary Mechanick, became an eminent perſon, and arrived at the Senatorian Order; and, that this Mammianus built that Edifice termed The [a] Antiphorum in the Suburb Daphne, (which place had before had Vines in it, and was fit for Tillage;) oppoſite to the publick Bath; wherein is erected a Brazen Statue, [with this Inſcription,] MAMMIANUS A LOVER OF THE CITY. [The ſame Johannes adds,] that he raiſed two Royal Porticus's in the City, for building very magnificent, and beautified with the ſplendour and brightneſs of Stones. And, that between the two Royal Porticus's, The Tetrapylum a middle Edifice was erected by him, moſt exquiſitely adorned with Columns and * Braſs. * Or, matters of braſs, I my ſelf have ſeen the Royal Porticus's, which, together with their name, do ſtill retain the Remains of their former Beauty; their floor being paved with Proconneſian Marble. But, the [reſt of the] Building has nothing of excellency. For, by reaſon of thoſe Calamities which have befaln them, they have of late been repair'd, [b] nothing being added that might beautifie them. But, of the Tetrapylum erected by Mammianus we have not found ſo much as the very * Foundation. * Or, Footſtep.
